Casella's suite once more gave pleasure and confirmed the favorable impression which it made when played here last October. Mr. Monteux gave a remarkably impressive reading of the César Franck Symphonic Piece, one which was in keeping with the exalted tone of the music and he also brought to Weber's overture an agreeable freshness and sincerity. This ability to rejuvenate works of the older repertory has long been one of Mr. Monteux's most noticeable characteristics. It is a great quality in a conductor appearing before the same audience week after week. The playing of the orchestra was, as usual, brilliant, particularly in the pieces by Franck and Casella.

MONITOR - JAN. 21.

Popular Orchestral Concerts

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in deigning to give an extra performance once a month this season, has fallen in line with Frederick Stock, who has long led the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Emil Oberhoffer, who against odds of one sort and another is keeping the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra going, and Rudolph Ganz, who last year succeeded Max Zach in the direction of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. In posting his show bills for five popular Monday nights, as well as for the regular twenty-four Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, the Boston conductor accepts an idea which has been widely tested in the United States, to say nothing of other countries, and found rewarding. In acknowledging that his organization owes a service to that part of the public which is interested in music moderately, as well as that part which makes it a primary diversion, he adopts a policy which other conductors have shown to be good.

And still, the out-of-course concerts of Mr. Monteux should probably be regarded as more or less an independent procedure, and not a mere imitation of what Mr. Stock of Chicago and Mr. Oberhoffer of Minneapolis have done before him, or even of what Sir Henry Wood of London did before Mr. Stock and Mr. Oberhoffer. Granted that the Monday night extra performances may be described as a tardy development in the artistic progress of Boston, they may nevertheless prove to have certain traits that are wanting in any popular musical enterprises hitherto.

The question is largely one of programs. Which of the symphony orchestra conductors who are offering popular series of concerts in addition to their regular schedule, hold high standards as to the music presented? To take Mr. Monteux first, and to judge him by the second of the two monthly programs he has given thus far, his standard is as high, beyond dispute, as that reached by his fellow-conductors in the United States. Indeed, it quite equals that of visiting conductors from Europe who in recent years have traveled on the American concert circuit with their own orchestras. A program that includes Beethoven's fifth symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" prelude and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture, and opera arias for solo singer, is veritably near to first-class. None of the Sunday afternoon popular programs got up by Mr. Ganz this season for the Odeon audiences of St. Louis, compare in seriousness with Mr. Monteux's January program. Few of the Thursday night concerts provided by Mr. Stock at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, in former seasons, have contained such significant material; and likewise but an occasional one of the Sunday afternoon popular concerts given by Mr. Oberhoffer at the Auditorium in Minneapolis has been of such importance. In St. Louis, the selections presented are almost uniformally single movements from symphonies and other short things, with an occasional concerto, performed in its entirety by orchestra and soloist. In Chicago, a complete symphony has been now and then played, the range of choice running from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony to Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor. If it is a mark of distinction for an orchestra to do without a soloist, then so much higher the rating of Chicago. For Mr. Stock has been able to interest popular audiences, unassisted by a singer or by virtuoso of the violin or the piano. In Minneapolis, Dvorák's "New World" symphony, Kallinikoff's first symphony, and Beethoven's fifth have been performed, besides complete suites of the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" type, and many of the brighter overtures and the more highly colored tone poems.

Programs, however, are not the whole of the matter. Standards of interpretation also count. Let Mr. Monteux, when conducting the fifth symphony of Beethoven at a popular concert, put his men through their parts in a careless, uninspired manner, then vanishes all acclaim of the occasion for him. Let Mr. Ganz, on the other hand, at one of his popular Sunday matinées, arouse his players to the picturesque splendors of the "Caucasian" suite of Ippolitoff-Ivanoff, and he becomes the conductor worth people's talking about. The size and scope of the undertaking, in other words, means no more than the quality of effort that goes into it.

MONITOR- JAN. 21

SYMPHONY GIVES 12TH CONCERT

Szymanovski Composition Played for First Time in America

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Szymanovski, Symphony No. 2, B flat major (first time in America); Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Cassella, Orchestral Excerpts from "The Convent on the Water"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Szymanovski who attended the rehearsals and the concert, said modestly that this symphony was composed when he was young; that if he were to use the same thematic material today he would unite certain pages in a different manner. As it was, during the week, he, of his own will, lightened the score, which, indeed, might to advantage be further changed in order to gain needed contrasts in the first movement. As Saint-Saens said, the young composer puts everything in; when he is older he takes many things out.

This symphony, first produced at Warsaw, has been frequently played in German and Austrian cities and is in the repertoire of leading orchestras of those countries. The symphony is in two sections; a first movement, an Allegro moderato; a second, comprising a theme with seven variations, ending with an elaborate fugue. Mr. Monteux omitted two of the variations. The theme and the first three variations are in the place of the conventional slow movement; the fourth is in the form of a Scherzo; the fifth and sixth are respectively a gavotte and minuet.

The chief motives of the first movement have a decided profile. The first arrests at once the attention by its decisive character; the second is of a more sensuous nature. These themes are treated with marked contrapuntal skill, but in the development there is a lack of contrast in emotional expression and in orchestral coloring. There are two stirring climaxes. As a whole, the movement appeals more to the brain than to the soul. The music has individuality, the individuality of a thinker rather than of one possessed by a vivid sense of beauty. The theme for the variations is original, unusual. Of the ingenious variations the Scherzo, Gavotte and Minuet are the most appealing. The complex Fugue is one of toil and trouble.

Mr. Szymanovski in later years composed a symphonic poem, "The Song of the Night," for orchestra, solo voice and chorus, and music for violin and piano, that are said to show a poetic imagination. A few of his songs, sung here in 1913 and 1914, showed a warmer side of his musical nature than was revealed in the symphony played yesterday. Mr. Monteux took great pains in the preparation. The orchestra overcame brilliantly the many difficulties. Yet the absence of contrasts, of varied coloring, of any direct and spontaneous outbursts of emotion, was felt by the well disposed audience.

French conductors in Paris or sojourning in this country are never weary of the symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption." It is not easy to understand this passionate regard. The music is unmistakably Franckian, but it is not of that great composer's first quality. The chief theme has the peculiar serenity, but the development is diffuse. The energetic phrase for the brass strikes one as rather cheap.

It was a pleasure to hear Cassella's music again. The Barcarolle with the wordless, haunting song, sung by Mrs. Littlefield with greater freedom than before; the Saraband and the Dance of the Chattering Old Ladies delighted the hearers even more than when the excerpts were played in October.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when the overtures to "Oberon," "Der Freischuetz" and "Euryanthe" were expected each season. The three were performed even as late as the season of 1[illegible] "Oberon" had not been heard at the subscription concerts since the latter year. Of the three it has suffered the most at the hands of time. Rezia's peroration, her "Whooping it up" at the end of the overture, no longer excites one; in fact, it now seems perfunctory and singularly suited to an orchestrion. But the slow, mysterious measures in the "Euryanthe" overture, and the greater part of the prelude to "Des Freischuetz" are still fresh and o'er mastering.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 2 (Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist); Pierne, Overture to "Ramuntcho" (first time in Boston); Basque Rhapsody from "Ramuntcho."

HERALD-JAN. 21.

CONCERT NOTES

WILHELM BACHAUS

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, this pair of concerts to be followed by a week of absence in which the orchestra will play in other cities.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, will appear as soloist at this concert, playing the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor.

TRAV. JAN. 21.

FAMILIAR pieces, for the most part, fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. One of them, however, will bring to Symphony Hall a pianist of many virtues, William Bachaus, only once before and in distant year visitor to Boston. He returns in the maturity of well grounded and well rounded powers. He will be heard in Rakhmaninov's Concerto in C minor, a testing piece, to which the composer has already made a remembering audience well disposed. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—of the dance-rhythms—will precede the Concerto. Two pieces new to Boston will follow it—the Prelude and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music written by the Parisian, Pierné, to "Ramuntcho," Pierre Loti's play of the Basque country, once produced at the Odéon by Antoine.

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons at four o'clock and through an hour thereafter, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first concerts of the season for young people. The programme for both is one and the same, viz.: Saint-Saëns's "Heroic March"; the slow movement from Beethoven's Second Symphony; the Prelude, Minuet and Carillon from Bizet's music to Daudet's play, "The Woman of Arles"; two of Dvorák's Slavonic Dances; and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi." So Mr. Monteux has chosen pieces to persuade his hearers of the teens that an orchestral concert can be amusing, interesting, generally pleasurable. He himself will conduct and the orchestra responds quickly to its youthful audience. For the most part the tickets have been distributed through schools. Adults may not purchase those that remain unless one young person—or more—accompanies them.

TRANS. JAN. 21

TIMES

n

ress: NEW YORK

JAN 22 1922

JAN 22 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played that symphony by Karel Szymanowsky, the Polish composer, that Mr. Damrosch announced for a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra before he handed it over to Mr. Coates and then gave up.

At the first anniversary, next February, of the death of Max Zach, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra after he left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will play in honor to his memory, "The Angel of Death," George W. Chatwick's tone-poem of an artist so cut off in prime.

the solo soprano, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

SERIOUS AND POETIC

Mr. Szymanowski is, or rather was, a pupil in composition of Noskowski, whose symphonic poem, "The Steppe," is well known to Boston Symphony audiences. He was born in Kiev in 1883. He now lives in New York. He has composed in many forms.

The symphony heard yesterday is not to be hastily dismissed with a word of praise or blame after a single hearing. It is not frivolous music. It is the work of a composer who has a very considerable skill in the handling of his material, who can invent beautiful melody, as shown by the theme of his second movement, and who is in dead earnest.

The first movement, in particular, is very closely woven. The mood is often melancholy or grim. Occasionally clouds part and there is a poetic vista. Whether the impression of unnecessary thickness and excessive elaboration will be dismissed on repeated hearings of the work has to be seen.

Virile Leading Voice

On first acquaintance one wishes a broader sweepe, bolder and simpler outlines. One admires the virile voice leading, the dissonances which contain few hints of that which is sensuous or ear-tickling, but craves a more varied instrumental scheme. The scoring is on the whole inclined to dullness and stinginess. On preliminary acquaintance one is impressed by the earnestness of the music without particularly taking to it. The music is learned if it is not academic. Is it possible that in sitting down to compose this work, Mr. Szymanowski insisted on maintaining a formidable mood and a contrapuntal manner, when a freer flight would have been more natural to him and more convincing to the hearer? We put this as a question, not having heard other music by Mr. Szymanowski, and not having reached any conclusion about this symphony satisfactory to ourselves.

The form of the work is unusual: a first movement, more or less after accepted models; a second movement, following without a break, in the form of variations. These variations are of such character that they suggest, now the symphony scherzo or minuet, now the slow movement and at last the fugued finale.

Composer Called to Platform

Thus there are really present all the elements of the classic symphony, with an uncommon unity of design. As a matter of fact, both movements come close together because of the intimate relations of all the themes and the cunning with which they are varied or juxtaposed. This symphony is very serious and very sincere. That is not to say that it is academic. It is a symphony to be heard again. It was well received yesterday, and the composer called to the platform where he bowed his thanks to orchestra and audience.

Franck's interlude from the "Redemption" must be ranked among his poorest music. It is theatrical and cheap. It savors of Meyerbeer far more than of the lofty soul which originated the great symphony, the quartet and quintet and other of the music of the truly noble Franck.

Casella's Suite

The outstanding impression of the concert is the performance of Casella's suite. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for playing it a second time in a season. Ultra-modern in harmony and instrumental coloring, it produces very wonderfully the sense of beautiful far off things, of another and incomparably more gorgeous age. Mrs. Littlefield sang admirably the voice part in the Barcarolle. The effect haunts the memory, as does that of the entire suite, which is now seen to be a delightful and significant addition to the modern repertory.

Finally Weber's overture to "Oberon" was played with a fancy and a spirit which breathed fresh flame into its dying embers, and made one realize again the fresh and youthful genius of the composer.

---

incidental solo for soprano voice which diversifies Casella's piece.

This number and the two familiar classics which filled the rest of the concert were especially well played. The symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption" has never sounded so impressive at these concerts, nor has Weber's overture to "Oberon" ever been more vividly played. Mr Monteux can do much more than justice to such romantic music as these pieces.

In them his work has the imaginative delicacy and the extraordinary technical competence that often seem to fail him in dealing with the music of such greater, and therefore less human, composers as Mozart and Wagner, and too often Beethoven. He is, of course, in everything a capable routine conductor. But at his best he is much more than that a fact some of his audiences still fail to realize.

Next week Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Second Pianoforte Concerto and numbers from Pierne's incidental music for Pierre Loti's dramatization of his novel, "Ramuntcho," fill the program. Wilhelm Bachaus will be the soloist, reappearing after many years of absence.

GLOBE-JAN. 16

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on January 20. The program was as follows: Szymanowski, Symphony No. 2; Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Casella, Suite from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon."

The symphony by Szymanowski, played for the first time in America, might be characterized as a symphony for the violin. The opening theme is first stated by a solo violin which plays a prominent part throughout the remainder of the work and practically all the important melodic designs are confided to the first violins, in unison or divided into groups. The symphony is somewhat novel in form as it is in only two divisions, the second of which is a theme with variations so arranged in matters of tempo and mood as to furnish the contrasts usually offered by the more conventional adagio, scherzo, and finale. This innovation is a not unhappy one, though the day of the symphonic variation is perhaps past.

The harmonic scheme of this symphony is richly chromatic, in fact the uninterrupted flow of chromatic harmonies produces a restless and sometimes incoherent effect. The orchestration, while skillful, is also monotonous and at times thick. All the instruments seem to be playing nearly all the time and one longs for a moment of relaxation from the ceaseless succession of notes. There are also many sequences and similar devices, which are not out of place in themselves and yet tend to increase the prevailing monotony. The finale fugue may be a marvel of contrapuntal ingenuity. Its musical effect, however, was one of extreme harshness.

Casella's suite once more gave pleasure and confirmed the favorable impression which it made when played here last October. Mr. Monteux gave a remarkably impressive reading of the César Franck Symphonic Piece, one which was in keeping with the exalted tone of the music and he also brought to Weber's overture an agreeable freshness and sincerity. This ability to rejuvenate works of the older repertory has long been one of Mr. Monteux's most noticeable characteristics. It is a great quality in a conductor appearing before the same audience week after week. The playing of the orchestra was, as usual, brilliant, particularly in the pieces by Franck and Casella.

MONITOR-JAN. 21.

Popular Orchestral Concerts

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in deigning to give an extra performance once a month this season, has fallen in line with Frederick Stock, who has long led the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Emil Oberhoffer, who against odds of one sort and another is keeping the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra going, and Rudolph Ganz, who last year succeeded Max Zach in the direction of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. In posting his show bills for five popular Monday nights, as well as for the regular twenty-four Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, the Boston conductor accepts an idea which has been widely tested in the United States, to say nothing of other countries, and found rewarding. In acknowledging that his organization owes a service to that part of the public which is interested in music moderately, as well as that part which makes it a primary diversion, he adopts a policy which other conductors have shown to be good.

And still, the out-of-course concerts of Mr. Monteux should probably be regarded as more or less an independent procedure, and not a mere imitation of what Mr. Stock of Chicago and Mr. Oberhoffer of Minneapolis have done before him, or even of what Sir Henry Wood of London did before Mr. Stock and Mr. Oberhoffer. Granted that the Monday night extra performances may be described as a tardy development in the artistic progress of Boston, they may nevertheless prove to have certain traits that are wanting in any popular musical enterprises hitherto.

The question is largely one of programs. Which of the symphony orchestra conductors who are offering popular series of concerts in addition to their regular schedule, hold high standards as to the music presented? To take Mr. Monteux first, and to judge him by the second of the two monthly programs he has given thus far, his standard is as high, beyond dispute, as that reached by his fellow-conductors in the United States. Indeed, it quite equals that of visiting conductors from Europe who in recent years have traveled on the American concert circuit with their own orchestras. A program that includes Beethoven's fifth symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" prelude and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture, and opera arias for solo singer, is veritably near to first-class. None of the Sunday afternoon popular programs got up by Mr. Ganz this season for the Odeon audiences of St. Louis, compare in seriousness with Mr. Monteux's January program. Few of the Thursday night concerts provided by Mr. Stock at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, in former seasons, have contained such significant material; and likewise but an occasional one of the Sunday afternoon popular concerts given by Mr. Oberhoffer at the Auditorium in Minneapolis has been of such importance. In St. Louis, the selections presented are almost uniformally single movements from symphonies and other short things, with an occasional concerto, performed in its entirety by orchestra and soloist. In Chicago, a complete symphony has been now and then played, the range of choice running from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony to Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor. If it is a mark of distinction for an orchestra to do without a soloist, then so much higher the rating of Chicago. For Mr. Stock has been able to interest popular audiences, unassisted by a singer or by virtuoso of the violin or the piano. In Minneapolis, Dvorák's "New World" symphony, Kallinikoff's first symphony, and Beethoven's fifth have been performed, besides complete suites of the "Peer Gynt" and "Nutcracker" type, and many of the brighter overtures and the more highly colored tone poems.

Programs, however, are not the whole of the matter. Standards of interpretation also count. Let Mr. Monteux, when conducting the fifth symphony of Beethoven at a popular concert, put his men through their parts in a careless, uninspired manner, then vanishes all acclaim of the occasion for him. Let Mr. Ganz, on the other hand, at one of his popular Sunday matinées, arouse his players to the picturesque splendors of the "Caucasian" suite of Ippolitoff-Ivanoff, and he becomes the conductor worth people's talking about. The size and scope of the undertaking, in other words, means no more than the quality of effort that goes into it.

MONITOR- JAN. 21

---

late as the season of 1914-[illegible] "Oberon" had not been heard at the subscription concerts since the latter year. Of the three it has suffered the most at the hands of time. Rezia's peroration, her "Whooping it up" at the end of the overture, no longer excites one; in fact, it now seems perfunctory and singularly suited to an orchestrion. But the slow, mysterious measures in the "Euryanthe" overture, and the greater part of the prelude to "Des Freischuetz" are still fresh and o'er mastering.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto, C minor, No. 2 (Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist); Pierne, Overture to "Ramuntcho" (first time in Boston); Basque Rhapsody from "Ramuntcho."

HERALD-JAN. 21.

CONCERT NOTES

WILHELM BACHAUS

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, this pair of concerts to be followed by a week of absence in which the orchestra will play in other cities.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, will appear as soloist at this concert, playing the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor.

TRAV. JAN. 21.

FAMILIAR pieces, for the most part, fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. One of them, however, will bring to Symphony Hall a pianist of many virtues, William Bachaus, only once before and in distant year visitor to Boston. He returns in the maturity of well grounded and well rounded powers. He will be heard in Rakhmaninov's Concerto in C minor, a testing piece, to which the composer has already made a remembering audience well disposed. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—of the dance-rhythms—will precede the Concerto. Two pieces new to Boston will follow it—the Prelude and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music written by the Parisian, Pierné, to "Ramuntcho," Pierre Loti's play of the Basque country, once produced at the Odéon by Antoine.

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons at four o'clock and through an hour thereafter, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first concerts of the season for young people. The programme for both is one and the same, viz.: Saint-Saëns's "Heroic March"; the slow movement from Beethoven's Second Symphony; the Prelude, Minuet and Carillon from Bizet's music to Daudet's play, "The Woman of Arles"; two of Dvoràk's Slavonic Dances; and the Overture to Wagner's opera "Rienzi." So Mr. Monteux has chosen pieces to persuade his hearers of the teens that an orchestral concert can be amusing, interesting, generally pleasurable. He himself will conduct and the orchestra responds quickly to its youthful audience. For the most part the tickets have been distributed through schools. Adults may not purchase those that remain unless one young person—or more—accompanies them.

TRANS. JAN 21

POST-JAN-21

COMPOSER APPEARS ON SYMPHONY STAGE

SzymanovskiAcknowledges Generous Applause

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program, a Symphony in B flat by Karel Szymanovski, although it showed an individual musical imagination and a personal musical idiom, failed to impress the listener with the sense that a new genius had appeared. If Mr Szymanovski had written as few notes as possible, instead of trying to provide every player with something to do all the time, one's impression might have been different.

The musical ideas were so drowned in the mass of sound from the full orchestra playing almost constant forte that they were hard to grasp. The orchestration was too full to be brilliant. Rescoring and condensation might make this symphony into a really notable work, if more variety of themes, instrumentation and rhythms could be introduced. The composer came upon the stage to acknowledge the applause, which was of encouraging volume.

Casella's suite from his ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," has the economy of means in producing vivid contrasting effects which Szymanovski's work lacks. But it is as facile, as easily clever as the symphony in B flat is serious. Better such a trifle well done than a masterpiece manque. Mrs Littlefield, as at the first performance earlier in the season, gave an admirable performance of the

---

SYMPHONY GIVES 12TH CONCERT

Szymanovski Composition Played for First Time in America

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Szymanovski, Symphony No. 2, B flat major (first time in America); Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Cassella, Orchestral Excerpts from "The Convent on the Water"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Szymanovski, who attended the rehearsals and the concert, said modestly that this symphony was composed when he was young; that if he were to use the same thematic material today he would unite certain pages in a different manner. As it was, during the week, he, of his own will, lightened the score, which, indeed, might to advantage be further changed in order to gain needed contrasts in the first movement. As Saint-Saens said, the young composer puts everything in; when he is older he takes many things out.

This symphony, first produced at Warsaw, has been frequently played in German and Austrian cities and is in the repertoire of leading orchestras of those countries. The symphony is in two sections; a first movement, an Allegro moderato; a second, comprising a theme with seven variations, ending with an elaborate fugue. Mr. Monteux omitted two of the variations. The theme and the first three variations are in the place of the conventional slow movement; the fourth is in the form of a Scherzo; the fifth and sixth are respectively a gavotte and minuet.

The chief motives of the first movement have a decided profile. The first arrests at once the attention by its decisive character; the second is of a more sensuous nature. These themes are treated with marked contrapuntal skill, but in the development there is a lack of contrast in emotional expression and in orchestral coloring. There are two stirring climaxes. As a whole, the movement appeals more to the brain than to the soul. The music has individuality, the individuality of a thinker rather than of one possessed by a vivid sense of beauty. The theme for the variations is original, unusual. Of the ingenious variations the Scherzo, Gavotte and Minuet are the most appealing. The complex Fugue is one of toil and trouble.

Mr. Szymanovski in later years composed a symphonic poem, "The Song of the Night," for orchestra, solo voice and chorus, and music for violin and piano, that are said to show a poetic imagination. A few of his songs, sung here in 1913 and 1914, showed a warmer side of his musical nature than was revealed in the symphony played yesterday. Mr. Monteux took great pains in the preparation. The orchestra overcame brilliantly the many difficulties. Yet the absence of contrasts, of varied coloring, of any direct and spontaneous outbursts of emotion, was felt by the well disposed audience.

French conductors in Paris or sojourning in this country are never weary of the symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption." It is not easy to understand this passionate regard. The music is unmistakably Franckian, but it is not of that great composer's first quality. The chief theme has the peculiar serenity, but the development is diffuse. The energetic phrase for the brass strikes one as rather cheap.

It was a pleasure to hear Cassella's music again. The Barcarolle with the wordless, haunting song, sung by Mrs. Littlefield with greater freedom than before; the Saraband and the Dance of the Chattering Old Ladies delighted the hearers even more than when the excerpts were played in October.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when the overtures to "Oberon," "Der Freischuetz" and "Euryanthe" were expected each season. The three were performed even as

---

TIMES

n ress:

NEW YORK
JAN 22 1922
JAN 2? 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has played that symphony by Karel Szymanowsky, the Polish composer, that Mr. Damrosch announced for a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra before he handed it over to Mr. Coates and then gave up.

At the first anniversary, next February, of the death of Max Zach, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra after he left the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it will play in honor to his memory, "The Angel of Death," George W. Chatwick's tone-poem of an artist so cut off in prime.

ork City
JAN 22 1922

such a contact with the peoples of other countries.

A striking portrait—John Philipp's painting of Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and formerly leader of our own Boston Symphony. It is on display at the Sterner Gallery.

Peter A. Juley.

The Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday night is the outstanding musical event this week in Providence. The week opens with an organ recital at the Central Congregational Church this afternoon and a concert by Alice Pancada, soprano, and Alfred Mascarenhas to-night.

To-morrow night, the annual meeting of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs will be followed by a special programme. The Catholic Woman's Club is giving "The Chimes of Normandy" on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning is the meeting of the Chaminade Club.

Musical events of the future announced include a concert by Alice Nielson on Feb. 5; a recital by Mme. Avis Bliven-Charbonnel on Feb. 10, and one by Hulda Lashanska and Yolando Mero on Feb. 12.

Bronislaw Huberman

Soloist With Boston Symphony at Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

* * *

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a programme slightly different from that originally announced for the next symphony concert on Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall. It will include the overture to Weber's fairy opera, "Oberen," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Franck's symphonic piece from his choral work, "The Redemption," and the Polovtsian dances from the opera, "Prince Igor," by Borodin, the famous Russian composer.

The soloist for the concert, Bronislaw Huberman, is a Polish violinist, who came to America last month for the first time, although his name has long been familiar from his work in Europe. Huberman was born in 1882 in a village of Russian Poland near Warsaw. The musical talent of the boy, in infancy, was perceived by his father, who carefully arranged for a thorough course of training. The boy made such progress that at the age of 7 he played Spohr's extremely difficult second violin concerto

After nine months of study with the great master, Joachim, in Berlin, he appeared publicly as a boy wonder, first as an assisting artist in a concert by Adelina Patti in London. The public was amazed and delighted at the genius of the boy of 12, who met success in capital after capital of Europe, including 12 concerts in Vienna during the same season.

The composer Brahms, after hearing him play his difficult violin concerto, embraced him warmly and took an eager interest in his career. As the boy Huberman grew into the mature artist his standing with his public in many cities came to be of the highest, say criticisms of him. In this, his first appearance in Providence, he will play with the orchestra Mendelssohn's popular violin concerto.

* * *

PROV-JOURNEL - JAN 22

Young People's Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra

Tomorrow and Wednesday afternoons, Jan. 23 and 25, in Symphony Hall, at 4 o'clock, the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give a pair of special concerts for the younger generation of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully inaugurated two years ago.

The programme which Pierre Monteux has made for both these concerts will be one hour long and will include: Saint-Saens' "Marche Heroique," the Larghetto from Beethoven's Second Symphony, Bizet's First "L'Arlesienne" Suite, consisting of Prelude, Minuet and Carillon, two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Adults will not be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by children. All seats are being distributed through the schools of Greater Boston.

Bachaus Symphony Soloist

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, this pair of concerts to be followed by a week of absence in which the orchestra will play in other cities.

Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist at this concert, playing with the orchestra the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor. Mr. Bachaus is undoubtedly remembered by many from his former sojourn in America in the seasons of 1912-13 and 1913-14, in which he appeared notably as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His present visit to the United States follows a highly successful tour of South America. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of 16. At 21 he was unanimously awarded the celebrated Rubinstein prize of 25,000 francs over 25 other competitors in Paris. Since that time he has steadily advanced in the command of his art, having now reached his 38th year.

A work new to Boston to be played on this programme is the incidental music which Pierne has written to "Ramuntcho," the play of Pierre Loti on the Basque people. The numbers to be played are the Overture and "Rapsodie Basque."

POST-JAN 22

[55]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be presented by Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist, playing with the orchestra the second concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of sixteen. Since that time he has advanced to a place in the front ranks of pianists. Pierne's "Ramuntcho" overture and "Rhapsodie Basque" are orchestral novelties on the program.

ADVTSR. JAN 22

CHILDREN ENJOY THE SYMPHONY

First of Young People's Concerts of the Season

Yesterday afternoon was a gala day at Symphony Hall for the school children of Boston. The first of this season's Young Peoples' Symphony concerts was given to an enthusiastic, attentive and delighted audience.

HEARTY IN APPLAUSE

Conductor Monteux had most appropriately made up a programme of melodious and easily comprehended music and the heartiness of the applause testified to his good judgment. The programme was as follows: St. Saens, "Heroic March," Beethoven, "Larghetto" from second symphony, Bizet, "L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1." Dvorak, "Slavonic Dances," Wagner, "Rienzi Overture."

The St. Saens "march" was perhaps the least attractive number, from a purely musical standpoint, but it was well orchestrated and although slight in musical content, made a good opening number for a concert of this nature.

Appear to Like Beethoven

Beethoven's "Larghetto" received an exceptionally fine performance and was evidently thoroughly appreciated. The same may be said of the dance music of Bizet and Dvorak—the incisive and infectious rhythms of which Mr. Monteux knows well how to bring out.

At last came the Rienzi Overture, which was so unusual, so startling, and so dramatic that even a few small, restless boys in the back of the hall sat up and took notice of nothing else.

Music of Youth for Youth

It is the fashion nowadays to speak lightly of the Rienzi Overture—to call it flamboyant, sensational and in general to dismiss it as a piece of poster picture-card music, yet the present writer—in view of subsequent events—discovered in it the bold and unafraid gestures of a youthful musical giant.

It was composed in Wagner's early youth—it has the faults of youth—yet perhaps for this very reason was it most fittingly presented to, and appreciated by the youth of this generation.

In it the god of 19th century music—which Wagner ultimately became—is clearly foreshadowed. The applause which followed its rendition was hearty and spontaneous.

This is the third season of these Young Peoples' concerts. The idea is a fine one—of undoubted educational value—and judging by yesterday's concert deservedly successful. The management is certainly to be complimented.

POST-JAN.24

SYMPHONY PLAYS TO SCHOOL PUPILS

Orchestra Gives First of Annual Concert Series

By PHILIP HALE

The first of the concerts for the school children of Greater Boston given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was completely filled. The program, well suited to the occasion, was as follows: Saint-Saens's "Heroic March," composed in 1871 and first performed on Dec. 10 of that year. The march was originally in a cantata for a concert at the opera in 1870, but this cantata was not performed. Saint-Saens dedicated the march to the memory of Henri Regnault, the celebrated painter, a victim of the Franco-Prussian war. Regnault was one of his intimate friends and joined him in mad musical pranks. This march, by the way, was performed at Saint-Saens funeral in the Madeline.

Then came the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 21, D major, which was followed by the Prelude, Minuet and Carillon from Bizet's music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." Two Slavonic Dances of Dvorak; then the overture to "Rienzi" brought the end. The Dances were from the first set. There was a time in the history of the orchestra when some of Dvorak's Dances were often on the programs. It is well to remember that he wrote other music than the "From the New World" Symphony, music that is more spontaneous, more characteristic, before the simple soul was spoiled by adulation and the success of "Serious," i. e., dull vocal works in England. His Scherzo Capriccioso would be worth reviving at a subscription concert of the orchestra.

The orchestra played as if the audience were one of Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. Who knows whether young people are not as critical—they are certainly more honest in the expression of opinion—than older, more sophisticated but timorous persons? Yesterday the children, who were attentive and evidently interested, seemed especially pleased with Beethoven's music—and here it was not pronounced rhythm or the beating of drums that appealed to them—the Carillon, and Dvorak's Dances.

These concerts are of great benefit in the development of a taste for orchestral music. From these children future audiences must come. It is a good thing for them to know that music can be gay without being cheap and vulgar; that Beethoven is not a name to inspire fear; that "high-brow" music may interest them as much as "low-brow" pieces.

The concert will be repeated for other children Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

HERALD-JAN.24

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE OF UNUSUAL TYPE

School Children Crowd Hall at Concert

Numbers of Explosive Character Easily the Favorites

A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience," as if that too were a type. It isn't so any longer.

A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children. The tickets had been sent out through the schools, and by the teachers sold to the pupils. And the series was promptly oversubscribed.

Children as young as 9 were included; students from the New England Conservatory—typical Americans these, for if one forgot that there was to be a concert and left her ticket at home, one did not on that account despair when memory came back. One went instead boldly down to the door and told the doorman: "I had a ticket but I left it at home." And in true American fashion one convinced that doorman, and that doorman in similar style somehow got one a spare seat that had been left with him for just such an emergency.

Children Mercilessly Exclusive

The program announced "No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children." The small number of adults present hinted that the children had been merciless in their exclusiveness.

They came from darkest Dorchester, the trolleys brought swarms of them from sunny South Boston, they trooped across town on foot from regions of Back Bay hitherto supposed to be almost childless. The cars from Park st and the cars from Brookline had to move slowly across Massachusetts av in the swirling tide of kids.

"Is that the Arena?" one boy asked rather wistfully, as he left his crosstown car. It sounded a bit as if he already regretted the investment of his 50 cents. And two other young rascals didn't stop at wistfulness. They had aisle seats in the 50-cent section, which is to say well forward on the floor. They enjoyed thoroughly the voyage of discovery to their seats and the exercise of their right of possession by virtue of holding checks. They were interested in the tuning up, and excited visibly by the first bursts of the Saint-Saens "Heroic March" with which the program began. They stood the second movement of the second Beethoven symphony, but that was all.

"Come on," said Reddy.

Inaudible reply.

"Jus' across Mass av."

Another inaudible objection.

"Ah, I have. Come on."

And the two chaps—about 11 apiece, they were—sneaked unobtrusively up the aisle and went to the movies.

Beethoven Too Much for Them

The Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horse-play went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne' suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted.

Dvorak's Two Slavonic Dances and the overture to "Rienzi" completed the program, both pieces being apparently chosen for their percussiveness, and their vivid, explosive character, for the purpose of holding the attention of the young auditors.

The overture was received more favorably than any other piece of the afternoon, and the youngsters applauded earnestly and long, until Mr Monteux came back to the stage to bow his acknowledgements. The audience liked the Slavonic whirl, also, but was entirely unmoved by the Beethoven Larghetto. To this extent the choice of numbers was justified.

It is impossible to guess how many of the children were at their first concert; there were signs that the percentage was large. It is equally impossible to guess how much the attendance was a matter of adventure, of curiosity, rather than of any wish to hear music.

The children were visibly interested in the instrumentation. If the brass struck in, there was instant craning of necks to identify the horn; there was constant search for the players of percussion instruments, and the tinkling of the harps in the Saint-Saens number set everybody searching for them.

In the outrush at the close not a single comment on the music could be heard, though discussion was vociferous. But here and there one saw a still rapt face, or star-gleaming eyes, not yet come back to the realities.

GLOBE-JAN 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme, amended from that originally announced.

The programme: Weber, Overture to "Oberon;" Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption;" Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Brahms, Variations on a theme by Handel; Borodine, Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor."

The only item on the entire programme with any savor of novelty was the Borodine Dances from "Prince Igor," which brought to a colorful close a concert that, as a whole, was rather colorless. The "Oberon" Overture has done service in the concert hall these many, many years and the fact that it still retains much of its freshness after almost endless iteration bears witness to its inherent and abiding charm. Likewise, the Franck excerpt has become a classic of symphony concerts, albeit the library of the Boston Orchestra contains much more imaginative music unheard within the longest memory. Why is nothing new vouchsafed us? At home, in other cities, audiences of the orchestra have heard Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," pieces of the moderns of Italy and of France, new music—relatively—out of Russia; but when M. Monteux's band travels hither it seems it must needs exhume the overtures from Oberon, from Der Freischutz, this or that "tone-poem" of Liszt, or some such thrice familiar matter. It cannot be truly said that Providence audiences of the symphony orchestra are unresponsive to newer and more unfamiliar music. They have not even had the opportunity to hear it, at least not in this city, where even Wagner seems denied us of late.

The orchestra's other number was the Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn. The theme itself is no marvel of beauty or charm and the variations are what variations usually are—exceedingly tiresome.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Bronislaw Hubermann, who elected to play the favorite Mendelssohn Concerto. He gave it a beautiful performance and was enthusiastically recalled by the good-sized audience.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the programme of the next concert will be a bit more interesting. But there. Perhaps we should rather be grateful to whatever gods spared us the Handel "Double Concerto," originally announced.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

PROV. NEWS-JA

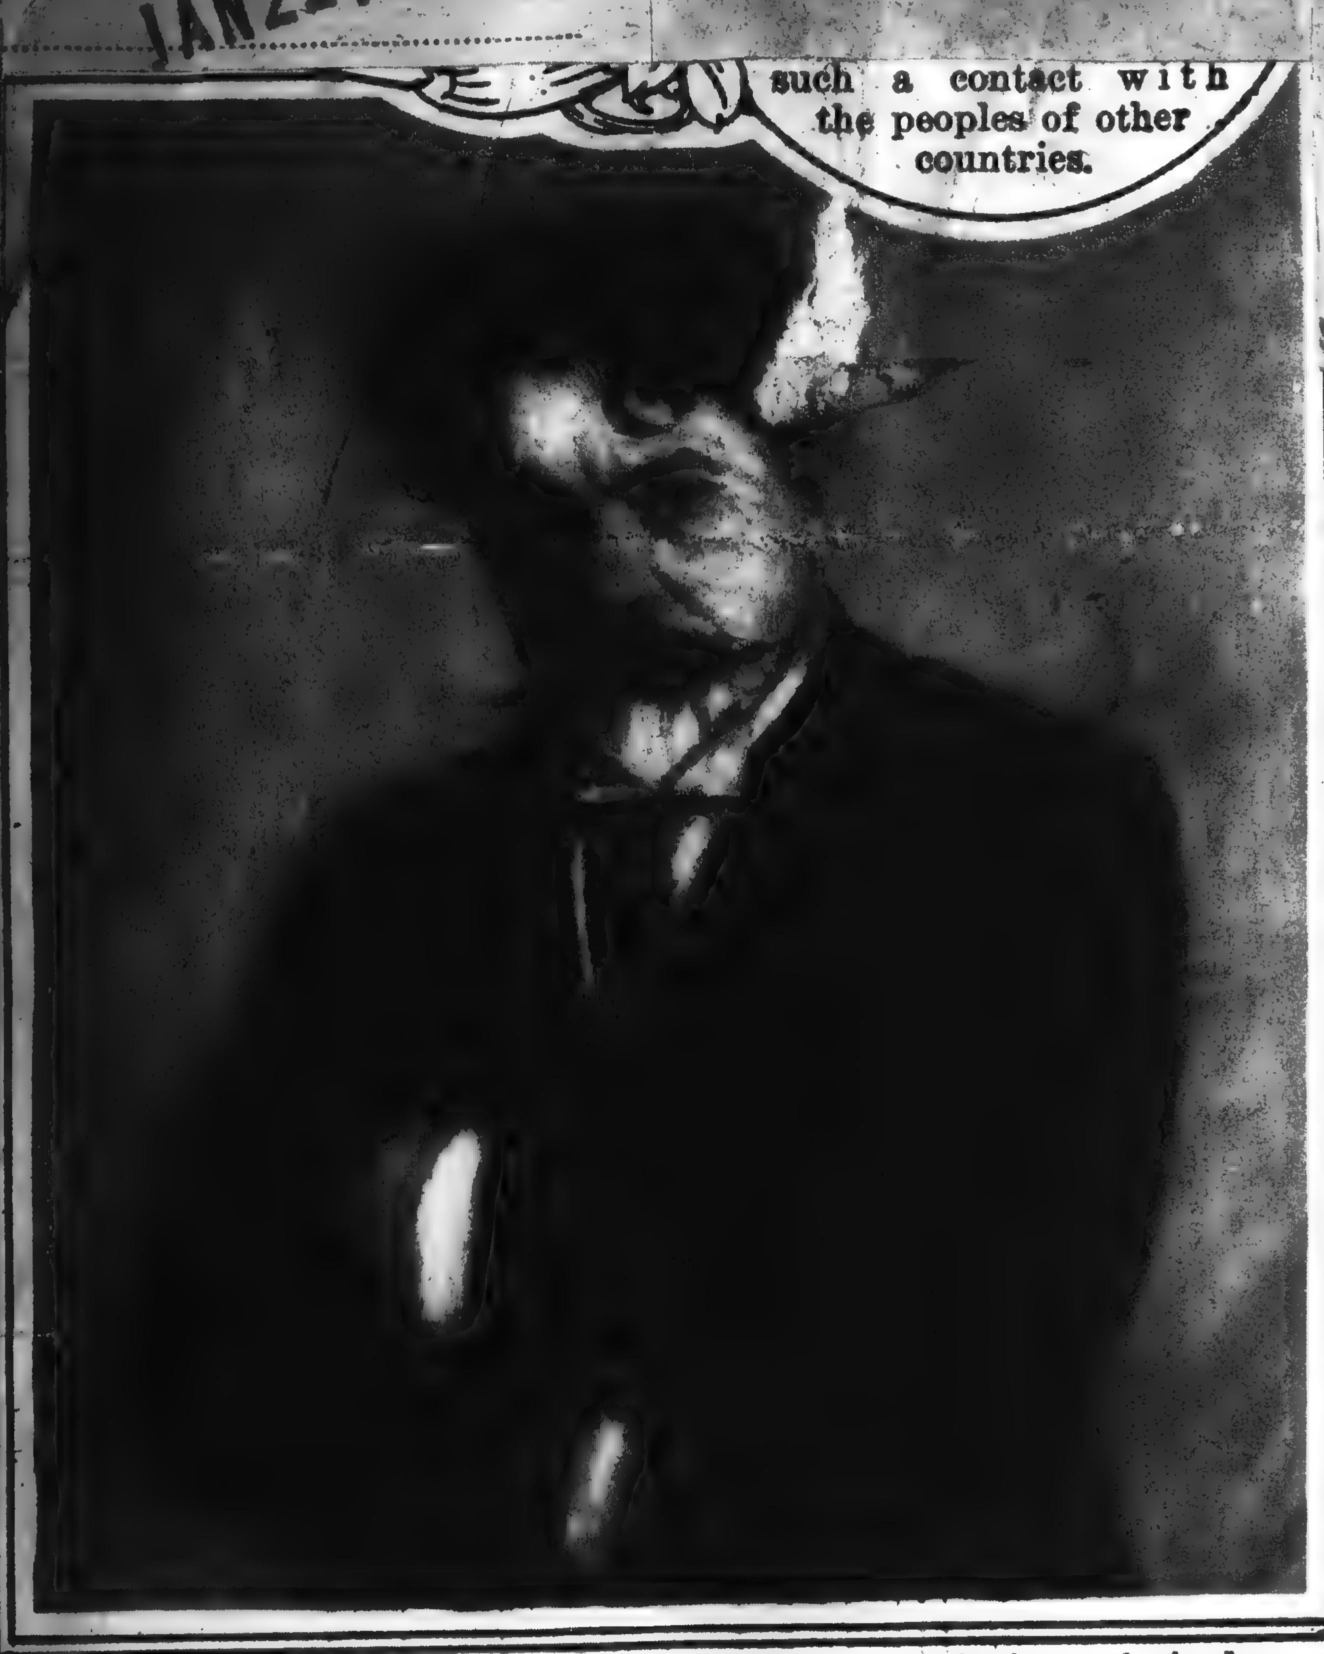
HUBERMAN'S PLAYING AROUSES AUDIENCE

Polish Violinist Wins Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented to a Providence audience a new violin soloist last evening when the orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season. It was a typical symphony concert in every respect, inspiring and soul-satisfying, but the feature of extraordinary interest was undoubtedly the playing of the soloist, Bronislaw Huberman, Poland's contribution to American musical art.

Here is a violinist of rare abilities, a true artist with amazing control of the mechanics of his instrument and an overpowering sense of tonal beauty which makes his work a charm and delight. Not only the sweeping b ork City JAN 22 1922

such a contact with the peoples of other countries.



A striking portrait—John Philipp's painting of Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and formerly leader of our own Boston Symphony. It is on display at the Sterner Gallery. Peter A. Juley.

The Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday night is the outstanding musical event this week in Providence. The week opens with an organ recital at the Central Congregational Church this afternoon and a concert by Alice Pancada, soprano, and Alfred Mascarenhas to-night.

To-morrow night, the annual meeting of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs will be followed by a special programme. The Catholic Woman's Club is giving "The Chimes of Normandy" on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning is the meeting of the Chaminade Club.

Musical events of the future announced include a concert by Alice Nielson on Feb. 5; a recital by Mme. Avis Bliven-Charbonnel on Feb. 10, and one by Hulda Lashanska and Yolando Mero on Feb. 12.

Bronislaw Huberman

Soloist With Boston Symphony at Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

* * *

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a programme slightly different from that originally announced for the next symphony concert on Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall. It will include the overture to Weber's fairy opera, "Oberen," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Franck's symphonic piece from his choral work, "The Redemption," and the Polovtsian dances from the opera, "Prince Igor," by Borodin, the famous Russian composer.

The soloist for the concert, Bronislaw Huberman, is a Polish violinist, who came to America last month for the first time, although his name has long been familiar from his work in Europe. Huberman was born in 1882 in a village of Russian Poland near Warsaw. The musical talent of the boy, in infancy, was perceived by his father, who carefully arranged for a thorough course of training. The boy made such progress that at the age of 7 he played Spohr's extremely difficult second violin concerto with ease.

After nine months of study with the great master, Joachim, in Berlin, he appeared publicly as a boy wonder, first as an assisting artist in a concert by Adelina Patti in London. The public was amazed and delighted at the genius of the boy of 12, who met success in capital after capital of Europe, including 12 concerts in Vienna during the same season.

The composer Brahms, after hearing him play his difficult violin concerto, embraced him warmly and took an eager interest in his career. As the boy Huberman grew into the mature artist his standing with his public in many cities came to be of the highest, say criticisms of him. In this, his first appearance in Providence, he will play with the orchestra Mendelssohn's popular violin concerto.

* * *

BROV-JOURNEL- JAN22.

Young People's Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra

Tomorrow and Wednesday afternoons, Jan. 23 and 25, in Symphony Hall, at 4 o'clock, the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give a pair of special concerts for the younger generation of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully inaugurated two years ago.

The programme which Pierre Monteux has made for both these concerts will be one hour long and will include: Saint-Saens' "Marche Heroique," the Larghetto from Beethoven's Second Symphony, Bizet's First "L'Arlesienne" Suite, consisting of Prelude, Minuet and Carillon, two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Adults will not be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by children. All seats are being distributed through the schools of Greater Boston.

Bachaus Symphony Soloist

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, this pair of concerts to be followed by a week of absence in which the orchestra will play in other cities.

Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist at this concert, playing with the orchestra the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor. Mr. Bachaus is undoubtedly remembered by many from his former sojourn in America in the seasons of 1912-13 and 1913-14, in which he appeared notably as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His present visit to the United States follows a highly successful tour of South America. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of 16. At 21 he was unanimously awarded the celebrated Rubinstein prize of 25,000 francs over 25 other competitors in Paris. Since that time he has steadily advanced in the command of his art, having now reached his 38th year.

A work new to Boston to be played on this programme is the incidental music which Pierne has written to "Ramuntcho," the play of Pierre Loti on the Basque people. The numbers to be played are the Overture and "Rapsodie Basque."

POST-JAN.22.

[55]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be presented by Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist, playing with the orchestra the second concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of sixteen. Since that time he has advanced to a place in the front ranks of pianists. Pierne's "Ramuntcho" overture and "Rhapsodie Basque" are orchestral novelties on the program.

ADVTSR. JAN.22

CHILDREN ENJOY THE SYMPHONY

First of Young People's Concerts of the Season

Yesterday afternoon was a gala day at Symphony Hall for the school children of Boston. The first of this season's Young Peoples' Symphony concerts was given to an enthusiastic, attentive and delighted audience.

HEARTY IN APPLAUSE

Conductor Monteux had most appropriately made up a programme of melodious and easily comprehended music and the heartiness of the applause testified to his good judgment. The programme was as follows: St. Saens, "Heroic March," Beethoven, "Larghetto" from second symphony, Bizet, "L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1," Dvorak, "Slavonic Dances," Wagner, "Rienzi Overture."

The St. Saens "march" was perhaps the least attractive number, from a purely musical standpoint, but it was well orchestrated and although slight in musical content, made a good opening number for a concert of this nature.

Appear to Like Beethoven

Beethoven's "Larghetto" received an exceptionally fine performance and was evidently thoroughly appreciated. The same may be said of the dance music of Bizet and Dvorak—the incisive and infectious rhythms of which Mr. Monteux knows well how to bring out.

At last came the Rienzi Overture, which was so unusual, so startling, and so dramatic that even a few small, restless boys in the back of the hall sat up and took notice of nothing else.

Music of Youth for Youth

It is the fashion nowadays to speak lightly of the Rienzi Overture—to call it flamboyant, sensational and in general to dismiss it as a piece of poster picture-card music, yet the present writer—in view of subsequent events—discovered in it the bold and unafraid gestures of a youthful musical giant.

It was composed in Wagner's early youth—it has the faults of youth—yet perhaps for this very reason was it most fittingly presented to, and appreciated by the youth of this generation.

In it the god of 19th century music—which Wagner ultimately became—is clearly foreshadowed. The applause which followed its rendition was hearty and spontaneous.

This is the third season of these Young Peoples' concerts. The idea is a fine one—of undoubted educational value—and judging by yesterday's concert deservedly successful. The management is certainly to be complimented.

POST-JAN.24

SYMPHONY PLAYS TO SCHOOL PUPILS

Orchestra Gives First of Annual Concert Series

By PHILIP HALE

The first of the concerts for the school children of Greater Boston given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was completely filled. The program, well suited to the occasion, was as follows: Saint-Saens's "Heroic March," composed in 1871 and first performed on Dec. 10 of that year. The march was originally in a cantata for a concert at the opera in 1870, but this cantata was not performed. Saint-Saens dedicated the march to the memory of Henri Regnault, the celebrated painter, a victim of the Franco-Prussian war. Regnault was one of his intimate friends and joined him in mad musical pranks. This march, by the way, was performed at Saint-Saens funeral in the Madeline.

Then came the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 21, D major, which was followed by the Prelude, Minuet and Carillon from Bizet's music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." Two Slavonic Dances of Dvorak; then the overture to "Rienzi" brought the end. The Dances were from the first set. There was a time in the history of the orchestra when some of Dvorak's Dances were often on the programs. It is well to remember that he wrote other music than the "From the New World" Symphony, music that is more spontaneous, more characteristic, before the simple soul was spoiled by adulation and the success of "Serious," i. e., dull vocal works in England. His Scherzo Capriccioso would be worth reviving at a subscription concert of the orchestra.

The orchestra played as if the audience were one of Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. Who knows whether young people are not as critical—they are certainly more honest in the expression of opinion—than older, more sophisticated but timorous persons? Yesterday the children, who were attentive and evidently interested, seemed especially pleased with Beethoven's music—and here it was not pronounced rhythm or the beating of drums that appealed to them—the Carillon, and Dvorak's Dances.

These concerts are of great benefit in the development of a taste for orchestral music. From these children future audiences must come. It is a good thing for them to know that music can be gay without being cheap and vulgar; that Beethoven is not a name to inspire fear; that "high-brow" music may interest them as much as "low-brow" pieces.

The concert will be repeated for other children Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

HERALD- JAN.24

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE OF UNUSUAL TYPE

School Children Crowd Hall at Concert

Numbers of Explosive Character Easily the Favorites

A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience," as if that too were a type. It isn't so any longer.

A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children. The tickets had been sent out through the schools, and by the teachers sold to the pupils. And the series was promptly oversubscribed.

Children as young as 9 were included; students from the New England Conservatory—typical Americans these, for if one forgot that there was to be a concert and left her ticket at home, one did not on that account despair when memory came back. One went instead boldly down to the door and told the doorman: "I had a ticket but I left it at home." And in true American fashion one convinced that doorman, and that doorman in similar style somehow got one a spare seat that had been left with him for just such an emergency.

Children Mercilessly Exclusive

The program announced "No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children." The small number of adults present hinted that the children had been merciless in their exclusiveness.

They came from darkest Dorchester, the trolleys brought swarms of them from sunny South Boston, they trooped across town on foot from regions of Back Bay hitherto supposed to be almost childless. The cars from Park st and the cars from Brookline had to move slowly across Massachusetts av in the swirling tide of kids.

"Is that the Arena?" one boy asked rather wistfully, as he left his cross-town car. It sounded a bit as if he already regretted the investment of his 50 cents. And two other young rascals didn't stop at wistfulness. They had aisle seats in the 50-cent section, which is to say well forward on the floor. They enjoyed thoroughly the voyage of discovery to their seats and the exercise of their right of possession by virtue of holding checks. They were interested in the tuning up, and excited visibly by the first bursts of the Saint-Saens "Heroic March" with which the program began. They stood the second movement of the second Beethoven symphony, but that was all.

"Come on," said Reddy.

Inaudible reply.

"Jus' across Mass av."

Another inaudible objection.

"Ah, I have. Come on."

And the two chaps—about 11 apiece, they were—sneaked unobtrusively up the aisle and went to the movies.

Beethoven Too Much for Them

The Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horse-play went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted.

Dvorak's Two Slavonic Dances and the overture to "Rienzi" completed the program, both pieces being apparently chosen for their percussiveness, and their vivid, explosive character, for the purpose of holding the attention of the young auditors.

The overture was received more favorably than any other piece of the afternoon, and the youngsters applauded earnestly and long, until Mr Monteux came back to the stage to bow his acknowledgements. The audience liked the Slavonic whirl, also, but was entirely unmoved by the Beethoven Larghetto. To this extent the choice of numbers was justified.

It is impossible to guess how many of the children were at their first concert; there were signs that the percentage was large. It is equally impossible to guess how much the attendance was a matter of adventure, of curiosity, rather than of any wish to hear music.

The children were visibly interested in the instrumentation. If the brass struck in, there was instant craning of necks to identify the horn; there was constant search for the players of percussion instruments, and the tinkling of the harps in the Saint-Saens number set everybody searching for them.

In the outrush at the close not a single comment on the music could be heard, though discussion was vociferous. But here and there one saw a still rapt face, or star-gleaming eyes, not yet come back to the realities.

GLOBE-JAN24

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme, amended from that originally announced.

The programme: Weber, Overture to "Oberon;" Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption;" Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Brahms, Variations on a theme by Handel; Borodine, Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor."

The only item on the entire programme with any savor of novelty was the Borodine Dances from "Prince Igor," which brought to a colorful close a concert that, as a whole, was rather colorless. The "Oberon" Overture has done service in the concert hall these many, many years and the fact that it still retains much of its freshness after almost endless iteration bears witness to its inherent and abiding charm. Likewise, the Franck excerpt has become a classic of symphony concerts, albeit the library of the Boston Orchestra contains much more imaginative music unheard within the longest memory. Why is nothing new vouchsafed us? At home, in other cities, audiences of the orchestra have heard Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," pieces of the moderns of Italy and of France, new music—relatively—out of Russia; but when M. Monteux's band travels hither it seems it must needs exhume the overtures from Oberon, from Der Freischutz, this or that "tone-poem" of Liszt, or some such thrice familiar matter. It cannot be truly said that Providence audiences of the symphony orchestra are unresponsive to newer and more unfamiliar music. They have not even had the opportunity to hear it, at least not in this city, where even Wagner seems denied us of late.

The orchestra's other number was the Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn. The theme itself is no marvel of beauty or charm and the variations are what variations usually are—exceedingly tiresome.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Bronislaw Hubermann, who elected to play the favorite Mendelssohn Concerto. He gave it a beautiful performance and was enthusiastically recalled by the good-sized audience.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the programme of the next concert will be a bit more interesting. But there. Perhaps we should rather be grateful to whatever gods spared us the Handel "Double Concerto," originally announced.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

PROV.NEWS-JA

HUBERMAN'S PLAYING AROUSES AUDIENCE

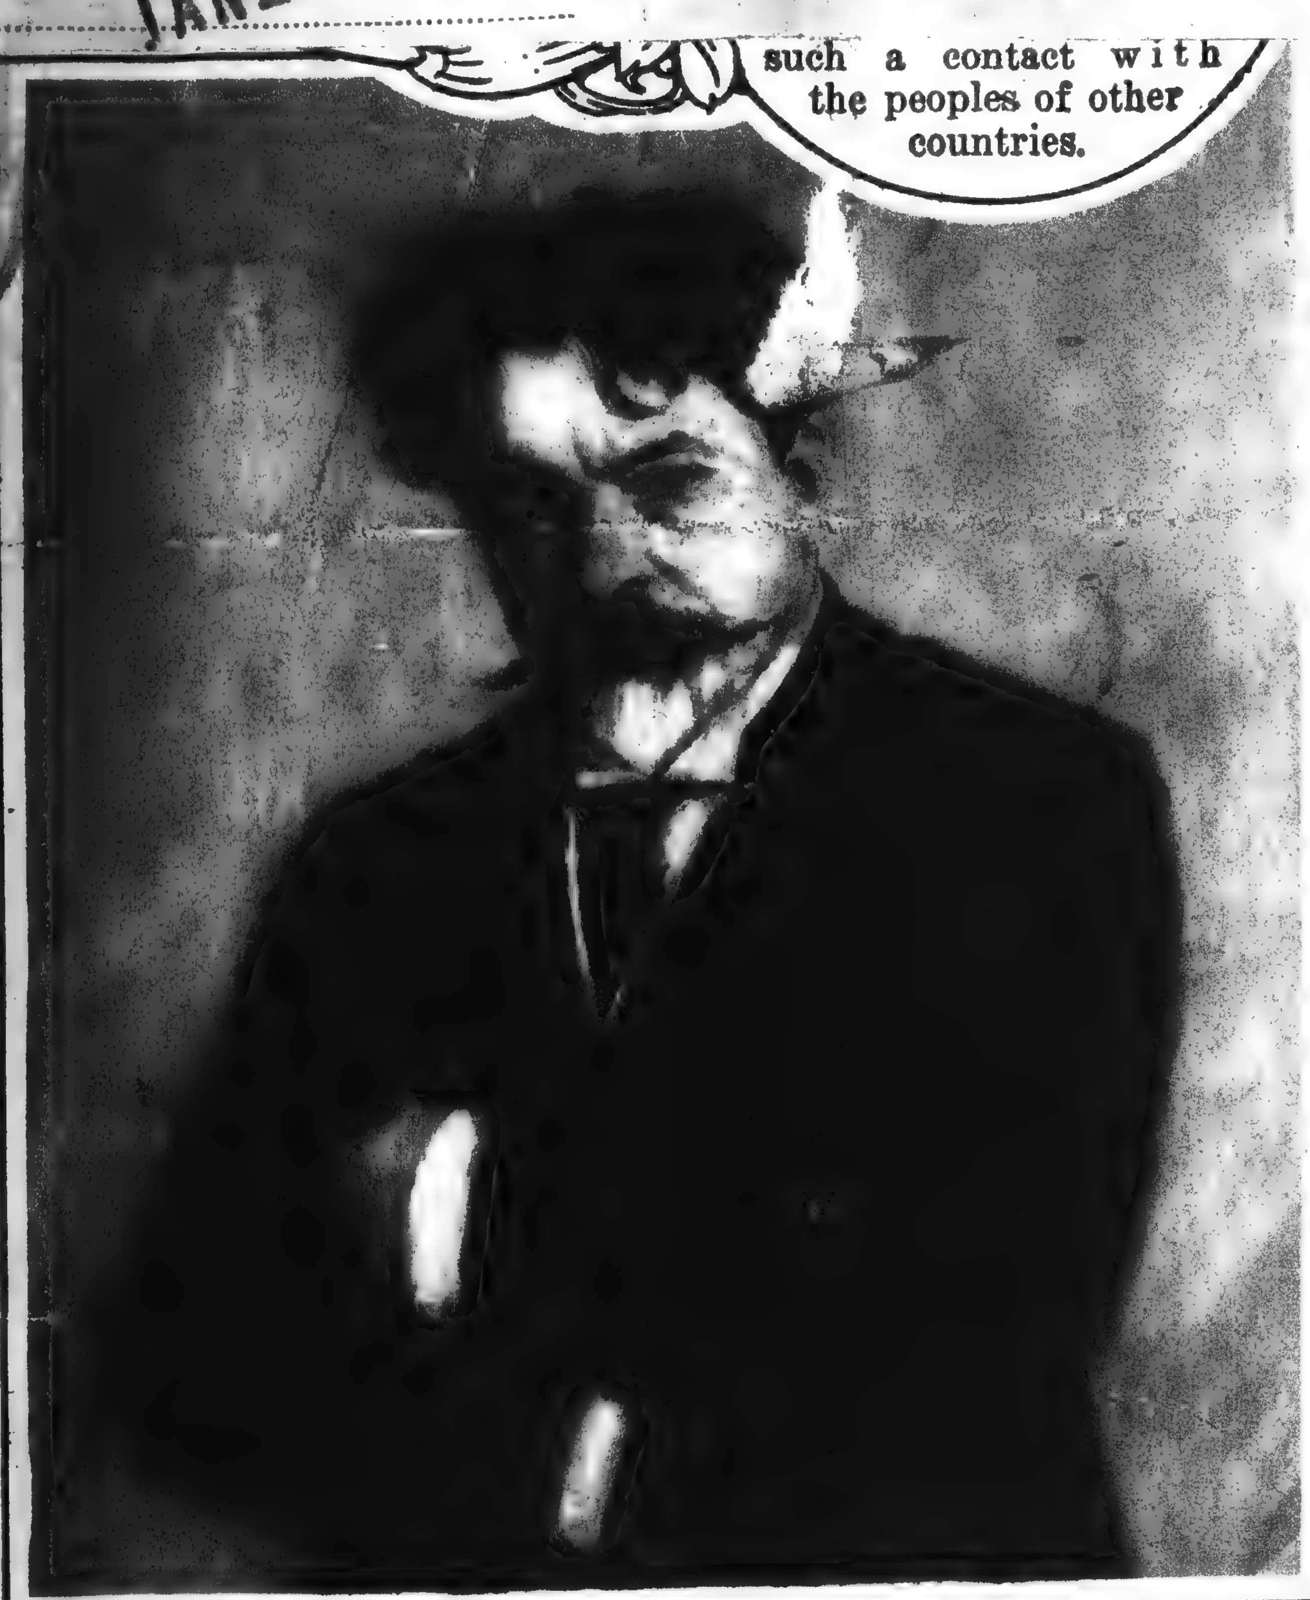
Polish Violinist Wins Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented to a Providence audience a new violin soloist last evening when the orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season. It was a typical symphony concert in every respect, inspiring and soul-satisfying, but the feature of extraordinary interest was undoubtedly the playing of the soloist, Bronislaw Huberman, Poland's contribution to American musical art.

Here is a violinist of rare abilities, a true artist with amazing control of the mechanics of his instrument and an overpowering sense of tonal beauty which makes his work a charm and delight. Not only the sweeping b

ork City
JAN 22 1922

such a contact with the peoples of other countries.



A striking portrait—John Philipp's painting of Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and formerly leader of our own Boston Symphony. It is on display at the Sterner Gallery. Peter A. Juley.

The Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday night is the outstanding musical event this week in Providence. The week opens with an organ recital at the Central Congregational Church this afternoon and a concert by Alice Pancada, soprano, and Alfred Mascarenhas to-night.

To-morrow night, the annual meeting of the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs will be followed by a special programme. The Catholic Woman's Club is giving "The Chimes of Normandy" on Wednesday evening. Thursday morning is the meeting of the Chaminade Club.

Musical events of the future announced include a concert by Alice Nielson on Feb. 5; a recital by Mme. Avis Bliven-Charbonnel on Feb. 10, and one by Hulda Lashanska and Yolando Mero on Feb. 12.

Bronislaw Huberman

Soloist With Boston Symphony at Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

* * *

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a programme slightly different from that originally announced for the next symphony concert on Tuesday evening, in Infantry Hall. It will include the overture to Weber's fairy opera, "Oberen," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Franck's symphonic piece from his choral work, "The Redemption," and the Polovtsian dances from the opera, "Prince Igor," by Borodin, the famous Russian composer.

The soloist for the concert, Bronislaw Huberman, is a Polish violinist, who came to America last month for the first time, although his name has long been familiar from his work in Europe. Huberman was born in 1882 in a village of Russian Poland near Warsaw. The musical talent of the boy, in infancy, was perceived by his father, who carefully arranged for a thorough course of training. The boy made such progress that at the age of 7 he played Spohr's extremely difficult second violin concerto with ease.

After nine months of study with the great master, Joachim, in Berlin, he appeared publicly as a boy wonder, first as an assisting artist in a concert by Adelina Patti in London. The public was amazed and délighted at the genius of the boy of 12, who met success in capital after capital of Europe, including 12 concerts in Vienna during the same season.

The composer Brahms, after hearing him play his difficult violin concerto, embraced him warmly and took an eager interest in his career. As the boy Huberman grew into the mature artist his standing with his public in many cities came to be of the highest, say criticisms of him. In this, his first appearance in Providence, he will play with the orchestra Mendelssohn's popular violin concerto.

* * *

BROV-JOURNEL - JAN 2

Young People's Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra

Tomorrow and Wednesday afternoons, Jan. 23 and 25, in Symphony Hall, at 4 o'clock, the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give a pair of special concerts for the younger generation of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully inaugurated two years ago.

The programme which Pierre Monteux has made for both these concerts will be one hour long and will include: Saint-Saens' "Marche Heroique," the Larghetto from Beethoven's Second Symphony, Bizet's First "L'Arlesienne" Suite, consisting of Prelude, Minuet and Carillon, two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, and Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi."

Adults will not be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by children. All seats are being distributed through the schools of Greater Boston.

Bachaus Symphony Soloist

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28, this pair of concerts to be followed by a week of absence in which the orchestra will play in other cities.

Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist at this concert, playing with the orchestra the Second Concerto of Rachmaninoff in C minor. Mr. Bachaus is undoubtedly remembered by many from his former sojourn in America in the seasons of 1912-13 and 1913-14, in which he appeared notably as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His present visit to the United States follows a highly successful tour of South America. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of 16. At 21 he was unanimously awarded the celebrated Rubinstein prize of 25,000 francs over 25 other competitors in Paris. Since that time he has steadily advanced in the command of his art, having now reached his 38th year.

A work new to Boston to be played on this programme is the incidental music which Pierne has written to "Ramuntcho," the play of Pierre Loti on the Basque people. The numbers to be played are the Overture and "Rapsodie Basque."

POST-JAN.22

[55]

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be presented by Pierre Monteaux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will appear as soloist, playing with the orchestra the second concerto of Rachmaninoff, in C minor. A graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and a favorite pupil of Eugen d'Albert, he gave his first public concerts at the age of sixteen. Since that time he has advanced to a place in the front ranks of pianists. Pierne's "Ramuntcho" overture and "Rhapsodie Basque" are orchestral novelties on the program.

ADVTSR. JAN.22

CHILDREN ENJOY THE SYMPHONY

First of Young People's Concerts of the Season

Yesterday afternoon was a gala day at Symphony Hall for the school children of Boston. The first of this season's Young Peoples' Symphony concerts was given to an enthusiastic, attentive and delighted audience.

HEARTY IN APPLAUSE

Conductor Monteux had most appropriately made up a programme of melodious and easily comprehended music and the heartiness of the applause testified to his good judgment. The programme was as follows: St. Saens, "Heroic March." Beethoven, "Larghetto" from second symphony, Bizet, "L'Arlesienne Suite No. 1." Dvorak, "Slavonic Dances," Wagner, "Rienzi Overture."

The St. Saens "march" was perhaps the least attractive number, from a purely musical standpoint, but it was well orchestrated and although slight in musical content, made a good opening number for a concert of this nature.

Appear to Like Beethoven

Beethoven's "Larghetto" received an exceptionally fine performance and was evidently thoroughly appreciated. The same may be said of the dance music of Bizet and Dvorak—the incisive and infectious rhythms of which Mr. Monteux knows well how to bring out.

At last came the Rienzi Overture, which was so unusual, so startling, and so dramatic that even a few small, restless boys in the back of the hall sat up and took notice of nothing else.

Music of Youth for Youth

It is the fashion nowadays to speak lightly of the Rienzi Overture—to call it flamboyant, sensational and in general to dismiss it as a piece of poster picture-card music, yet the present writer—in view of subsequent events—discovered in it the bold and unafraid gestures of a youthful musical giant.

It was composed in Wagner's early youth—it has the faults of youth—yet perhaps for this very reason was it most fittingly presented to, and appreciated by the youth of this generation.

In it the god of 19th century music—which Wagner ultimately became—is clearly foreshadowed. The applause which followed its rendition was hearty and spontaneous.

This is the third season of these Young Peoples' concerts. The idea is a fine one—of undoubted educational value—and judging by yesterday's concert deservedly successful. The management is certainly to be complimented.

POST-JAN.24

SYMPHONY PLAYS TO SCHOOL PUPILS

Orchestra Gives First of Annual Concert Series

By PHILIP HALE

The first of the concerts for the school children of Greater Boston given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, which was completely filled. The program, well suited to the occasion, was as follows: Saint-Saens's "Heroic March," composed in 1871 and first performed on Dec. 10 of that year. The march was originally in a cantata for a concert at the opera in 1870, but this cantata was not performed. Saint-Saens dedicated the march to the memory of Henri Regnault, the celebrated painter, a victim of the Franco-Prussian war. Regnault was one of his intimate friends and joined him in mad musical pranks. This march, by the way, was performed at Saint-Saens funeral in the Madeline.

Then came the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 21, D major, which was followed by the Prelude, Minuet and Carillon from Bizet's music for Daudet's "L'Arlesienne." Two Slavonic Dances of Dvorak; then the overture to "Rienzi" brought the end. The Dances were from the first set. There was a time in the history of the orchestra when some of Dvorak's Dances were often on the programs. It is well to remember that he wrote other music than the "From the New World" Symphony, music that is more spontaneous, more characteristic, before the simple soul was spoiled by adulation and the success of "Serious," i. e., dull vocal works in England. His Scherzo Capriccioso would be worth reviving at a subscription concert of the orchestra.

The orchestra played as if the audience were one of Friday afternoon or Saturday evening. Who knows whether young people are not as critical—they are certainly more honest in the expression of opinion—than older, more sophisticated but timorous persons? Yesterday the children, who were attentive and evidently interested, seemed especially pleased with Beethoven's music—and here it was not pronounced rhythm or the beating of drums that appealed to them—the Carillon, and Dvorak's Dances.

These concerts are of great benefit in the development of a taste for orchestral music. From these children future audiences must come. It is a good thing for them to know that music can be gay without being cheap and vulgar; that Beethoven is not a name to inspire fear; that "high-brow" music may interest them as much as "low-brow" pieces.

The concert will be repeated for other children Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

HERALD-JAN.24

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE OF UNUSUAL TYPE

School Children Crowd Hall at Concert

Numbers of Explosive Character Easily the Favorites

A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience," as if that too were a type. It isn't so any longer.

A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children. The tickets had been sent out through the schools, and by the teachers sold to the pupils. And the series was promptly oversubscribed.

Children as young as 9 were included; students from the New England Conservatory—typical Americans these, for if one forgot that there was to be a concert and left her ticket at home, one did not on that account despair when memory came back. One went instead boldly down to the door and told the doorman: "I had a ticket but I left it at home." And in true American fashion one convinced that doorman, and that doorman in similar style somehow got one a spare seat that had been left with him for just such an emergency.

Children Mercilessly Exclusive

The program announced "No adult will be admitted to these concerts unless accompanied by one or more children." The small number of adults present hinted that the children had been merciless in their exclusiveness.

They came from darkest Dorchester, the trolleys brought swarms of them from sunny South Boston, they trooped across town on foot from regions of Back Bay hitherto supposed to be almost childless. The cars from Park st and the cars from Brookline had to move slowly across Massachusetts av in the swirling tide of kids.

"Is that the Arena?" one boy asked rather wistfully, as he left his crosstown car. It sounded a bit as if he already regretted the investment of his 50 cents. And two other young rascals didn't stop at wistfulness. They had aisle seats in the 50-cent section, which is to say well forward on the floor. They enjoyed thoroughly the voyage of discovery to their seats and the exercise of their right of possession by virtue of holding checks. They were interested in the tuning up, and excited visibly by the first bursts of the Saint-Saens "Heroic March" with which the program began. They stood the second movement of the second Beethoven symphony, but that was all.

"Come on," said Reddy.

Inaudible reply.

"Jus' across Mass av."

Another inaudible objection.

"Ah, I have. Come on."

And the two chaps—about 11 apiece, they were—sneaked unobtrusively up the aisle and went to the movies.

Beethoven Too Much for Them

The Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horse-play went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's "L'Arlesienne' 'suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted.

Dvorak's Two Slavonic Dances and the overture to "Rienzi" completed the program, both pieces being apparently chosen for their percussiveness, and their vivid, explosive character, for the purpose of holding the attention of the young auditors.

The overture was received more favorably than any other piece of the afternoon, and the youngsters applauded earnestly and long, until Mr Monteux came back to the stage to bow his acknowledgements. The audience liked the Slavonic whirl, also, but was entirely unmoved by the Beethoven Larghetto. To this extent the choice of numbers was justified.

It is impossible to guess how many of the children were at their first concert; there were signs that the percentage was large. It is equally impossible to guess how much the attendance was a matter of adventure, of curiosity, rather than of any wish to hear music.

The children were visibly interested in the instrumentation. If the brass struck in, there was instant craning of necks to identify the horn; there was constant search for the players of percussion instruments, and the tinkling of the harps in the Saint-Saens number set everybody searching for them.

In the outrush at the close not a single comment on the music could be heard, though discussion was vociferous. But here and there one saw a still rapt face, or star-gleaming eyes, not yet come back to the realities.

GLOBE-JAN 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN THIRD CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme, amended from that originally announced.

The programme: Weber, Overture to "Oberon;" Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption;" Mendelssohn, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Brahms, Variations on a theme by Handel; Borodine, Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor."

The only item on the entire programme with any savor of novelty was the Borodine Dances from "Prince Igor," which brought to a colorful close a concert that, as a whole, was rather colorless. The "Oberon" Overture has done service in the concert hall these many, many years and the fact that it still retains much of its freshness after almost endless iteration bears witness to its inherent and abiding charm. Likewise, the Franck excerpt has become a classic of symphony concerts, albeit the library of the Boston Orchestra contains much more imaginative music unheard within the longest memory. Why is nothing new vouchsafed us? At home, in other cities, audiences of the orchestra have heard Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," pieces of the moderns of Italy and of France, new music—relatively—out of Russia; but when M. Monteux's band travels hither it seems it must needs exhume the overtures from Oberon, from Der Freischutz, this or that "tone-poem" of Liszt, or some such thrice familiar matter. It cannot be truly said that Providence audiences of the symphony orchestra are unresponsive to newer and more unfamiliar music. They have not even had the opportunity to hear it, at least not in this city, where even Wagner seems denied us of late.

The orchestra's other number was the Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn. The theme itself is no marvel of beauty or charm and the variations are what variations usually are—exceedingly tiresome.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Bronislaw Hubermann, who elected to play the favorite Mendelssohn Concerto. He gave it a beautiful performance and was enthusiastically recalled by the good-sized audience.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the programme of the next concert will be a bit more interesting. But there. Perhaps we should rather be grateful to whatever gods spared us the Handel "Double Concerto," originally announced.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

PROV.NEWS-JA

HUBERMAN'S PLAYING AROUSES AUDIENCE

Polish Violinist Wins Ovation at Boston Symphony Concert.

Conductor Pierre Monteux of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented to a Providence audience a new violin soloist last evening when the orchestra gave its third Providence concert of the season. It was a typical symphony concert in every respect, inspiring and soul-satisfying, but the feature of extraordinary interest was undoubtedly the playing of the soloist, Bronislaw Huberman, Poland's contribution to American musical art.

Here is a violinist of rare abilitie a true artist with amazing control o the mechanics of his instrument an an overpowering sense of tonal beau which makes his work a charm and delight. Not only the sweeping b arm and the facile fingers, not the cultured and developed musical intelligence of the player, produce such effects as those achieved by Huberman last evening. It was the real soul of the artist finding expression, and his interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto was a real delivery of the composer's message, a story told by the genius of a master artist.

Of rare beauty was his playing of the wonderful second movement, the glorious andante, which fairly swept the audience along with its sweetly sung strains. There may be living today violinists with greater technical power than Huberman although surely he displayed sufficient of sheer skill to satisfy the most exacting lover of musical mechanics, but last evening's audience was thoroughly satisfied that it was listening to an artist. Repeated rounds of applause testified to the impression his playing made.

The orchestra numbers were played with splendid effect, particularly the Franck symphonic piece, and the familiar "Oberon" overture was beautifully played. The final number, the dances by Borodin, is truly Slavic, abounding in odd and novel features. It was played with masterly precision and superb finish. The programme follows:

Weber..........Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms......Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck......Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin....Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

GLOBE- JAN.24.

ARTISTS PLEASE LARGE AUDIENCE

Excellent Program Rendered by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here.

A welcome and refreshing contrast was the significant feature of the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third concert of the season in Infantry Hall, last evening. For the first time in many years the program offered no symphony yet in its place the program ranged from Weber's Eighteenth Century Overture to "Oberon," which somehow never grows old—to Borodin's superb dance music from "Prince Igor."

Bronislaw Huber, violinist, was the soloist of the concert and the program was given in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a, Brahms; symphonic piece from "La Redemption," Franck; concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

The exquisite harmony and melody of the Weber overture was brought out by Mr. Monteux and his men in all the fullness of its perennial beauty and in the Brahm's variations on a Haydn theme, the strings and wood winds interpreted with magnificent effect with the various musical pictures so unerringly visualized by this great master.

In the piece from "La Redemption," by Caesar Franck, the French composer gives the hearer a sense of expansion in beauty and faltiness of style a characteristic which is his forte and his distinguishing mark of genius. It was given a masterly performance by the orchestra.

Naturally much of the interest of the concert centred in Mr. Huberman, the soloist, who was heard here for the first time.

Huberman appeared in this country almost a quarter of a century ago as a boy prodigy, but after his first American tour he did not return to the United States until last October, when he made his "second American debut" at Carnegie Hall in recital with Paul Frenkel at the piano. Mr. Huberman subsequently played in Chicago, in recital, and made his debut as an orchestral soloist in this country with the Minneapolis Symphony at St. Paul on Oct. 27. On this occasion, Mr. Huberman played the Beethoven Concerto, which he has since played in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky and again at the farewell concert of Dr. Richard Strauss.

This great artist played the Mendelssohn Concerto as if it had been written yesterday, and his musical conception of this big number—while differing greatly from the familiar interpretation given it by other famous violinists—was yet, perhaps a true recreation of the composer's dream. Indeed, the work of Huberman, his artistic qualities, his intelligence, his fervor and his perfection of technique revealed him as a violinist of the very first rank. He plays in the "grand manner" and does it with passion and exquisite sensibility for the possibilities of his instrument though at times the artist seemed to over reach himself in the matter of tempermamment and emotional display.

The concert ended in a realistic blaze of musical glory in the splendid performance by the orchestra of Borodin's colorful and barbaric "Polovtsian Dances."

N. B. P.

PROV. TRIB. JAN. 25

BOSTON SYMPHONY, HUBERMAN SOLOIST, DELIGHTS HEARERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms............Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck.........Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin......Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skillful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's style lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over-exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a show movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insistent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL - JAN. 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS HEARERS

Concert Opened with Overture to "Oberon," M. Monteux Giving Fine Reading.

HUBERMAN SOLO ARTIST

Brahm's Variations Hold Interest of Large Audience.—Borodin's "Polovtsian Dances" a Vivid Finish

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms............Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck.........Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin......Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skillful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's style lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over-exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a slow movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insistent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

PROV. JOURNEL - JAN. 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR FORMER LEADER

Orchestra to Play Funeral March for Hungarian Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will honor Arthur Nikisch, Hungarian conductor who was once its leader, at concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening by playing the funeral march from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung." Nikisch died in Leipsic on Monday.

Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, for the seasons 1889 to 1893.

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffmann, W. Krafft, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and F. Zahn, viola; A. Schroeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horn; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a wreath at the funeral of Nikisch as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor.

HERALD - JAN. 26

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HONOR NIKISCH

The Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" will be added to the programme of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, in honor of Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian conductor, whose death occurred in Leipsic on Monday. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, and holding this post during the seasons 1889 to 1893. When he first came to the orchestra and heard the ensemble which Gericke had trained to so remarkable a degree of perfection, Nikisch is credibly reported to have said: "All I have to do is to poetize."

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as follows: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffman, W. Krafft, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and F. Zahn, violas; A. Schoeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horns; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a wreath at the funeral of Nikisch, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor.

POST - JAN. 26.

Enter Pierne

Of the two pieces from Gabriel Pierné's incidental music to Pierre Loti's drama, "Ramuntcho," that Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will play today and tomorrow, one, the Overture, is wholly new to Boston. The other, a "Basque Rhapsody," has already received two performances in Boston—the first at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club in 1910, under the direction of Mr. Longy; the second, also under Mr. Longy's baton, at a concert by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club a year ago last spring. In treatment and character Overture and Rhapsody are much alike. Both are based upon tunes from the Biscayan country and in each several melodies are set down successively, with but little development. The Overture begins in moderate tempo in the key of E-flat major, with a theme in five-eight time, and this unusual rhythm holds sway for several pages. An Andante in G-flat major brings appropriate contrast and also an interesting bit of orchestration. The broadly songful melody is announced by first trumpet and first trombone in octaves, while the second trumpet, a second and third trombone, horn, bassoon and sarrusophone supply the supporting harmonies. The final division of the Overture has for its basis a lively tune not unlike a Bolero—for this Basque music is half Spanish.

W. S. S.

A full week of journeying will await the Symphony Orchestra when it departs from Boston next Sunday evening. On Monday it will play for the first time in Richmond; on Tuesday, it will revisit Washington; on Wednesday, it will be heard in Baltimore. Then follow, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, the usual concerts in New York and Brooklyn. In New York on Thursday, Mr. Monteux will repeat Mr. Szymanovski's Symphony and the fragments of Casella's ballet-music so well received here. On Saturday he will set Schönberg's Sextet for Strings for a second time on one of his programmes for New York.

TRANS JAN. 27.

SYMPHONY GIVES 13TH CONCERT

Siegfried's Funeral Music Played in Memory of Arthur Nikisch

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto No. 2, C minor; Pierne, overture and Basque Rhapsody from the music to Loti's play "Ramuntcho."

Before the symphony, Siegfried's Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" was performed in memory of Arthur Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra. The choice of this tribute was peculiarly appropriate, for Mr. Nikisch excelled in the interpretation of the romantic composers.

After the impressive performance, there was incongruous, impertinent applause, on the part of certain hearers. Perhaps, not having noticed the title page of the program-book, they mistook the march for the first movement of the symphony. This is a charitable supposition. Yet there are restless, excitable souls who would applaud the officiating clergyman at a funeral.

Pierne's overture was played here for the first time. The Basque Rhapsody was heard at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, led by Mr. Longy, on Jan. 26, 1910. The overture is practically a fantasia on Basque folk songs and dances. The thematic material of the Rhapsody is from the same source. This strange people with a strange language have folk music of singular individuality. In some of the airs there is a trace of eastern influence. It has been thought by some folk-lorists that these Moors shaped melodies older than their revival in Spain, or in certain cases introduced their own. It is imprudent to speak pontifically about the origin of folk songs in any country. The Basque airs chosen by Pierne for the two compositions are of contrasting gaiety and melancholy. He harmonized them skilfully, preserving their simplicity, their naivete, and clothed them in a brilliant orchestral dress without modern sophistication. The performance was brilliant.

Rachmaninov's concerto has been played here twice by the composer; once by Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Yesterday the pianist, who had visited this country in 1912-13, was Mr. William Bachaus, as he is known in the United States; Mr. Wilhelm Backhaus, as he is known in Germany. The concerto demands full sonority. This Mr. Bachaus was unable to obtain although he has by nature and art ample strength for any concerto. His performance was well-rhythmed, intelligent, musical, and in the gentler portions of the work he showed delicacy and the ability to "sing" a melodic passage. In the more vigorous measures he could not always cope with the orchestra. This was not the fault of Mr. Monteux or the orchestral players. The concerto is of uneven worth. The first movement is labored and has little marked character. It might have been written by any German, technically well-trained, who was acquainted with the music of Tchaikovsky. The Adagio and the Finale have more racial spirit and are well designed to win the favor of the crowd; the Adagio by its agreeable sentiment, the Finale by the sharply defined themes, the hustle and rush, the crescendo of excitement, with the apotheosis—full vigor of the orchestra with a long and sweeping cantilena, an obvious tune—truly an ad captandum Finale.

Mr. Monteux gave an interesting and effective reading of Beethoven's symphony without attempting the futile task of modernization or rejuvenation; a task in which some "prima donna" conductors more solicitous for their own glorification than that of the composer find delight and win the applause of those who are bored, unhappy, unless the conductor "does something," "gives them a thrill," "makes them sit up." They would welcome an actor who, in support of the theory that Hamlet was mad, would have straw in his hair while he recited "To be or not to be" with exaggerated emphasis, semaphoric gestures, and a wild expression in his eye. Mr. Monteux has given admirable interpretations of the great masters of the past. That of the 7th symphony is one of them.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The program for the concerts of Feb. 10, 11 will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B flat major; Handel, Concerto in F major for strings and two bands of wind instruments; Liadov, Folk Tales, "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Baba - Yaga"; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

HERALD - JAN 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

William Bachaus, who has not been in this country for a number of years, returned to Boston yesterday afternoon to play Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto in C minor at the Symphony concert.

It is a curious coincident that just a year ago Mr. Bachaus was playing this same concerto at a concert in Leipsic under Arthur Nikisch, for whom Mr. Monteux played Siegfried's Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung" as a memorial tribute.

The audience applauded Mr. Bachaus to the echo, but it seemed to be the consensus of opinion that certainly in the first movement, if not in all three, there was too much orchestration for the artist to surmount.

It was only by watching his fast-flying hands that one could know that he was playing much of the time. However, when the orchestra did subside, the tone of the pianist was powerful and beautiful.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with the Funeral March and followed it by the Beethoven Symphony in A major. This was exceedingly well played—so much so that Mr. Monteux was obliged to call the entire orchestra to its feet in acknowledgment.

The incidental music to "Ramantcho," a play by Pierre Loti, concluded the program. It was the first time that the music of Pierce has been played here. It is the appealing sort with marked rhyth and lots of quaint little old melodies.

AMER - JAN. 23

NIKISCH'S MEMORY HONORED

Symphony Plays Tribute; Backhaus, Soloist, at Piano

BY OLIN DOWNES

In memory of Arthur Nikisch, one of the greatest of modern conductors, and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in years gone by, the Funeral March from Wagner's "Die Gotterdamerung" opened the concert given by the arm and the facile fingers, not the cultured and developed musical intelligence of the player, produce such effects as those achieved by Huberman last evening. It was the real soul of the artist finding expression, and his interpretation of the Mendelssohn concerto was a real delivery of the composer's message, a story told by the genius of a master artist.

Of rare beauty was his playing of the wonderful second movement, the glorious andante, which fairly swept the audience along with its sweetly sung strains. There may be living today violinists with greater technical power than Huberman although surely he displayed sufficient of sheer skill to satisfy the most exacting lover of musical mechanics, but last evening's audience was thoroughly satisfied that it was listening to an artist. Repeated rounds of applause testified to the impression his playing made.

The orchestra numbers were played with splendid effect, particularly the Franck symphonic piece, and the familiar "Oberon" overture was beautifully played. The final number, the dances by Borodin, is truly Slavic, abounding in odd and novel features. It was played with masterly precision and superb finish. The programme follows:

Weber..........Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms......Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck......Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin....Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

GLOBE- JAN.24

ARTISTS PLEASE LARGE AUDIENCE

Excellent Program Rendered by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here.

A welcome and refreshing contrast was the significant feature of the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third concert of the season in Infantry Hall, last evening. For the first time in many years the program offered no symphony yet in its place the program ranged from Weber's Eighteenth Century Overture to "Oberon," which somehow never grows old—to Borodin's superb dance music from "Prince Igor."

Bronislaw Huber, violinist, was the soloist of the concert and the program was given in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a, Brahms; symphonic piece from "La Redemption," Franck; concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

The exquisite harmony and melody of the Weber overture was brought out by Mr. Monteux and his men in all the fullness of its perennial beauty and in the Brahm's variations on a Haydn theme, the strings and wood winds interpreted with magnificent effect with the various musical pictures so unerringly visualized by this great master.

In the piece from "La Redemption," by Caesar Franck, the French composer gives the hearer a sense of expansion in beauty and faltiness of style a characteristic which is his forte and his distinguishing mark of genius. It was given a masterly performance by the orchestra.

Naturally much of the interest of the concert centred in Mr. Huberman, the soloist, who was heard here for the first time.

Huberman appeared in this country almost a quarter of a century ago as a boy prodigy, but after his first American tour he did not return to the United States until last October, when he made his "second American debut" at Carnegie Hall in recital with Paul Frenkel at the piano. Mr. Huberman subsequently played in Chicago, in recital, and made his debut as an orchestral soloist in this country with the Minneapolis Symphony at St. Paul on Oct. 27. On this occasion, Mr. Huberman played the Beethoven Concerto, which he has since played in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky and again at the farewell concert of Dr. Richard Strauss.

This great artist played the Mendelssohn Concerto as if it had been written yesterday, and his musical conception of this big number—while differing greatly from the familiar interpretation given it by other famous violinists—was yet, perhaps a true recreation of the composer's dream. Indeed, the work of Huberman, his artistic qualities, his intelligence, his fervor and his perfection of technique reevaled him as a violinist of the very first rank. He plays in the "grand manner" and does it with passion and exquisite sensibility for the possibilities of his instrument though at times the artist seemed to over reach himself in the matter of tempermament and emotional display.

The concert ended in a realistic blaze of musical glory in the splendid performance by the orchestra of Borodin's colorful and barbaric "Polovtsian Dances."

N. B. P.

PROVTRIB. JAN.25

BOSTON SYMPHONY, HUBERMAN SOLOIST, DELIGHTS HEARERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber..................Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms............Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck..........Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin......Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skillful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's style lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over-exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a show movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insistent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL - JAN. 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS HEARERS

Concert Opened with Overture to "Oberon," M. Monteux Giving Fine Reading.

HUBERMAN SOLO ARTIST

Brahm's Variations Hold Interest of Large Audience.—Borodin's "Polovtsian Dances" a Vivid Finish

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre

Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber....................Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms............Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck..........Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin......Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skillful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's style lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over-exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a slow movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insistent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

PROV. JOURNEL-JAN.25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR FORMER LEADER

Orchestra to Play Funeral March for Hungarian Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will honor Arthur Nikisch, Hungarian conductor who was once its leader, at concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening by playing the funeral march from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung." Nikisch died in Leipsic on Monday.

Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, for the seasons 1889 to 1893.

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffmann, W. Krafft, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and F. Zahn, viola; A. Schroeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horn; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a wreath at the funeral of Nikisch as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor.

HERALD- JAN.26

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HONOR NIKISCH

The Funeral March from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" will be added to the programme of the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, in honor of Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian conductor, whose death occurred in Leipsic on Monday. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, and holding this post during the seasons 1889 to 1893. When he first came to the orchestra and heard the ensemble which Gericke had trained to so remarkable a degree of perfection, Nikisch is credibly reported to have said: "All I have to do is to poetize."

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as follows: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffman, W. Krafft, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and F. Zahn, violas; A. Schoeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horns; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a wreath at the funeral of Nikisch, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor.

POST- JAN.26.

Enter Pierne

Of the two pieces from Gabriel Pierné's incidental music to Pierre Loti's drama, "Ramuntcho," that Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will play today and tomorrow, one, the Overture, is wholly new to Boston. The other, a "Basque Rhapsody," has already received two performances in Boston—the first at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club in 1910, under the direction of Mr. Longy; the second, also under Mr. Longy's baton, at a concert by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club a year ago last spring. In treatment and character Overture and Rhapsody are much alike. Both are based upon tunes from the Biscayan country, and in each several melodies are set down successively, with but little development. The Overture begins in moderate tempo in the key of E-flat major, with a theme in five-eight time, and this unusual rhythm holds sway for several pages. An Andante in G-flat major brings appropriate contrast and also an interesting bit of orchestration. The broadly songful melody is announced by first trumpet and first trombone in octaves, while the second trumpet, a second and third trombone, horn, bassoon and sarrusophone supply the supporting harmonies. The final division of the Overture has for its basis a lively tune not unlike a Bolero—for this Basque music is half Spanish.

W. S. S.

A full week of journeying will await the Symphony Orchestra when it departs from Boston next Sunday evening. On Monday it will play for the first time in Richmond; on Tuesday, it will revisit Washington; on Wednesday, it will be heard in Baltimore. Then follow, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, the usual concerts in New York and Brooklyn. In New York on Thursday, Mr. Monteux will repeat Mr. Szymanovski's Symphony and the fragments of Casella's ballet-music so well received here. On Saturday he will set Schönberg's Sextet for Strings for a second time on one of his programmes for New York.

TRANS JAN.27.

SYMPHONY GIVES 13TH CONCERT

Siegfried's Funeral Music Played in Memory of Arthur Nikisch

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto No. 2, C minor; Pierne, overture and Basque Rhapsody from the music to Loti's play "Ramuntcho."

Before the symphony, Siegfried's Funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" was performed in memory of Arthur Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra. The choice of this tribute was peculiarly appropriate, for Mr. Nikisch excelled in the interpretation of the romantic composers.

After the impressive performance, there was incongruous, impertinent applause, on the part of certain hearers. Perhaps, not having noticed the title page of the program-book, they mistook the march for the first movement of the symphony. This is a charitable supposition. Yet there are restless, excitable souls who would applaud the officiating clergyman at a funeral.

Pierne's overture was played here for the first time. The Basque Rhapsody was heard at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, led by Mr. Longy, on Jan. 26, 1910. The overture is practically a fantasia on Basque folk songs and dances. The thematic material of the Rhapsody is from the same source. This strange people with a strange language have folk music of singular individuality. In some of the airs there is a trace of eastern influence. It has been thought by some folk-lorists that the Moors shaped melodies older than their arrival in Spain, or in certain cases introduced their own. It is imprudent to speak pontifically about the origin of folk songs in any country. The Basque airs chosen by Pierne for the two compositions are of contrasting gaiety and melancholy. He harmonized them skilfully, preserving their simplicity, their naiveta, and clothed them in a brilliant orchestral dress without modern sophistication. The performance was brilliant.

Rachmaninov's concerto has been played here twice by the composer; once by Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Yesterday the pianist, who had visited this country in 1912-13, was Mr. William Bachaus, as he is known in the United States; Mr. Wilhelm Backhaus, as he is known in Germany. The concerto demands full sonority. This Mr. Bachaus was unable to obtain although he has by nature and art ample strength for any concerto. His performance was well-rhythmed, intelligent, musical, and in the gentler portions of the work he showed delicacy and the ability to "sing" a melodic passage. In the more vigorous measures he could not always cope with the orchestra. This was not the fault of Mr. Monteux or the orchestral players. The concerto is of uneven worth. The first movement is labored and has little marked character. It might have been written by any German, technically well-trained, who was acquainted with the music of Tchaikovsky. The Adagio and the Finale have more racial spirit and are well designed to win the favor of the crowd; the Adagio by its agreeable sentiment, the Finale by the sharply defined themes, the hustle and rush, the crescendo of excitement, with the apotheosis—full vigor of the orchestra with a long and sweeping cantilena, an obvious tune—truly an ad captandum Finale.

Mr. Monteux gave an interesting and effective reading of Beethoven's symphony without attempting the futile task of modernization or rejuvenation; a task in which some "prima donna" conductors more solicitous for their own glorification than that of the composer find delight and win the applause of those who are bored, unhappy, unless the conductor "does something," "gives them a thrill," "makes them sit up." They would welcome an actor who, in support of the theory that Hamlet was mad, would have straw in his hair while he recited "To be or not to be" with exaggerated emphasis, semaphoric gestures, and a wild expression in his eye. Mr. Monteux has given admirable interpretations of the great masters of the past. That of the 7th symphony is one of them.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The program for the concerts of Feb. 10, 11 will be as follows: Schumann, Symphony No. 1, B flat major; Handel, Concerto in F major for strings and two bands of wind instruments; Liadov, Folk Tales, "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Baba-Yaga"; Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

HERALD-JAN 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

William Bachaus, who has not been in this country for a number of years, returned to Boston yesterday afternoon to play Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto in C minor at the Symphony concert.

It is a curious coincident that just a year ago Mr. Bachaus was playing this same concerto at a concert in Leipsic under Arthur Nikisch, for whom Mr. Monteux played Siegfried's Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung" as a memorial tribute.

The audience applauded Mr. Bachaus to the echo, but it seemed to be the consensus of opinion that certainly in the first movement, if not in all three, there was too much orchestration for the artist to surmount.

It was only by watching his fast-flying hands that one could know that he was playing much of the time. However, when the orchestra did subside, the tone of the pianist was powerful and beautiful.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with the Funeral March and followed it by the Beethoven Symphony in A major. This was exceedingly well played—so much so that Mr. Monteux was obliged to call the entire orchestra to its feet in acknowledgment.

The incidental music to "Ramantcho," a play by Pierre Loti, concluded the program. It was the first time that the music of Pierce has been played here. It is the appealing sort with marked rhyth and lots of quaint little old melodies.

AMER- JAN 23

NIKISCH'S MEMORY HONORED

Symphony Plays Tribute; Backhaus, Soloist, at Piano

BY OLIN DOWNES

In memory of Arthur Nikisch, one of the greatest of modern conductors, and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in years gone by, the Funeral March from Wagner's "Die Gotterdamerung" opened the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

BACKHAUS AT PIANO

The remainder of the programme consisted of Beethoven's 7th symphony; Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto C minor, played by William Backhaus, and the Overture and "Caprice Basque" that Pierne composed for Pierre Lotis drama, "Ramuntcho." The overture was heard here for the first time. The Caprice had been introduced by Georges Longy at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, conducted by him in 1910.

The performance of the symphony was spirited, though there have been performances of this work at these concerts more euphonious in character. The music itself remains among the greatest Beethoven ever wrote, this though the influence of Haydn is strong in the opening allegro and in the scherzo. There is the introduction, as though vast portals were swinging open, to reveal a wondrous realm of light and joy. There is the incomparable genius with which Beethoven takes a fragment of a motive, or merely a rythm, and creates gigantically. There is the allegretto, of which the meaning lies deeper than any words, expressible only through music. There is the finale that swings and laughs until the very planets whirl in the dance. The performance was stormily applauded until the players rose with the conductor to make their acknowledgments.

Well Made Music

Mr. Backhaus then gave a performance of what is probably the best of the three piano concertos that Rachmaninoff has thus far published. He played with such technic of mastery, and a superb sense of form, that he gave the concerts almost a stronger and nobler character than it inherently possesses.

It is possible that a Slavic performer would have thrown his emotions more recklessly in the piece, and slapped on color with a broader and a wilder brush. But the concerto is more than a patch of color, more than a reek of Slavic emotion. It is not music of the first class, but it is certainly extremely well made music of the second, and the melancholy coloring, the sensuousness of the themes and the composer's power of building up a climax and scoring wonderfully for piano and orchestra are strongly felt.

POST - JAN. 28.

SYMPHONY HONORS MEMORY OF NIKISCH

Funeral Music Played for Former Conductor

Yesterday's Symphony concert began with an impressive performance of the "Siegfried Funeral Music," from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," in memory of Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the orchestra from 1889 to 1893, who died in Leipzig Tuesday. It is a curious fact that although this is the 41st season of the Boston Symphony, all of the other conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Paur, Fiedler, Muck and Rabaud, are still living. A dozen of the present players and many in the audience must have revived memories of Nikisch's brilliant conducting as they listened to the "Funeral Music."

The soloist was Wilhelm Bachaus, unheard here since before the war, who played Rachmaniov's Second Pianoforte Concerto, last heard here from the composer's hands in 1919. The music is for the most part uninteresting, trivial and bombastic by turns. It is, however, admirably adapted to a display of technical mastery, the raison d'etre of most such pieces.

Mr Bachaus, though he failed to make his instrument sing, gave a virtuoso performance which was received with great enthusiasm by the audience. He is a phenomenally agile and muscular pianist.

Incidental music to Pierre Loti's dramatization of his novel "Ramuntcho," composed by Pierne for the performances at the Odeon in Paris in 1908, was played for the first time at these concerts. Basque dance tunes much less strange than their names, of which "Hancha ikhazketako" is a fair sample, furnish the thematic material, which is deftly handled, making light, agreeably innocuous music.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played with no repeats, probably because the addition of the Funeral Music lengthened the program originally planned, was fervently applauded. The scherzo and finale seemed more than ever to deserve the phrase of Wagner about this symphony—"the apotheosis of the dance"—under Mr Monteux' graceful treatment of them. The marvelous introduction to the first movement and the allegretto have been more nobly played here in the past.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Feb 10 and 11 includes Schumann's First Symphony, Handel's Double Concerto, three short pieces by Liadov, and Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp." There will be no soloist.

GLOBE - JAN 28

[57]

GERMAN PIANIST SYMPHONY STAR

It is more like old times at the Symphony this week, wit ha German soloist, Wilhelm Bachaus, the intensely Germanic funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," in memory of Arthur Nikisch, the brilliant German who formerly conducted the orchestra, and

HELM BACHAUS

hoven's seventh symphony, ch for more than a century been one of the glories of an music.

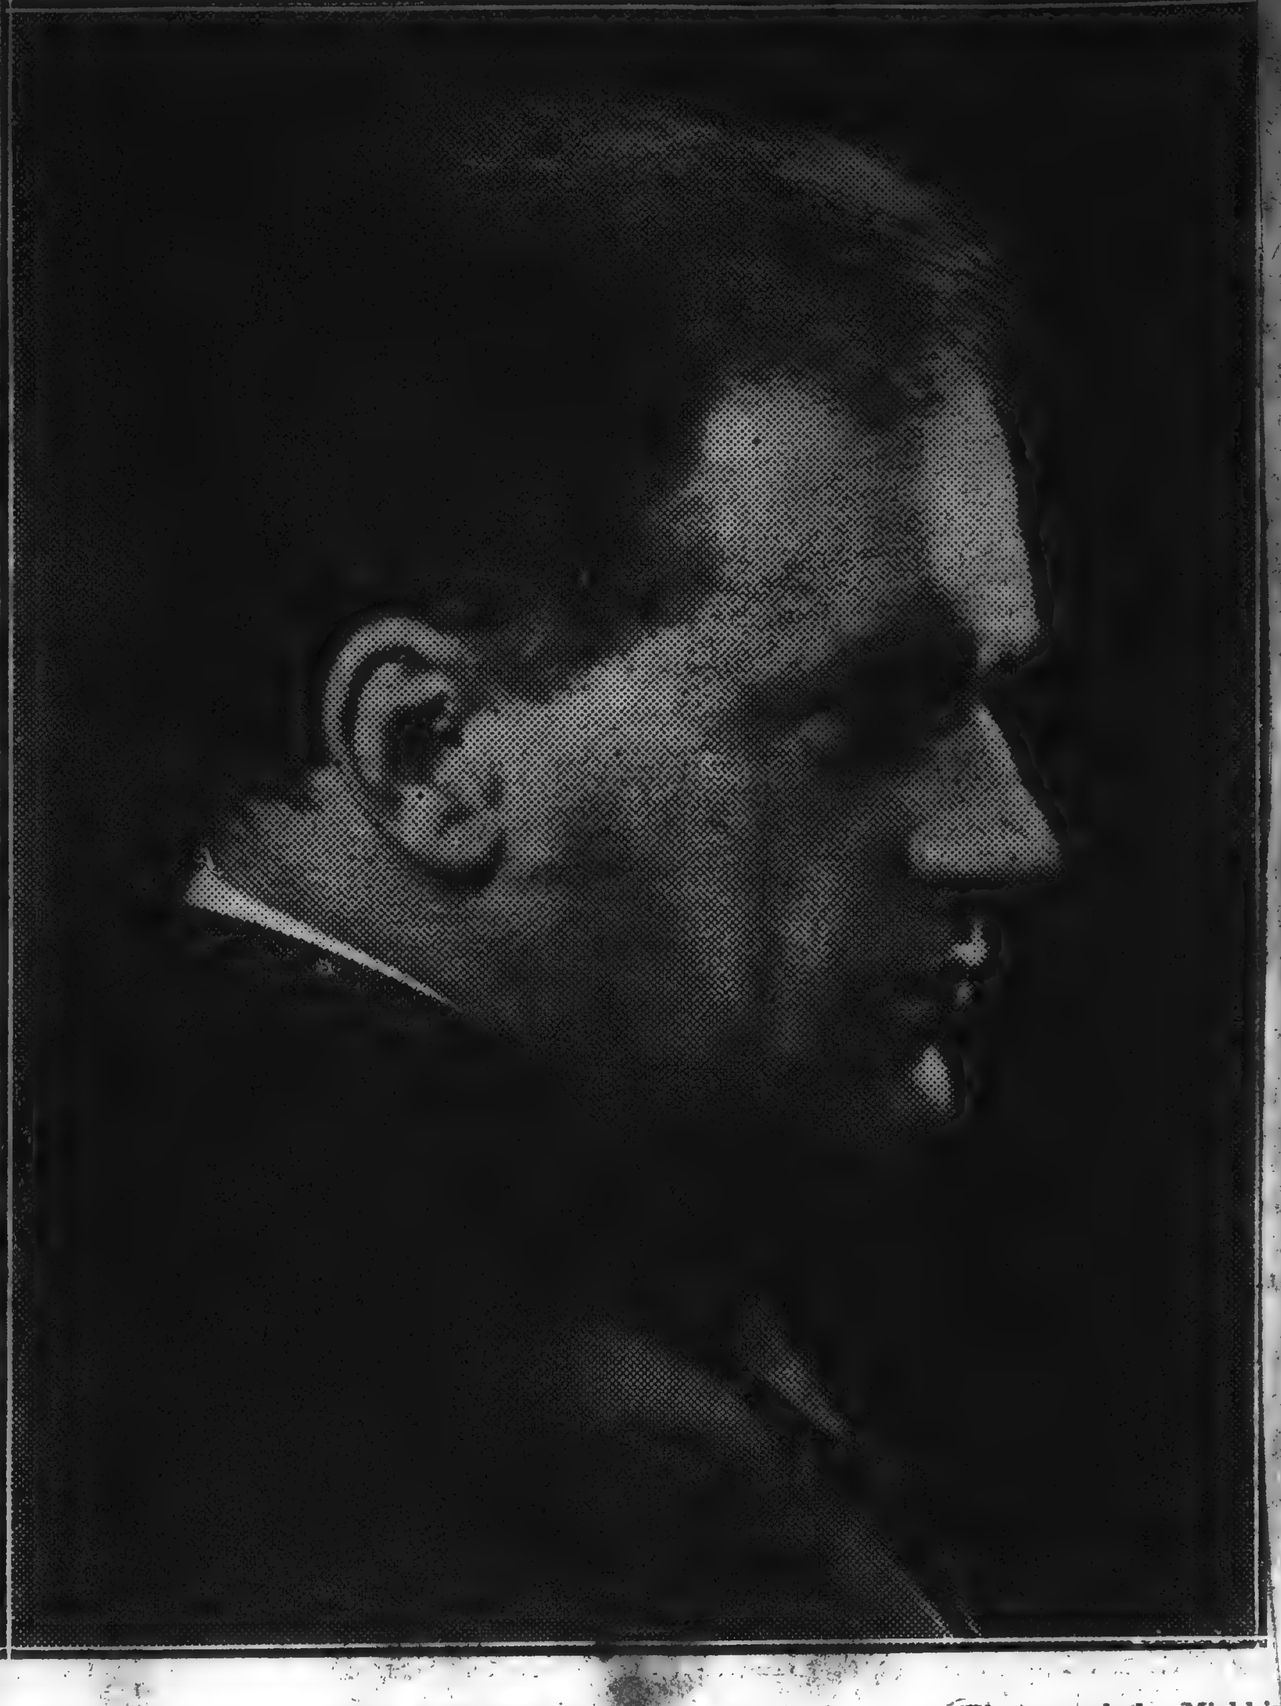
orchestra was in fine fettle erday, giving one of the most joyable performances of the ason. The Nikisch memorial music was of itself worth going to hear. Mr. Monteux interpreted it with true artistic feeling, thus paying his personal tribute to one of his most distinguished predecessors.

Mr. Bachaus, who has been a concert star since he was 16, ranks today among the foremost pianists. His performance of the Rachmaninoff concerts in C minor was at once virile and poetic. Here, again, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra displayed their mettle. Soloist and orchestra fairly shared the honors of a remarkable performance.

The novelty on the program, which will be repeated tonight, is the music written by Pierne, the French composer, for "Ramuntcho," a play by Pierre Lotti, which was brought out in Paris many years ago. The music is especially interesting for the reason that it includes song and dance themes from the Basque country, the home of Marshal Foch. Pierne's "Biscayan Rhapsody," music of a similar melodic tang and rhythmic snap, was added for full measure.

ADVTSR - JAN - 28

Maturity and Measure



Wilhelm Bachaus

(Photograph by Mishkin

Pianist of the Week at the Symphony Concerts

TRANS - JAN 28.

Symphony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MEMORIAL PIECE TO BASQUE RHAPSODY

The Dead Siegfried and the Dead Nikisch — Beethoven Again for the Music of Genius — Rakhmaninov Without Rakhmaninov—Folk-Dances Wild Yet Grave

IN some moods it is hard to agree that any mortal man deserves as memorial music Wagner's lament and exaltation of Siegfried. The fragment began the Symphony Concert yesterday as tribute in tones to the dead Nikisch. It mourned and honored him alike as illustrious conductor and as whilom leader of the orchestra so recalling his memory. It was music that set his mind and heart aglow, with which —even in his young days in Boston—he had often been magnificently eloquent. Yet Nikisch was no more than mortal man ably practicing his profession to the admiration and applause of his fellows. Now sounded for him the measures of lament for a hero dead transcending all other mourning that music yet knows. Might and majesty upbear them; they scale the heavens with a universal, an heroic woe. Then out of the music the ghost of Siegfried rises, of the Volsung pair that gave him birth. It sings with infinite pity their fated love; it sounds his horn as he goes forth to hero's deed and glory; across it glows the quest that to Brünnhilde sealed him. Fate broods and conquers; again the folk may only cry their grief. Legend or no legend, Siegfried is hero of the imagination; hero incarnate and exalted in music beyond all the rest; figure as epical as any that dramatic poet from Æschylus to this very Wagner has summoned to everlasting and universal life in the spirits of men. For no mortals, properly, is his music, since they, doing the deeds and living the life of earth, may not reach to his deeds and life of the imagination.

Yet what is a choosing conductor to do? Assuredly Nikisch deserved a memorial piece and the range of choice is so small. Hardly for him was a certain "Trauermusik" of Mozart occasionally disinterred for such purpose. It would have sounded pale and formal for a romantic, an ebullient master. Commemoration for all and sundry—bankers included—has worn threadbare for this usage the slow movement of Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony." So forth and so onward. Possibly the "funeral march," in orchestral arrangement from Chopin's Sonata for Piano sounds most plangently, most piercingly, the grief of mortal for mortal. And there are chords and sonorities of Mozart in "Don Juan" and "The Magic Flute" that might be great epitaph for any greatness, dead and mourned. True, they continue but for a moment, but of such is our human lamenting.

If superlatives were less perilous words it would be easy to write that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the most vital of classics. Yet forthwith his Fifth, maybe his Third and also his Ninth, rises to challenge such assertion while there are those who find music of Bach, of Mozart, even of Handel, no less immortal and deathless. Juster then is it to say that no music seems more independent of space and time, the changing minds and manners and ears of men than this Seventh Symphony, that no other sounds over a century with less diminished voice. We of this day write of our moderns with their preludings of mystery unfolding, warming, like shadowed gateway gathering life and light. Yet not one of them has set such portico to his music as does Beethoven in this Symphony. The other day in his tone-poem of "The Waltz," Ravel was preluding darkly, as it were gropingly, for his epitome of a dance that a shattered world was at the end to shatter and to mock. His measures were interesting, in degree impressive work of the imagination after Ravel's kind. Yet poor they seem to recall beside the depths and the heights of Beethoven's beginning in his symphony of the dance. Out of his mystery and suspense shapes beauty; upon all three he lays his finger of sublimity and even the Strauss of the first measures of "Zarathustra" pales and is still.

We listen to our moderns—or rather to the moderns of the last generation, to Brahms and Franck, to Mahler and to the Bruckner of the slow movements, to d'Indy even—and with them glow and mount as from some germ, small but fruitful, rises music to flood the ear with sound and the listening heart with emotion. So from the merest figure, as it sometimes seems, is born the first movement of this Seventh Symphony. It threads from choir to choir; rhythm stays or speeds it; modulation newly accents it; fuller and fuller harmony enriches it; from motiv mounts melody from melody outspreads song; with it at last the whole orchestra, the whole audience, is winged. By another path, again a music that scales the tonal heavens. . . .

Forthwith Beethoven sets to his Allegretto and again to new mysteries. For here is the everlasting loveliness, the celestial voice of music in itself, by itself, for itself. It is futility to ask what Beethoven was thinking as he wrote, what he intended to express, what mood happened to be upon him. Not he himself probably could have said. The song of beauty intensified could do his will; so also could the song of deepening power. Here in this Seventh Symphony he has preferred—who knows by what prompting?—the song of pure loveliness, a music of the air that sounds when light brightens into dawning and the very ether, as Debussy fancied in his second Nocturne, quivers to the rhythm of its progress.

Beethoven's Scherzo, with leaping beat and recurring jets of song, releases the passion of music made motion that is to race and flood through the Finale. Of course, the pedants may find repetitions —Mr. Monteux excised most of them yesterday; of course, the incurably sedate may detect excesses. But what is excess in such a music of the noble rage of genius making of sound the apotheosis of motion and in passion of creation setting a whole universe to dance. Here sounds and sounded long before Nietzsche's day the "dance-song" of Zarathustra's imagining, world-embracing and endless. With eloquence Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played the Seventh Symphony; for once his doubled instruments did not thicken tone or impede motion; but such a music of genius needs genius in the conductor to heat with equal and ascendant flame. Once upon a time in this town and for long recollection so met and were as one Beethoven and Toscanini.

Even with an intermission between, it is not good for Mr. Rakhmaninov to follow Beethoven. No more is it good for his Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra to sound, through no present fault of the pianist, in bodiless and unresilient tone More than once in the Concerto, the Russian writes a music of marching sonorities. With it he would have piano and orchestra resound. Mr. Bachaus could not yesterday, though he is pianist of just power; while Mr Monteux perforce subdued his band to circumstance. Often in the Concerto Mr. Rakhmaninov would have the piano shine brightly across the instrumental web, or else lead the orchestra over the twofold course, rhapsodizing along the way like David when he danced before the ark. Mr. Bachaus, in prime as pianist, perceived this glow and march, pursued it, almost gained it, only to find it snatched away. Enough to praise with reason his cool, sure technical mastery, his clear sense of musical design and proportion, his perception of beauty, power and diversity of tone, his just and honest response to such mood and feeling as the music conveys, his ability to make feats of bravura sound as a musical speech.

Of course other pianists than Mr. Rakhmaninov play and will play this Concerto. Yet somehow it needs his presence to glamor it. When he comes gravely to his place as figure of brooding power; when he plays the first measures for piano alone and seems to martial the orchestra into the music, the susceptible hearer is ready to believe almost anything of it. Piano and orchestra make their way through a web—or a waste—of development, and with Mr. Rakhmaninov in grave and puissant presence, manipulation sounded like meditation in tones. Broadly, piano and orchestra sing a melody; and with Mr. Rakhmaninov as chief singer, emotion seemed to warm it. Upon the workable melancholy of the slow movement he wrought similar illusion. Hearing him, the listener was quite sure that the songful ascent, the uppiled sonorities of the Finale were a music of mounting power, not one more application of well-tested stimulants to aural nerves massed in the concert-room. Perhaps and perhaps; we of the audience are presumed to hear music of itself; while only incidentally to the eye comes illusion from the presence of the composer as pianist. Yet nearly all of us feel Mr. Rakhmaninov in person—and to the considerable advantage of his piano-pieces, small or great.

For ending, Mr. Monteux smote again the loud timbrel of folk-song and folk-dance. This time it was a Basque timbrel and Monsieur Pierné, workaday conductor and workaday composer in Paris, held it. More literally the conductor played an Overture and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music for a play of Basque folk, "Ramuntcho," written by the novelist, Loti, and produced by Antoine in his days as director of the Odéon. The piece did not suggest Loti as either born or practised playwright; the Parisian public regarded it coldly. It soon perished; whereupon the economical Pierné re-made his numbers for the concert-hall. There they reappear seldom and with more credit to him as dutiful and adaptable transcriber than as composer doing the works of imagination and projection upon kindling material.

Basque dances move gravely to strange, beating, reiterated rhythms. Again and again they repeat a native wildness which composer and conductor intensify by well-tested means. The individuality of this music is not the wildness—easy to find in folk-dances from the Biscayan even to the Roumanian hills. Rather it is a singular austerity. The rhythms whip; yet the music keeps a grave, almost a solemn, state. Paradoxical though it sounds, these Basques dance to frenzy yet keep their dignity. Akin goes the melancholy song that now and then is interlude. The Slav, so making folk-music, may whine; the Hungarian, the Roumanian, may scream; the Basques, according to Pierné and also their own music, respect reticence.

H. T. PARKER.

TRANS - JAN 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts will be given February 10 and 11. The program will include Schumann's symphony in B-flat; Liadoff's suite on Russian folk themes, Handel's double concerto for strings and wind and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

ADVTSR - JAN. 29.

Events and Comments

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. The program for Feb 10 and 11 includes Schumann's First Symphony, a Suite by Liadov, Handel's Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, and Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp." There is no soloist.

GLOBE - JAN. 29.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will be given on Feb. 10 and 11, since this week will be occupied by the southern trip of the orchestra, to include concerts in Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Mr. Monteux will head the program for the 14th pair of concerts, with Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat; Liadov's light suite will also be played, the movements of which are built on Russian folk themes, including "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga." Handel's double concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," will be the other numbers.

HERALD - JAN. 29

Dispatch

Richmond Va

IAN 18 1922

Concerning Boston Symphony.

Behind the musical achievements which the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to appear at the City Auditorium on January 30, has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose and the expenditure of wealth. The aim since its foundation in 1881 has been ever for the best attainable and only gradually, through years of upbuilding effort by one or another of the world's great conductors, has the goal been won.

Each of the hundred musicians in the orchestra is an accomplished artist. The leaders of the various sections are declared masters of their instruments and of a caliber scarcely to be found elsewhere. During the last two years the organization has profited signally by the powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. No leader has come to the orchestra with a more distinguished record.

The famous old orchestra is now in its fortieth season and it is understood that never before has the schedule been so heavy. The program to be given in Richmond is said to be exceptionally fine. This visit of the Boston players will mark the close of the artists' course under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, tickets for which are now on sale at the Corley Company's, 213 East Broad Street.

SUN

ss New York City

JAN 21 1922

The fourth and last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, February 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karl Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert, and thus give to this Polish composer, who is so highly spoken of in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

For the Saturday concert the novelty will be Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

BACKHAUS AT PIANO

The remainder of the programme consisted of Beethoven's 7th symphony; Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto in C minor, played by William Backhaus, and the Overture and "Caprice Basque" that Pierne composed for Pierre Lotis drama, "Ramuntcho." The overture was heard here for the first time. The Caprice had been introduced by Georges Longy at a concert of the Boston Orchestral Club, conducted by him in 1910.

The performance of the symphony was spirited, though there have been performances of this work at these concerts more euphonious in character. The music itself remains among the greatest Beethoven ever wrote, this though the influence of Haydn is strong in the opening allegro and in the scherzo. There is the introduction, as though vast portals were swinging open, to reveal a wondrous realm of light and joy. There is the incomparable genius with which Beethoven takes a fragment of a motive, or merely a rythm, and creates gigantically. There is the allegretto, of which the meaning lies deeper than any words, expressible only through music. There is the finale that swings and laughs until the very planets whirl in the dance. The performance was stormily applauded until the players rose with the conductor to make their acknowledgments.

Well Made Music

Mr. Backhaus then gave a performance of what is probably the best of the three piano concertos that Rachmaninoff has thus far published. He played with such technic of mastery, and a superb sense of form, that he gave the concerts almost a stronger and nobler character than it inherently possesses.

It is possible that a Slavic performer would have thrown his emotions more recklessly in the piece, and slapped on color with a broader and a wilder brush. But the concerto is more than a patch of color, more than a reek of Slavic emotion. It is not music of the first class, but it is certainly extremely well made music of the second, and the melancholy coloring, the sensuousness of the themes and the composer's power of building up a climax and scoring wonderfully for piano and orchestra are strongly felt.

POST - JAN. 28.

SYMPHONY HONORS MEMORY OF NIKISCH

Funeral Music Played for Former Conductor

Yesterday's Symphony concert began with an impressive performance of the "Siegfried Funeral Music," from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," in memory of Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the orchestra from 1889 to 1893, who died in Leipzig Tuesday. It is a curious fact that although this is the 41st season of the Boston Symphony, all of the other conductors, Henschel, Gericke, Paur, Fiedler, Muck and Rabaud, are still living. A dozen of the present players and many in the audience must have revived memories of Nikisch's brilliant conducting as they listened to the "Funeral Music."

The soloist was Wilhelm Bachaus, unheard here since before the war, who played Rachmaniov's Second Pianoforte Concerto, last heard here from the composer's hands in 1919. The music is for the most part uninteresting, trivial and bombastic by turns. It is, however, admirably adapted to a display of technical mastery, the raison d'etre of most such pieces.

Mr Bachaus, though he failed to make his instrument sing, gave a virtuoso performance which was received with great enthusiasm by the audience. He is a phenomenally agile and muscular pianist.

Incidental music to Pierre Loti's dramatization of his novel "Ramuntcho," composed by Pierne for the performances at the Odeon in Paris in 1908, was played for the first time at these concerts. Basque dance tunes much less strange than their names, of which "Hancha ikhazketako" is a fair sample, furnish the thematic material, which is deftly handled, making light, agreeably innocuous music.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played with no repeats, probably because the addition of the Funeral Music lengthened the program originally planned, was fervently applauded. The scherzo and finale seemed more than ever to deserve the phrase of Wagner about this symphony—"the apotheosis of the dance"—under Mr Monteux' graceful treatment of them. The marvelous introduction to the first movement and the allegretto have been more nobly played here in the past.

There are no concerts next week. The program for Feb 10 and 11 includes Schumann's First Symphony, Handel's Double Concerto, three short pieces by Liadov, and Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp." There will be no soloist.

GLOBE - JAN. 28

GERMAN PIANIST SYMPHONY STAR

HELM BACHAUS

It is more like old times at the Symphony this week, wit ha German soloist, Wilhelm Bachaus, the intensely Germanic funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," in memory of Arthur Nikisch, the brilliant German who formerly conducted the orchestra, and hoven's seventh symphony, ch for more than a century been one of the glories of an music.

orchestra was in fine fettle erday, giving one of the most oyable performances of the ason. The Nikisch memorial music was of itself worth going to hear. Mr. Monteux interpreted it with true artistic feeling, thus paying his personal tribute to one of his most distinguished predecessors.

Mr. Bachaus, who has been a concert star since he was 16, ranks today among the foremost pianists. His performance of the Rachmaninoff concerts in C minor was at once virile and poetic. Here, again, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra displayed their mettle. Soloist and orchestra fairly shared the honors of a remarkable performance.

The novelty on the program, which will be repeated tonight, is the music written by Pierne, the French composer, for "Ramuntcho," a play by Pierre Lotti, which was brought out in Paris many years ago. The music is especially interesting for the reason that it includes song and dance themes from the Basque country, the home of Marshal Foch. Pierne's "Biscayan Rhapsody," music of a similar melodic tang and rhythmic snap, was added for full measure.

Maturity and Measure

Wilhelm Bachaus

(Photograph by Mishkin

Pianist of the Week at the Symphony Concerts

TRANS - JAN. 28.

ADVTSR - JAN - 28

Symphony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM MEMORIAL PIECE TO BASQUE RHAPSODY

The Dead Siegfried and the Dead Nikisch — Beethoven Again for the Music of Genius — Rakhmaninov Without Rakhmaninov—Folk-Dances Wild Yet Grave

IN some moods it is hard to agree that any mortal man deserves as memorial music Wagner's lament and exaltation of Siegfried. The fragment began the Symphony Concert yesterday as tribute in tones to the dead Nikisch. It mourned and honored him alike as illustrious conductor and as whilom leader of the orchestra so recalling his memory. It was music that set his mind and heart aglow, with which —even in his young days in Boston—he had often been magnificently eloquent. Yet Nikisch was no more than mortal man ably practicing his profession to the admiration and applause of his fellows. Now sounded for him the measures of lament for a hero dead transcending all other mourning that music yet knows. Might and majesty upbear them; they scale the heavens with a universal, an heroic woe. Then out of the music the ghost of Siegfried rises, of the Volsüng pair that gave him birth. It sings with infinite pity their fated love; it sounds his horn as he goes forth to hero's deed and glory; across it glows the quest that to Brünnhilde sealed him. Fate broods and conquers; again the folk may only cry their grief. Legend or no legend, Siegfried is hero of the imagination; hero incarnate and exalted in music beyond all the rest; figure as epical as any that dramatic poet from Æschylus to this very Wagner has summoned to everlasting and universal life in the spirits of men. For no mortals, properly, is his music, since they, doing the deeds and living the life of earth, may not reach to his deeds and life of the imagination.

Yet what is a choosing conductor to do? Assuredly Nikisch deserved a memorial piece and the range of choice is so small. Hardly for him was a certain "Trauermusik" of Mozart occasionally disinterred for such purpose. It would have sounded pale and formal for a romantic, an ebullient master. Commemoration for all and sundry—bankers included—has worn threadbare for this usage the slow movement of Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony." So forth and so onward. Possibly the "funeral march," in orchestral arrangement from Chopin's Sonata for Piano sounds most plangently, most piercingly, the grief of mortal for mortal. And there are chords and sonorities of Mozart in "Don Juan" and "The Magic Flute" that might be great epitaph for any greatness, dead and mourned. True, they continue but for a moment, but of such is our human lamenting.

If superlatives were less perilous words it would be easy to write that Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the most vital of classics. Yet forthwith his Fifth, maybe his Third and also his Ninth, rises to challenge such assertion while there are those who find music of Bach, of Mozart, even of Handel, no less immortal and deathless. Juster then is it to say that no music seems more independent of space and time, the changing minds and manners and ears of men than this Seventh Symphony, that no other sounds over a century with less diminished voice. We of this day write of our moderns with their preludings of mystery unfolding, warming, like shadowed gateway gathering life and light. Yet not one of them has set such portico to his music as does Beethoven in this Symphony. The other day in his tone-poem of "The Waltz," Ravel was preluding darkly, as it were gropingly, for his epitome of a dance that a shattered world was at the end to shatter and to mock. His measures were interesting, in degree impressive work of the imagination after Ravel's kind. Yet poor they seem to recall beside the depths and the heights of Beethoven's beginning in his symphony of the dance. Out of his mystery and suspense shapes beauty; upon all three he lays his finger of sublimity and even the Strauss of the first measures of "Zarathustra" pales and is still.

We listen to our moderns—or rather to the moderns of the last generation, to Brahms and Franck, to Mahler and to the Bruckner of the slow movements, to d'Indy even—and with them glow and mount as from some germ, small but fruitful, rises music to flood the ear with sound and the listening heart with emotion. So from the merest figure, as it sometimes seems, is born the first movement of this Seventh Symphony. It threads from choir to choir; rhythm stays or speeds it; modulation newly accents it; fuller and fuller harmony enriches it; from motiv mounts melody from melody outspreads song; with it at last the whole orchestra, the whole audience, is winged. By another path, again a music that scales the tonal heavens. . . .

Forthwith Beethoven sets to his Allegretto and again to new mysteries. For here is the everlasting loveliness, the celestial voice of music in itself, by itself, for itself. It is futility to ask what Beethoven was thinking as he wrote, what he intended to express, what mood happened to be upon him. Not he himself probably could have said. The song of beauty intensified could do his will; so also could the song of deepening power. Here in this Seventh Symphony he has preferred—who knows by what prompting?—the song of pure loveliness, a music of the air that sounds when light brightens into dawning and the very ether, as Debussy fancied in his second Nocturne, quivers to the rhythm of its progress.

Beethoven's Scherzo, with leaping beat and recurring jets of song, releases the passion of music made motion that is to race and flood through the Finale. Of course, the pedants may find repetitions —Mr. Monteux excised most of them yesterday; of course, the incurably sedate may detect excesses. But what is excess in such a music of the noble rage of genius making of sound the apotheosis of motion and in passion of creation setting a whole universe to dance. Here sounds and sounded long before Nietzsche's day the "dance-song" of Zarathustra's imagining, world-embracing and endless. With eloquence Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played the Seventh Symphony; for once his doubled instruments did not thicken tone or impede motion; but such a music of genius needs genius in the conductor to heat with equal and ascendant flame. Once upon a time in this town and for long recollection so met and were as one Beethoven and Toscanini.

Even with an intermission between, it is not good for Mr. Rakhmaninov to follow Beethoven. No more is it good for his Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra to sound, through no present fault of the pianist, in bodiless and unresilient tone More than once in the Concerto, the Russian writes a music of marching sonorities. With it he would have piano and orchestra resound. Mr. Bachaus could not yesterday, though he is pianist of just power; while Mr Monteux perforce subdued his band to circumstance. Often in the Concerto Mr. Rakhmaninov would have the piano shine brightly across the instrumental web, or else lead the orchestra over the twofold course, rhapsodizing along the way like David when he danced before the ark. Mr. Bachaus, in prime as pianist, perceived this glow and march, pursued it, almost gained it, only to find it snatched away. Enough to praise with reason his cool, sure technical mastery, his clear sense of musical design and proportion, his perception of beauty, power and diversity of tone, his just and honest response to such mood and feeling as the music conveys, his ability to make feats of bravura sound as a musical speech.

Of course other pianists than Mr. Rakhmaninov play and will play this Concerto. Yet somehow it needs his presence to glamor it. When he comes gravely to his place as figure of brooding power; when he plays the first measures for piano alone and seems to martial the orchestra into the music, the susceptible hearer is ready to believe almost anything of it. Piano and orchestra make their way through a web—or a waste—of development, and with Mr. Rakhmaninov in grave and puissant presence, manipulation sounded like meditation in tones. Broadly, piano and orchestra sing a melody; and with Mr. Rakhmaninov as chief singer, emotion seemed to warm it. Upon the workable melancholy of the slow movement he wrought similar illusion. Hearing him, the listener was quite sure that the songful ascent, the uppiled sonorities of the Finale were a music of mounting power, not one more application of well-tested stimulants to aural nerves massed in the concert-room. Perhaps and perhaps; we of the audience are presumed to hear music of itself; while only incidentally to the eye comes illusion from the presence of the composer as pianist. Yet nearly all of us feel Mr. Rakhmaninov in person—and to the considerable advantage of his piano-pieces, small or great.

For ending, Mr. Monteux smote again the loud timbrel of folk-song and folk-dance. This time it was a Basque timbrel and Monsieur Pierné, workaday conductor and workaday composer in Paris, held it. More literally the conductor played an Overture and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music for a play of Basque folk, "Ramuntcho," written by the novelist, Loti, and produced by Antoine in his days as director of the Odéon. The piece did not suggest Loti as either born or practised playwright; the Parisian public regarded it coldly. It soon perished; whereupon the economical Pierné re-made his numbers for the concert-hall. There they reappear seldom and with more credit to him as dutiful and adaptable transcriber than as composer doing the works of imagination and projection upon kindling material.

Basque dances move gravely to strange, beating, reiterated rhythms. Again again they repeat a native wildness wi composer and conductor intensify it well-tested means. The individuality of this music is not the wildness—easy to find in folk-dances from the Biscayan even to the Roumanian hills. Rather it is a singular austerity. The rhythms whip; yet the music keeps a grave, almost a solemn, state. Paradoxical though it sounds, these Basques dance to frenzy yet keep their dignity. Akin goes the melancholy song that now and then is interlude. The Slav, so making folk-music, may whine; the Hungarian, the Roumanian, may scream;

the Basques, according to Pierné and also their own music, respect reticence.

H. T. PARKE

TRANS - JAN. 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts will be given February 10 and 11. The program will include Schumann's symphony in B-flat; Liadoff's suite on Russian folk themes, Handel's double concerto for strings and wind and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

ADVTSR - JAN. 29.

Events and Comments

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. The program for Feb 10 and 11 includes Schumann's First Symphony, a Suite by Liadov, Handel's Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, and Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp." There is no soloist.

GLOBE - JAN. 29.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will be given on Feb. 10 and 11, since this week will be occupied by the southern trip of the orchestra, to include concerts in Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York. Mr. Monteux will head the program for the 14th pair of concerts, with Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat; Liadov's light suite will also be played, the movements of which are built on Russian folk themes, including "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga." Handel's double concerto for strings and two wind orchestras, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," will be the other numbers.

HERALD - JAN.

IAN 1922

Concerning Boston Symphony.

Behind the musical achievements which the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to appear at the City Auditorium on January 30, has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose and the expenditure of wealth. The aim since its foundation in 1881 has been ever for the best attainable and only gradually, through years of upbuilding effort by one or another of the world's great conductors, has the goal been won.

Each of the hundred musicians in the orchestra is an accomplished artist. The leaders of the various sections are declared masters of their instruments and of a caliber scarcely to be found elsewhere. During the last two years the organization has profited signally by the powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. No leader has come to the orchestra with a more distinguished record.

The famous old orchestra is now in its fortieth season and it is understood that never before has the schedule been so heavy. The program to be given in Richmond is said to be exceptionally fine. This visit of the Boston players will mark the close of the artists' course under the direction of Mrs. Wilson-Greene, tickets for which are now on sale at the Corley Company's, 213 East Broad Street.

SUN

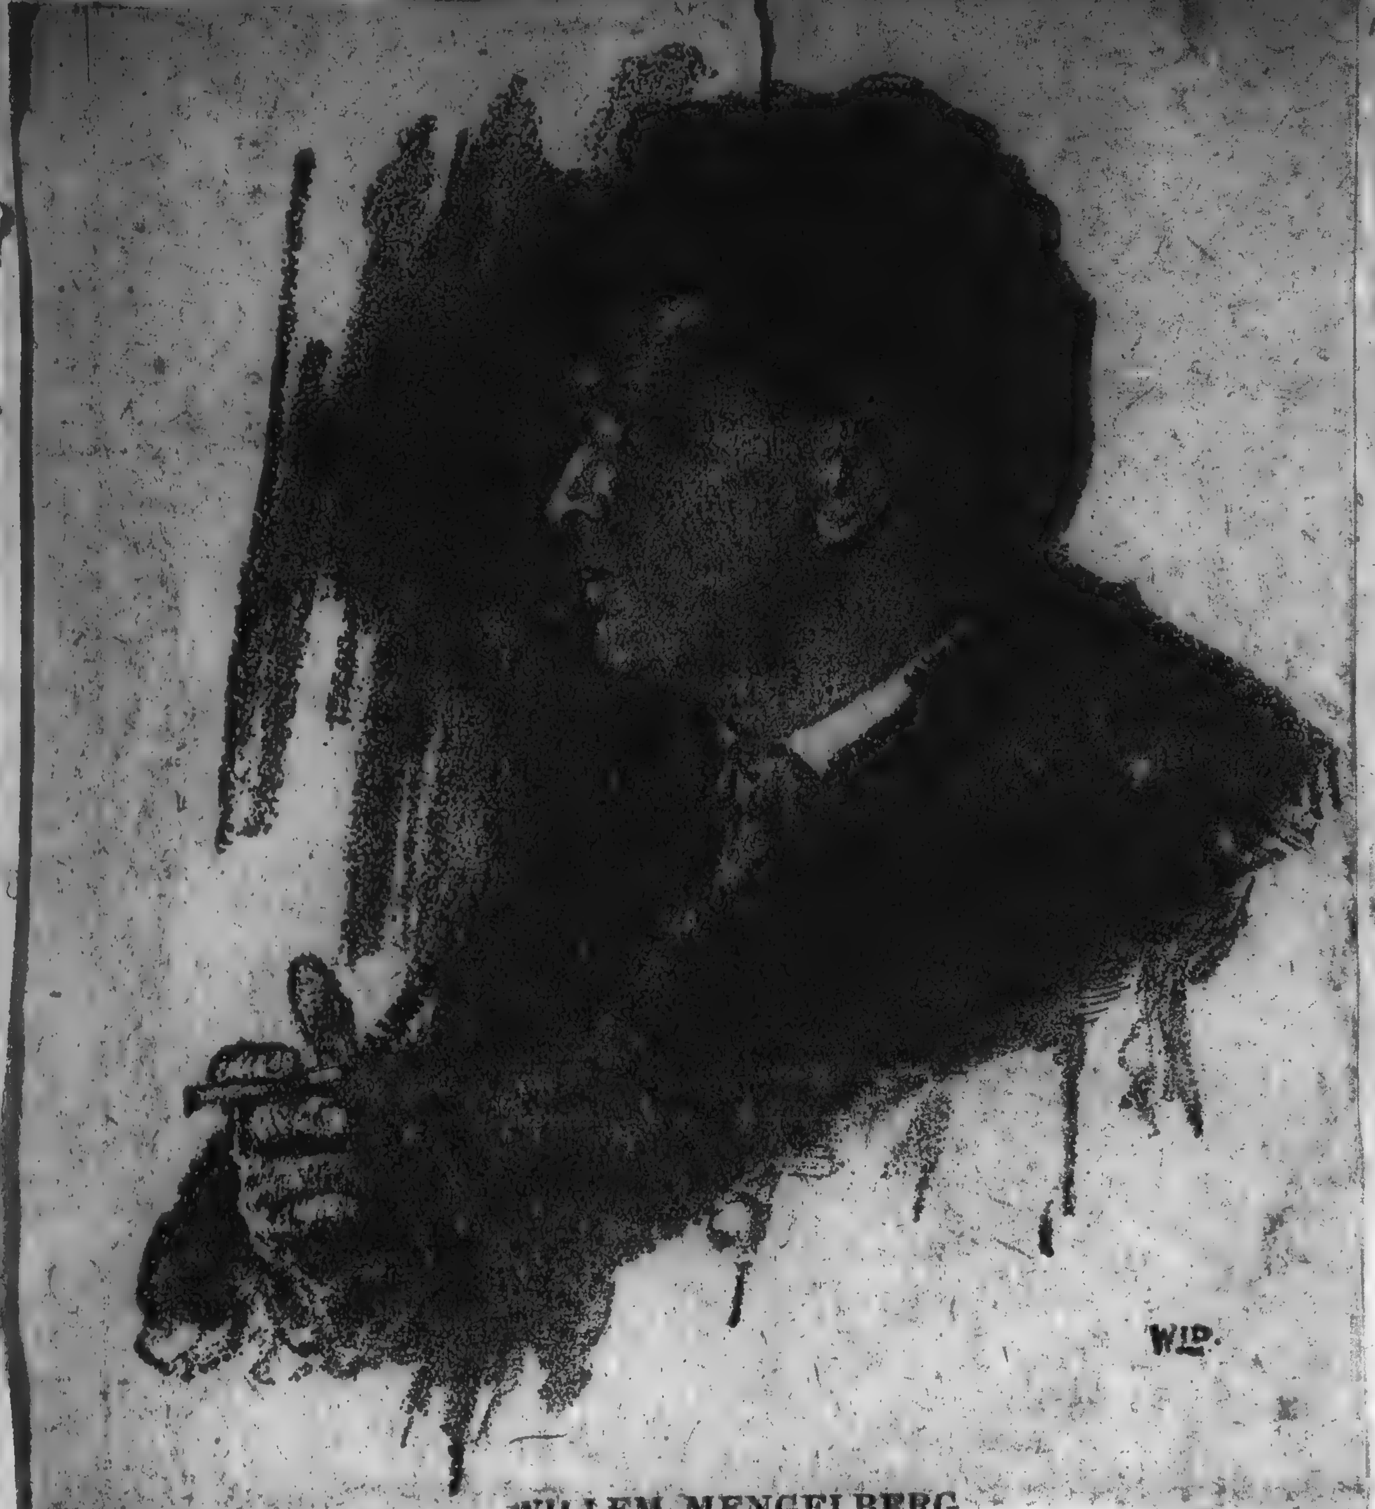
ess New York City

JAN 21 1922 D

The fourth and last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, February 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karl Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert, and thus give to this Polish composer, who is so highly spoken of in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

For the Saturday concert the novelty will be Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York.

MUSIC ON CHOOSING A CONDUCTOR



WILLEM MENGELBERG

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are said to be seeking anxiously for a new conductor for that organization to succeed Pierre Monteux. His term of office comes to an end with the end of this season, and his contract, for whatever reason, is apparently not to be renewed. Mr. Monteux will have been the conductor of the orchestra for three seasons, having succeeded another Frenchman, Henri Rabaud, who was given the position at the beginning of the season of 1918-19, and who left it at the end of that season.

Mr. Monteux has been very highly thought of by many music lovers in Boston, and the public support given to the orchestra in its home town has been restored, it is said, to what it was in its palmiest days. The public support of the orchestra in New York, which fell off greatly during the troublous times of the war, has also increased considerably, though it is hardly back to what it was when every seat in Carnegie Hall was taken and there was a long waiting list. Nor has Mr. Monteux gained quite so high opinion in the estimation of New York music lovers as he apparently has in Boston. He is respected as a capable, intelligent and vigorous conductor of wide sympathies; but he has not proved an inspiration to many, nor has he satisfied fastidious demands. While the playing of the orchestra has improved under his direction, it has not reached the perfection that was once such a joy that it seemed—as it was—too good to be true forever.

The trustees of the Boston Orchestra are going through the doubt, uncertainty and anguish of spirit that fall to most trustees when they have to select a new conductor. What should be the principles applied in choosing a conductor? Should you seek out the greatest name and induce the owner of it to accept your seductive financial offer—or, what is much more likely, strain your resources to meet the demands he will make, which are certain to be enormous? Or should you seek out a man of talent without a great reputation, in the hope that, if not a potential genius, he will at least develop himself in your service to great usefulness and great ability?

There is danger in both courses. If you pick the man of supposed talent, you may saddle yourself with a mediocrity; and this has happened in regrettable instances. To do it successfully you must have the prescience and the judgment of men and musicianship and of musical promise that will be able to select a man not yet famous, and perhaps not yet wholly developed, who has the qualities that give him the potency of development.

On the other hand, is it wise to pay an enormous salary for the great reputation of a noted conductor of the "prima donna" class? There are grave objections to doing so, some of which are rooted in facts of human nature. When you pay a famous man, say, $45,000 for conducting half a season, it may justly be said that he cannot possibly give you $45,000 worth of conducting in that period. But the trouble is, he will try to. He will [illegible] irresistibly impelled to demonstrate to his employers and the public that he can do what other men cannot.

Even if he does not have the idea that he is commissioned to reveal to the American public for the first time in history what fine orchestral playing and great conducting are, he can hardly resist the temptation to show that he can put something into the music on his programs that nobody else has been able to, and can bring something out that has escaped the notice of others. He will be driven, even against his better nature, to resort to sensation of one kind or another; to impress the public with the most stupendous or the most fine-spun effects; to show them, in short, that they are getting their $45,000 worth.

But the finest musical values are not to be produced and estimated in this way; nor are they the ones that always make the greatest show or arouse the greatest excitement. Thrills down the back, delicious as they are, are not the only, or perhaps even the best, form of esthetic delight to be obtained from orchestral performance. There are other ways of playing upon the emotions, many different chords to be struck. It is even possible, among other appeals, to make an appeal to the intellect.

The results that can be obtained by fostering and developing sound musicianship and genuine talent in a musician whose innate qualities are capable of development are to be seen in Chicago, where Frederick Stock, the man selected by Theodore Thomas, has maintained an orchestra at the highest point of efficiency and has satisfied the music lovers of that city, year in and year out, for seventeen years. Nor should the experience of New York, with the fiery Russian meteor, Wassili Safonoff, be forgotten. Hailed as a magician because of the overpowering effects he obtained in a certain very narrow range of orchestral music, he was found to be a disappointment when he undertook to go outside that range and quite failed to satisfy the reasonable demands of taste and judgment.

It is a mistake to conclude too hastily from a successful stirring of the blood in certain pieces of exciting music that a conductor will necessarily be the one who can give the highest delight, the purest pleasure, from year to year in music of other styles and other schools. And yet a well-balanced series of season's programs must contain all schools, all styles; and the ideal conductor must have the wide sympathy, knowledge and commanding skill to include them all in his understanding and his powers of interpretation. An obvious and commonplace enough view; but one that is too often left out of account. The fiery meteor is not generally, perhaps never, the one who compasses this most successfully. In fact, it might plausibly be maintained that a conductor should be

> A creature not too bright and good
> For human nature's daily food.

Let this not be considered a discouragement or an undervaluation of genius. True genius does not always, perhaps not often, take the shape of the flaming [illegible], but oftenest

---

[illegible] stant light, endurable for [illegible] days in the year.

Such a one, we take it, is what Boston is reasonably looking for. And New York has a considerable vested interest of many years' standing, in hoping that she will get it.

⁂

The newly published "Life and Letters of Henry Lee Higginson" contains a superb tribute to his work in founding and maintaining one of the finest orchestras in the world. It is offered in an article on Major Higginson, written by Charles W. Elliot and intended to celebrate his eighty-fifth birthday in November, 1919; though, as it happened, it was published on the very day of his death. President Eliot enumerates some of the merits of Major Higginson that had resulted in his choice as one of the Fellows of Harvard University. One of them is this:

"He had proved himself the most successful promoter of good music that Eastern Massachusetts had ever known."

This seems to be thoroughly conservative and wholly within the bounds of reason. President Eliot may know of somebody in Western or Central Massachusetts who has founded and maintained a better orchestra—there is no limit to what might happen within the confines of the Bay State—but good old Eastern Massachusetts had reason enough to be decently satisfied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to honor Major Higginson for his devotion to it.

This reminds us of the boast that used to be made on occasion by Rafael Joseffy, famous the world over in his day as a pianist, who spent the latter years of his life as an honored resident of North Tarrytown, N. Y. He used to declare, and it is not known that he was ever successfully controverted, that he was the best pianist in North Tarrytown.

N.Y. TIMES- JAN. 29.

MONTEUX OR NEWCOMER?

THE CONDUCTOR'S TERM NEARLY ENDED

Speculations as to a Successor — Three Courses Seemingly Open to the Trustees —A "Genius," a Young and Rising Talent, or a Leader of Sound and Proved Abilities—Mr. Monteux's Signal Services and High Deserts

ALONG with a few other chroniclers of the musical hour, the New York Times has remembered that the present term of Mr. Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will expire at the end of the current season. From this fact it infers rightly that the bankers, lawyers, men of business and men of the arts, who, as trustees, guide the fortunes of the band, are considering the future, even drawing near to decision upon it. Inevitably they are receiving much advice, many suggestions. There are the conductors, usually exceeding minor, who let it be known that they are "under consideration" for the post—a knowledge often confined to their own circle. There are the conductors, higher placed, whom their friends and partisans recommend insistently to the trustees' studious regard. There are the conductors at the head of their profession, who may or may not have intimated, through the proper channels, a receptive mind. There are the rising abilities of Europe, most of whom most of the trustees may know only through hearsay. About all and sundry there are the interested and disinterested advisers. Questions of income and guarantees, of nationality and public sentiment, of present and continuing policies, of prestige and the temper of audiences, must also be weighed.

No wonder that the trustees lay their fingers upon their lips and shake their heads with a pardonable show of weariness and dubiety. No wonder that, for once, the sustaining public of the Symphony Concerts has debated little and gossipped less of the future. Only the advocates of this or that newcomer are zealous; only those who seem to believe that nationality is the touchstone of ability in a conductor, are sharp upon the scent; only those who must be "on the inside" or perish of chagrin, venture to predict the choice. The rest of us who are much more numerous and may even have the progress and the prestige of the orchestra more impersonally at heart, keep a tranquil faith. Is there not the wisdom of the trustees, bestowing their busy leisure upon the affairs of the orchestra, to upbear us? Has not a manifest Providence sustained it through all the perils of the past five years; reëstablished it with its public at home, set it on the way to its old place with the public of other cities.

Why speed destiny? Yet The Times must spur it. "Apparently," it says, "Mr. Monteux's contract, for whatever reason, is not to be renewed." Perhaps it were wiser to wait and see; certainly it were more just to Mr. Mouteux to keep silence until, not "apparently" but "authoritatively" could be the written and printed word. A conductor, retiring or continuing, who has done such work as he for the Symphony Orchestra deserves courteous consideration unasked.

So comes into open discussion a matter intricate when it touches persons, yet by no means so perplexing when policies are in question. Three courses, indeed, seem to lie before the trustees. If they choose, they may seek as the next conductor for the Symphony Orchestra a man of the first rank in his calling, who in himself would overtop band, pieces and composers, who would become the Symphony Concerts to the public here and elsewhere, whose "genius" would shine (or be expected to shine) with unchanging glow from October even unto May. Mr. Toscanini is, Mr. Nikisch was, such a conductor; Mr. Mengelberg bears such a reputation. Some even would place the variable and often inert Mr. Weingartner beside them; others would count Mr. Stokowski such a conductor in the making. Of course these "geniuses" are costly and exacting. Upon them, as upon lower-placed mortals, come days when their light refuses to shine before men. Inevitably they concentrate and absorb the interest of the public to which they minister. The assisting orchestra becomes their instrument; they give the composers voice; making programmes they caress tenderly the necks of their battle-horses of the concert-hall. For a price and upon other terms, doubtless one or other of these geniuses could be persuaded to Boston.

At the other end of the scale are the rising men of European concert-halls, hardly known in Boston or indeed on this side of the Atlantic, who would cross it with their way to make before a new public, with their abilities to ripen under the freedom and the opportunity that our Symphony Concerts afford. So, of old, Mr. Nikisch came and conquered. Nowadays of these young powers is Mr. Goossens in London; Mr. Golchermann in Paris; Mr. Fitelberg, the wandering Pole; a mounting figure or two in Germany. America, unfortunately, yields not one, unless it be Mr. Gabrilowitsch. He is not young in years; old-established is his high reputation as pianist; yet as fixed conductor he began but a few seasons ago in Detroit. There, possibly, his works praise him; nearer to Boston, they are variously viewed. If the trustees of the orchestra are finally minded to take their chances with one or another in this rising European youth (as youth goes among conductors), a call to any of them would hardly go unanswered. Again might come a Nikisch in embryo; while yet again there are young abilities that never mature. A gambler's chance—if the contract run not too long—has its fascination; while for good or ill, scratch a young conductor and forthwith feel "the modernist."

For third course, the able men, the sound men remain—the conductors who can maintain an orchestra at an admirable technical and tonal prowess; who will keep the balance even between the classics, the moderns and the ultra-moderns; who will approach the chosen music intelligently and sympathetically; who will weekly ply their best powers to the pleasure of their hearers; who now and then will outdo themselves and stir all within earshot. Of such are most conductors in [illegible] mediate day and generation fro[illegible] grad to Paris and from Paris to [illegible]ork and Chicago. At their first concert and their last, they are practised and devoted men of talent, faithfully, ardently, open-mindedly exercised. They are not conductors of genius; no more are they conductors in embryo; least of all are they mere dull and wizened routineers. They have their individual qualities; they respect and heighten standards; often they broaden and deepen themselves. Like the cigarettes in the advertisement, "they satisfy"—and sometimes stimulate. If the trustees seek a conductor of this degree their searching need be neither long nor difficult.

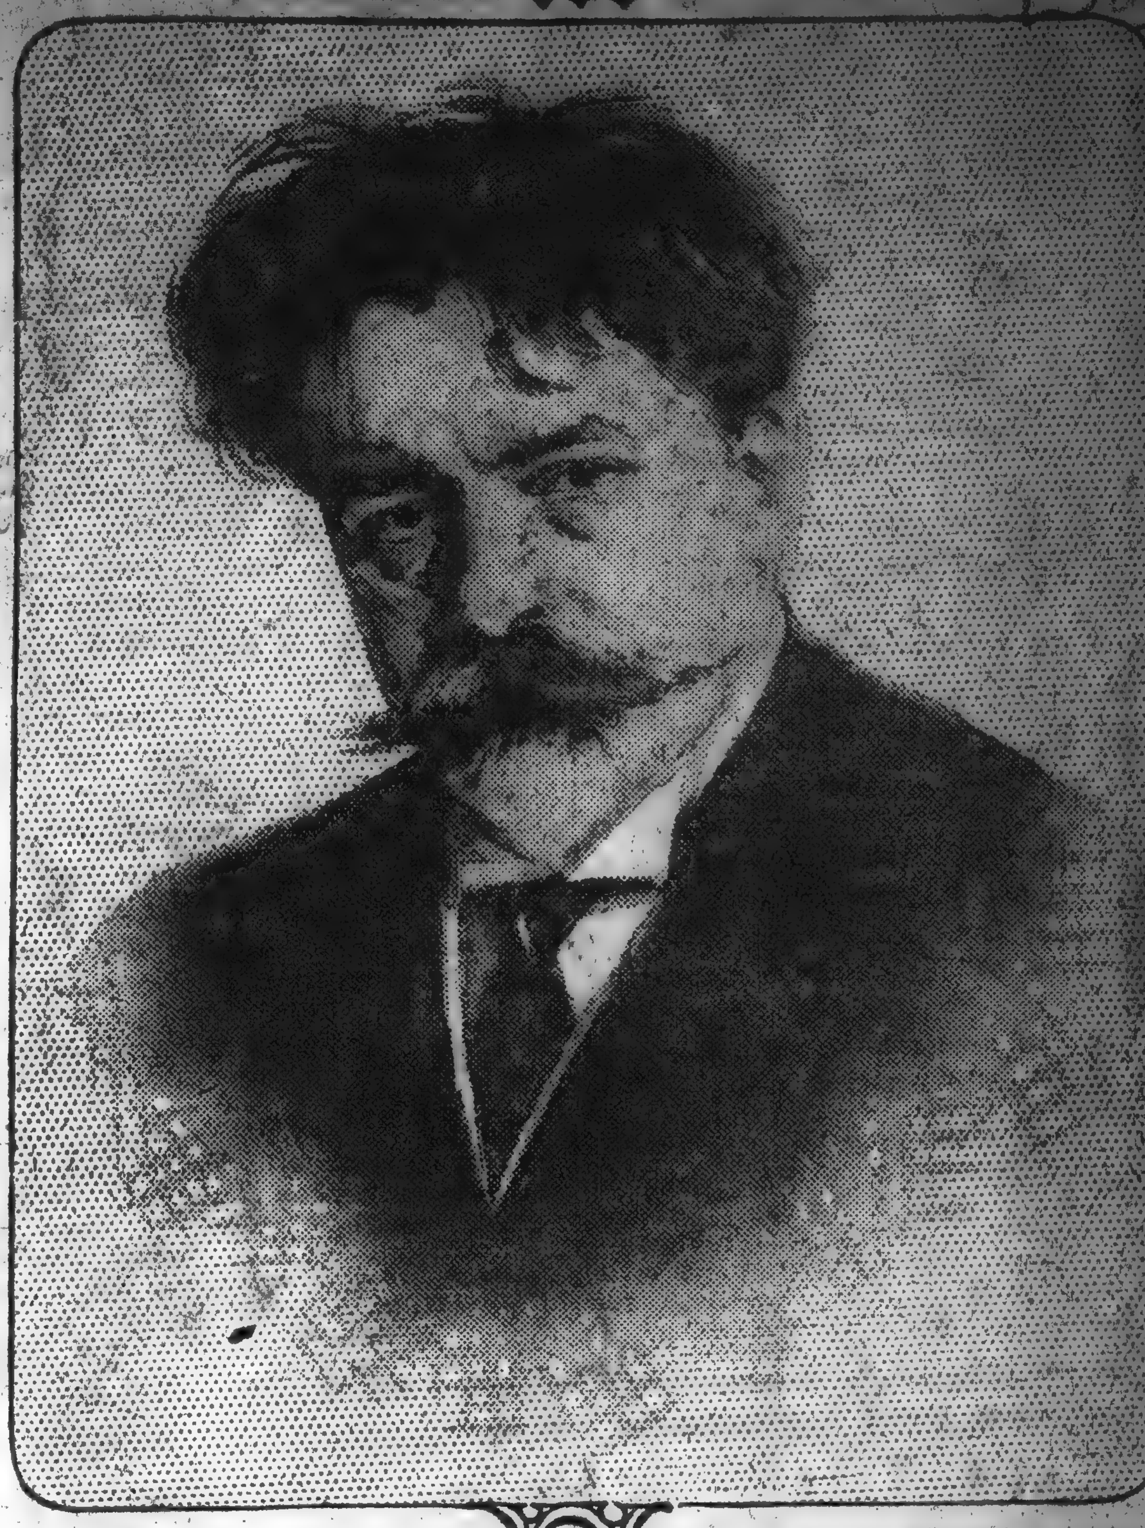
Yet where, it is permissible to ask, will the trustees find such a newcomer—unless they are bent on change for the sake of change—who will much excel Mr. Monteux? He received the orchestra when it had fallen lowest in discipline, in esprit de corps, in quality of performance. He carried it through a secession that nearly dissolved it. He has brought it farther and farther along the way to its old merit and prestige. He bids fair to bring it still nearer. No conductor in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts has equalled him in the range, the interest, the freshness and open-mindedness of his programmes. Upon each and every sort of music so chosen he has bestowed the fullness of his abilities and his pains—often to no small eloquence. His audiences hear him gladly and into them more are entering a younger generation. Alone of the conductors of recent years, he has caught the ears of youth, and of a public that asks and has at last received "special concerts"—and upon both the future much depends. It may be the will of the trustees, as The Times asserts, that Mr. Monteux depart at the end of the current season. Yet it is he, who above all other men, has preserved for them the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. PARKER.

TRANS. JAN. 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra Commemorates Artur Nikisch

[58



PORTRAIT OF ARTUR NIKISCH, by JOHN PHILIPP NOW ON EXHIBITION AT GALLERIES OF MRS. ALBERT STERNER.

Will Play Wagner's "Funeral March" at Boston Concerts in His Memory.

Artur Nikisch, the great conductor who died at Leipzig last Monday, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and in commemoration of his distinguished services the orchestra will add Wagner's "Funeral March" to the programmes of its concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of this week. A wreath will also be presented at the funeral in Leipzig.

Milton Diamond, a New York concert director, announces that the late Dr. Nikisch was about to come to the United States to conduct a series of four orchestral concerts in New York and in the large cities of the East, and although no announcement of plans had yet been made, applications for subscriptions for any proposed concerts had already accumulated. Moreover, practically every orchestra in the United States had invited Dr. Nikisch to be guest conductor.

N.Y. WORLD- JAN. 29.

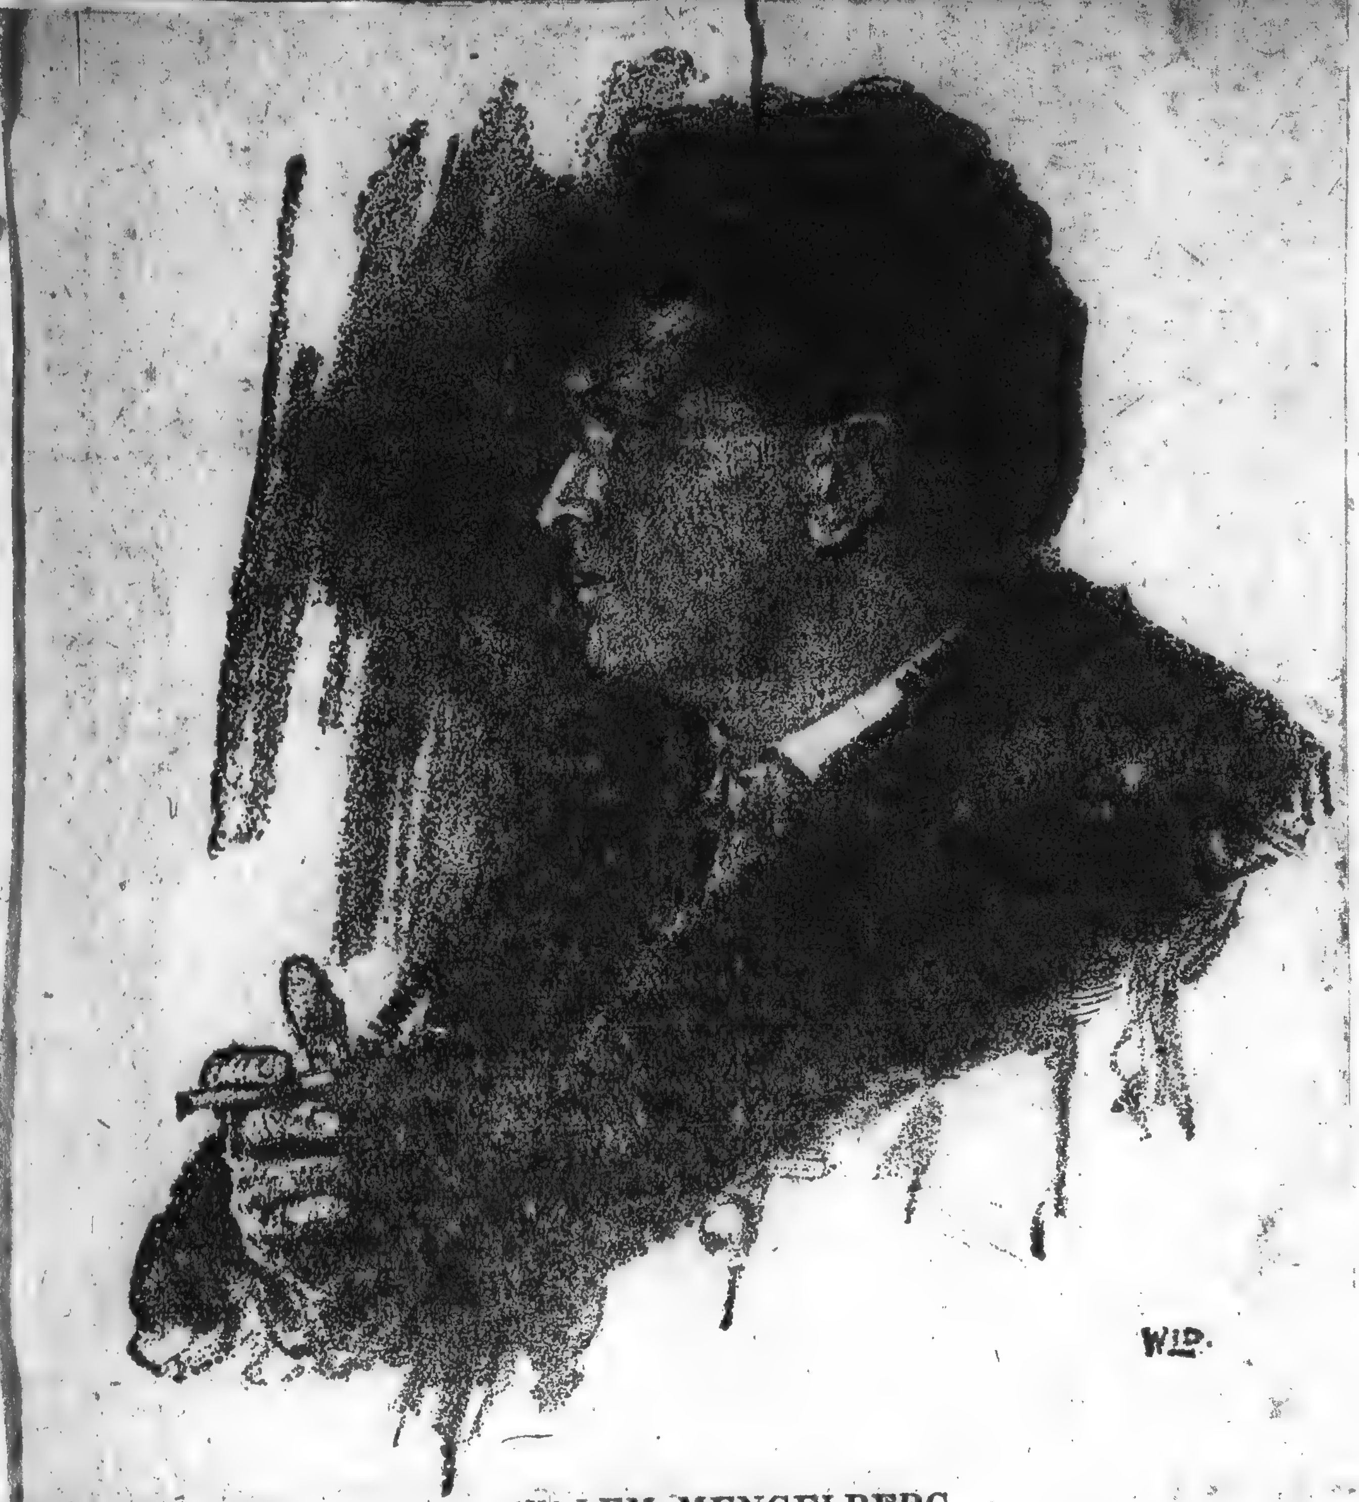
MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just why it happened that Beethoven's seventh symphony should have been three times played in New York within a week will doubtless never be explained. Mr. Monteux played it for the third time yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Coates having played it earlier in the pair of the New York Symphony Orchestra's concerts. [illegible] quick action on the part of both [illegible] Monteux and Mr. Mengelberg, a sim[illegible] duplication in the case of Ravel's "Valse" was avoided. The cond[illegible] of each of the four orchestra [illegible] concerts regularly in New York m[illegible] supposed to spend time both in th[illegible] and in the still watches of the [illegible] [illegible]ing to think of compositions [illegible]

MUSIC ON CHOOSING A CONDUCTOR



WILLEM MENGELBERG

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

THE trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are said to be seeking anxiously for a new conductor for that organization to succeed Pierre Monteux. His term of office comes to an end with the end of this season, and his contract, for whatever reason, is apparently not to be renewed. Mr. Monteux will have been the conductor of the orchestra for three seasons, having succeeded another Frenchman, Henri Rabaud, who was given the position at the beginning of the season of 1918-19, and who left it at the end of that season.

Mr. Monteux has been very highly thought of by many music lovers in Boston, and the public support given to the orchestra in its home town has been restored, it is said, to what it was in its palmiest days. The public support of the orchestra in New York, which fell off greatly during the troublous times of the war, has also increased considerably, though it is hardly back to what it was when every seat in Carnegie Hall was taken and there was a long waiting list. Nor has Mr. Monteux gained quite so high opinion in the estimation of New York music lovers as he apparently has in Boston. He is respected as a capable, intelligent and vigorous conductor of wide sympathies; but he has not proved an inspiration to many, nor has he satisfied fastidious demands. While the playing of the orchestra has improved under his direction, it has not reached the perfection that was once such a joy that it seemed—as it was—too good to be true forever.

The trustees of the Boston Orchestra are going through the doubt, uncertainty and anguish of spirit that fall to most trustees when they have to select a new conductor. What should be the principles applied in choosing a conductor? Should you seek out the greatest name and induce the owner of it to accept your seductive financial offer—or, what is much more likely, strain your resources to meet the demands he will make, which are certain to be enormous? Or should you seek out a man of talent without a great reputation, in the hope that, if not a potential genius, he will at least develop himself in your service to great usefulness and great ability?

There is danger in both courses. If you pick the man of supposed talent, you may saddle yourself with a mediocrity; and this has happened in regrettable instances. To do it successfully you must have the prescience and the judgment of men and musicianship and of musical promise that will be able to select a man not yet famous, and perhaps not yet wholly developed, who has the qualities that give him the potency of development.

On the other hand, is it wise to pay an enormous salary for the great reputation of a noted conductor of the "prima donna" class? There are grave objections to doing so, some of which are rooted in facts of human nature. When you pay a famous man, say, $45,000 for conducting half a season, it may justly be said that he cannot possibly give you $45,000 worth conducting in that period. But the trouble is, he will try to. He will almost irresistibly impelled to demonstrate to his employers and the public that he can do what other men cannot.

Even if he does not have the idea that he is commissioned to reveal to the American public for the first time in history what fine orchestral playing and great conducting are, he can hardly resist the temptation to show that he can put something into the music on his programs that nobody else has been able to, and can bring something out that has escaped the notice of others. He will be driven, even against his better nature, to resort to sensation of one kind or another; to impress the public with the most stupendous or the most fine-spun effects; to show them, in short, that they are getting their $45,000 worth.

But the finest musical values are not to be produced and estimated in this way; nor are they the ones that always make the greatest show or arouse the greatest excitement. Thrills down the back, delicious as they are, are not the only, or perhaps even the best, form of esthetic delight to be obtained from orchestral performance. There are other ways of playing upon the emotions, many different chords to be struck. It is even possible, among other appeals, to make an appeal to the intellect.

The results that can be obtained by fostering and developing sound musicianship and genuine talent in a musician whose innate qualities are capable of development are to be seen in Chicago, where Frederick Stock, the man selected by Theodore Thomas, has maintained an orchestra at the highest point of efficiency and has satisfied the music lovers of that city, year in and year out, for seventeen years. Nor should the experience of New York, with the fiery Russian meteor, Wassili Safonoff, be forgotten. Hailed as a magician because of the overpowering effects he obtained in a certain very narrow range of orchestral music, he was found to be a disappointment when he undertook to go outside that range and quite failed to satisfy the reasonable demands of taste and judgment.

It is a mistake to conclude too hastily from a successful stirring of the blood in certain pieces of exciting music that a conductor will necessarily be the one who can give the highest delight, the purest pleasure, from year to year in music of other styles and other schools. And yet a well-balanced series of season's programs must contain all schools, all styles; and the ideal conductor must have the wide sympathy, knowledge and commanding skill to include them all in his understanding and his powers of interpretation. An obvious and commonplace enough view; but one that is too often left out of account. The fiery meteor is not generally, perhaps never, the one who compasses this most successfully. In fact, it might plausibly be maintained that a conductor should be

> A creature not too bright and good
> For human nature's daily food.

Let this not be considered a discouragement or an undervaluation of genius. True genius does not always, perhaps not often, take the shape of the flaming meteor; but oftenest shines with a steadier and more constant light, endurable for 365 days in the year.

Such a one, we take it, is what Boston is reasonably looking for. And New York has a considerable vested interest of many years' standing, in hoping that she will get it.

⁂

The newly published "Life and Letters of Henry Lee Higginson" contains a superb tribute to his work in founding and maintaining one of the finest orchestras in the world. It is offered in an article on Major Higginson, written by Charles W. Eliot and intended to celebrate his eighty-fifth birthday in November, 1919; though, as it happened, it was published on the very day of his death. President Eliot enumerates some of the merits of Major Higginson that had resulted in his choice as one of the Fellows of Harvard University. One of them is this:

"He had proved himself the most successful promoter of good music that Eastern Massachusetts had ever known."

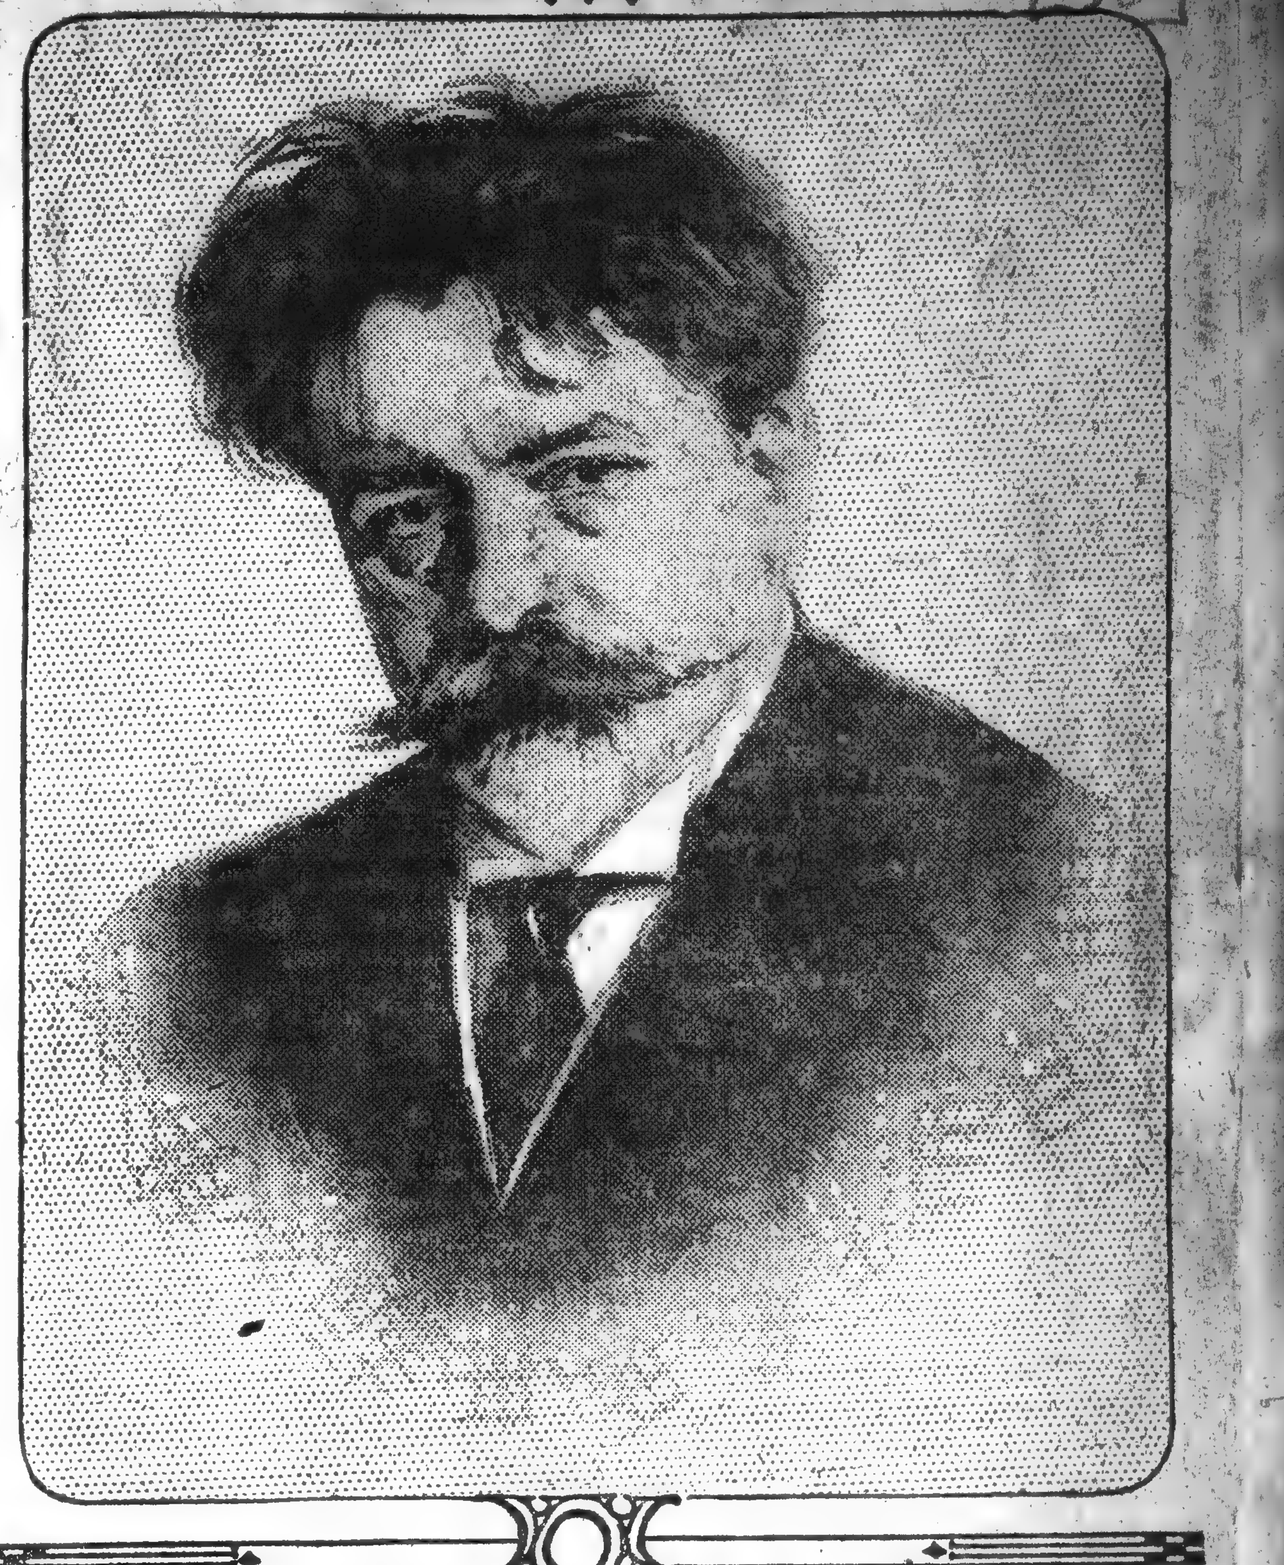
This seems to be thoroughly conservative and wholly within the bounds of reason. President Eliot may know of somebody in Western or Central Massachusetts who has founded and maintained a better orchestra—there is no limit to what might happen within the confines of the Bay State—but good old Eastern Massachusetts had reason enough to be decently satisfied with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and to honor Major Higginson for his devotion to it.

This reminds us of the boast that used to be made on occasion by Rafael Joseffy, famous the world over in his day as a pianist, who spent the latter years of his life as an honored resident of North Tarrytown, N. Y. He used to declare, and it is not known that he was ever successfully controverted, that he was the best pianist in North Tarrytown.

N.Y. TIMES - JAN. 2[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra Commemorates Artur Nikisch

[58]



PORTRAIT OF ARTUR NIKISCH, by JOHN PHILIPP NOW ON EXHIBITION AT GALLERIES OF MRS. ALBERT STERNER.

Will Play Wagner's "Funeral March" at Boston Concerts in His Memory.

Artur Nikisch, the great conductor who died at Leipzig last Monday, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and in commemoration of his distinguished services the orchestra will add Wagner's "Funeral March" to the programmes of its concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of this week. A wreath will also be presented at the funeral in Leipzig.

Milton Diamond, a New York concert director, announces that the late Dr. Nikisch was about to come to the United States to conduct a series of four orchestral concerts in New York and in the large cities of the East, and although no announcement of plans had yet been made, applications for subscriptions for any proposed concerts had already accumulated. Moreover, practically every orchestra in the United States had invited Dr. Nikisch to be guest conductor.

N.Y. WORLD - JAN. 29.

MONTEUX OR NEWCOMER?

THE CONDUCTOR'S TERM NEARLY ENDED

Speculations as to a Successor — Three Courses Seemingly Open to the Trustees —A "Genius," a Young and Rising Talent, or a Leader of Sound and Proved Abilities—Mr. Monteux's Signal Services and High Deserts

ALONG with a few other chroniclers of the musical hour, the New York Times has remembered that the present term of Mr. Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will expire at the end of the current season. From this fact it infers rightly that the bankers, lawyers, men of business and men of the arts, who, as trustees, guide the fortunes of the band, are considering the future, even drawing near to decision upon it. Inevitably they are receiving much advice, many suggestions. There are the conductors, usually exceeding minor, who let it be known that they are "under consideration" for the post—a knowledge often confined to their own circle. There are the conductors, higher placed, whom their friends and partisans recommend insistently to the trustees' studious regard. There are the conductors at the head of their profession, who may or may not have intimated, through the proper channels, a receptive mind. There are the rising abilities of Europe, most of whom most of the trustees may know only through hearsay. About all and sundry there are the interested and disinterested advisers. Questions of income and guarantees, of nationality and public sentiment, of present and continuing policies, of prestige and the temper of audiences, must also be weighed.

No wonder that the trustees lay their fingers upon their lips and shake their heads with a pardonable show of weariness and dubiety. No wonder that, for once, the sustaining public of the Symphony Concerts has debated little and gossipped less of the future. Only the advocates of this or that newcomer are zealous; only those who seem to believe that nationality is the touchstone of ability in a conductor, are sharp upon the scent; only those who must be "on the inside" or perish of chagrin, venture to predict the choice. The rest of us who are much more numerous and may even have the progress and the prestige of the orchestra more impersonally at heart, keep a tranquil faith. Is there not the wisdom of the trustees, bestowing their busy leisure upon the affairs of the orchestra, to upbear us? Has not a manifest Providence sustained it through all the perils of the past five years; reëstablished it with its public at home, set it on the way to its old place with the public of other cities.

Why speed destiny? Yet The Times must spur it. "Apparently," it says, "Mr. Monteux's contract, for whatever reason, is not to be renewed." Perhaps it were wiser to wait and see; certainly it were more just to Mr. Mouteux to keep silence until, not "apparently" but "authoritatively" could be the written and printed word. A conductor, retiring or continuing, who has done such work as he for the Symphony Orchestra deserves courteous consideration unasked.

So comes into open discussion a matter intricate when it touches persons, yet by no means so perplexing when policies, are in question. Three courses, indeed, seem to lie before the trustees. If they choose, they may seek as the next conductor for the Symphony Orchestra a man of the first rank in his calling, who in himself would overtop band, pieces and composers, who would become the Symphony Concerts to the public here and elsewhere, whose "genius" would shine (or be expected to shine) with unchanging glow from October even unto May. Mr. Toscanini is, Mr. Nikisch was, such a conductor; Mr. Mengelberg bears such a reputation. Some even would place the variable and often inert Mr. Weingartner beside them; others would count Mr. Stokowski such a conductor in the making. Of course these "geniuses" are costly and exacting. Upon them, as upon lower-placed mortals, come days when their light refuses to shine before men. Inevitably they concentrate and absorb the interest of the public to which they minister. The assisting orchestra becomes their instrument; they give the composers voice; making programmes they caress tenderly the necks of their battle-horses of the concert-hall. For a price and upon other terms, doubtless one or other of these geniuses could be persuaded to Boston.

At the other end of the scale are the rising men of European concert-halls, hardly known in Boston or indeed on this side of the Atlantic, who would cross it with their way to make before a new public, with their abilities to ripen under the freedom and the opportunity that our Symphony Concerts afford. So, of old, Mr. Nikisch came and conquered. Nowadays of these young powers is Mr. Goossens in London; Mr. Golchermann in Paris; Mr. Fitelberg, the wandering Pole; a mounting figure or two in Germany. America, unfortunately, yields not one, unless it be Mr. Gabrilowitsch. He is not young in years; old-established is his high reputation as pianist; yet as fixed conductor he began but a few seasons ago in Detroit. There, possibly, his works praise him; nearer to Boston, they are variously viewed. If the trustees of the orchestra are finally minded to take their chances with one or another in this rising European youth (as youth goes among conductors), a call to any of them would hardly go unanswered. Again might come a Nikisch in embryo; while yet again there are young abilities that never mature. A gambler's chance—if the contract run not too long—has its fascination; while for good or ill, scratch a young conductor and forthwith feel "the modernist."

For third course, the able men, the sound men remain—the conductors who can maintain an orchestra at an admirable technical and tonal prowess; who will keep the balance even between the classics, the moderns and the ultra-moderns; who will approach the chosen music intelligently and sympathetically; who will weekly ply their best powers to the pleasure of their hearers; who now and then will outdo themselves and stir all within earshot. Of such are most conductors in [illegible] mediate day and generation fro grad to Paris and from Paris to [illegible] York and Chicago. At their first concert and their last, they are practised and devoted men of talent, faithfully, ardently, openmindedly exercised. They are not conductors of genius; no more are they conductors in embryo; least of all are they mere dull and wizened routineers. They have their individual qualities; they respect and heighten standards; often they broaden and deepen themselves. Like the cigarettes in the advertisement, "they satisfy"—and sometimes stimulate. If the trustees seek a conductor of this degree their searching need be neither long nor difficult.

Yet where, it is permissible to ask, will the trustees find such a newcomer—unless they are bent on change for the sake of change—who will much excel Mr. Monteux? He received the orchestra when it had fallen lowest in discipline, in esprit de corps, in quality of performance. He carried it through a secession that nearly dissolved it. He has brought it farther and farther along the way to its old merit and prestige. He bids fair to bring it still nearer. No conductor in the forty years of the Symphony Concerts has equalled him in the range, the interest, the freshness and open-mindedness of his programmes. Upon each and every sort of music so chosen he has bestowed the fullness of his abilities and his pains—often to no small eloquence. His audiences hear him gladly and into them more are entering a younger generation. Alone of the conductors of recent years, he has caught the ears of youth, and of a public that asks and has at last received "special concerts"—and upon both the future much depends. It may be the will of the trustees, as The Times asserts, that Mr. Monteux depart at the end of the current season. Yet it is he, who above all other men, has preserved for them the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN. 30

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just why it happened that Beethoven's seventh symphony should have been three times played in New York within a week will doubtless never be explained. Mr. Monteux played it for the third time yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Coates having played it earlier in the pair of the New York Symphony Orchestra's concerts. P quick action on the part of both Monteux and Mr. Mengelberg, a sim duplication in the case of Ravel's Valse" was avoided. The cond of each of the four orchestra concerts regularly in New York m supposed to spend time both in th and in the still watches of the [illegible] ing to think of compositions

… in New York, but … so …ally with singularly unsuccessful …

… Mr. Monteux was successful in … performance of the symphony, … was right in tempo, rhythmically …, fine and well balanced in tone, … performance that sounded like Bee…ven's music.

In place of Ravel's piece, Mr. Mon…x played the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's sextet, "Verk…te Nache," music now not unfamiliar and that still seems the product of …agination and a sense of beauty. The string orchestra grows monotonous in color before the piece is ended; and singularly enough, this monotony is conveyed much more by the orchestra than by the sextet for which the composition was originally written.

It was a gratification to hear again d'Indy's "Istar" variations, music that is not often played and deserves a more frequent hearing. This music no longer seems "cerebral" or dry, but finely imaginative, deeply felt and written with great skill not only in the development of the variations but in the orchestral color. Nor need there be anxious reflections as to nature and appearance of the ornaments and garments successively stripped from the Babylonian woman. The music gives no information about them, and can give none. But it is engrossing and impressive as music and was played with brilliancy and clarity by the orchestra.

There was none too great interest in Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which closed the concert. It seeks to represent purely exterior effects, which it does with some success till they begin to pall through undue length.

TIMES- FEB-5-

Times
Beverly - Mass
JAN 19 1922

Tickets for the concert to be given at the opera house on Monday night, February 6, by the ensemble of the Boston Symphony orchestra, are meeting with a good demand. The orchestra will have 14 members with the director and will present a fine program.

MASS.
Sun
ISSUE OF
JAN 30 1922

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Children's Concert

The Boston Symphony ensemble gave a concert at City hall at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon and 7.45 o'clock last night which was the third in the series of young people's concerts under the direction of Robert E. Sault, supervisor of music in the local public schools

The program presented at the afternoon and evening concerts was:

"1812"—Overture	Tschaikowsky
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
Dance of the Hours, from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Angelus, from Scenes Pittoresques	Massanet
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Kammeici—Ostow—Angelis Vision,	Rubinstein
Indian Summer	Herbert
Andante from the Ballet Music from Rosamund,	Schubert
Danse, Arabe, from Nut Cracker Suite	Tschaikowsky
Scherherazade Suite,	Rimsky-Korsakoff

City hall was crowded last night at the concert and well filled in the afternoon, which has been customary at the varied concerts given but the interest aroused by Music Week brought forth many more.

STAR, JAN 22 1922
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony, January 31.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 31, under management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony will be the fourth by Tschaikowsky, in F minor, a work considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement. The program will include also "The Carnival in Paris," by the Norwegian composer Svendsen; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), considered one of the finest examples of the modern French school of music, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Date Jan 24
From The Item
LYNN, MASS.

EX-SYMPHONY HEAD DEAD.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24, 1922.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Sentinel
Ansonia Conn
JAN 24 1922

NIKISCH DEAD.

Leipsic, Jan. 24, (By the Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of

---

MERIDEN
CONNECTICUT
Journal
ISSUE OF
Jan 24

ARTHUR NIKISCH GREAT MUSICIAN

And Boston Symphony Leader Dies in Germany

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By The Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper, and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the directon of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Reecntly he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

Jan 24
The ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.

Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies

[By The Associated Press]

LEIPZIG, Jan. 24—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra died here last night of influenza. He was 66 years Nikisch, who was a Hungarian widely known in America. He ducted the Boston Symphony tra from 1889 to 1893. He n this country in 1912 with lon Symphony orchestra.

FALL RIVER
MASSACHUSETTS
News
ISSUE OF
Jan 24

FORMER CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC, GERMANY, FROM INFLUENZA.

[By the Associated Press.]

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the tinent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

---

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

American
Waterbury
Conn JAN 24 1922

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC

Former Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs to Influenza.

MOST NOTABLE CAREER

Served Many Years as Distinguished Orchestra Leader Here and Abroad.

Leipsic, Jan 24.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

New Brittian
CONN.
Herald
ISSUE OF
Jan 24

FORMER LEADER OF SYMPHONY IS DEAD

Arthur Nikisch was Once in Charge of Famous Boston Musical Organization.

Leipsic, Jan. 24 (By Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper, and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

---

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

News
Gardner Mass
Jan 24

FORMER CONDUCTOR DEAD.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24 (By A. P.)—Arthur Mikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza. He was 66 years old.

Argus
Montpelier Vt
Jan 24

WELL KNOWN LEADER DEAD.

Leipsic, Jan. 24, (By the Associated Press).—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

DATE........JAN 24 1922........
From The Fitchburg, Mass.
Sentinel

ARTHUR NIKISCH IS DEAD AT LEIPSIC

One Of Europe's Most Distinguished Orchestral Conductors; Was Widely Known In America

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24, (By Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his life time of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of manv of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

From Jan 24
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Symphony Plays To-night.

Bronislaw Huberman, the Polish violinit, who has made a sensation in New York since his arrival in this country, will play for the first time in Providence when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall at 8.15 o'clock to-night. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will present the following programme numbers: Overture to "Oberon," Franck's symphonic piece from the "Redemption," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

American
Waterbury
Conn JAN 24 1922

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC

Former Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs to Influenza.

MOST NOTABLE CAREER

Served Many Years as Distinguished Orchestra Leader Here and Abroad.

Leipsic, Jan 24.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
Jan 24

175

HUBERMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

The fame of Bronsilaw Huberman, the great Polish violinist, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight, has made his name known to our public for a considerable time, since this artist has so long held an enviable reputation in Europe. Coming to America in person last month, he amazed the audiences in New York by the wonder of his genius and the supreme beauty of his tone, in which he is materially aided by the quality of his instrument, one of the finest surviving specimens of Stradivarius violins. His appearance here tonight will be his first in Providence.

Mr. Huberman will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption;" Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." The concert will take place at Infantry Hall at 8.15.

programs that the others are not going to play in New York, but they do so frequently with singularly unsuccessful results.

But Mr. Monteux was successful in his performance of the symphony, which was right in tempo, rhythmically elastic, fine and well balanced in tone, a performance that sounded like Beethoven's music.

In place of Ravel's piece, Mr. Monteux played the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's sextet, "Verklärte Nache," music now not unfamiliar and that still seems the product of imagination and a sense of beauty. The string orchestra grows monotonous in color before the piece is ended; and singularly enough, this monotony is conveyed much more by the orchestra than by the sextet for which the composition was originally written.

It was a gratification to hear again d'Indy's "Istar" variations, music that is not often played and deserves a more frequent hearing. This music no longer seems "cerebral" or dry, but finely imaginative, deeply felt and written with great skill not only in the development of the variations but in the orchestral color. Nor need there be anxious reflections as to nature and appearance of the ornaments and garments successively stripped from the Babylonian woman. The music gives no information about them, and can give none. But it is engrossing and impressive as music and was played with brilliancy and clarity by the orchestra.

There was none too great interest in Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which closed the concert. It seeks to represent purely exterior effects, which it does with some success till they begin to pall through undue length.

TIMES- FEB-5

JAN / 1922

Tickets for the concert to be given at the opera house on Monday night, February 6, by the ensemble of the Boston Symphony orchestra, are meeting with a good demand. The orchestra will have 14 members with the director and will present a fine program.

MASS.

ISSUE OF

JAN

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Children's Concert

The Boston Symphony ensemble gave a concert at City hall at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon and 7.45 o'clock last night which was the third in the series of young people's concerts under the direction of Robert E. Sault, supervisor of music in the local public schools.

The program presented at the afternoon and evening concerts was:

"1812"—Overture	Tschaikowsky
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie"	Wagner
Dance of the Hours, from "Gioconda"	Ponchielli
Angelus, from Scenes Pittoresques	Massanet
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Kammeiol—Ostow—Angells Vision,	Rubinstein
Indian Summer	Herbert
Andante from the Ballet Music from Rosamund,	Schubert
Danse, Arabe, from Nut Cracker Suite	Tschaikowsky
Scherherazade Suite,	Rimsky-Korsakoff

City hall was crowded last night at the concert and well filled in the afternoon, which has been customary at the varied concerts given but the interest aroused by Music Week brought forth many more.

STAR, JAN 22 1922

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony, January 31.

Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 31, under management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony will be the fourth by Tschaikowsky, in F minor, a work considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement. The program will include also "The Carnival in Paris," by the Norwegian composer Svendsen; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), considered one of the finest examples of the modern French school of music, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Date Jan 24

From The Item

LYNN, MASS.

EX-SYMPHONY HEAD DEAD.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24, 1922.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Sentinel

Ansonia Conn

JAN 24 1922

NIKISCH DEAD.

Leipsic, Jan. 24, (By the Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of

---

MERIDEN

CONNECTICUT

Journal

ISSUE OF Jan 24

ARTHUR NIKISCH GREAT MUSICIAN

And Boston Symphony Leader Dies in Germany

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By The Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper, and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the directon of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Reecntly he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

Jan 24

The ENTERPRISE

LEOMINSTER, MASS.

Former Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Dies

[By The Associated Press]

LEIPZIG, Jan. 24—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra died here last night of influenza. He was 66 years Nikisch, who was a Hungarian widely known in America. He ducted the Boston Symphony tra from 1889 to 1893. He n this country in 1912 with lon Symphony orchestra.

FALL RIVER

MASSACHUSETTS

News

ISSUE OF Jan 24

FORMER CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC, GERMANY, FROM INFLUENZA.

[By the Associated Press.]

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

---

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

American

Waterbury

Conn

JAN 24 1922

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC

Former Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs to Influenza.

MOST NOTABLE CAREER

Served Many Years as Distinguished Orchestra Leader Here and Abroad.

Leipsic, Jan 24.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

New Brittian

CONN.

ISSUE OF Jan 24

FORMER LEADER OF SYMPHONY IS DEAD

Arthur Nikisch was Once in Charge of Famous Boston Musical Organization.

Leipsic, Jan. 24 (By Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper, and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a l period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

---

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

News

Jan 24

FORMER CONDUCTOR DEAD.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24 (By A. P.)—Arthur Mikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza. He was 66 years old.

WELL KNOWN LEADER DEAD.

Leipsic, Jan. 24, (By the Associated Press).—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

DATE ... 1922 ...

From The Fitchburg, Mass.

ARTHUR NIKISCH IS DEAD AT LEIPSIC

One Of Europe's Most Distinguished Orchestral Conductors; Was Widely Known In America

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24, (By Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his life time of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

From Jan 24

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

Symphony Plays To-night.

Bronislaw Huberman, the Polish violinit, who has made a sensation in New York since his arrival in this country, will play for the first time in Providence when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall at 8.15 o'clock to-night. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will present the following programme numbers: Overture to "Oberon," Franck's symphonic piece from the "Redemption," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme" by Haydn, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

American

Waterbury

Conn

JAN 2 1922

ARTHUR NIKISCH DIES IN LEIPSIC

Former Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra Succumbs to Influenza.

MOST NOTABLE CAREER

Served Many Years as Distinguished Orchestra Leader Here and Abroad.

Leipsic, Jan 24.—(By the Associated Press)—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in America in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

Providence

R. I.

News

ISSUE OF Jan

HUBERMAN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

The fame of Bronsilaw Huberman, the great Polish violinist, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight, has made his name known to our public for a considerable time, since this artist has so long held an enviable reputation in Europe. Coming to America in person last month, he amazed the audiences in New York by the wonder of his genius and the supreme beauty of his tone, in which he is materially aided by the quality of his instrument, one of the finest surviving specimens of Stradivarius violins. His appearance here tonight will be his first in Providence.

Mr. Huberman will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption;" Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." The concert will take place at Infantry Hall at 8.15.

Date Jan 24

From The TIMES
BARRE, VT.

DIED OF FLU.

Arthur Nikisch, Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leipsic, Jan. 24 (by the Associated Press).—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestra conductors.

In his life time of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Phylharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 189 and visited many American cities a the head of this noted organization. H was also in this country in 1912 for concert tour at the head of the Londo Symphony orchestra, which he con ducted for some time before the war.

FROM Jan 24

TRIBUNE

Providence

55

Symphony Orchestra To-night

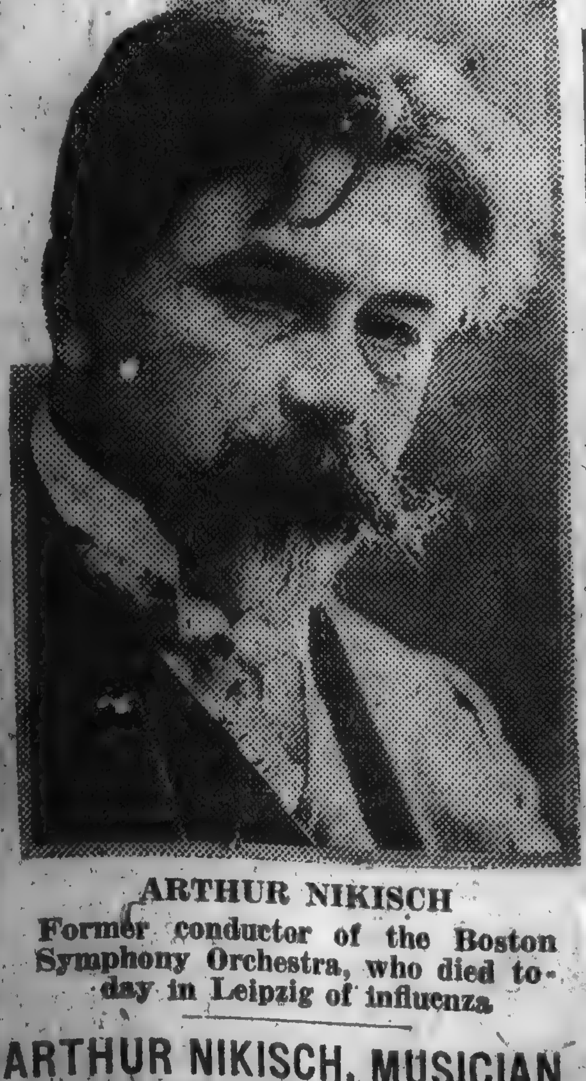
The fame of Bronislaw Huberman, the great Polish violinist, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night, has made his name known to our public for a considerable time, since this artist has so long held an enviable reputation in Europe. Coming to America in person last month, he amazed the audiences in New York by the wonder of his genius and the supreme beauty of his tone, in which he is materially aided by the quality of his instrument, one of the finest surviving specimens of Stradivarius violins. His appearance here to-night will be his first at Providence.

Mr. Huberman will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Weber's overture to "Oberon," Frank's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," variations on a theme by Haydn, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." The concert will take place at Infantry Hall at 8.15.

FROM JAN 24 1922 M
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Famous Musician



ARTHUR NIKISCH

Former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died today in Leipzig of influenza

ARTHUR NIKISCH, MUSICIAN AND CONDUCTOR, DIES

Noted Leader Succumbs to Attack of Influenza in Leipsic

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By A. P.)—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was obtained at the Vienna Conservatory where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipsic Theatre as second conductor, and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889-1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Budapest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipsic as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

In addition to his work at Leipsic Nikisch appeared as a guest conductor in all the leading cities of Europe, including Berlin, Hamburg, St. Petersburg and London. In 1901 he was dignified with the honor of royal professor of music. From 1902 to 1907 he served as director of studies at the Leipsic Conservatory and in 1905-1906 was director of the City Theatre at Leipsic.

FROM JAN 24 1922
STAR

St. Louis

NIKISCH, VIOLINIST, DIES

LEIPZIG, Jan. 24.—(By I. N. S.)—Arthur Nikisch, one of the foremost violinists in Europe and for many years connected with the Leipzig Opera Company, died today of inflammation of the lungs. He was a native of Hungary.

Nikisch was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and appeared in St. Louis with that orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 24 1922
TIMES STAR,
Cincinnati, Ohio

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED MUSICAL CONDUCTOR, DIES

Famous Orchestral Leader of Boston Passes Away in Leipsic

(ASSOCIATED PRESS CABLE)

LEIPSIC, January 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over several of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

From JAN 25 1922
GLOBE DEMOCRAT
St. Louis, Mo.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED MUSICIAN, DIES OF FLU

Once Headed Boston Symphony and Was Well Known in U. S.

By Associated Press.

LEIPSIC, January 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestra conductor, died here last night of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Eu- [illegible] conductors. In his lifetime of sixty years, he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the Continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra.

For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year, with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

THE VARYING SHORE

A Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra to an Audience of Many Minds, Moods and Manners—The Leaven That Justifies Such Ventures, Especially for the Teens

PITFALLS for the unwary open before the reviewer when his trade calls him to a Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra such as befell yesterday afternoon. He turns his eyes upon the audience, sees in it many children of tender years—no less than nine, yet no more than thirteen. He questions speculatively whether such infants of the concert-hall receive any impression at all from the music heard, even though Mr. Monteux and his orchestra administer it in homeopathic and pleasantly spiced doses. He looks again and straightway sees many a lad and many a girl engrossed in the pieces of Beethoven or Bizet, or Dvoràk or Wagner, and pleasured by them. He says in his haste that for these adolescents these Young People's Concerts should be reserved—only to be told by a wise phychologist in education that if children are to be "caught young" for the Symphony Concerts, they must be enmeshed in the very years to which he, in his folly, had demurred.

The reviewer pricks up his ears and hears much childish prattle about him while the music is proceeding, observes cynically to himself that in habits of the concert-hall, the child is also father to the man uncontrolled—an impression confirmed when hardly a youngster leaving the concert is chattering of pieces or instruments. The reviewer pretends not to notice when two lads slip out to the nearest movies; when a neighboring girl audibly absorbs the juice of a lemon or makes sure that her overshoes will flap à la mode. By this time he is quite sure that Young People's Concerts are a snare and delusion. He looks and listens yet again—and the instrumental song, the gentle beauty of the slow movement of Beethoven's Second Symphony gradually unfolds and penetrates an audiences, listening first in puzzled expectancy. Eyes brighten to Mr. Laurent's flute in The Minuet from Bizet's music of "The Woman of Arles." Wagner's trumpet-calls in the Overture to "Rienzi" send thrills down childish backs. Plainly the youngsters are much interested in the instruments that vary the band, that give color and contour to the music. (A whole Young People's Concert might reasonably be devoted to example and explanation with them.)

The reviewer resumes listening post and before he leaves it, he knows that these Slavonic Dances of Dvoràk, that racking Prelude to "The Woman of Arles," the pomps of Saint-Saëns's "Heroic March" have not been played in vain in the ears of many a rapt adolescent, caught into the music, rhythmed to it, illuded by it. Maybe, he thinks of his own young days. "Eheu! Fugaces!" A whole Symphony Concert "in regular course," a whole "special" on those Monday evenings, which these Young People's matinées are designed to feed, will not yield such various, such confused impressions. Yet at end, when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra have finished their pains, when the last of Mr. Burke's tempting programme-notes have been read, when the youngsters have chattered and clicked away, one impression stays firm. Whatever the infirmities of childish flesh and childish will before these concerts, however at odds with each other and with the occasion, this or that element in the audience may be, enough of youth hears and is pleasured, to justify them altogether. For there should be more joy over one pair of ears opened to symphonic music than over ninety-and-nine pairs of eyes fastened upon the movies.

H. T. P.

TRANS - JAN 24.

Though the Symphony Orchestra has flourished through forty-one years, Mr. Nikisch is the first conductor of the band to die. Strange as it seems, Sir G. Henschel and Mr. Gericke, both his seniors, are still living—the one in London, the other in Vienna—at ripe old age. To honor the memory of Nikisch, the "funeral-music" of Siegfried from the third act of Wagner's opera, "Götterdämmerung," will be played at the beginning of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The trustees, the management, the conductor and the players in the orchestra have also ordered at Leipzig a wreath to be laid on Nikisch's bier.

TRANS. JAN. 25

[60]

NIKISCH CONDUCTOR

THE RIPENED POWERS OF LATER YEARS

The Man, His Work and His Ways as Europe Knew Them Long After His Young Days in Boston—His Sway over Orchestras and Audience—The Intuitive, the Intensifying Temperament and, Through Both, the Romantic Strain

THIRTY years of incessant work and no little play in Europe altered Mr. Nikisch even as they dimmed the image that the elder concert-going public of Boston and New York kept of the conductor whom they knew in the early nineties and heard briefly again in the spring of 1912. Of old he was dark-haired and the locks were plentiful and tossing. In his last years they were so few that they could not toss under any possible excitement and in color they were silvery gray. In those early days Mr. Nikisch wore a black beard and moustache that grew somewhat wildly. More recently, they were trimmed neatly Van Dyck wise, and they were also gray. The conductor once had a short and lithe figure; it became short and somewhat stout, and he moved it slowly, gravely, with the dignity of advancing age. Once Mr. Nikisch was exuberant of linen, and his flying and expansive shirt-cuffs were as the oriflamme of his conducting. Nowadays his linen was like that of all the rest of us; while before the war austere London tailors clothed him in their discreetest fashion.

Of old, Mr. Nikisch used to come somewhat excitedly to his place before his men. Latterly he came as one poised, preoccupied, almost paternal. His audiences in Europe were wont to applaud his entrance long and loudly. He bowed gravely; he lifted deprecating hands; he gazed with kindly eye upon his orchestra and upon the auditorium. He opened the score with precision; he scrutinized the orchestra narrowly; he might send a word of council passing along its ranks. His native wildness, as we might have called it thirty years ago, was gone. In its place went the more subdued manner of middle age in a man that had accomplished much and had a dignity and a reputation to uphold. Mr. Nikisch was still a romantically-minded conductor—more so, perhaps, than any of his fellows; but he was no longer romantic of aspect except in one feature. His eyes kept their glowing, their piercing quality. Through them shone his personal response to his music. By them, more than by other means he swayed his men.

The Years in Europe

Like Mengelberg and Weingartner of the eminent conductors of his time, Mr. Nikisch developed into the wandering virtuouso. Mottl was permanently established at Munich; Mahler dwelt and worked in Vienna or else in New York; when Strauss conducted, he usually did so in Berlin; Dr. Muck abode there or else in Boston for continuous toil; Richter lived his later years in England. Only Weingartner, in the good days before the war, went up and down Europe as Mr. Nikisch did and journeyed to America like the elder conductor in 1912 and again, had he lived, in 1923. Even Weingartner or Mengelberg never projected twenty concert in as many days and almost as many cities—the extent and duration of Mr. Nikisch's original American tour. Yet for years he has had his permanent appointments in Europe. Annually he conducted in the twenty-four concerts of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic. Annually he led in a series of concerts by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin in its own city and in Hamburg. Each spring, before 1915, he conducted with the London Symphony Orchestra in three or four concerts. He paid recurring visits to Russia; and while he would conduct regularly in no opera house, he would undertake a "cycle" of Wagner's "Ring" operas in Paris or "festival performances" at Baireuth. In all his career, only one failure befell him—and in opera. He became the director, as well as the chief conductor, of the Opera House at Leipsic. He did not succeed in the dual post, and he soon abandoned it. In his prime he dwelt still, or he professed to dwell, in Leipsic; but he divided the spring and the summer between London and Ostend, and the autumn and the winter between half the cities of Europe. It was Mr. Mengelberg who said that he slept in his own bed at Amsterdam no oftener than once a fortnight, through the season. Mr. Nikisch was more fortunate.

Ways and Works

Nowadays, the psychologists, who spare no man, classify the conductors. Into one category go the disciplinarians; into another the conductors in whom the intellectual faculty predominates; while into a third fall the conductors in whom imagination, emotion and magnetically compelling force are uppermost. Among them, the psychologists would surely thrust Mr Nikisch; yet his conducting partakes of all three categories. Even in the days when he led the Boston Orchestra, he was no hard and fast disciplinarian; he was less so in recent years. But unmistakably he controlled his men. He had long cultivated his instinctive sense of well-staged conducting, as it were, and he happened to use an unusually long, thin, white stick for a baton. His beat with it was large, clear, precise and sweeping, and neither men nor audience might mistake the pace and the rhythm with which he would have the music move. When he would increase or lessen the volume of tone, when he would summon a particular group of instruments, when he would emphasize a particular passage, a motion of his head, a glance of his commanding eyes sufficed after the training of rehearsals. Usually his left hand and arm hung loosely at his side. He raised them when he would marshal a climax; the arm moved higher and higher in a hammering gesture, until as the climax broke, he had lifted it straight above his head swinging with clenched fist to the rhythm and the pounding vehemence of the music. Again, in lighter passages, this left hand served him; but then it waved delicately and gracefully to the pulsing of the music, spreading, as wi the finger-tips, the transparent and sua quality of tone that the conductor woul gain. Unmistakably, Mr. Nikisch's conducting was well staged, but once embarked upon it, he seemed wholly absorbed in it and wholly unaware of the audience watching as well as hearing. Moreover, it was imperious conducting—conducting that worked its full will with the music upon the orchestra. The most rigid disciplinarian could have done no more. The chances even are that he would have bitted an orchestra into the narrow way of his routine. Mr. Nikisch seemed to set it free.

Mind and Temperament

Mr. Nikisch never analyzed his music in public as the intellectual conductors have been known to do. In his comparatively young days, here in Boston, he was prone to weary of rehearsals and to take the chance of the compelling necessity and the stimulating circumstance of actual performance. He was more diligent in his later years, but still he exacted fewer rehearsals, made them less strenuous and achieved more in them than did many another conductor. One summer in Paris Mr. Weingartner and Mr. Nikisch in turn conducted through two "cycles" of Wagner's "Ring" operas. Either conductor had a like number of rehearsals, though they were not many. Mr. Weingartner was a far more practised operatic conductor than was Mr. Nikisch, who had confined himself for many years almost wholly to concerts. Yet in the performance of "Das Rheingold," which began both "cycles," Mr. Weingartner was clearly feeling his way with his men and they with him; while Mr. Nikisch had already made them responsive instruments.

The psychology of conducting is treacherous slough to traverse, but th probability is that Mr. Nikisch possess not only the communicating and commanding force which turns an orchestra into personal voice, but also the power of intuition that quickly grasps the design and the contents of music and expresses them, as intuitively, in terms of emotion. His course through the familiar Finale of Brahms's Symphony in C minor wa characteristic instance of his ways wit "absolute" music. The Pizzicati at t beginning tingled with nervous expectatio the approach to the melody of the horn was tremulous with anticipation. It emerged in its grave beauty; it died and then after a pause that was the rhetoric of music vividly applied, the triumphant, the joyous, the master-melody of the whole Finale swept along its way. The composer and Mr Nikisch propelling, almost goading, orchestra and audience alike, carried it to higher and higher power, to sharper and sharpe accent, to more and more exuberant tumu Then the power of the orchestra told. the end, Brahms, as it seemed, needed have written no other "Triumphlied" tha this.

Emotional Sides

On the emotional side, Mr. Nikisch i prime seemed the incarnation of the conducting temperament. Grant that he wa swayed by feeling and swayed his me with it. Yet it usually guided him and them aright. He sought and gained larg and sweeping sonorities that seemed neve hard, overblown or brittle. Yet he coul draw from an orchestra a tone of such softness and euphony that it seemed t melt into the air. He had a rare sens of the delicate tracery and shimmer o sound. He was adept with middle voice and middle colorings. He was vivid with instrumental detail and he refined adroitly upon it. His ear steadily ripened i sense of beautiful, euphonious, modulated and characterizing tone. Mighty as was in its sonorities, it never suggeste that he and the orchestra would soon b at the end of their resources. Whateve its shimmer, it still kept body. Invariably it seemed the voice of the emotion or o the characteristic beauty behind.

Mr. Nikisch read his music largely an intensely. The Song of the Pilgrims, fo example, at the beginning of the overtur to "Tannhäuser" was to him the song o a mighty host. He whipped the orchestr to a frenzy of excited tone in the mus of the Venusberg; he proclaimed the clos of the overture as though he would summon all the trumpets of heaven. It wa the Wagner of "Tannhäuser" become the Wagner of "Tristan." At the oth extreme, he filled another sort of musi Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, for ample—with tremulous, pathetic, hoveri whisperings that seemed the breathings o a lyric voice. When the Germans first hear him conduct in the music of Brahms the declared that he softened it unduly, tha he deprived it of its "intellectual force. Yet he was really giving it the sensuou beauty, the quality of emotion felt an expressed, that are much more essenti to music. He had the power that attain to something close to grandeur. He ha the sensitiveness that compasses a soft an shifting beauty.

The Unique Voice

The voice of no two violinists is alik If Mr. Ysaye or Mr. Kreisler were hidd by a screen, the expert listener cou probably surmise which of the two w playing a given concerto. Mr. Pad ski's Chopin would never sound like de Pachmann's though both were invisible to their hearers. Similarly, an emine conductor makes his band and the mus that it plays sound as it does under other man. Mr. Nikisch, for his pa transformed his orchestra into a high sensitive instrument. He was often sistent and subtle in his modifications pace and rhythm. He had his own centings of long passages of upspring or diminishing song. He was artful sustaining such ejaculatory music Chaikovsky's, in opening such clos wrought music as that of Brahms. knew every device—the pause, the qui ening, the holding, the shrewd empha or contrast—of the conductor as a rhe cian. He was master of the gradati of tonal force, the shadings of tonal co Responsive himself, he expected and gai a like responsiveness in his orchestra almost kindled it in his audiences as w Scarcely a conductor of our time had obvious a personal sway over both. psychologists judged him rightly they placed him among the conduct magnetic force.

Date Jan 24

From The TIMES

BARRE, VT.

5

DIED OF FLU

Arthur Nikisch, Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leipsic, Jan. 24 (by the Associated Press).—Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestra conductors.

In his life time of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Phylharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 189 and visited many American cities a the head of this noted organization. H was also in this country in 1912 for concert tour at the head of the Londo Symphony orchestra, which he con ducted for some time before the war.

FROM Jan 24

TRIBUNE

Providence

55

Symphony Orchestra To-night

The fame of Bronislaw Huberman, the great Polish violinist, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night, has made his name known to our public for a considerable time, since this artist has so long held an enviable reputation in Europe. Coming to America in person last month, he amazed the audiences in New York by the wonder of his genius and the supreme beauty of his tone, in which he is materially aided by the quality of his instrument, one of the finest surviving specimens of Stradivarius violins. His appearance here to-night will be his first at Providence.

Mr. Huberman will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mendelssohn's violin concerto.

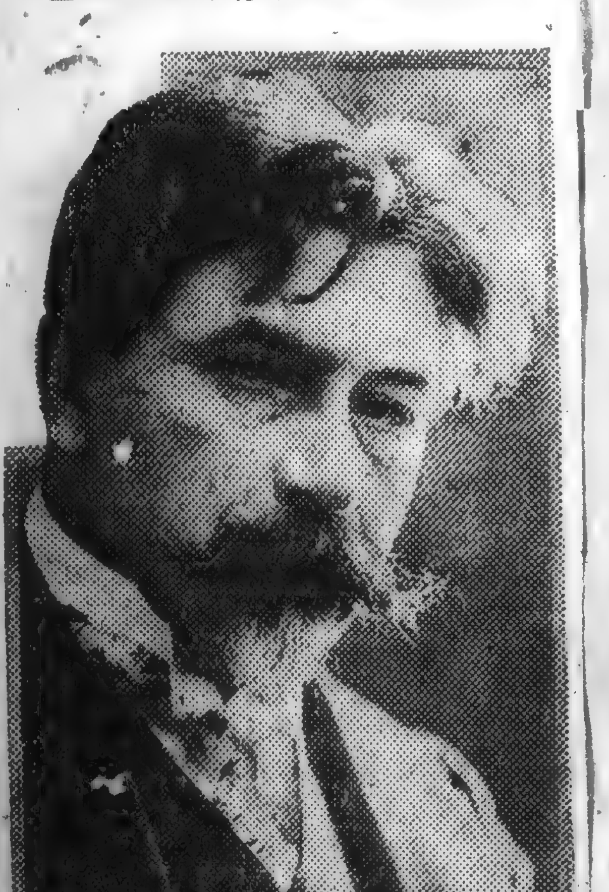
Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will present Weber's overture to "Oberon," Frank's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," variations on a theme by Haydn, and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor." The concert will take place at Infantry Hall at 8:15.

FROM JAN 2 M

Evening Public Ledger

Philadelphia, Pa.

Famous Musician



ARTHUR NIKISCH

Former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died today in Leipzig of influenza

ARTHUR NIKISCH, MUSICIAN AND CONDUCTOR, DIES

Noted Leader Succumbs to Attack of Influenza in Leipsic

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By A. P.)—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was obtained at the Vienna Conservatory where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipsic Theatre as second conductor, and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889-1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Budapest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipsic as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

In addition to his work at Leipsic Nikisch appeared as a guest conductor in all the leading cities of Europe, including Berlin, Hamburg, St. Petersburg and London. In 1901 he was dignified with the honor of royal professor of music. From 1902 to 1907 he served as director of studies at the Leipsic Conservatory and in 1905-1906 was director of the City Theatre at Leipsic.

FROM JAN 24 1922

STAR

St. Louis

NIKISCH, VIOLINIST, DIES

LEIPZIG, Jan. 24.—(By I. N. S.)—Arthur Nikisch, one of the foremost violinists in Europe and for many years connected with the Leipzig Opera Company, died today of inflammation of the lungs. He was a native of Hungary.

Nikisch was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and appeared in St. Louis with that orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From JAN 24 1922

TIMES STAR,

Cincinnati, Ohio

I'll fight this to the finish.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED MUSICAL CONDUCTOR, DIES

Famous Orchestral Leader of Boston Passes Away in Leipsic

(ASSOCIATED PRESS CABLE)

LEIPSIC, January 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over several of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

From JAN 25 1922

GLOBE DEMOCRAT

St. Louis, Mo.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED MUSICIAN, DIES OF FLU

Once Headed Boston Symphony and Was Well Known in U. S.

By Associated Press.

LEIPSIC, January 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestra conductor, died here last night of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most [illegible] orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of sixty years, he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the Continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra.

For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war.

Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year, with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

THE VARYING SHORE

A Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra to an Audience of Many Minds, Moods and Manners—The Leaven That Justifies Such Ventures, Especially for the Teens

PITFALLS for the unwary open before the reviewer when his trade calls him to a Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra such as befell yesterday afternoon. He turns his eyes upon the audience, sees in it many children of tender years—no less than nine, yet no more than thirteen. He questions speculatively whether such infants of the concert-hall receive any impression at all from the music heard, even though Mr. Monteux and his orchestra administer it in homeopathic and pleasantly spiced doses. He looks again and straightway sees many a lad and many a girl engrossed in the pieces of Beethoven or Bizet, or Dvoràk or Wagner, and pleasured by them. He says in his haste that for these adolescents these Young People's Concerts should be reserved—only to be told by a wise phychologist in education that if children are to be "caught young" for the Symphony Concerts, they must be enmeshed in the very years to which he, in his folly, had demurred.

The reviewer pricks up his ears and hears much childish prattle about him while the music is proceeding, observes cynically to himself that in habits of the concert-hall, the child is also father to the man uncontrolled—an impression confirmed when hardly a youngster leaving the concert is chattering of pieces or instruments. The reviewer pretends not to notice when two lads slip out to the nearest movies; when a neighboring girl audibly absorbs the juice of a lemon or makes sure that her overshoes will flap à la mode. By this time he is quite sure that Young People's Concerts are a snare and delusion. He looks and listens yet again—and the instrumental song, the gentle beauty of the slow movement of Beethoven's Second Symphony gradually unfolds and penetrates an audiences, listening first in puzzled expectancy. Eyes brighten to Mr. Laurent's flute in The Minuet from Bizet's music of "The Woman of Arles." Wagner's trumpet-calls in the Overture to "Rienzi" send thrills down childish backs. Plainly the youngsters are much interested in the instruments that vary the band, that give color and contour to the music. (A whole Young People's Concert might reasonably be devoted to example and explanation with them.)

The reviewer resumes listening post and before he leaves it, he knows that these Slavonic Dances of Dvoràk, that racking Prelude to "The Woman of Arles," the pomps of Saint-Saëns's "Heroic March" have not been played in vain in the ears of many a rapt adolescent, caught into the music, rhythmed to it, illuded by it. Maybe, he thinks of his own young days. "Eheu! Fugaces! A whole Symphony Concert "in regular course," a whole "special" on those Monday evenings, which these Young People's matinées are designed to feed, will not yield such various, such confused impressions. Yet at end, when Mr. Monteux and the orchestra have finished their pains, when the last of Mr. Burke's tempting programme-notes have been read, when the youngsters have chattered and clicked away, one impression stays firm. Whatever the infirmities of childish flesh and childish will before these concerts, however at odds with each other and with the occasion, this or that element in the audience may be, enough of youth hears er. For there should be more joy over one and is pleasured, to justify them altogeth- pair of ears opened to symphonic music than over ninety-and-nine pairs of eyes fastened upon the movies.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 24.

Though the Symphony Orchestra has flourished through forty-one years, Mr. Nikisch is the first conductor of the band to die. Strange as it seems, Sir G. Henschel and Mr. Gericke, both his seniors, are still living—the one in London, the other in Vienna—at ripe old age. To honor the memory of Nikisch, the "funeral-music" of Siegfried from the third act of Wagner's opera, "Götterdämmerung," will be played at the beginning of the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The trustees, the management, the conductor and the players in the orchestra have also ordered at Leipzig a wreath to be laid on Nikisch's bier.

TRANS. JAN. 25

[60]

NIKISCH CONDUCTOR

THE RIPENED POWERS OF LATER YEARS

The Man, His Work and His Ways as Europe Knew Them Long After His Young Days in Boston—His Sway over Orchestras and Audience—The Intuitive, the Intensifying Temperament and, Through Both, the Romantic Strain

THIRTY years of incessant work and no little play in Europe altered Mr. Nikisch even as they dimmed the image that the elder concert-going public of Boston and New York kept of the conductor whom they knew in the early nineties and heard briefly again in the spring of 1912. Of old he was dark-haired and the locks were plentiful and tossing. In his last years they were so few that they could not toss under any possible excitement and in color they were silvery gray. In those early days Mr. Nikisch wore a black beard and moustache that grew somewhat wildly. More recently, they were trimmed neatly Van Dyck wise, and they were also gray. The conductor once had a short and lithe figure; it became short and somewhat stout, and he moved it slowly, gravely, with the dignity of advancing age. Once Mr. Nikisch was exuberant of linen, and his flying and expansive shirt-cuffs were as the oriflamme of his conducting. Nowadays his linen was like that of all the rest of us; while before the war austere London tailors clothed him in their discreetest fashion.

Of old, Mr. Nikisch used to come somewhat excitedly to his place before his men. Latterly he came as one poised, preoccupied, almost paternal. His audiences in Europe were wont to applaud his entrance long and loudly. He bowed gravely; he lifted deprecating hands; he gazed with kindly eye upon his orchestra and upon the auditorium. He opened the score with precision; he scrutinized the orchestra narrowly; he might send a word of council passing along its ranks. His native wildness, as we might have called it thirty years ago, was gone. In its place went the more subdued manner of middle age in a man that had accomplished much and had a dignity and a reputation to uphold. Mr. Nikisch was still a romantically-minded conductor—more so, perhaps, than any of his fellows; but he was no longer romantic of aspect except in one feature. His eyes kept their glowing, their piercing quality. Through them shone his personal response to his music. By them, more than by other means he swayed his men.

The Years in Europe

Like Mengelberg and Weingartner of the eminent conductors of his time, Mr. Nikisch developed into the wandering virtuoso. Mottl was permanently established at Munich; Mahler dwelt and worked in Vienna or else in New York; when Strauss conducted, he usually did so in Berlin; Dr. Muck abode there or else in Boston for continuous toil; Richter lived his later years in England. Only Weingartner, in the good days before the war, went up and down Europe as Mr. Nikisch did and journeyed to America like the elder conductor in 1912 and again, had he lived, in 1923. Even Weingartner or Mengelberg never projected twenty concerts in as many days and almost as many cities—the extent and duration of Mr. Nikisch's original American tour. Yet for years he has had his permanent appointments in Europe. Annually he conducted in the twenty-four concerts of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic. Annually he led in a series of concerts by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin in its own city and in Hamburg. Each spring, before 1915, he conducted with the London Symphony Orchestra in three or four concerts. He paid recurring visits to Russia; and while he would conduct regularly in no opera house, he would undertake a "cycle" of Wagner's "Ring" operas in Paris or "festival performances" at Baireuth. In all his career, only one failure befell him—and in opera. He became the director, as well as the chief conductor, of the Opera House at Leipsic. He did not succeed in the dual post, and he soon abandoned it. In his prime he dwelt still, or he professed to dwell, in Leipsic; but he divided the spring and the summer between London and Ostend, and the autumn and the winter between half the cities of Europe. It was Mr. Mengelberg who said that he slept in his own bed at Amsterdam no oftener than once a fortnight, through the season. Mr. Nikisch was more fortunate.

Ways and Works

Nowadays, the psychologists, who spare no man, classify the conductors. Into one category go the disciplinarians; into another the conductors in whom the intellectual faculty predominates; while into a third fall the conductors in whom imagination, emotion and magnetically compelling force are uppermost. Among them, the psychologists would surely thrust Mr Nikisch; yet his conducting partakes of all three categories. Even in the days when he led the Boston Orchestra, he was no hard and fast disciplinarian; he was less so in recent years. But unmistakably he controlled his men. He had long cultivated his instinctive sense of well-staged conducting, as it were, and he happened to use an unusually long, thin, white stick for a baton. His beat with it was large, clear, precise and sweeping, and neither men nor audience might mistake the pace and the rhythm with which he would have the music move. When he would increase or lessen the volume of tone, when he would summon a particular group of instruments, when he would emphasize a particular passage, a motion of his head, a glance of his commanding eyes sufficed after the training of rehearsals. Usually his left hand and arm hung loosely at his side. He raised them when he would marshal a climax; the arm moved higher and higher in a hammering gesture, until as the climax broke, he had lifted it straight above his head swinging with clenched fist to the rhythm and the pounding vehemence of the music. Again, in lighter passages, this left hand served him; but then it waved delicately and gracefully to th pulsing of the music, spreading, as wi the finger-tips, the transparent and suave quality of tone that the conductor would gain. Unmistakably, Mr. Nikisch's conducting was well staged, but once embarked upon it, he seemed wholly absorbed in it and wholly unaware of the audience watching as well as hearing. Moreover, it was imperious conducting—conducting that worked its full will with the music upon the orchestra. The most rigid disciplinarian could have done no more. The chances even are that he would have bitted an orchestra into the narrow way of his routine. Mr. Nikisch seemed to set it free.

Mind and Temperament

Mr. Nikisch never analyzed his music in public as the intellectual conductors have been known to do. In his comparatively young days, here in Boston, he was prone to weary of rehearsals and to take the chance of the compelling necessity and the stimulating circumstance of actual performance. He was more diligent in his later years, but still he exacted fewer rehearsals, made them less strenuous and achieved more in them than did many another conductor. One summer in Paris Mr. Weingartner and Mr. Nikisch in turn conducted through two "cycles" of Wagner's "Ring" operas. Either conductor had a like number of rehearsals, though they were not many. Mr. Weingartner was a far more practised operatic conductor than was Mr. Nikisch, who had confined himself for many years almost wholly to concerts. Yet in the performance of "Das Rheingold," which began both "cycles," Mr. Weingartner was clearly feeling his way with his men and they with him; while Mr. Nikisch had already made them responsive instruments.

The psychology of conducting is treacherous slough to traverse, but th probability is that Mr. Nikisch possess not only the communicating and commanding force which turns an orchestra into personal voice, but also the power of intuition that quickly grasps the design and the contents of music and expresses them, as intuitively, in terms of emotion. His course through the familiar Finale of Brahms's Symphony in C minor was characteristic instance of his ways wit "absolute" music. The Pizzicati at th beginning tingled with nervous expectatio the approach to the melody of the horn was tremulous with anticipation. It emerged in its grave beauty; it died and then after a pause that was the rhetoric of music vividly applied, the triumphant, the joyous, the master-melody of the whole Finale swept along its way. The composer and Mr Nikisch propelling, almost goading, orchestra and audience alike, carried it to higher and higher power, to sharper and sharpe accent, to more and more exuberant tumu Then the power of the orchestra told. the end, Brahms, as it seemed, needed have written no other "Triumphlied" tha this.

Emotional Sides

On the emotional side, Mr. Nikisch in prime seemed the incarnation of the conducting temperament. Grant that he was swayed by feeling and swayed his men with it. Yet it usually guided him and them aright. He sought and gained larg and sweeping sonorities that seemed never hard, overblown or brittle. Yet he could draw from an orchestra a tone of such softness and euphony that it seemed to melt into the air. He had a rare sense of the delicate tracery and shimmer o sound. He was adept with middle voices and middle colorings. He was vivid with instrumental detail and he refined adroitly upon it. His ear steadily ripened in sense of beautiful, euphonious, modulated and characterizing tone. Mighty as it was in its sonorities, it never suggested that he and the orchestra would soon b at the end of their resources. Whatever its shimmer, it still kept body. Invariably it seemed the voice of the emotion or o the characteristic beauty behind.

Mr. Nikisch read his music largely and intensely. The Song of the Pilgrims, for example, at the beginning of the overture to "Tannhäuser" was to him the song o a mighty host. He whipped the orchestra to a frenzy of excited tone in the music of the Venusberg; he proclaimed the close of the overture as though he would summon all the trumpets of heaven. It was the Wagner of "Tannhäuser" become the Wagner of "Tristan." At the ot extreme, he filled another sort of musi Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, for ample—with tremulous, pathetic, hoveri whisperings that seemed the breathings o a lyric voice. When the Germans first heard him conduct in the music of Brahms they declared that he softened it unduly, that he deprived it of its "intellectual force." Yet he was really giving it the sensuou beauty, the quality of emotion felt an expressed, that are much more essentia to music. He had the power that attain to something close to grandeur. He ha the sensitiveness that compasses a soft and shifting beauty.

The Unique Voice

The voice of no two violinists is alike If Mr. Ysaye or Mr. Kreisler were hidde by a screen, the expert listener co probably surmise which of the two w playing a given concerto. Mr. Pad ski's Chopin would never sound like de Pachmann's though both were invis ble to their hearers. Similarly, an emine conductor makes his band and the mus that it plays sound as it does under other man. Mr. Nikisch, for his pa transformed his orchestra into a high sensitive instrument. He was often sistent and subtle in his modifications pace and rhythm. He had his own centings of long passages of upspring or diminishing song. He was artful sustaining such ejaculatory music Chaikovsky's, in opening such clos wrought music as that of Brahms. knew every device—the pause, the quic ening, the holding, the shrewd empha or contrast—of the conductor as a rhet cian. He was master of the gradatio of tonal force, the shadings of tonal col Responsive himself, he expected and gai a like responsiveness in his orchestra almost kindled it in his audiences as w Scarcely a conductor of our time had obvious a personal sway over both. psychologists judged him rightly they placed him among the conduct magnetic force.

[illegible], as Mr. Nikisch's orchestras in [illegible] and Berlin and London, re[illegible] him. They gained the penetrating [illegible], be it soft or sonorous that he [illegible]. They shared his feeling for [illegible] and shade, for richness of tonal color, for luminosity, that in climaxes was like the large lighting of a stage in music-drama. They became, like him, resolved at all costs to keep their music songful and to impart it as the voice of human emotion to stir human sensibilities. As he aged, Nikisch lost few of the fine ardors of his younger years; but they drove him very seldom now into excesses or eccentricities. In maturity as a conductor he embodied the romantic temperament in its best virtues—incessant intensity, high brilliance, tireless range, passion in all things, zest for many sorts of beauty, divining and imparting quality. In the old days in Boston, he sometimes laid the reins on the neck of this temperament. In his later years they very seldom slipped from his commanding fingers.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN 26

BROOKLYN
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 9 1922 X

[illegible], Flatbush.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy Friday evening, Feb. 3. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals). Two Slavonic dances by Dvorak close the concert.

Saint-Saens will be represented by his splendid violoncello concerto which Mr. Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

Morning Telegraph
New York
JAN 29 1922

The fourth and last pair, but one, of Boston Symphony concerts in New York this season will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will introduce to New York the "Second Symphony" (B flat major, Op. 19), by Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer. The remainder of the program will consist of a symphonic work from Cesar Franck's "The Redemption," and a suite by Alfredo Casella, entitled "Le Couvent sur l'eau."

At the Saturday matinee, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will head the program, and the novelty will be Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse." The remainder of the matinee program will consist of d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar" and Svendsen's Episode, "The Carnival in Paris."

FROM JAN 2 8 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Concerts

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will make known to New York the larger works of Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer, now living in New York, by producing his Second Symphony in B-flat. The remainder of the programme will consist of Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Alfredo Casella's "Couvent sur l'eau," and Weber's Overture to "Oberon."

The symphony to be played at the Saturday matinée will be the seventh by Beethoven. A new work at this concert will be Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," which was published last year and describes, according to the composer, "the whirl of an imperial ball about 1855." The remaining numbers will be d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris."

NEW YORK
EVENING JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 8 1922 X

ORCHESTRAL NOTES.

At to-morrow's matinee concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, in Aeolian Hall, Albert Coates will introduce a suite called "Four Conceits," by Eugene Goossens. Other numbers will be Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," a concerto for strings and woodwind by Vivaldi, arranged by Alexander Siloti, and Saint-Saens A minor violoncello concerto, with Lucien Schmit as [illegible]

[illegible] Kreisler will be the soloist [illegible] Bruch G minor concerto at [illegible] of Thursday afternoon [illegible] evening in Carnegie Hall. [illegible] will play Beethoven's [illegible]

At the [illegible] Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will introduce Karel Szymanowski's second symphony. Alfredo Casell's suite, "Le couvent sur l'eau," will also be played. On Saturday afternoon the principal numbers will be Beethoven's seventh symphony and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

Willem Mengelberg and Artur Bodanzky will both conduct the first of the Philharmonic Orchestra's series in the Metropolitan Opera House, beginning next Tuesday. Mr. Bodanzky's principal number will be the Brahms C minor symphony and that of Mr. Mengelberg Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" suite.

FROM JAN 2 8 1922 X
Evening Globe
New York

The fourth and last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Feb 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karol Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert and thus give to this Polish composer, who is well known in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

The other numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," the suite, "Le Couvent sur l'eau," by Alfredo Casella, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

At the Saturday concert Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris," and Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht" will be played.

SUN
New York City
JAN 2 8 1922 D

SATURDAY.

Aeolian Hall, aft., piano recital, Ignaz Friedman; eve., concert for Russian famine by Mishel Piastro; Carnegie Hall, aft., Boston Symphony; eve., Rosenblatt, Pilzer and mandolin orchestra.

SUN
New York City
JAN 2 8 1922 D

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., New York Symphony; eve., Boston Symphony; Aeolian Hall, eve., piano recital, Victor Wittgenstein.

From JAN 2 8 1922 L
EVENING MAIL
New York City

ADMIRERS of the work of Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer, can hear his Second Symphony played by the Boston Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, next Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Casella's "The Convent on the Water" are the other numbers.

For the Saturday matinee the Bostonians will play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Ravel's "La Valse" and d'Indy's "Istar."

---

53 GREENWICH AVE.

Date Jan 27

From The Augusta, Me. Journal

Boston Symphony Sends Wreath Tribute to Nikisch

Boston, Jan. 26—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his services, it was made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

From JAN 2 8 1922 X
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

For the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy Friday evening, February 3rd, Pierre Monteux will conduct the great Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the golden-toned 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who came from Europe to take this post two years ago and has, by appearances as soloist in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and also in recitals of his own, justified and even enhanced the enviable reputation which he formerly held in Europe. He will play with the orchestra on this occasion the 'cello concerto by Saint-Saens, noted French composer, the interest in whose works has been increased by the news of his death last month. The remaining numbers on this program will be the two nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," a splendid example of the modern French school of music, which has perhaps no more fortunate and inspired interpreter in this country, since Mr. Monteux was a personal friend of the late composer and was among the first to conduct these pieces in Paris, with the collaboration of Debussy. To close the concert, Mr. Monteux will present Two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, the noted Bohemian composer.

FROM JAN 2 8 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Nikisch—Since Seidl, The Best Conductor

By Henry T. Finck

WITH the exception of Anton Seidl, Arthur Nikisch, whose death was announced on Monday, was the best—that is, the most magnetic and temperamental—orchestral conductor of his time. Like Seidl, he was a Hungarian; nearly all the great "German" conductors, especially of Wagner's operas, have come from the land of the Magyars. Hungarian music is passionate and sensuous, and so is Wagner's.

Nikisch, as a youth of nineteen, played violin in Wagner's orchestra when the cornerstone of the Bayreuth Theatre was laid in 1872. From that time on he was a champion of Wagner's cause and afterwards one of his foremost interpreters. Angelo Neumann, who took Wagner's Nibelung operas on tour throughout Europe, engaged Nikisch at first as Seidl's assistant. Neumann also had in his Leipzig company Sucher, another great Hungarian conductor of Wagner's works. Hans Richter, by the way, was also from Hungary. Motti was an Austrian.

In America Nikisch is known only as an orchestral conductor. In 1889 Col. Higginson brought him over to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he held four years. In the interesting "Life and Letters of Henry Lee Higginson," recently published by the Atlantic Monthly Press, there are some amusing details concerning this engagement. In a letter to Dresel, Higginson wrote that Nikisch "is not strongly built, but must have a pretty tough and wiry constitution, or else he would not be alive. In reply to my expressed anxiety about his physical strength, he said that more than once he had had to conduct four Wagner operas in one week. Considering that it nearly kills me to hear one of the beastly things, I think conducting four of them in one week may be sufficient to prove his powers of resistance!"

It certainly speaks volumes for Higginson's liberal mind that, feeling as he did towards Wagner's operas, he should engage a Wagnerian specialist for his orchestra. I remember vividly Nikisch's début in Boston. Higginson had invited a bunch of New York critics to come up for the occasion. We went, paying our own fare. He invited us to a restaurant. He was a millionaire. We expected a champagne, caviare, and broiled lobster lunch, but had to pay for our own sandwiches and beer. His Puritan soul evidently shrank from the mere thought of bribing us with a lunch to praise Nikisch. But if he had treated us to champagne, caviare, and lobster, and added fonds d'artichaux salad, Camembert, and yellow chartreuse, we could not have been more delighted with Nikisch than we were that night. The climax of the concert was a thrilling performance of the fourth Schumann symphony, which I shall never forget. Oh, for a Nikisch to play the Schumann symphonies for us again and show how much more inspired they are than those of Brahms, which are inflicted on us ad nauseam from October to April.

Nikisch, to be sure, was also a Brahmsite. I have somewhere a forlorn letter he wrote to reproach me for the frivolous tone I adopted in telling how the audience gradually retired, hurried, and stampeded from Chickering Hall while he was conducting one of the Brahms symphonies—I believe it was the third—then new here. New York audiences no longer stampede when the Brahms symphonies are played; but I have seen signs that they will soon begin to do so again unless our conductors manifest some prudent moderation in their incessant repetition of them. New York is not Berlin.

Higginson himself was very much pleased with his new conductor. "He came in the autumn of 1889," he wrote, "and immediately took up his work with great energy. He was, I think, surprised to find how good our orchestra was; . . . but he put into it all his power, passion, and wonderful skill in producing results, and he gave us very different effects from Mr. Gericke. He was a man of real genius."

De Wolfe Howe, in his historical sketch of the Boston Orchestra, records the report that when Nikisch first heard this orchestra he exclaimed: "All I have to do is to poetize!" As Mr. Parker put it, the romantic period in the progress of the orchestra began with Nikisch. The "conductor cult" began. Whenever two Bostonians met their salutation was: "Well, what do you think of Nikisch?" It was not till the end of the season that it "was possible to gently criticise the new conductor without running the risk of being stoned to death in Hamilton Place by infuriated buyers of season tickets."

In the spring of 1893 Nikisch left Boston to become director general of the Royal Opera at Budapest. Two years later he began to give Philharmonic concerts in Berlin and at the head of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig, which had been kept half a century behind the times by the ultra-conservative Reinecke. The appearance of Nikisch was like a tornado of bracing mountain air sweeping away the stale air of an unventilated theatre. For the first time Tchaikovsky and other moderns were correctly and sympathetically interpreted in these German cities and the results were far-reaching.

For years Nikisch was busy all the time travelling from city to city, from country to country. When he made a tour of the United States, in 1912, he brought with him a London orchestra with which he could not do himself justice.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 2 6 1922 M
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

ARTHUR NIKISCH

IF EVER a man was born to the purple in the realm of music, it was Nikisch. It was not the family circumstances but his innate aptitude that made him the preeminent conductor he became, and his genius was manifest from his earliest years. Probably there has been no leader of anything approaching his status who has been at the same time so skillful an executant.

Nikisch had a hypnotizing control over those who played under his baton. He kindled in them a zeal that made them do better than they knew. The charm and force of his personality communicated themselves to his audiences. His hearers found him peculiarly magnetic and inspiring, and a cult was created of the sort that surrounds the leader who wields an orchestra as a single mighty instrument.

Important was the contribution made by Nikisch to the life history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in his time the best of our orchestras. In four seasons he infused a new vitality and spirit into the organization. Musicians proud of their art and independent of temper deferred to his complete and indisputable connoisseurship in his calling; his very presence breathed prestige and confidence. The music is stilled, but the influence upon art is perennial.

EVENING SUN JAN [illegible] 1922 S
Baltimore, Md.

NEXT week we will again have a goodly number of musical entertainments, chief among which may be mentioned at this time the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, one of the entertainments of the Wilson-Greene Philharmonic Course. This will take place on Wednesday evening at the Lyric, and it is interesting to note that should it prove successful it may be possible to have this orchestra play here five times next winter. Washington is anxious to have five Boston concerts next year, and if they can be combined with five Baltimore concerts a "season" may be arranged for. Theoretically the Boston Orchestra serves only New England, but if it is charmed to Washington there is no reason why Baltimore could not have the pleasure of hearing it, too.

From JAN 2 6 1922 M
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NIKISCH, FAMOUS MUSICIAN, IS DEAD

Noted Orchestra Conductor a Victim of Influenza at Leipzig

Special Cable Dispatch

Copyright, 1922, by Public Ledger Company

Berlin, Jan. 24. — Arthur Nikisch, the famous musical conductor, died suddenly yesterday at eLipzig of influenza.

His death is regarded here as an irreparable loss to the German musical world. Though Germany still possesses a large number of widely-known conductors, none, it is said, touches Nikisch's ability to inspire an orchestra to play its best, at the same time giving each single musician at the right moment liberty to develop his own individuality.

The newspapers tonight point out that he was given the first opportunity to establish international fame in the United States while conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nikisch was preparing for a second big tour of the United States in the near future.

Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, was heard in Philadelphia on numerous occasions. One visit was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 14, 1893, when musical centers were agitated by rumors that he had resigned the leadership. He was interviewed on the rumor at the Academy of Music and confirmed reports of his resignation. He then announced he had accepted an offer to direct the Royal Opera at Budapest. The last tour that brought him to Philadelphia was with the London Symphony Orchestra, playing an engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 11, 1912.

Nikisch was born in 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was obtained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor, and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke, he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889-1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Budapest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

In addition to his work at Leipzig Nikisch appeared as a guest conductor in all the leading cities of Europe, including Berlin, Hamburg, St. Petersburg and London. In 1901 he was dignified with the honor of royal professor of music. From 1902 to 1907 he served as director of studies at the Leipzig Conservatory and in 1905-1906 was director of the City Theatre at Leipzig.

In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classic and modern masterpieces.

As he was, so Mr. Nikisch's orchestras in Leipsic and Berlin and London, reflected him. They gained the penetrating tone, be it soft or sonorus that he sought. They shared his feeling for light and shade, for richness of tonal color, for luminosity, that in climaxes was like the large lighting of a stage in music-drama. They became, like him, resolved at all costs to keep their music songful and to impart it as the voice of human emotion to stir human sensibilities. As he aged, Nikisch lost few of the fine ardors of his younger years; but they drove him very seldom now into excesses or eccentricities. In maturity as a conductor he embodied the romantic temperament in its best virtues—incessant intensity, high brilliance, tireless range, passion in all things, zest for many sorts of beauty, divining and imparting quality. In the old days in Boston, he sometimes laid the reins on the neck of this temperament. In his later years they very seldom slipped from his commanding fingers.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. JAN 26

BROOKLYN CITIZEN

ISSUE OF

JAN 29 1922 X

[illegible] Road, Flatbush.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy Friday evening, Feb. 3. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals). Two Slavonic dances by Dvorak close the concert.

Saint-Saens will be represented by his splendid violoncello concerto which Mr. Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

Morning Telegraph
New York

JAN 29 1922

The fourth and last pair, but one, of Boston Symphony concerts in New York this season will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will introduce to New York the "Second Symphony" (B flat major, Op. 19), by Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer. The remainder of the program will consist of a symphonic work from Cesar Franck's "The Redemption," and a suite by Alfredo Casella, entitled "Le Couvent sur l'eau."

At the Saturday matinee, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major will head the program, and the novelty will be Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse." The remainder of the matinee program will consist of d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar" and Svendsen's Episode, "The Carnival in Paris."

FROM JAN 28 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Concerts

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given. At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will make known to New York the larger works of Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer, now living in New York, by producing his Second Symphony in B-flat. The remainder of the programme will consist of Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," Alfredo Casella's "Couvent sur l'eau," and Weber's Overture to "Oberon."

The symphony to be played at the Saturday matinée will be the seventh by Beethoven. A new work at this concert will be Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," which was published last year and describes, according to the composer, "the whirl of an imperial ball about 1855." The remaining numbers will be d'Indy's Symphonic Variations, "Istar," and Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris."

NEW YORK
EVENING JOURNAL

ISSUE OF

JAN 28 1922 X

ORCHESTRAL NOTES.

At to-morrow's matinee concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra, in Aeolian Hall, Albert Coates will introduce a suite called "Four Conceits," by Eugene Goossens. Other numbers will be Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," a concerto for strings and woodwind by Vivaldi, as arranged by Alexander Siloti, and the Saint-Saens A minor violoncello concerto, with Lucien Schmit as soloist.

Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist in the Bruch G minor concerto at the concerts of Thursday afternoon and Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Coates will play Beethoven's seventh symphony and an excerpt [illegible] Stravinsky's "L'oiseau de feu."

At the next Boston Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will introduce Karel Szymanowski's second symphony. Alfredo Casell's suite, "Le couvent sur l'eau," will also be played. On Saturday aftornoon the principal numbers will be Beethoven's seventh symphony and Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations.

Willem Mengelberg and Artur Bodanzky will both conduct the first of the Philharmonic Orchestra's series in the Metropolitan Opera House, beginning next Tuesday. Mr. Bodanzky's principal number will be the Brahms C minor symphony and that of Mr. Mengelberg Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" suite.

FROM JAN 28 1922 X
Evening Globe
New York

The fourth and last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karol Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert and thus give to this Polish composer, who is well known in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

The other numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption," the suite, "Le Couvent sur l'eau," by Alfredo Casella, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

At the Saturday concert Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in A major, d'Indy's "Istar" variations, Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris," and Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht" will be played.

SUN
New York City

JAN 28 1922 D

SATURDAY.

Aeolian Hall, aft., piano recital, Ignaz Friedman; eve., concert for Russian famine by Mishel Piastro; Carnegie Hall, aft., Boston Symphony; eve., Rosenblatt, Pilzer and mandolin orchestra.

SUN
New York City

JAN 28 1922 D

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, aft., New York Symphony; eve., Boston Symphony; Aeolian Hall, eve., piano recital, Victor Wittgenstein.

From JAN 28 1922 L
EVENING MAIL
New York City

ADMIRERS of the work of Karol Szymanovski, the Polish composer, can hear his Second Symphony played by the Boston Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, next Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Casella's "The Convent on the Water" are the other numbers.

For the Saturday matinee the Bostonians will play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Ravel's "La Valse" and d'Indy's "Istar."

---

53 GREENWICH AVE.

Date Jan 27

From The Augusta, Me.

Boston Symphony Sends Wreath Tribute to Nikisch

Boston, Jan. 26—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his services, it was made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

From JAN 28 1922 X
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Program

For the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy Friday evening, February 3rd, Pierre Monteux will conduct the great Seventh Symphony of Beethoven in A major. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the golden-toned 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who came from Europe to take this post two years ago and has, by appearances as soloist in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and also in recitals of his own, justified and even enhanced the enviable reputation which he formerly held in Europe. He will play with the orchestra on this occasion the 'cello concerto by Saint-Saens, noted French composer, the interest in whose works has been increased by the news of his death last month. The remaining numbers on this program will be the two nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," a splendid example of the modern French school of music, which has perhaps no more fortunate and inspired interpreter in this country, since Mr. Monteux was a personal friend of the late composer and was among the first to conduct these pieces in Paris, with the collaboration of Debussy. To close the concert, Mr. Monteux will present Two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak, the noted Bohemian composer.

FROM JAN 28 1922 W
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Nikisch—Since Seidl, The Best Conductor

By Henry T. Finck

WITH the exception of Anton Seidl, Arthur Nikisch, whose death was announced on Monday, was the best—that is, the most magnetic and temperamental—orchestral conductor of his time. Like Seidl, he was a Hungarian; nearly all the great "German" conductors, especially of Wagner's operas, have come from the land of the Magyars. Hungarian music is passionate and sensuous, and so is Wagner's.

Nikisch, as a youth of nineteen, played violin in Wagner's orchestra when the cornerstone of the Bayreuth Theatre was laid in 1872. From that time on he was a champion of Wagner's cause and afterwards one of his foremost interpreters. Angelo Neumann, who took Wagner's Nibelung operas on tour throughout Europe, engaged Nikisch at first as Seidl's assistant. Neumann also had in his Leipzig company Sucher, another great Hungarian conductor of Wagner's works. Hans Richter, by the way, was also from Hungary. Mottl was an Austrian.

In America Nikisch is known only as an orchestral conductor. In 1889 Col. Higginson brought him over to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position he held four years. In the interesting "Life and Letters of Henry Lee Higginson," recently published by the Atlantic Monthly Press, there are some amusing details concerning this engagement. In a letter to Dresel, Higginson wrote that Nikisch "is not strongly built, but must have a pretty tough and wiry constitution, or else he would not be alive. In reply to my expressed anxiety about his physical strength, he said that more than once he had had to conduct four Wagner operas in one week. Considering that it nearly kills me to hear one of the beastly things, I think conducting four of them in one week may be sufficient to prove his powers of resistance!"

It certainly speaks volumes for Higginson's liberal mind that, feeling as he did towards Wagner's operas, he should engage a Wagnerian specialist for his orchestra. I remember vividly Nikisch's début in Boston. Higginson had invited a bunch of New York critics to come up for the occasion. We went, paying our own fare. He invited us to a restaurant. He was a millionaire. We expected a champagne, caviare, and broiled lobster lunch, but had to pay for our own sandwiches and beer. His Puritan soul evidently shrank from the mere thought of bribing us with a lunch to praise Nikisch. But if he had treated us to champagne, caviare, and lobster, and added fonds d'artichaux salad, Camembert, and yellow chartreuse, we could not have been more delighted with Nikisch than we were that night. The climax of the concert was a thrilling performance of the fourth Schumann symphony, which I shall never forget. Oh, for a Nikisch to play the Schumann symphonies for us again and show how much more inspired they are than those of Brahms, which are inflicted on us ad nauseam from October to April.

Nikisch, to be sure, was also a Brahmsite. I have somewhere a forlorn letter he wrote to reproach me for the frivolous tone I adopted in telling how the audience gradually retired, hurried, and stampeded from Chickering Hall while he was conducting one of the Brahms symphonies—I believe it was the third—then new here. New York audiences no longer stampede when the Brahms symphonies are played; but I have seen signs that they will soon begin to do so again unless our conductors manifest some prudent moderation in their incessant repetition of them. New York is not Berlin.

Higginson himself was very much pleased with his new conductor. "He came in the autumn of 1889," he wrote, "and immediately took up his work with great energy. He was, I think, surprised to find how good our orchestra was; . . . but he put into it all his power, passion, and wonderful skill in producing results, and he gave us very different effects from Mr. Gericke. He was a man of real genius."

De Wolfe Howe, in his historical sketch of the Boston Orchestra, records the report that when Nikisch first heard this orchestra he exclaimed: "All I have to do is to poetize!" As Mr. Parker put it, the romantic period in the progress of the orchestra began with Nikisch. The "conductor cult" began. Whenever two Bostonians met their salutation was: "Well, what do you think of Nikisch?" It was not till the end of the season that it "was possible to gently criticise the new conductor without running the risk of being stoned to death in Hamilton Place by infuriated buyers of season tickets."

In the spring of 1893 Nikisch left Boston to become director general of the Royal Opera at Budapest. Two years later he began to give Philharmonic concerts in Berlin and at the head of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig, which had been kept half a century behind the times by the ultra-conservative Reinecke. The appearance of Nikisch was like a tornado of bracing mountain air sweeping away the stale air of an unventilated theatre. For the first time Tchaikovsky and other moderns were correctly and sympathetically interpreted in these German cities and the results were far-reaching.

For years Nikisch was busy all the time travelling from city to city, from country to country. When he made a tour of the United States, in 1912, he brought with him a London orchestra with which he could not do himself justice.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From JAN 26 1922 M
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

ARTHUR NIKISCH

IF EVER a man was born to the purple in the realm of music, it was Nikisch. It was not the family circumstances but his innate aptitude that made him the preeminent conductor he became, and his genius was manifest from his earliest years. Probably there has been no leader of anything approaching his status who has been at the same time so skillful an executant.

Nikisch had a hypnotizing control over those who played under his baton. He kindled in them a zeal that made them do better than they knew. The charm and force of his personality communicated themselves to his audiences. His hearers found him peculiarly magnetic and inspiring, and a cult was created of the sort that surrounds the leader who wields an orchestra as a single mighty instrument.

Important was the contribution made by Nikisch to the life history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in his time the best of our orchestras. In four seasons he infused a new vitality and spirit into the organization. Musicians proud of their art and independent of temper deferred to his complete and indisputable connoisseurship in his calling; his very presence breathed prestige and confidence. The music is stilled, but the influence upon art is perennial.

EVENING SUN JAN [illegible] 1922 8
Baltimore, Md.

NEXT week we will again have a goodly number of musical entertainments, chief among which may be mentioned at this time the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, one of the entertainments of the Wilson-Greene Philharmonic Course. This will take place on Wednesday evening at the Lyric, and it is interesting to note that should it prove successful it may be possible to have this orchestra play here five times next winter. Washington is anxious to have five Boston concerts next year, and if they can be combined with five Baltimore concerts a "season" may be arranged for. Theoretically the Boston Orchestra serves only New England, but if it is charmed to Washington there is no reason why Baltimore could not have the pleasure of hearing it, too.

From JAN 26 1922 M
Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NIKISCH, FAMOUS MUSICIAN, IS DEAD

Noted Orchestra Conductor a Victim of Influenza at Leipzig

Special Cable Dispatch
Copyright, 1922, by Public Ledger Company

Berlin, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch, the famous musical conductor, died suddenly yesterday at eLipzig of influenza.

His death is regarded here as an irreparable loss to the German musical world. Though Germany still possesses a large number of widely-known conductors, none, it is said, touches Nikisch's ability to inspire an orchestra to play its best, at the same time giving each single musician at the right moment liberty to develop his own individuality.

The newspapers tonight point out that he was given the first opportunity to establish international fame in the United States while conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nikisch was preparing for a second big tour of the United States in the near future.

Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, was heard in Philadelphia on numerous occasions. One visit was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 14, 1893, when musical centers were agitated by rumors that he had resigned the leadership. He was interviewed on the rumor at the Academy of Music and confirmed reports of his resignation. He then announced he had accepted an offer to direct the Royal Opera at Budapest. The last tour that brought him to Philadelphia was with the London Symphony Orchestra, playing an engagement at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 11, 1912.

Nikisch was born in 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was obtained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor, and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke, he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889-1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Budapest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

In addition to his work at Leipzig Nikisch appeared as a guest conductor in all the leading cities of Europe, including Berlin, Hamburg, St. Petersburg and London. In 1901 he was dignified with the honor of royal professor of music. From 1902 to 1907 he served as director of studies at the Leipzig Conservatory and in 1905-1906 was director of the City Theatre at Leipzig.

In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

From JAN 25 1922 M
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md. 1.

ARTHUR NIKISCH DEAD; WAS NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Dies In Leipzig.

Leipzig, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was attained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889 to 1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Buda-Pest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

Nikisch conducted the London Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Lyric April 12, 1912.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 25

ARTHUR NIKISCH

Former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of noted musical organizations in Europe, died of influenza in Leipsic.

NIKISCH, ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, DIES

Flu at Leipsic Fatal to Former Boston Symphony Leader

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24. (By the Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras.

For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of his noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with

---

FROM 25 1922 A
GAZETTE TIMES
Pittsburgh, Pa.

NOTED ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR DIES

Arthur Nikisch Influenza Victim at Berlin—Led Boston Symphony.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24. — Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

FROM JAN 25 1922 X
DISPATCH,
Pittsburg, Pa.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED DIRECTOR, DIES IN LEIPSIC

[BY ASSOCIATED PRESS CABLE]

LEIPSIC, January 24—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful progidy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch was conductor of London Orchestra when it played in Exposition Music Hall, Pittsburg, in 1912.

TRIBUNE
Providence JAN 25

Excellent Program Rendered by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here.

A welcome and refreshing contrast was the significant feature of the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third concert of the season in Infantry Hall, last evening. For the first time in many years the program offered no symphony yet in its place the program ranged from Weber's Eighteenth Century Overture to "Oberon," which somehow never grows old—to Borodin's superb dance music from "Prince Igor."

Bronislaw Huber, violinist, was the soloist of the concert and the program was given in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a. Brahms; symphonic piece from "La Redemption," Franck; concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

The exquisite harmony and melody of the Weber overture was brought out by Mr. Monteux and his men in all the fullness of its perennial beauty and in the Brahm's variations on a Haydn theme the strings and wood winds interpreted with magnificent effect with the various musical pictures so unerringly visualized by this great master.

In the piece from "La Redemption," by give [illegible] a sense of expansion in beauty and fatness of style a characteristic which is his forte and his distinguishing mark of genius. It was given a masterly performance by the orchestra.

Naturally much of the interest of the concert centred in Mr. Huberman, the soloist, who was heard here for the first time.

Huberman appeared in this country almost a quarter of a century ago as a boy prodigy, but after his first American tour he did not return to the United States until last October, when he made his "second American debut" at Carnegie Hall in recital with Paul Frenkel at the piano. Mr. Huberman subsequently played in Chicago, in recital, and made his debut as an orchestral soloist in this country with the Minneapolis Symphony at St. Paul on Oct. 27. On this occasion, Mr. Huberman played the Beethoven Concerto, which he has since played in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky and again at the farewell concert of Dr. Richard Strauss.

This great artist played the Mendelssohn Concerto as if it had been written yesterday, and his musical conception of this big number—while differing greatly from the familiar interpretation given it by other famous violinists—was yet, perhaps a true recreation of the composer's dream. Indeed, the work of Huberman, his artistic qualities, his intelligence, his fervor and his perfection of technique reevaled him as a violinist of the very first rank. He plays in the "grand manner" and does it with passion and exquisite sensibility for the possiblities of his instrument though at times the artist seemed to over reach himself in the matter of tempermament and emotional display.

The concert ended in a realistic blaze of musical glory in the splendid performance by the orchestra of Borodin's colorful and barbaric "Polovtsian Dances."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Jan 25.
BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY, HUBERMAN SOLOIST, DELIGHTS HEARERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber .... Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms .... Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck .... Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn .... Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Andante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace
Borodin ..... Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skilful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Broniclaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's [illegible] lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a show movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insitent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 25 1922 M
From INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Arthur Nikisch

The many concert-goers who can recall his ministrations in the palmiest days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will grieve to learn of the death of Arthur Nikisch, by whom that admirable organization was conducted from 1889 to 1893.

That is a long while ago, but there must still be more than a few who can remember with what ability his functions were discharged, and who will agree that much of the supreme efficiency to which the Boston orchestra attained was due to the skill and the zeal and the musical intelligence of his direction. It is true that it was already a highly trained body, with no superior and hardly an equal in the country, when he assumed its leadership. It had become so under the severe training of Wilhelm Gericke, than whom there was no better drill master, and it was on the solid foundation of rigorous discipline laid by Gericke that Arthur Nikisch built.

Grace and refinement were the qualities which under his guidance the Boston orchestra in larger measure acquired, and while there were those who complained that this gain had been made at the cost of a lessened vigor, the best critical opinion did not adopt that view. Certainly the orchestra never played better, with more brilliancy of execution, eloquence of expression and perfection of ensemble, than it did during the comparatively brief period that he was at its head, and while justice requires the admission that it did fine work under the baton of the late unlamented Muck, that conductor enjoyed the inestimable advantage of inheriting a practically perfect instrument.

There is rather a curious parallel in this matter of leadership between the history of the Boston orchestra and that of our own. What Gericke did for the former was done for the local organization by Fritz Scheel, the value of whose service during its formative period has never been properly appreciated. To use a convenient colloquialism he whipped it into shape and developed the technique which rendered its subsequent achievement possible. Carl Pohlig's term of office corresponds to that of Emil Paur and was without any special significance, which does not mean that Pohlig was anything less than an excellent conductor, but his successor was a musician of superior distinction, and what Nikisch was to Boston, Leopold Stokowski has become to Philadelphia.

From Jan 25
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

NIKISCH, MUSICIAN, DIES IN LEIPSIC

Was Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By The Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

Philadelphia
PA.
Bulletin
ISSUE OF
JAN 25 1922 M

ARTHUR NIKISCH, POET-MUSICIAN

Nearly thirty years have elapsed since ARTHUR NIKISCH, the Hungarian conductor, closed his five years' contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in the interim he has made but a single visit to Philadelphia, ten years ago, on an American concert tour. Yet he left an impress on musical America which has not been obliterated. Poetic sensitiveness was the keynote of his temperament, and he taught native musicians to interpret the symphonic works of the German and Russian composers in this illuminating spirit.

Critics of 1889-1893 thought he carried this principle to an extreme that robbed many famous compositions of their traditional character, but the intervening thirty years have witnessed a progressive compromise which has crystallized some of NIKISCH's ideas. During this period he has been active as a conductor in the capitals of Europe, admired in Paris and London no less than in Berlin and St. Petersburg, to give the Russian metropolis the name by which it was known while he was poetizing TCHAIKOWSKY to the delight of that composer's music-loving compatriots.

From these and other European cities his influence radiated, crossing the Atlantic to continue the current of musical development which started with his Boston Symphony engagement.

[62]

From JAN 25 1922 M
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

1

ARTHUR NIKISCH DEAD; WAS NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Dies In Leipzig.

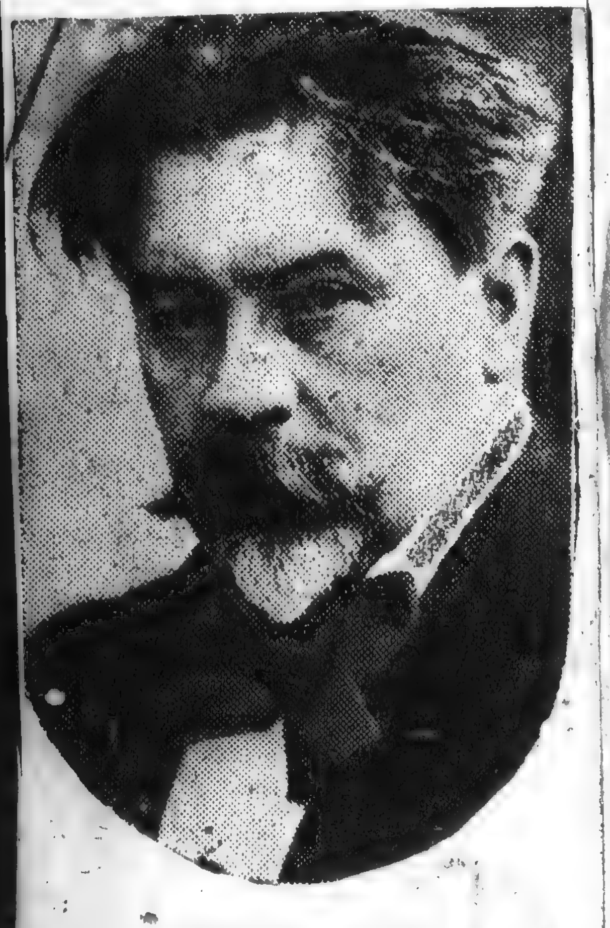
Leipzig, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was attained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889 to 1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Buda-Pest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

Nikisch conducted the London Symphony Orchestra in a concert at the Lyric April 12, 1912.

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.



ARTHUR NIKISCH

Former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of noted musical organizations in Europe, died of influenza in Leipsic.

NIKISCH, ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, DIES

Flu at Leipsic Fatal to Former Boston Symphony Leader

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24. (By the Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras.

For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and visited many American cities at the head of his noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

JAN 25 1922 X
FROM GAZETTE TIMES
Pittsburgh, Pa.

NOTED ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR DIES

Arthur Nikisch Influenza Victim at Berlin—Led Boston Symphony.

LEIPSIC, Jan. 24. — Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America during the present year with the Leipsic Gewandhaus Band.

FROM JAN 25 1922 X
DISPATCH,
Pittsburg, Pa.

ARTHUR NIKISCH, NOTED DIRECTOR, DIES IN LEIPSIC

[BY ASSOCIATED PRESS CABLE]

LEIPSIC, January 24—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful progidy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors. In his lifetime of 66 years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus orchestras. He was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted band. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Herr Nikisch was conductor of London Orchestra when it played in Exposition Music Hall, Pittsburg, in 1912.

TRIBUNE
Providence JAN 2

Excellent Program Rendered by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Concert Here.

A welcome and refreshing contrast was the significant feature of the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third concert of the season in Infantry Hall, last evening. For the first time in many years the program offered no symphony yet in its place the program ranged from Weber's Eighteenth Century Overture to "Oberon," which somehow never grows old—to Borodin's superb dance music from "Prince Igor."

Bronislaw Huber, violinist, was the soloist of the concert and the program was given in the following order: Overture to "Oberon," Weber; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56a. Brahms; symphonic piece from "La Redemption," Franck; concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

The exquisite harmony and melody of the Weber overture was brought out by Mr. Monteux and his men in all the fullness of its perennial beauty and in the Brahm's variations on a Haydn theme, the strings and wood winds interpreted with magnificent effect with the various musical pictures so unerringly visualized by this great master.

In the piece from "La Redemption," by Caesar Franck, the French composer gives the hearer a sense of expansion in beauty and faitiness of style a characteristic which is his forte and his distinguishing mark of genius. It was given a masterly performance by the orchestra.

Naturally much of the interest of the concert centred in Mr. Huberman, the soloist, who was heard here for the first time.

Huberman appeared in this country almost a quarter of a century ago as a boy prodigy, but after his first American tour he did not return to the United States until last October, when he made his "second American debut" at Carnegie Hall in recital with Paul Frenkel at the piano. Mr. Huberman subsequently played in Chicago, in recital, and made his debut as an orchestral soloist in this country with the Minneapolis Symphony at St. Paul on Oct. 27. On this occasion, Mr. Huberman played the Beethoven Concerto, which he has since played in New York with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky and again at the farewell concert of Dr. Richard Strauss.

This great artist played the Mendelssohn Concerto as if it had been written yesterday, and his musical conception of this big number—while differing greatly from the familiar interpretation given it by other famous violinists—was yet, perhaps a true recreation of the composer's dream. Indeed, the work of Huberman, his artistic qualities, his intelligence, his fervor and his perfection of technique reevaled him as a violinist of the very first rank. He plays in the "grand manner" and does it with passion and exquisite sensibility for the possiblities of his instrument though at times the artist seemed to over reach himself in the matter of tempermament and emotional display.

The concert ended in a realistic blaze of musical glory in the splendid performance by the orchestra of Borodin's colorful and barbaric "Polovtsian Dances."

N. R. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Jan 25
BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY, HUBERMAN SOLOIST, DELIGHTS HEARERS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played here last evening for the third time this season. It was a symphony concert without a symphony, and, for soloist, featured Bronislaw Huberman, a noted violinist, who played here for the first time. M. Monteux's programme offered much that was interesting, and his men played in a manner that elicited a hearty response from the audience. The attendance, though not so large as at preceding concerts this season, nearly filled the hall.

The programme was played as follows:

Weber ....Overture to "Oberon"
Brahms............Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a
Franck..........Symphonic Piece from the Symphonic Poem, "La Redemption"
Mendelssohn....Concerto for Violin in E-minor, Op. 64
I. Allegro molto appassionato
II. Ardante
III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vi ace
Borodin......Polovtsian Dances from the Opera "Prince Igor"

One never tires of the fine Weber overture. M. Monteux gave it a spirited reading and with the exception of a slight disagreement in the first violin section in the earlier measures the ensemble was excellent.

In the Brahms variations on a Haydn theme, M. Monteux sustained the listener's interest by the variety and beauty of his conceptions of what might be termed separate musical pictures. The themes of Haydn have proved an inexhaustible source of material for later composers and Brahms found in this instance one well fitted for his skill in contrapuntal treatment. The work is highly interesting in the sheer beauty of the musical effects produced and it also repays the close attention of those who delight in skillful manipulation of the orchestra voices. There are variations which fairly sparkle in their technical brilliance, dainty dance movements, and still others in which the composer's mastery of instrumentation focusses attention. The lightness of style maintained throughout the piece was a noticeable and pleasing feature of the orchestra's work.

Entirely different and filled with instrumental coloring was the symphonic piece by Franck. The purity and elevation of style so characteristic of this French writer was clearly and beautifully expressed in the appreciative and sympathetic reading accorded it by M. Monteux. The effect of portions of the work is heightened by use of divided violins.

Much interest attached to the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman. His fine reputation as solo artist preceded him here.

Mr. Huberman is now on his first tour of this country as a mature artist. About 25 years ago, however, he visited the United States, appearing in several of the larger cities as a wonder child. There were a few in last evening's audience who heard him play in Boston in the days of his early youth and his remarkable playing is fresh in their memory. Curiously enough, at his final Boston concert, years ago, he played the Mendelssohn concerto, which was also his choice last evening. This concerto is always a favorite and at its conclusion last night the violinist received a great tribute of applause.

Mr. Huberman's playing of the work was not at all along conventional lines. The artistic value of his interpretation might easily be a debatable question. It was extremely temperamental, and in making it so the player's style lost the repose which is essential to the concerto's best effect. There was an over-exaggeration of rhythmic accent in the first movement and at times a forcing of the tone which caused the rasping of strings against the finger board. The simplicity of the slow movement was distorted by emotionalism and the finale, admittedly a show movement, but one in which speed of finger should be tempered with reason, was raced at such a pace that clarity was sacrificed.

Brilliance was the outstanding feature of Mr. Huberman's performance, and, viewed from the virtuoso standpoint, it was highly successful.

Borodin's wild, barbaric "Polovtsian Dances" made an exciting finish to the programme. This is music which suggests the primitive. It deals the listening ear terrible blows, but the pain is sweet. Vivid harmonies and strong, insitent rhythm hold the attention as if in a vise. The dances were played with great vigor and were enthusiastically applauded.

A. F. P.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 25 1922 M
From INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Arthur Nikisch

The many concert-goers who can recall his ministrations in the palmiest days of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will grieve to learn of the death of Arthur Nikisch, by whom that admirable organization was conducted from 1889 to 1893.

That is a long while ago, but there must still be more than a few who can remember with what ability his functions were discharged, and who will agree that much of the supreme efficiency to which the Boston orchestra attained was due to the skill and the zeal and the musical intelligence of his direction. It is true that it was already a highly trained body, with no superior and hardly an equal in the country, when he assumed its leadership. It had become so under the severe training of Wilhelm Gericke, than whom there was no better drill master, and it was on the solid foundation of rigorous discipline laid by Gericke that Arthur Nikisch built.

Grace and refinement were the qualities which under his guidance the Boston orchestra in larger measure acquired, and while there were those who complained that this gain had been made at the cost of a lessened vigor, the best critical opinion did not adopt that view. Certainly the orchestra never played better, with more brilliancy of execution, eloquence of expression and perfection of ensemble, than it did during the comparatively brief period that he was at its head, and while justice requires the admission that it did fine work under the baton of the late unlamented Muck, that conductor enjoyed the inestimable advantage of inheriting a practically perfect instrument.

There is rather a curious parallel in this matter of leadership between the history of the Boston orchestra and that of our own. What Gericke did for the former was done for the local organization by Fritz Scheel, the value of whose service during its formative period has never been properly appreciated. To use a convenient colloquialism he whipped it into shape and developed the technique which rendered its subsequent achievement possible. Carl Pohlig's term of office corresponds to that of Emil Paur and was without any special significance, which does not mean that Pohlig was anything less than an excellent conductor, but his successor was a musician of superior distinction, and what Nikisch was to Boston, Leopold Stokowski has become to Philadelphia.

From
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

NIKISCH, MUSICIAN, DIES IN LEIPSIC

Was Former Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leipsic, Jan. 24.—(By The Associated Press.)—Arthur Nikisch former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died here last evening of influenza.

Arthur Nikisch, son of a Hungarian bookkeeper and a youthful prodigy at the pianoforte and with the violin, developed in maturity into one of Europe's most distinguished orchestral conductors.

In his lifetime of sixty-six years he wielded the baton over a number of the greatest of the orchestral bands of the continent, notably the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipsic Gewandhaus Orchestra. For a long period he devoted himself mainly to the direction of the opera in his native city, Leipsic, where he made a name for himself by the successful revival of many long-neglected operatic masterpieces. In the orchestral field he was noted for his advanced musical views, as well as for both the smoothness and virility of his readings of many of both classical and modern masterpieces.

Nikisch was widely known in America. He was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893 and visited many American cities at the head of this noted organization. He was also in this country in 1912 for a concert tour at the head of the London Symphony Orchestra, which he conducted for some time before the war. Recently he was reported to be planning a tour in America with the Leipsic Gewandhaus band.

Philadelphia
PA.

ISSUE OF

JAN 25 1922 M

ARTHUR NIKISCH, POET-MUSICIAN

Nearly thirty years have elapsed since ARTHUR NIKISCH, the Hungarian conductor, closed his five years' contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in the interim he has made but a single visit to Philadelphia, ten years ago, on an American concert tour. Yet he left an impress on musical America which has not been obliterated. Poetic sensitiveness was the keynote of his temperament, and he taught native musicians to interpret the symphonic works of the German and Russian composers in this illuminating spirit.

Critics of 1889-1893 thought he carried this principle to an extreme that robbed many famous compositions of their traditional character, but the intervening thirty years have witnessed a progressive compromise which has crystallized some of NIKISCH's ideas. During this period he has been active as a conductor in the capitals of Europe, admired in Paris and London no less than in Berlin and St. Petersburg, to give the Russian metropolis the name by which it was known while he was poetizing TCHAIKOWSKY to the delight of that composer's music-loving compatriots.

From these and other European cities his influence radiated, crossing the Atlantic to continue the current of musical development which started with his Boston Symphony engagement.

[62]

BALTIMORE
MD.
News
ISSUE OF
JAN 25 1922 M

ARTHUR NIKISCH DEAD; WAS NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Dies In Leipzig

(By Cable to the Associated Press.)

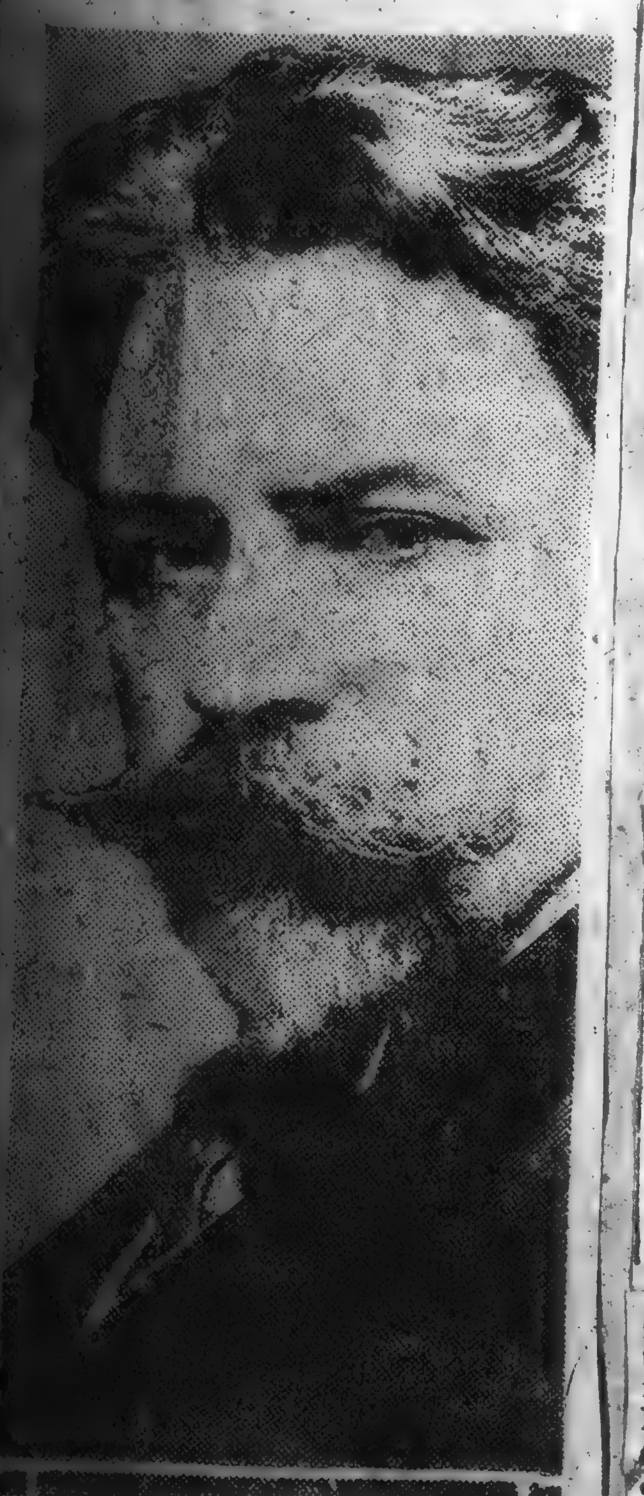
Leipzig, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was attained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889 to 1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Buda-Pest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

BALTIMORE
MD.
ISSUE OF
JAN 25 1922 M

NOTED MUSICIAN DEAD



Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday in Leipzig, Germany. He was known throughout Europe and America as a gifted orchestral leader. Nilsisch was at the Lyric, Baltimore, in April, 1912, as leader of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Honors Nikisch's Memory

BOSTON, January 26.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipzig of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader. Wagner's "Funeral March" has been added to the programme of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the bâton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

EAGLE JAN 26 1922 M
Brooklyn, New York

ORCHESTRA HONORS NIKISCH.

Boston, Jan. 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, it was made known today. Wagner's Funeral March has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

MERIDEN
CONNECTICUT
Journal
ISSUE OF Jan 26

MEMORIAL FOR NIKISCH.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, it wah made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

Sentinel
Ansonia Conn
JAN 1922

SENT MEMORIAL WREATH

Boston, Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader, it was made known today. Wagner's Funeral March has been added to the orchestra's concert program of the this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 26

NIKISCH AND HIS TRADITION

TO THE younger generation of Philadelphia music patrons, Arthur Nikisch is a name to be uttered with a kind of conventional awe. It is so long since the distinguished conductor, who has just died in Leipzig, mounted the concert dais in this city that his actual artistic attributes are dimmed in the pathos of distance.

He is, however, a tradition of considerable potency. When this community was in its musical nonage Nikisch presided over the destinies of the Boston Symphony, and when that once exceptional organization paid its four or five visits a year to the Academy of Music great was the esthetic satisfaction of audiences then almost ironically deemed to be of the "elect."

Today the appeal of symphonic music has been stripped of its mystery. Philadelphia itself can boast of an orchestral director ranked with the most eminent of his craft. Good music is no longer a super-cultural excrescence, but a necessity.

Nikisch, a pioneer in his American campaign, which lasted from 1889 to 1893, returned to this country only once to witness its artistic transformation. His devotion to exalted artistic principles abroad, however, was consistent and unflagging. Not even the World War deprived the Gewandhaus orchestra, under his baton, of its traditional prestige.

Nikisch was among the last survivors of the inspiring age of German musical development of the last century. He was young with Wagner's "Ring," and played with the first violins at the memorable premiere of the inextinguishable tetralogy at Bayreuth in 1876.

It is trite but true that the musical awakening succeeding that event has been unprecedented and world-wide.

Haverhill
MASS.
Gazette
ISSUE OF
Jan 26

Boston Symphony Pays a Tribute to Nikisch

BOSTON, Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his services, it was made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Musicians Mourn Nikisch

Boston, Jan. 26.—(By A. P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader. Wagner's "Funeral March" has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

Arthur Nikisch, a victim of influenza in Leipsic, was one of the most distinguished orchestral conductors of his time, and one well and favorably known in this country a generation ago. He was the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and by his tours of the country at that time won a host of admirers in most of the larger American cities. He was noted for his advanced musical views and for the polish of his interpretations of classical as well as modern masterpieces.

Washington
D. C.
Post
ISSUE OF
JAN 26 1922 L

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance here this season on Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30, under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux. The concert will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

BROOKLYN EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

Boston Symphony.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made the following change in the program for the Saturday matinee concert in Carnegie Hall:

Ravel's "La Valse" is to be omitted and Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht," arranged by the composer for string orchestra from his early string sextet, will be substituted for it. This number was played at a Thursday evening concert earlier in the season.

BROOKLYN EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony will make its penultimate appearance of the season here when it plays in the Academy Friday evening of this week. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the organization, who will be heard in the concerto of Saint-Saens for 'cello and orchestra. Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to begin the program, and will follow the concerto with two of Debussy's nocturnes and two Slavonic Dances of Dvorak.

TIMES 192
NEW YORK CITY

Music Notes Afield.

At the funeral of Arthur Nikisch the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he was formerly conductor, will present a wreath. At the concerts in Boston last week Wagner's Funeral March was added to the program in his memory. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor.

Sixteen of the musicians who played under his baton are still members of the orchestra. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, has served in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

A tour of this country by Artur Nikisch had been arranged for next season, and it is said that applications for his services as "guest conductor" had been received from nearly every orchestra in the United States. There had also been requests for concerts at which he would accompany some noted singer on the piano.

FROM JAN 29 1922 L
HERALD,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a single concert this season in Washington, at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30 o'clock. Pierr Monteux has compiled for this occasion a program of splendid beauty and engrossing interest. The concert will be under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Washington
D. C.
Post
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 L

Coming Concerts

The Boston Symphony orchestra's only concert this season in Washington will be given in the New National theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Pierre Monteux has compiled for this occasion a program headed by Tschaikowsky's great Fourth Symphony in F minor, which vies in popularity with his "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and is considered by many its superior. Monteux will also present Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and the modern French school of music will be represented by Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes." The program will close with Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." The concert is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

From JAN 29 1922 S
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Baltimore Concert

Well-Known Organization Will Appear at Lyric Wednesday—Other Musical News.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA has prepared a program for its concert at the Lyric next Wednesday that covers a wide variety. This is the only visit here this season, although Mrs. Kato Wilson-Greene, who has brought the famous organization back to Baltimore, hopes to sign up five dates for next year in connection with five visits to Washington for which the music lovers there have expressed a decided demand. The present Southern swing of the orchestra will include Richmond, Va., where an auditorium of 3500 seats has been sold out, and Washington, where one concert has been found far below the demand.

Pierre Monteux has announced the following program for Baltimore:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.—Andante sostenuto, Andantino in modo di eanzona, Scherzo, Pizzicato ostinato, Allegro; Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

D'Indy — Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42.

Casella—Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)." Choreographic Comedy—Ronde d'Enfants (Act I.), Barcarolle, Sarabande (Act II.), A Voice: Laura Littlefield, soprano, Pas des Vielles Dames (Act I.), Nocturne, Danse Finale Act I.).

Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.—Alborada, Variations, Alborada, Scene and Gypsy Song, Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)

SUN, JAN 29 1922 S
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteaux, will present a program of wide musical interest on Wednesday night at the Lyric, when this organization will make its only appearance here this season. The program will be as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Symphonic Variations ("Istar") Op. 42, d'Indy

Orchestra Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)" Choreographic Comedy.........Casella
a. Ronde d'Enfants (Act I).
b. Barcarolle; Sarabande (Act II).
A Voice: Laura Littlefield, soprano.
c. Pas des Vieilles Dames (Act I).
d. Nocturne; Danse Finale (Act I).

Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.... Rimsky-Korsakoff
1. Alborada.
2. Variations.
3. Alborada.
4. Scene and Gypsy Song.
5. Fandango of the Asturias.

The principal number, the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, is ranked by many as superior to the "Pathetic" and indeed as the Russian master's finest work. This symphony, with its theme of Fate given forth by the brass at the beginning and end, with its songful slow movement and effective scherzo, in which the string orchestra plays pizzicato throughout, never once using the bows, has become an enduring favorite with musicians the world over.

The novelty on this program will be the suite from "Le Convent sur Feau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the daring young Italian composer, who is now in this country on his first visit here. This music, piquant, colorful, and brilliantly orchestrated, is in four movements, in one of which, a barcarolle, the beautiful soprano part will be taken by Laura Littlefield.

The French school of music will be represented by the "Istar" Variations of Vincent d'Indy, the French composer and conducter, who has just returned from a visit to this country; and the final number, the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most highly favored of the many gorgeous works by this composer of the more recent Russian school.

From JAN 29 1922 S
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

With Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteaux, the director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct that organization Wednesday evening at the Lyric at the only concert to be given in Baltimore.

From JAN 29 1922
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BEDETTI WITH THE BOSTON.

Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert, but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy next Friday evening, February 3. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Bethoven's mighty symphony in A Major, No. 7. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals).

Saint-Saëns, the famous French composer who died last month, will be represented by his violincello concerto which Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

BALTIMORE
MD.
News
ISSUE OF
JAN 25 1922 M

ARTHUR NIKISCH DEAD; WAS NOTED MUSICIAN

Former Conductor Of Boston Symphony Dies In Leipzig

(By Cable to the Associated Press.)

Leipzig, Jan. 24.—Arthur Nikisch, noted orchestral conductor, died here last evening of influenza. He was formerly conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nikisch was born October 12, 1855, at Lebeny Szent Mikolas, in Hungary, where his father was head accountant for Prince Lichtenstein. His musical education was attained at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was a pupil of Hellmesberger in violin and Deskoff in composition. When he left the conservatory in 1874 he had won prizes in composition and violin playing and was engaged as violinist for the court orchestra. In 1878 he went to the Leipzig Theatre as second conductor and acquitted himself so ably in this post that he soon was placed on equal footing with Sucher and Seidl. In 1882 he was made first conductor.

When H. L. Higginson, the patron of the Boston Orchestra, found it necessary to look for a successor to William Gericke he turned to Nikisch with so flattering a proposition that the latter accepted the call and was in charge of the Boston Orchestra for four years, 1889 to 1893. In the latter year Mr. Nikisch turned to opera conducting and went to Buda-Pest as director of the orchestra and of the Royal Opera. At the end of two years he was called to Leipzig as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus Orchestra at the highest salary ever paid in Europe.

BALTIMORE
MD.
ISSUE OF
JAN 25 1922 M

NOTED MUSICIAN DEAD

Arthur Nikisch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday in Leipzig, Germany. He was known throughout Europe and America as a gifted orchestral leader. Nilsisch was at the Lyric, Baltimore, in April, 1912, as leader of the London Symphony Orchestra.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Honors Nikisch's Memory

BOSTON, January 26.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipzig of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader. Wagner's "Funeral March" has been added to the programme of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the bâton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

EAGLE JAN 26 1922 M
Brooklyn, New York

ORCHESTRA HONORS NIKISCH.

Boston, Jan. 26—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, it was made known today. Wagner's Funeral March has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

MERIDEN
CONNECTICUT
Journal
ISSUE OF
Jan 26

MEMORIAL FOR NIKISCH.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, it wah made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

[illegible]
[illegible]
JAN 19

SENT MEMORIAL WREATH

Boston, Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader, it was made known today. Wagner's Funeral March has been added to the orchestra's concert program of the orchestra's concert this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played here under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the local orchestra.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

NIKISCH AND HIS TRADITION

TO THE younger generation of Philadelphia music patrons, Arthur Nikisch is a name to be uttered with a kind of conventional awe. It is so long since the distinguished conductor, who has just died in Leipzig, mounted the concert dais in this city that his actual artistic attributes are dimmed in the pathos of distance.

He is, however, a tradition of considerable potency. When this community was in its musical nonage Nikisch presided over the destinies of the Boston Symphony, and when that once exceptional organization paid its four or five visits a year to the Academy of Music great was the esthetic satisfaction of audiences then almost ironically deemed to be of the "elect."

Today the appeal of symphonic music has been stripped of its mystery. Philadelphia itself can boast of an orchestral director ranked with the most eminent of his craft. Good music is no longer a super-cultural excrescence, but a necessity.

Nikisch, a pioneer in his American campaign, which lasted from 1889 to 1893, returned to this country only once to witness its artistic transformation. His devotion to exalted artistic principles abroad, however, was consistent and unflagging. Not even the World War deprived the Gewandhaus orchestra, under his baton, of its traditional prestige.

Nikisch was among the last survivors of the inspiring age of German musical development of the last century. He was young with Wagner's "Ring," and played with the first violins at the memorable premiere of the inextinguishable tetralogy at Bayreuth in 1876.

It is trite but true that the musical awakening succeeding that event has been unprecedented and world-wide.

Haverhill
MASS.
Gazette
ISSUE OF
Jan 26

Boston Symphony Pays a Tribute to Nikisch

BOSTON, Jan. 26.—The Boston Symphony orchestra sent a wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director who was formerly its leader, as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his services, it was made known today. Wagner's funeral march has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory. Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the orchestra.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Musicians Mourn Nikisch

Boston, Jan. 26.—(By A. P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra sent a memorial wreath to the funeral at Leipsic of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian director, who was formerly its leader. Wagner's "Funeral March" has been added to the program of the orchestra's concerts this week in his memory.

FROM JAN 26 1922 M
RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

Arthur Nikisch, a victim of influenza in Leipsic, was one of the most distinguished orchestral conductors of his time, and one well and favorably known in this country a generation ago. He was the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and by his tours of the country at that time won a host of admirers in most of the larger American cities. He was noted for his advanced musical views and for the polish of his interpretations of classical as well as modern masterpieces.

Washington
D. C.
Post
ISSUE OF
JAN 26 1922 L

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance here this season on Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30, under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux. The concert will be given under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

BROOKLYN EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

Boston Symphony.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made the following change in the program for the Saturday matinee concert in Carnegie Hall:

Ravel's "La Valse" is to be omitted and Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht," arranged by the composer for string orchestra from his early string sextet, will be substituted for it. This number was played at a Thursday evening concert earlier in the season.

BROOKLYN EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony will make its penultimate appearance of the season here when it plays in the Academy Friday evening of this week. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the organization, who will be heard in the concerto of Saint-Saens for 'cello and orchestra. Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Seventh Symphony to begin the program, and will follow the concerto with two of Debussy's nocturnes and two Slavonic Dances of Dvorak.

TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Music Notes Afield.

At the funeral of Arthur Nikisch the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he was formerly conductor, will present a wreath. At the concerts in Boston last week Wagner's Funeral March was added to the program in his memory. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor.

Sixteen of the musicians who played under his baton are still members of the orchestra. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, has served in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

A tour of this country by Artur Nikisch had been arranged for next season, and it is said that applications for his services as "guest conductor" had been received from nearly every orchestra in the United States. There had also been requests for concerts at which he would accompany some noted singer on the piano.

FROM JAN 29 1922 L M
HERALD,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a single concert this season in Washington, at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30 o'clock. Pierre Monteux has compiled for this occasion a program of splendid beauty and engrossing interest. The concert will be under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

Washington
D. C.
Post
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 L M

Coming Concerts

The Boston Symphony orchestra's only concert this season in Washington will be given in the New National theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. Pierre Monteux has compiled for this occasion a program headed by Tschaikowsky's great Fourth Symphony in F minor, which vies in popularity with his "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and is considered by many its superior. Monteux will also present Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and the modern French school of music will be represented by Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes." The program will close with Wagner's overture to "Rienzi." The concert is under the local management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

From JAN 29 1922
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Baltimore Concert

Well-Known Organization Will Appear at Lyric Wednesday—Other Musical News.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA has prepared a program for its concert at the Lyric next Wednesday that covers a wide variety. This is the only visit here this season, although Mrs. Kato Wilson-Greene, who has brought the famous organization back to Baltimore, hopes to sign up five dates for next year in connection with five visits to Washington for which the music lovers there have expressed a decided demand. The present Southern swing of the orchestra will include Richmond, Va., where an auditorium of 3500 seats has been sold out, and Washington, where one concert has been found far below the demand.

Pierre Monteux has announced the following program for Baltimore:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.—Andante sostenuto, Andantino in modo di canzona, Scherzo, Pizzicato ostinato, Allegro; Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

D'Indy — Symphonic Variations, "Istar," Op. 42.

Casella—Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)." Choreographic Comedy—Ronde d'Enfants (Act I.), Barcarolle, Sarabande (Act II.), A Voice: Laura Littlefield, soprano, Pas des Vielles Dames (Act I.), Nocturne, Danse Finale Act I.).

Rimsky-Korsakoff—Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.—Alborada, Variations, Alborada, Scene and Gypsy Song, Fandango of the Asturias. (Played without pause.)

SUN, JAN 29 1922
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Pierre Monteaux, will present a program of wide musical interest on Wednesday night at the Lyric, when this organization will make its only appearance here this season. The program will be as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.... Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Symphonic Variations ("Istar") Op. 42, d'Indy

Orchestra Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)" Choreographic Comedy..........Casella
a. Ronde d'Enfants (Act I).
b. Barcarolle; Sarabande (Act II). A Voice: Laura Littlefield, soprano.
c. Pas des Vieilles Dames (Act I).
d. Nocturne; Danse Finale (Act I).

Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34.... Rimsky-Korsakoff
1. Alborada.
2. Variations.
3. Alborada.
4. Scene and Gypsy Song.
5. Fandango of the Asturias.

The principal number, the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, is ranked by many as superior to the "Pathetic" and indeed as the Russian master's finest work. This symphony, with its theme of Fate given forth by the brass at the beginning and end, with its songful slow movement and effective scherzo, in which the string orchestra plays pizzicato throughout, never once using the bows, has become an enduring favorite with musicians the world over.

The novelty on this program will be the suite from "Le Convent sur Feau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the daring young Italian composer, who is now in this country on his first visit here. This music, piquant, colorful, and brilliantly orchestrated, is in four movements, in one of which, a barcarolle, the beautiful soprano part will be taken by Laura Littlefield.

The French school of music will be represented by the "Istar" Variations of Vincent d'Indy, the French composer and conducter, who has just returned from a visit to this country; and the final number, the "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, is one of the most highly favored of the many gorgeous works by this composer of the more recent Russian school.

From JAN 29 1922
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

With Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteaux, the director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct that organization Wednesday evening at the Lyric at the only concert to be given in Baltimore.

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BEDETTI WITH THE BOSTON.

Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert, but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy next Friday evening, February 3. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Bethoven's mighty symphony in A Major, No. 7. The other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals).

Saint-Saens, the famous French composer who died last month, will be represented by his violincello concerto which Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

[63]

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED
JAN 29 1922
FROM
WORLD,
New York City.

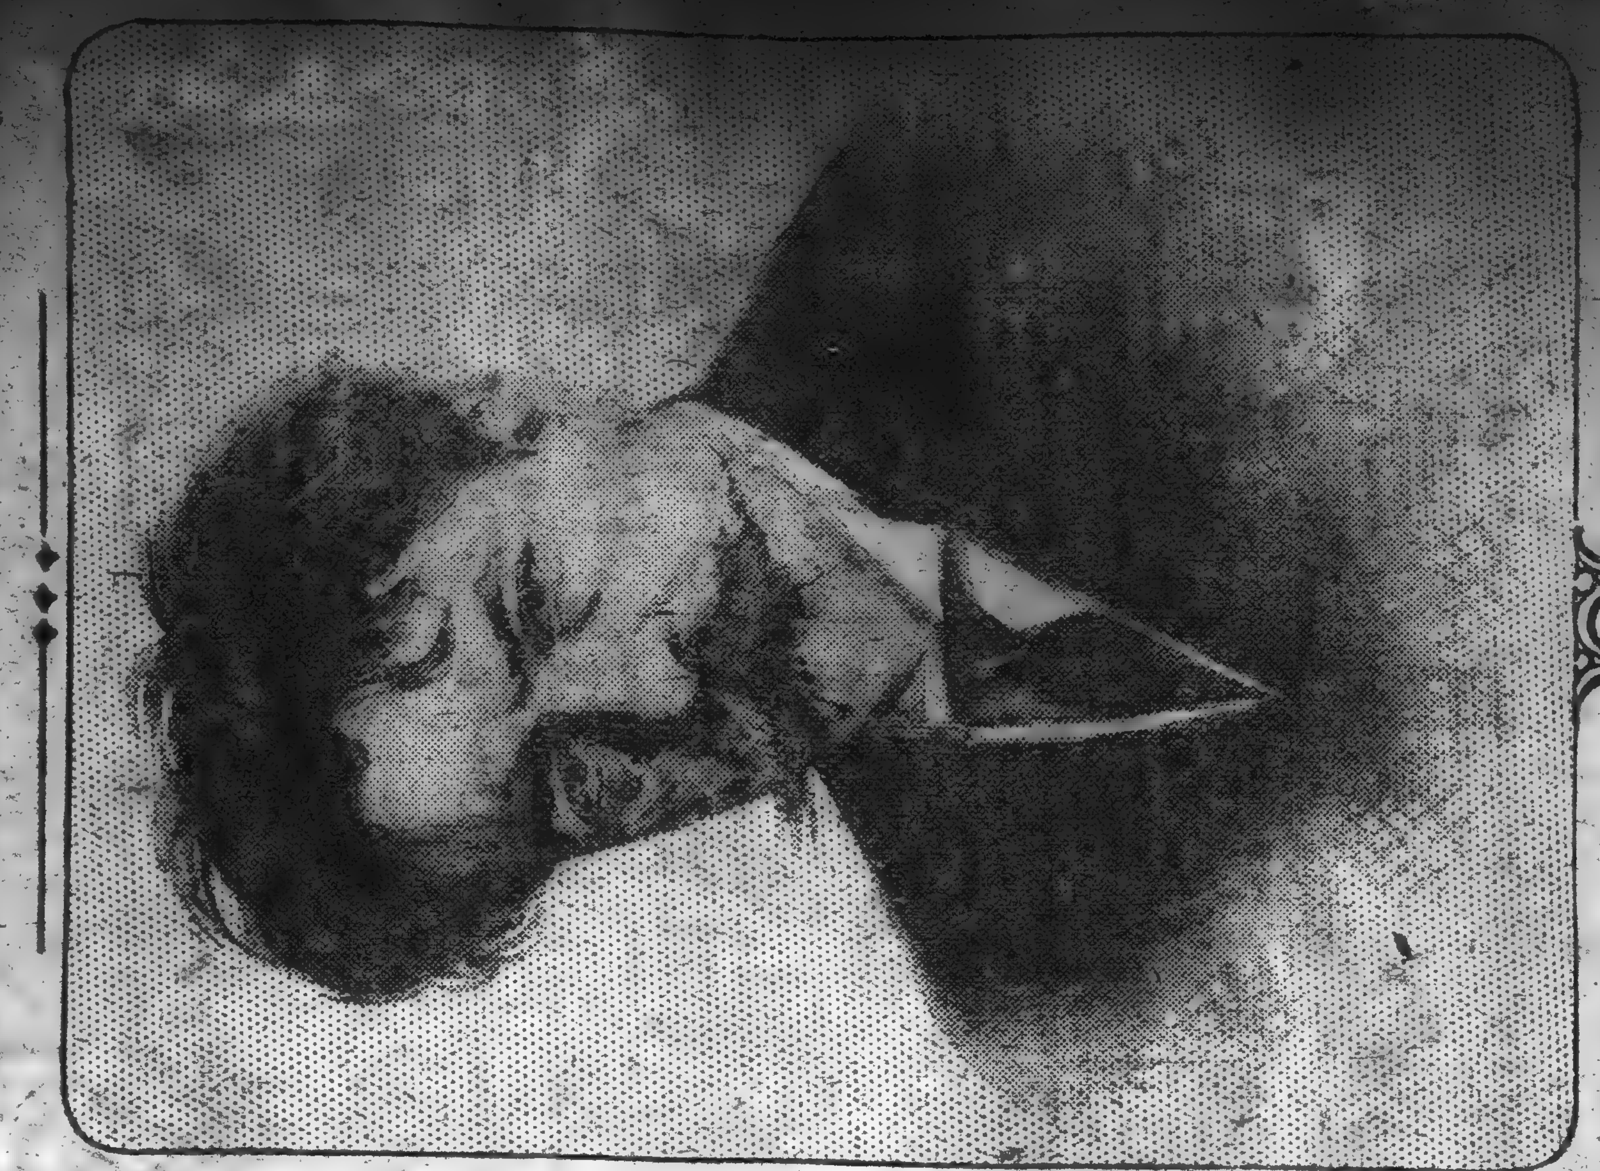
SATURDAY afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, will play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar," and Svendson's episode "The Carnival in Paris."

FROM JAN 29 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr with Pierre Monteux conducting, o Thursday evening at Carnegie Ha will play Szymanowski's second sym phony for the first time in America a symphonic piece from Cesa Franck's "Redemption," a suite b Alfredo Casella—"Le couvent su l'eau"—in which the solo voice par in one of the movements will be sun by Laura Littlefield, soprano; a Weber's "Oberon" overture

WORLD, JAN 29 1922
New York City.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Commemorates Artur Nikisch



PORTRAIT OF ARTUR NIKISCH, by JOHN PHILIPP HOWLON EXHIBITION AT GALLERIES OF MRS. ALBERT STERNER.

Will Play Wagner's "Funeral March" at Boston Concerts in His Memory.

Artur Nikisch, the great conductor who died at Leipzig last Monday, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and in commemoration of his distinguished services the orchestra will add Wagner's "Funeral March" to the programmes of its concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of this week. A wreath will also be presented at the funeral in Leipzig.

Milton Diamond, a New York concert director, announces that the late Dr. Nikisch was about to come to the United States to conduct a series of four orchestral concerts in New York and in the large cities of the East, and although no announcement of plans had yet been made, applications for subscriptions for any proposed concerts had already accumulated. Moreover, practically every orchestra in the United States [illegible] vited Dr. Nikisch to be guest conductor.

FROM FEB 1 1922
HERALD,

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF Journal
Jan 29

young folks.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was a magnet that drew many to Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, and its offerings were as enthusiastically received as is the custom at all its appearances here. To add to the enjoyment of the programme, which peculiarly did not include a single symphony, Bronislaw Huberman, the violinist, made his initial bow to Providence audiences and received a tribute of spontaneous applause in recognition of the unconventional interpretations which he gave his selections.

59

FROM JAN 29 1922 F
WORLD, Bklyn
New York City.

BEDETTI AT THE ACADEMY.

Pierre Monteux Will Give Beethoven's Symphony.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the concert to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will give Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7, which has been characterized by Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance," and by d'Indy as a second "pastoral" symphony.

Other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), which are considered to have no finer interpreter in this country than M. Monteux, who was a close friend of the late composer and received at first hand the authentic interpretation of his scores. The concert will close with two Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Saint-Saens, the French composer, who died last month, will be represented by his violoncello concerto, which Mr. Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

The programs for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday—Szymanowski (first time in New York), Symphony No. 2; Franck, symphonic piece from the symphonic poem "La Redemption"; Casella, orchestral excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)," choreographic comedy; Ronde d'Enfante (Act 1), Barcarolle; Sarabande (Act 2); a voice, Laura Littlefield, soprano; Pas des Vieilles Dames (Act 1); Nocturne; Danse Finale (Act 1); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Saturday—Beethoven, Symphony No. 7; Schoenberg, "Verklaerte Nacht," for string orchestra; d'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar"; Svendsen, "The Carnival in Paris," episode for full orchestra, opus 9.

At the funeral of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian conductor, whose death occurred in Liepsic on Monday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a wreath as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor. At the concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week Wagner's Funeral March was added to the program in his memory. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, and holding this post during the seasons 1889 to 1893. When he first came to the orchestra [illegible] heard the ensemble which Gericke had trained to so remarkable a degree of perfection, Nikisch is credibly reported to have said, "All I have to do is to poetize."

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as follows: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffmann, W. Krafft, R. Kurth, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and E. Zahn, viola; A. Schroeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horn; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

NEW YORK HERALD
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

With orchestra concerts, however, something can be done if one does not bestow too much attention to the music. For there is always the conductor. One of the greatest the musical world has ever known passed away a few days ago. The years during which Arthur Nikisch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra were among the very brightest that famous organization ever knew. He was a conductor who combined the classic and romantic elements in almost perfect balance. His readings of the old masterpieces were invariably noble in style and warm in feeling. There was almost no exaggeration in anything he did. He seemed to be able to throw every composition in front of himself as a beautiful and everchanging screen of emotional color. He never stood in front of the music revealing himself as the creative interpreter for whose glorification the art work had been made and who alone could breathe into it the breath of life.

Boston Orchestra's Playing.

As a technician he had no superior. He brought the mechanical features of the Boston Orchestra's playing to such a high degree of precision and finish that even if he himself had lacked imagination the sheer excellence of the technical performances would have been a never ending delight. Even this is not to be despised, for too many conductors in their eagerness to develop a brilliant reading injure the technical performance. They sometimes cause the brass to overblow. Sometimes they ask too large a forte of a clarinet or an oboe and thereby spoil the mellowness of its tone. And they often split the ears of their audiences with the dangerous blows of the sticks on the tympani heads.

Mr. Nikisch knew how to attain his ends without injury to the technical excellence of his orchestra. When he last visited this country he came as the conductor of an inferior organization, from which neither he nor any other wizard of the baton could have drawn a pure, transparent tone. But he succeeded in compelling those musicians to present to the audience the dynamic gradations, the phrasing, the subtle changes of tempo and the nicely adjusted balance of parts which he saw to be essential to his interpretations.

Doubtless the younger generation of concert goers, which never heard performances under Mr. Nikisch, will be satisfied with those which they do hear and the world of music will continue to be alive and interesting, even though he is removed from it. But it has suffered a great loss.

[64]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE
MD.
Mer
ISSUE OF

It will be very agreeable to welcome the Boston Symphony back to Baltimore, for its concerts have been much missed since it decided to eliminate this city from its regular itineray. The coming concert was arranged by Mrs. Wilson-Greene as one of a course of musical engagements.

Pierre Monteux continues the conductor of the Boston Symphony, which, according to reports, is maintaining its old-time standards of excellence.

The program will comprise Cassella's "Couvent sur l'Eau," which is a novelty with a part of soprano; Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, d'Indy's more or less familiar "Istar" variations and Rimsky's Caprice on Spanish themes. Laura Littlefield, soprano, will make her local debut as soloist at this concert.

FROM JAN 30 1922 M
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

ON Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will play at the Lyric. This concert is one of the Wilson-Greene Philharmonic Course. The program will include the beautiful Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, the one in F minor, Op. 36; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar" and the now-popular orchestral excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" (Il Convento Veneziano), which is a "choreographic" comedy and in which the "voice" part will be sung by Laura Littlefield, soprano. The concert will close with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Op. 34, its five numbers being played without pause.

SUN
ALTIMORE, THURSDA

Monteux Brings Boston Symphony To High Standard

Makes Marked Success At Only Appearance Of Season In Baltimore And Is Warmly Received.

When Pierre Monteux inherited the wreck which remained of the old Boston Orchestra after the hasty departure of Karl Muck for Central Europe, he set about methodically to rebuild it, not on the Muck pattern but after the French design. For two years he sailed a stormy sea; in fact, most of this season's tours were canceled and last night's performance at the Lyric was Baltimore's only opportunity to observe the miracle which M. Monteux has worked.

Automatically one compares the strings with those of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and here certainly the rebuilt Boston Orchestra fails to measure up. This, however, is true of every other orchestra that attempts a joust with Stokowski's perfect strings. But the woodwinds will rank with Philadelphia's and the brass choir is miles ahead. So excellent is this latter group of the orchestra that it can properly be rated at the head of the list, a striking demonstration of M. Monteux's efficiency at building up that branch wherein every Frenchmon strives to excel and over which, for some reason, other schools fail to show great concern. The result is a warmth, a color and a tonal volume which make possible effects which not even Stokowski can attain.

The program was well devised to bring out this peculiar excellence, for the symphony was Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor. It moved smoothly through the andante movements and a faultless scherzo, pizzicato, to the full-toned allegro in which the director carried his players at a superb dash into the magnificent harmonies which form the finale. This was quite the biggest feat of the program.

The colorful but rather abstruse "Istar" of d'Indy was succeeded by excerpts from the rarely heard "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," of Casella, a charming series of graphic dance music, ranging from a child's round to the humorous, rheumatic "Dance of the Old Ladies" and containing a luscious barcarolle for soprano. It is interesting to note that Casella dedicated this work to M. Monteux, who was, at that time, conducting in Paris.

Further variety was afforded by Rimsky-Korsakov's rich Caprice on Spanish themes, concluding with the familiar fandango often heard as a separate piece. Here again was a noble opportunity for the brasses, cordially accepted by that choir and brilliantly executed.

On the basis of last night's performance, before a rather small but unusually responsive audience, it would appear that the Boston Orchestra is, artistically at least, once more on safe ground, thanks to the extraordinary work of its new conductor.

M. S. W.

From JAN 31 1922 H
TELEGRAM
New York City

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given.

At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will make known to New York Karol Szymanovski's second symphony in B flat. The remainder of the programme will consist of Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," the suite by Alfredo Casella, from "Le Couvent sur l'eau" (The Convent on the Water), in which the solo voice in the Barcarolle will be taken by Laura Littlefield, soprano. This work is dedicated to Mr. Morteux, and was first produced at the "Monteux Concerts" in Paris. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Oberon."

The symphony to be played at the Saturday matinee will be the seventh of Beethoven.

POST
s: Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 1922

Among those who attended the concert yesterday afternoon, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, were Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. Herbert Hoover, the Chinese Minister and Mme. Sze, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. W. J. Boardman, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. B. B. Jones, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Ridgley Hunt, Mrs. Edwin J. Stellwagen, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Angus McLean, Mrs. Ralph H. Cameron, Mrs. Willard H. Brownson, Mrs. J. A. Van Orsdel, Mrs. E. B. Grandin, Mrs. C. C. Calhoun, Mrs. Charles L. Hussey, Mrs. John Joy Edson, Rear Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Mrs. Delos A. Blodgett, Mrs. Stewart Farrar Smith, Mrs. A. Sanderson, Mrs. H. A. Robbins, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Dr. Ward Denys, Mrs. Robert L. Owens, Mrs. George Hope, Mrs. George Vanderbilt, Mrs. W. L. Crounse, Mrs. H. C. Wade, Mrs. Ridley McLean, Mrs. W. K. Van Reypen, Mrs. Harry C. Woodyard, Mrs. Joseph Fairbanks, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Miss Isabelle Wells, Miss Sara Latimer, Mrs. Frederick A.

FROM FEB 1 1922
HERALD,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SHOWS WORK OF MASTER

Concert at National One Of Season's Best Performances.

PROGRAM.

Tchaikovsky..........Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Svendsen, "The Carnival in Paris," Episode for Full Orchestra, Op. 9
Debussy..........Two Nocturnes
I. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Wagner..........Overture to "Rienzi"

Pierre Monteux has done good work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this last year. The ensemble is excellent, where there were occasional ragged edges; there is a breadth and color in tone and an intelligence in phrasing that is worthy of America's oldest symphony Orchestra.

Their 134th Appearance.

Their concert yesterday afternoon at the National was their one hundred and thirty-fourth appearance here and their program one of the most delightful they have ever given. Tschiakowsky's Symphony in F minor is one of the most beautiful of all that appear on concert programs, and the orchestra did it full justice—the organ effects and fine work for the clarionets of the Andante; the lovely bits for violas, cellos and then all the strings of the Andantino; the Pizzicato of the third movement, beautifully phrased and exquisitely played, and the big finale all made it one of the brilliant performances of the season.

Effects in Tone Shading.

Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" is one of those modern tone paintings so popular with the latest composers and is a melange of street sounds, cathedral singing and the beauty that pervades everything, even carnivals. M. Monteux gets his effects in two ways by the usual shading of tone, and by emphasizing instruments in groups, most convincingly.

The Debussy Nocturnes were beautiful as Debussy is beautiful—hauntingly rebelliously, with flashes of surpassing loveliness, that die before one has quite grasped them.

Once Wagner was almost mobbed for being extreme. There are passages in his popular Rienzi Overture that sound old-fashioned today! Oh, we shall come to Schonberg in time. The audience expressed its warm appreciation of the orchestra's fine program with many recalls.

F. H.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED [illegible]
FROM JAN 29 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

SATURDAY afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, will play Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," d'Indy's symphonic variations "Istar," and Svendson's episode "The Carnival in Paris."

FROM JAN 29 192
WORLD,
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr with Pierre Monteux conducting, o Thursday evening at Carnegie Ha will play Szymanowski's second sym phony for the first time in America a symphonic piece from Cesa Franck's "Redemption," a suite b Alfredo Casella—"Le couvent su l'eau"—in which the solo voice par in one of the movements will be sun by Laura Littlefield, soprano; ar Weber's "Oberon" overture.

WORLD, JAN 31 19
New York City.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
Journal
[illegible]

young folks.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was a magnet that drew many to Infantry Hall on Tuesday night, and its offerings were as enthusiastically received as is the custom at all its appearances here. To add to the enjoyment of the programme, which peculiarly did not include 59 a single symphony, Bronislaw Huberman, the violinist, made his initial bow to Providence audiences and received a tribute of spontaneous applause in recognition of the unconventional interpretations which he gave his selections.

FROM JAN 29 1922 F
WORLD, Bklyn
New York City.

BEDETTI AT THE ACADEMY.

Pierre Monteux Will Give Beethoven's Symphony.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the concert to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will give Beethoven's symphony in A major, No. 7, which has been characterized by Wagner as the "apotheosis of the dance," and by d'Indy as a second "pastoral" symphony.

Other orchestral numbers will be Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), which are considered to have no finer interpreter in this country than M. Monteux, who was a close friend of the late composer and received at first hand the authentic interpretation of his scores. The concert will close with two Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

Saint-Saens, the French composer, who died last month, will be represented by his violoncello concerto, which Mr. Bedetti is to play with the orchestra.

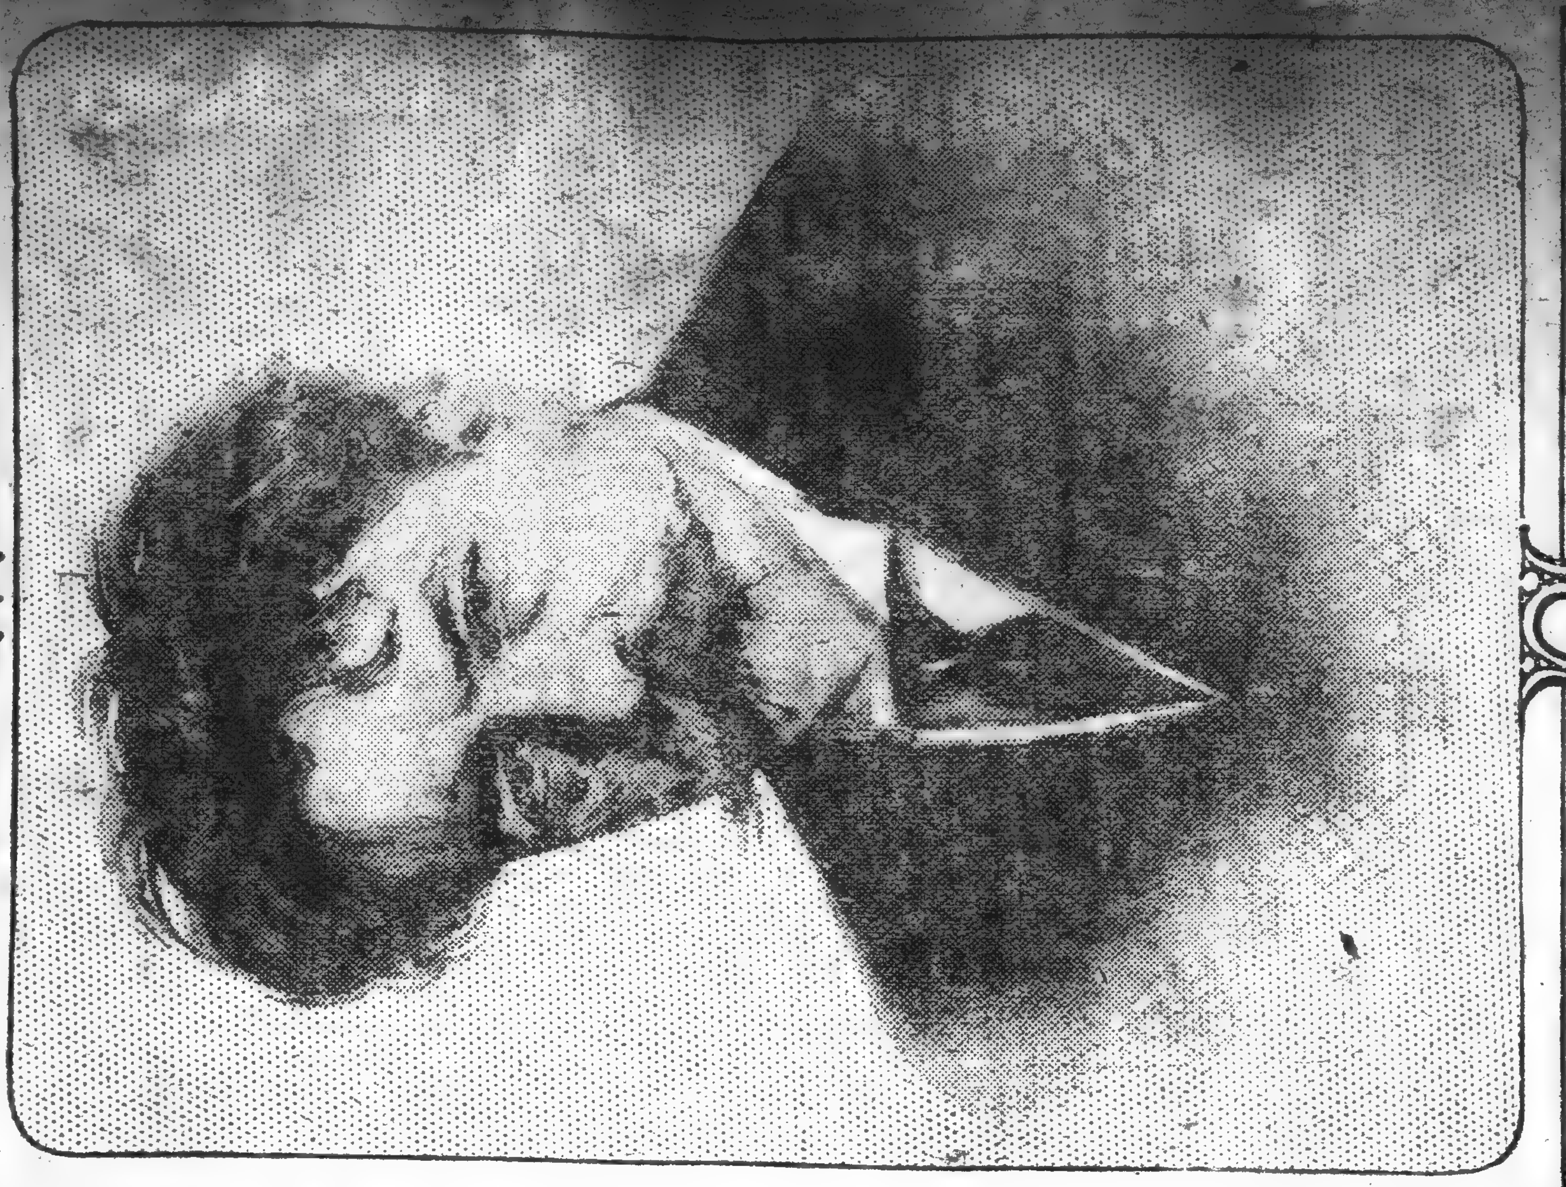
NEW YORK HERALD
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

The programs for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday—Szymanowski (first time in New York), Symphony No. 2; Franck, symphonic piece from the symphonic poem "La Redemption"; Casella, orchestral excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau (Il Convento Veneziano)," choreographic comedy; Ronde d'Enfante (Act 1), Barcarolle; Sarabande (Act 2); a voice, Laura Littlefield, soprano; Passes Vieilles Dames (Act 1); Nocturne; Danse Finale (Act 1); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Saturday—Beethoven, Symphony No. 7; Schoenberg, "Verklaerte Nacht," for string orchestra; d'Indy, symphonic variations, "Istar"; Svendsen, "The Carnival in Paris," episode for full orchestra, opus 9.

At the funeral of Arthur Nikisch, the Hungarian conductor, whose death occurred in Liepsic on Monday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a wreath as a tribute to his genius and in gratitude for his distinguished services as its former conductor. At the concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of last week Wagner's Funeral March was added to the program in his memory. Of those who have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Nikisch was the first to die. He was its third conductor, following Georg Henschel and Wilhelm Gericke, and holding this post during the seasons 1889 to 1893. When he first came to the orchestra and heard the ensemble which Gericke had trained to so remarkable a degree of perfection, Nikisch is credibly reported to have said, "All I have to do is to poetize."

Sixteen of the musicians who played under the baton of Nikisch are still members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as follows: H. Berger, S. Goldstein, J. Hoffmann, W. Krafft, R. Kurth, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, violins; M. Kluge and F. Zahn, viola; A. Schroeder, violoncello; G. Gerhardt, bass; F. Mueller, English horn; F. Hain and H. Lorbeer, French horn; J. Mann, trumpet; C. Hampe, trombone. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, has served many times in the same capacity under Nikisch in Europe.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Commemorates Artur Nikisch



PORTRAIT OF ARTUR NIKISCH, by JOHN PHILIPP NOW ON EXHIBITION AT GALLERIES OF MRS. ALBERT STERNER.

FROM FEB 1 1922
HERALD,

Will Play Wagner's "Funeral March" at Boston Concerts in His Memory.

Artur Nikisch, the great conductor who died at Leipzig last Monday, was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1889 to 1893, and in commemoration of his distinguished services the orchestra will add Wagner's "Funeral March" to the programmes of its concerts in Boston on Friday and Saturday of this week. A wreath will also be presented at the funeral in Leipzig.

Milton Diamond, a New York concert director, announces that the late Dr. Nikisch was about to come to the United States to conduct a series of four orchestral concerts in New York and in the large cities of the East, and although no announcement of plans had yet been made, applications for subscriptions for any proposed concerts had already accumulated. Moreover, practically every orchestra in the United States had invited Dr. Nikisch to be guest conductor.

NEW YORK HERALD
ISSUE OF
JAN 29 1922 M

With orchestra concerts, however, something can be done if one does not bestow too much attention to the music. For there is always the conductor. One of the greatest the musical world has ever known passed away a few days ago. The years during which Arthur Nikisch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra were among the very brightest that famous organization ever knew. He was a conductor who combined the classic and romantic elements in almost perfect balance. His readings of the old masterpieces were invariably noble in style and warm in feeling. There was almost no exaggeration in anything he did. He seemed to be able to throw every composition in front of himself as a beautiful and everchanging screen of emotional color. He never stood in front of the music revealing himself as the creative interpreter for whose glorification the art work had been made and who alone could breathe into it the breath of life.

Boston Orchestra's Playing.

As a technician he had no superior. He brought the mechanical features of the Boston Orchestra's playing to such a high degree of precision and finish that even if he himself had lacked imagination the sheer excellence of the technical performances would have been a never ending delight. Even this is not to be despised, for too many conductors in their eagerness to develop a brilliant reading injure the technical performance. They sometimes cause the brass to overblow. Sometimes they ask too large a forte of a clarinet or an oboe and thereby spoil the mellowness of its tone. And they often split the ears of their audiences with the dangerous blows of the sticks on the tympani heads.

Mr. Nikisch knew how to attain his ends without injury to the technical excellence of his orchestra. When he last visited this country he came as the conductor of an inferior organization, from which neither he nor any other wizard of the baton could have drawn a pure, transparent tone. But he succeeded in compelling those musicians to present to the audience the dynamic gradations, the phrasing, the subtle changes of tempo and the nicely adjusted balance of parts which he saw to be essential to his interpretations.

Doubtless the younger generation of concert goers, which never heard performances under Mr. Nikisch, will be satisfied with those which they do hear and the world of music will continue to be alive and interesting, even though he is removed from it. But it has suffered a great loss.

[64]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE
MD.
News
ISSUE OF

It will be very agreeable to welcome the Boston Symphony back to Baltimore, for its concerts have been much missed since it decided to eliminate this city from its regular itineray. The coming concert was arranged by Mrs. Wilson-Greene as one of a course of musical engagements.

Pierre Monteux continues the conductor of the Boston Symphony, which, according to reports, is maintaining its old-time standards of excellence.

The program will comprise Cassella's "Couvent sur l'Eau," which is a novelty with a part of soprano; Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, d'Indy's more or less familiar "Istar" variations and Rimsky's Caprice on Spanish themes. Laura Littlefield, soprano, will make her local debut as soloist at this concert.

FROM JAN 30 192 M
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

ON Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will play at the Lyric. This concert is one of the Wilson-Greene Philharmonic Course. The program will include the beautiful Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, the one in F minor, Op. 36; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar" and the now-popular orchestral excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" (Il Convento Veneziano), which is a "choreographic" comedy and in which the "voice" part will be sung by Laura Littlefield, soprano. The concert will close with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Op. 34, its five numbers being played without pause.

LTIMORE, THURSDA

Monteux Brings Boston Symphony To High Standard

Makes Marked Success At Only Appearance Of Season In Baltimore And Is Warmly Received.

When Pierre Monteux inherited the wreck which remained of the old Boston Orchestra after the hasty departure of Karl Muck for Central Europe, he set about methodically to rebuild it, not on the Muck pattern but after the French design. For two years he sailed a stormy sea; in fact, most of this season's tours were canceled and last night's performance at the Lyric was Baltimore's only opportunity to observe the miracle which M. Monteux has worked.

Automatically one compares the strings with those of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and here certainly the rebuilt Boston Orchestra fails to measure up. This, however, is true of every other orchestra that attempts a joust with Stokowski's perfect strings. But the woodwinds will rank with Philadelphia's and the brass choir is miles ahead. So excellent is this latter group of the orchestra that it can properly be rated at the head of the list, a striking demonstration of M. Monteux's efficiency at building up that branch wherein every Frenchmon strives to excel and over which, for some reason, other schools fail to show great concern. The result is a warmth, a color and a tonal volume which make possible effects which not even Stokowski can attain.

The program was well devised to bring out this peculiar excellence, for the symphony was Tschaikowsky's Fourth in F minor. It moved smoothly through the andante movements and a faultless scherzo, pizzicato, to the full-toned allegro in which the director carried his players at a superb dash into the magnificent harmonies which form the finale. This was quite the biggest feat of the program.

The colorful but rather abstruse "Istar" of d'Indy was succeeded by excerpts from the rarely heard "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," of Casella, a charming series of graphic dance music, ranging from a child's round to the humorous, rheumatic "Dance of the Old Ladies" and containing a luscious barcarolle for soprano. It is interesting to note that Casella dedicated this work to M. Monteux, who was, at that time, conducting in Paris.

Further variety was afforded by Rimsky-Korsakov's rich Caprice on Spanish themes, concluding with the familiar fandango often heard as a separate piece. Here again was a noble opportunity for the brasses, cordially accepted by that choir and brilliantly executed.

On the basis of last night's performance, before a rather small but unusually responsive audience, it would appear that the Boston Orchestra is, artistically at least, once more on safe ground, thanks to the extraordinary work of its new conductor. M. S. W.

From JAN 31 1922 H
TELEGRAM
New York City

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall the last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season will be given.

At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will make known to New York Karol Szymanovski's second symphony in B flat. The remainder of the programme will consist of Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," the suite by Alfredo Casella, from "Le Couvent sur l'eau" (The Convent on the Water), in which the solo voice in the Barcarolle will be taken by Laura Littlefield, soprano. This work is dedicated to Mr. Morteux, and was first produced at the "Monteux Concerts" in Paris. The closing number will be Weber's overture to "Oberon."

The symphony to be played at the Saturday matinee will be the seventh of Beethoven.

POST
s: Washington, D. C.
FEB 1 1922

Among those who attended the concert yesterday afternoon, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, were Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. Herbert Hoover, the Chinese Minister and Mme. Sze, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. W. J. Boardman, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. B. B. Jones, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Ridgley Hunt, Mrs. Edwin J. Stellwagen, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann, Mrs. Angus McLean, Mrs. Ralph H. Cameron, Mrs. Willard H. Brownson, Mrs. J. A. Van Orsdel, Mrs. E. B. Grandin, Mrs. C. C. Calhoun, Mrs. Charles L. Hussey, Mrs. John Joy Edson, Rear Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Mrs. Delos A. Blodgett, Mrs. Stewart Farrar Smith, Mrs. A. Sanderson, Mrs. H. A. Robbins, Mrs. William A. Hammond, Mrs. Gibson Fahnestock, Dr. Ward Denys, Mrs. Robert L. Owens, Mrs. George Hope, Mrs. George Vanderbilt, Mrs. W. L. Crounse, Mrs. H. C. Wade, Mrs. Ridley McLean, Mrs. W. X. Van Reypen, Mrs. Harry C. Woodyard, Mrs. Joseph Fairbanks, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Miss Isabelle Wells, Miss Sara Latimer, Mrs. Frederick A.

FROM FEB 1 1922
HERALD,
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SHOWS WORK OF MASTER

Concert at National One Of Season's Best Performances.

PROGRAM.

Tchaikovsky..........Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
1. Andante sostenuto.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Svendsen, "The Carnival in Paris," Episode for Full Orchestra, Op. 9
Debussy......................Two Nocturnes
1. Nuages.
II. Fetes.
Wagner...............Overture to "Rienzi"

Pierre Monteux has done good work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this last year. The ensemble is excellent, where there were occasional ragged edges; there is a breadth and color in tone and an intelligence in phrasing that is worthy of America's oldest symphony Orchestra.

Their 134th Appearance.

Their concert yesterday afternoon at the National was their one hundred and thirty-fourth appearance here and their program one of the most delightful they have ever given. Tschiakowsky's Symphony in F minor is one of the most beautiful of all that appear on concert programs, and the orchestra did it full justice—the organ effects and fine work for the clarionets of the Andante; the lovely bits for violas, cellos and then all the strings of the Andantino; the Pizzicato of the third movement, beautifully phrased and exquisitely played, and the big finale all made it one of the brilliant performances of the season.

Effects in Tone Shading.

Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" is one of those modern tone paintings so popular with the latest composers and is a melange of street sounds, cathedral singing and the beauty that pervades everything, even carnivals. M. Monteux gets his effects in two ways by the usual shading of tone, and by emphasizing instruments in groups, most convincingly.

The Debussy Nocturnes were beautiful as Debussy is beautiful—hauntingly rebelliously, with flashes of surpassing loveliness, that die before one has quite grasped them.

Once Wagner was almost mobbed for being extreme. There are passages in his popular Rienzi Overture that sound old-fashioned today! Oh, we shall come to Schonberg in time. The audience expressed its warm appreciation of the orchestra's fine program with many recalls.

F. H.

FROM FEB 1 1922 L
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An interesting audience turned out yesterday afternoon for the only concert which the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteaux, is to give in Washington this year. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, and Mrs. Hughes, wife of the Secretary of State, were guests of Mrs. William J. Boardman and Miss Mabel Boardman, who had the stage box at the National Theater for this interesting recital.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Herbert Hoover, the Chinese Minister and Mme. Sze, Mrs. Calderson Carlisle, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. B. B. Jones, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Frank A. Richardson, Col. and Mrs. William Eric Fowler, Mrs. Ridgley Hunt, Mrs. Edwin J. Stellwagen, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann.

For the first time within long recollection, at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday, a memorial piece was played without the applause that usually answers it as to any other item on the programme. Few and far separated were the hands that stirred after Siegfried's "Funeral Music" recalling and honoring the dead Nikisch. Even at this late day, so rare an incident deserves record.

TRANS. Feb. 1

Boston Symphony, Back In Old Form, Gives Fine Concert

Monterix Revives Perfection Of Orchestra—Lyric Only Partly Filled For Concert.

By RICHARD H. PRATT, 2d.

The Boston Orchestra is no longer fashionable in Baltimore and a dismay array of empty chairs greeted its performance last night at the Lyric. Yet the band is more nearly the superb instrument that played under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck in ante-bellum days than it has been since the German conductor returned to Berlin. Its improvement has been so tremendous, in fact, that it is to be regretted that this is to be the last season of Pierre Monteaux's direction.

The program last night was an especially grateful one, containing Tchaikowsky at his glamorous best; the most interesting of the orchestral works of Vincent d'Indy; a delicious bit from the Italian rebel, Casella, and a Spain-soaked suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The Tchaikowsky was the fourth and loveliest of the symphonies of this Russian out of France. This work in F minor seems to us the Beau Brummel of symphonies. Its beauty, even under stress, in tragedy and despair, is always immaculate. It is well mannered and beautiful throughout—until the very end, when something slips and it expires amid the cheapest kind of clap-trap fanfare. It was given a stunning performance.

Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," which followed the symphony, is still, after 25 years, an unusual piece of construction, reversing, as it does, the conventional method of development by setting forth the principal theme, upon which the variations are based, at the close rather than at the beginning. The strings of the orchestra were remarkably rich and brilliant in the broad unison passages at the end.

The novelty of the evening was a selection of episodes from the suite, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," by Alfredo Cassella. This work, originally intended for the Ballet Russe, is dedicated to M. Monteaux. The first section, "Ronde d'Enfants," is a lusty rollicking dance, the Barcarolle in the second episode is cast in a distinctly different vein, with strange tonal resolutions and curious intervals. It contains a voice part that is sung effectively by Laura Littlefield. The "Pas des Veilles Dames" is daintily stately and is scored with delightful crispness. The final excerpts from the suite were a mellow nocturne and an invigorating dance. The work has exquisite moments and others that are a trifle pale.

The concert came to a close with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," written with all the familiar brilliance of this master of orchestral color. The orchestra played the suite with fine abandon.

BALT. AMER. Feb. 2

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Feb. 2

MUSICAL NOTES.

Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the [illegible]morrow evening.

EVENING SUN, 1922 M
Baltimore, Md.

As Fashion Dictates.

Isn't it rather a sad commentary on the discrimination of Baltimore's music-loving public that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning after an absence of many months, was obliged to play to a half-filled auditorium at the Lyric last evening?

There is no finer body of musicians anywhere in the world today than these players whom Pierre Monteux has now brought to such a high state of technical and executive perfection, yet their advent caused scarcely a ripple on the calm pool of Baltimore's appreciation.

Time was, and not so very long ago, when seats for the Boston Orchestra were at a premium. To be sure, the Boston Orchestra fell upon evil days for a time and its former friends deserted it for new musical pastures. But now that it has returned to its high artistic state, why are not its fine perfections appreciated?

The storm was in part responsible, no doubt, for some of the empty places last evening, but it was not responsible for all of them. One hesitates to suggest that the lack of interest in the Boston Orchestra is due to the fact that it is no longer a fashionable entertainment, but in the final analysis isn't this distressingly true?

If one or other of the orchestras that now attract such enormous crowds to the Lyric had been playing last evening instead of the Boston organization, it is safe to say that everyone would have braved the storm and that the music hall would have been filled.

It does not look well for Baltimore's musical understanding that so few people, relatively speaking, were present in the Lyric last evening.

ESTABLISHED 18[illegible]
FROM Feb ~~JAN 2~~ 1922 L
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

HUB SYMPHONY PLAYERS HEARD IN FINE RECITAL

Lack of Inspiration From Conductor Makes Concert Pallid, However.

Washington welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday by applauding at the close of the concert until the entire group of players rose to their feet. With Pierre Monteux as conductor, an entire orchestral program was given, with no soloist.

Purity of tone, fine delineation of the parts, the finish that characterizes this orchestra, were all present in an admirable ensemble. But in interpretation Mr. Monteux is both over precise and pallid. One feels his metronomic beat to the detriment of the broad musical form, and he omits strong accent and dynamics in such music as the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, that music of tragic wailing, giving it with quiet exactness, with oft-repeated sameness of phrase, and with little contrast between the gayety of the dainty dance and the big notes of fate.

The playing of the orchestra in the plucked passages of the Scherzo was remarkably clear and beautiful, but its big import was not brought out, nor did one feel the strong type of the Russian.

The latter half of the Svendsen "Carnival in Paris," beginning with a soaring lyric melody, held that indeterminate line of music of the moderns that had been lost in the Tschaikowsky. The fete came tumbling in in fine abandon, its execution was excellent, making one wish for more of this imagination. But, again, in all the impressionism of the Debussy music there came through the joints of this music by too much precision that was not hidden. There were no unexpected sparks of theme in the "Clouds," and the exotic in "Fetes" was not there, nor much imagery. The winds marched into the fete with military exactness.

For so fine a rendition of a program it seems over-critical to discover such lack of detail, but the rich harmony was also missing in the stirring music of Wagner's "Rienzi." This was dramatically built up, but the inside voices did not come through. Mr. Monteux has not thrilled his players; they are finely polished in a musical accord, but it does not picture the big moods of music.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

From FEB 3 1922 M
AMERICAN
New York City

Szymanowski's Symphony No. 2, produced for the first time in New York, was the principal offering at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

This composition of the Polish composer is quite innocuous compared to some of his later efforts. Consequently it sounds well to normal ears. The influence of Wagner's "Tristan" is agreeably predominant, and Strauss bobs up conspicuously here and there, as does Scriabine, too. The contrapuntal workmanship, moreover, discloses the influence of Reger.

There are two movements — an Allegro Moderato that ends inconclusively and a Theme with Variations capped by an elaborately chromatic Introduction and Fugue. The second part, from which two episodes were omitted last night, could well be given separately. Effective music, skilfully wrought and colorfully orchestrated, it was well worth hearing and would bear repetition.

Mr. Szymanowski, seated in a first tier box, was readily discovered and rose to share the applause that the playing of Monsieur Monteux and his valiant musicians evoked.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From FEB 2 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

TWO ORCHESTRAS

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

A new symphony came to town last evening; and a good one. As often as Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have introduced novelties, they have seldom done so signal a service as on this occasion in Carnegie Hall. The work is the second essay in this form by Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer who now nearing his 40th birthday seems to have taken a permanent residence in New York. Probably for this reason a visiting orchestra had to introduce him, though it must be admitted that Mr. Damrosch announced, if he did not play, the Third Symphony. The Second Symphony was first produced under Georg Fitelberg in Warsaw in 1911 and had its first American hearing a week ago in Boston.

Mr. Szymanowski's B flat Symphony sticks to conventional form at least through its first movement. This - an Allegro—flowers from the typical double-root of two contrasting themes, themes of originality, individuality and capable of interesting and colorful development. The composer disclosed forthwith a command of orchestration and an intelligent straightforwardness of expression that stirred the imagination and satisfied eternal laws of esthetics.

Thereafter the composer cut loose from conventional restraint. A lovely, somber, eloquent theme, redolent of poppies and soft nights, sounded on divided 'celli; waxed through the media of five sets of variations, including a scherzo and a minuet. Herein Mr. Szymanowski muses on the blessed verities of beauty and of loveliness. His orchestra sounded celar and distinct—a multicolored instrument on which a poet might exercise his potent will.

Again in his finale Mr. Szymanowski wandered from the beaten path, and for the greater part successfully; though his elaborate fugue seemed overburdened with color-seeking detail. However ,orchestral fugues are frequently an anomaly. But force was here, and strength and virility.

Mr. Monteux gave the symphony a devoted reading. His program held in later places Cesar Franck's symphonic piece from "Redemption," orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" and the Overture to Weber's "Oberon."

From FEB 3 1922 L
EVENING MAIL
New York City

OPERA and CONCERT

By KATHARINE SPAETH

NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED

PERHAPS several hearings of the Polish composer Szymanowski's Second Symphony would make it more intimate. But it could never be a really friendly work. Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra last night, playing the symphony for the first time in New York.

He did earnest, scholarly things to the vagrant score. Clarinets squeaked at odd moments, and there were the usual spaces of wandering theme that blew about like a drapery caught on a picket fence. If you seek melody from your modern composers, Szynanowski supplied a bit in the variations, particularly the gavotte.

But honest persons in the audience did not seem to like it as music. They settled into real enjoyment when Cesar Franck's "Redemption" was played, and Casella's "Convent on the Water" seemed delicately lucid by contrast with the symphony.

FROM FEB 3 1922 L
Morning Telegraph
New York

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES NEW WORK

Pierre Monteux Offers Symphony by Karol Szymanovski at Carnegie Hall Concert Last Night.

At the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, its conductor, introduced Karol Szymanovski's Second Symphony, a work new to New York. Written in a form entirely foreign to the ordinary symphonic plan, the work failed to bring any heartthrobs to the audience. It was a singularly cold method of expression that Mr. Szymanovski used in building up his composition. The first part—an allegro moderato — contained two vigorous themes, developed in workmanlike fashion. The second section, however after stating a definite theme, proceeded into a series of variations that went on and on "for no reason at all." Toward the end the contrapuntal effects resolved themselves into an incongruous jumble with now and then a thin shriek from the violins; it was a disappointing end to a work that had a promising beginning.

Laura Littlefield was soloist in four excerpts from Alfredo Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," music of descriptive character which offered much interesting material for the audience to hear. A symphonic piece from Cesar Franck's strong-symphonic-poem, "The Redemption," helped to give contrast, as did von Weber's "Oberon" overture.

FROM FEB 3 1922 M
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

At Carnegie Hall last night Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra in the first of that organization's penultimate pair of concerts for the season. His programme, one of exceptional interest, included an extract from Franck's symphonic poem, "La Redemption," four excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The event of the evening was a first New York performance of Karol Szymanovski's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major. Mr. Szymanovski is a young Polish composer, at present living in New York, whose long list of compositions includes two operas, three symphonies, a symphonic poem and a number of songs and piano and violin pieces. The work played last night was composed in 1911, when he was but 28 years old, and has had numerous performances in Europe.

Several of his smaller works have been heard here this season, the best of them being two violin pieces that Paul Kochanski played at his Carnegie Hall recital. Nothing heretofore, however, has given more than a hint of the real gifts of the composer of the second symphony. This is real music. It is eloquent, well-knit and individual. In the opinion of at least one listener, the man who wrote it deserves to rank among the foremost living composers.

In form the work is unusual, although it looks more unorthodox on paper than it actually sounds. There is a first movement with two contrasting themes. Instead of the classic slow and scherzo movements, however, there are a theme, and variations, [illegible] tions taking the place of the slow movement, and the last three variations replacing the scherzo. For a finale there is a fugue, based upon the two themes of the first movement and the theme of the variations. The last three movements are played without a break.

In other words, here is a symphony that, instead of the conventional eight, has only three themes. The test that faced the composer was whether he had the skill and eloquence to develop his thematic material at such great length without being boresome.

Szymanovski meets the test with complete success. The small number of basic themes makes the structure crystal-clear to follow, and the masterly way in which the material is handled makes the work one of impressive power and beauty.

The first theme is based on a brief phrase made from the notes D, E-flat, F, d, heard first in the strings and then on the full orchestra. Follows a second theme, rather capricious in character, which alternates with the first and is finally combined with it. The theme of the variations is equally brief—a short four-note phrase on f, B-flat, c, d. The variations are handled with dazzling ingenuity. It is, in fact, doubtful whether the listener, unless warned in advance, would realize the amazing economy of material with which the composer has done his work.

It would be impossible on a first hearing to give any accurate description of the sequence of moods in this composition, of its bold and brilliant harmonic coloring, at once daring and strictly logical, and of the richly woven instrumental fabric. Suffice it to say that the second symphony is the best orchestral novelty of the season—a work of passionate and yearning loveliness.

It is customary to say of every new composer, "he will be heard from." Critics sometimes say it until the man is dead. Let us say, rather, that Karol Szymanovski was very definitely heard from last night, and that what he has to say is true and beautiful.

FROM TIMES
FEB 3 1922 M
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

Monteux Introduces Szymanowski's Symphony—Kreisler Plays With New York Orchestra.

Two orchestras played in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the evening concert of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux introducing here the music "in large form" of Karol Szymanowski, the Polish composer, now sojourning in this city. Mr. Szymanowski's second symphony, Op. 19, in B flat major, had been played in Russia and Germany, and a fortnight since at Boston; it is not of the conventional four-square symphonic order, but is instead in two main parts, an opening allegro on broad melodic lines, and an elaborate theme and variations, which included a gavotte, minuet and fugue among the five played yesterday out of an original seven episodes. There was an audience of musicians keen to hear the much-discussed work.

Mr. Monteux and his virtuoso players gave a polished performance of the novelty; music marked, not by deep feeling, unless it were for beauty of tone and phrase, matters far from the thought of "free verse" tone-poets today, but compelling attention rather by its intrinsic quality as sheer music in an abstract view of art akin to the Greek.

Another recent visitor to New York was recalled in Alfred Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," with its quaint dances of children and ancient dames, and its barcarolle with solo for soprano, sung by Laura Littlefield. The work bears dedication to Monteux and was first produced by him in Paris. He added last night Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption" and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Fritz Kreisler appeared at the New York Symphony Orchestra's matinee under Albert Coates in the same hall, filled to overflowing earlier in the day, when the violinist was heard with breathless interest, as often before, in a superb performance of Brahms's concerto. Mr. Coates conducted Beethoven's seventh symphony, and, after many recalls following the solo work, added a dash of vermilion in the "Dance Infernal of King Kaischei," by Stravinsky.

FROM FEB 3 1922 M
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Too Much Futurist Noise

M. Monteux cannot help it that he is not a Nikisch or a Muck or a Stransky or a Mengelberg; but he might easily offer the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a more alluring programme than he did last night. It surely would have been quite enough for one dose to present the cacophonous and noisy second symphony of the Polish composer Szymanowski without adding Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau." Fortunately critical duty did not compel a hearing of the Casella pieces since they had been done previously by Walter Damrosch.

There was soothing balm in Monteux's other two pieces, the ever beautiful "Oberon" overture and César Franck's splendid symphonic [illegible] "Redemption." But

FROM FEB 1 1922

TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An interesting audience turned out yesterday afternoon for the only concert which the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Pierre Monteaux, is to give in Washington this year. Mme. Jusserand, wife of the French ambassador, and Mrs. Hughes, wife of the Secretary of State, were guests of Mrs. William J. Boardman and Miss Mabel Boardman, who had the stage box at the National Theater for this interesting recital.

Others in the audience were Mrs. Herbert Hoover, the Chinese Minister and Mme. Sze, Mrs. Calderson Carlisle, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. B. B. Jones, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Beale R. Howard, Frank A. Richardson, Col. and Mrs. William Eric Fowler, Mrs. Ridgley Hunt, Mrs. Edwin J. Stellwagen, Mrs. R. R. Hitt, Mrs. Victor Kauffmann.

For the first time within long recolle tion, at the Symphony Concert of last Sa urday, a memorial piece was played wit out the applause that usually answers it as to any other item on the programm Few and far separated were the han that stirred after Siegfried's "Funer Music" recalling and honoring the dea Nikisch. Even at this late day, so rare a incident deserves record.

TRANS: Feb. 1

Boston Symphony, Back In Old Form, Gives Fine Concert

Monterix Revives Perfection Of Orchestra—Lyric Only Partly Filled For Concert.

By RICHARD H. PRATT, 2d.

The Boston Orchestra is no longer fashionable in Baltimore and a dismay array of empty chairs greeted its performance last night at the Lyric. Yet the band is more nearly the superb instrument that played under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck in ante-bellum days than it has been since the German conductor returned to Berlin. Its improvement has been so tremendous, in fact, that it is to be regretted that this is to be the last season of Pierre Monteaux's direction.

The program last night was an especially grateful one, containing Tchaikowsky at his glamorous best; the most interesting of the orchestral works of Vincent d'Indy; a delicious bit from the Italian rebel, Casella, and a Spain-soaked suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The Tchaikowsky was the fourth and loveliest of the symphonies of this Russian out of France. This work in F minor seems to us the Beau Brummel of symphonies. Its beauty, even under stress, in tragedy and despair, is always immaculate. It is well mannered and beautiful throughout—until the very end, when something slips and it expires amid the cheapest kind of clap-trap fanfare. It was given a stunning performance.

Vincent d'Indy's symphonic poem, "Istar," which followed the symphony, is still, after 25 years, an unusual piece of construction, reversing, as it does, the conventional method of development by setting forth the principal theme, upon which the variations are based, at the close rather than at the beginning. The strings of the orchestra were remarkably rich and brilliant in the broad unison passages at the end.

The novelty of the evening was a selection of episodes from the suite, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," by Alfredo Cassella. This work, originally intended for the Ballet Russe, is dedicated to M. Monteaux. The first section, "Ronde d'Enfants," is a lusty rollicking dance, the Barcarolle in the second episode is cast in a distinctly different vein, with strange tonal resolutions and curious intervals. It contains a voice part that is sung effectively by Laura Littlefield. The "Pas des Veilles Dames" is daintily stately and is scored with delightful crispness. The final excerpts from the suite were a mellow nocturne and an invigorating dance. The work has exquisite moments and others that are a trifle pale.

The concert came to a close with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," written with all the familiar brilliance of this master of orchestral color. The orchestra played the suite with fine abandon.

BALT. AMER - Feb. 2

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Feb. 2

MUSICAL NOTES.

Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert but one of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the

---

EVENING SUN, 1922 M
Baltimore, Md.

As Fashion Dictates.

Isn't it rather a sad commentary on the discrimination of Baltimore's music-loving public that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning after an absence of many months, was obliged to play to a half-filled auditorium at the Lyric last evening?

There is no finer body of musicians anywhere in the world today than these players whom Pierre Monteux has now brought to such a high state of technical and executive perfection, yet their advent caused scarcely a ripple on the calm pool of Baltimore's appreciation.

Time was, and not so very long ago, when seats for the Boston Orchestra were at a premium. To be sure, the Boston Orchestra fell upon evil days for a time and its former friends deserted it for new musical pastures. But now that it has returned to its high artistic state, why are not its fine perfections appreciated?

The storm was in part responsible, no doubt, for some of the empty places last evening, but it was not responsible for all of them. One hesitates to suggest that the lack of interest in the Boston Orchestra is due to the fact that it is no longer a fashionable entertainment, but in the final analysis isn't this distressingly true?

If one or other of the orchestras that now attract such enormous crowds to the Lyric had been playing last evening instead of the Boston organization, it is safe to say that everyone would have braved the storm and that the music hall would have been filled.

It does not look well for Baltimore's musical understanding that so few people, relatively speaking, were present in the Lyric last evening.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM Feb 2 1922 L
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

HUB SYMPHONY PLAYERS HEARD IN FINE RECITAL

Lack of Inspiration From Conductor Makes Concert Pallid, However.

Washington welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday by applauding at the close of the concert until the entire group of players rose to their feet. With Pierre Monteux as conductor, an entire orchestral program was given, with no soloist.

Purity of tone, fine delineation of the parts, the finish that characterizes this orchestra, were all present in an admirable ensemble. But in interpretation Mr. Monteux is both over precise and pallid. One feels his metronomic beat to the detriment of the broad musical form, and he omits strong accent and dynamics in such music as the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony, that music of tragic wailing, giving it with quiet exactness, with oft-repeated sameness of phrase, and with little contrast between the gayety of the dainty dance and the big notes of fate.

The playing of the orchestra in the plucked passages of the Scherzo was remarkably clear and beautiful, but its big import was not brought out, nor did one feel the strong type of the Russian.

The latter half of the Svendsen "Carnival in Paris," beginning with a soaring lyric melody, held that indeterminate line of music of the moderns that had been lost in the Tschaikowsky. The fete came tumbling in in fine abandon, its execution was excellent, making one wish for more of this imagination. But, again, in all the impressionism of the Debussy music there came through the joints of this music by too much precision that was not hidden. There were no unexpected sparks of theme in the "Clouds," and the exotic in "Fetes" was not there, nor much imagery. The winds marched into the fete with military exactness.

For so fine a rendition of a program it seems over-critical to discover such lack of detail, but the rich harmony was also missing in the stirring music of Wagner's "Rienzi." This was dramatically built up, but the inside voices did not come through. Mr. Monteux has not thrilled his players; they are finely polished in a musical accord, but it does not picture the big moods of music.

JESSIE MacBRIDE.

From FEB 3 1922 M
AMERICAN
New York City

* * *

Szymanowski's Symphony No. 2, produced for the first time in New York, was the principal offering at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

This composition of the Polish composer is quite innocuous compared to some of his later efforts. Consequently it sounds well to normal ears. The influence of Wagner's "Tristan" is agreeably predominant, and Strauss bobs up conspicuously here and there, as does Scriabine, too. The contrapuntal workmanship, moreover, discloses the influence of Reger.

There are two movements — an Allegro Moderato that ends inconclusively and a Theme with Variations capped by an elaborately chromatic Introduction and Fugue. The second part, from which two episodes were omitted last night, could well be given separately. Effective music, skilfully wrought and colorfully orchestrated, it was well worth hearing and would bear repetition.

Mr. Szymanowski, seated in a first tier box, was readily discovered and rose to share the applause that the playing of Monsieur Monteux and his valiant musicians evoked.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

TWO ORCHESTRAS

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

A new symphony came to town last evening; and a good one. As often as Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have introduced novelties, they have seldom done so signal a service as on this occasion in Carnegie Hall. The work is the second essay in this form by Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer who now nearing his 40th birthday seems to have taken a permanent residence in New York. Probably for this reason a visiting orchestra had to introduce him, though it must be admitted that Mr. Damrosch announced, if he did not play, the Third Symphony. The Second Symphony was first produced under Georg Fitelberg in Warsaw in 1911 and had its first American hearing a week ago in Boston.

Mr. Szymanowski's B flat Symphony sticks to conventional form at least through its first movement. This – an Allegro—flowers from the typical double-root of two contrasting themes, themes of originality, individuality and capable of interesting and colorful development. The composer disclosed forthwith a command of orchestration and an intelligent straightforwardness of expression that stirred the imagination and satisfied eternal laws of esthetics.

Thereafter the composer cut loose from conventional restraint. A lovely, somber, eloquent theme, redolent of poppies and soft nights, sounded on divided 'celli; waxed through the media of five sets of variations, including a scherzo and a minuet. Herein Mr. Szymanowski muses on the blessed verities of beauty and of loveliness. His orchestra sounded celar and distinct—a multicolored instrument on which a poet might exercise his potent will.

Again in his finale Mr. Szymanowski wandered from the beaten path, and for the greater part successfully; though his elaborate fugue seemed overburdened with color-seeking detail. However ,orchestral fugues are frequently an anomaly. But force was here, and strength and virility.

Mr. Monteux gave the symphony a devoted reading. His program held in later places Cesar Franck's symphonic piece from "Redemption," orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" and the Overture to Weber's "Oberon."

[65]

From FEB 3 1922 L
EVENING MAIL
New York City

OPERA and CONCERT

By KATHARINE SPAETH

NEW SYMPHONY PLAYED

PERHAPS several hearings of the Polish composer Szymanowski's Second Symphony would make it more intimate. But it could never be a really friendly work. Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra last night, playing the symphony for the first time in New York.

He did earnest, scholarly things to the vagrant score. Clarinets squeaked at odd moments, and there were the usual spaces of wandering theme that blew about like a drapery caught on a picket fence. If you seek melody from your modern composers, Szynanowski supplied a bit in the variations, particularly the gavotte.

But honest persons in the audience did not seem to like it as music. They settled into real enjoyment when Cesar Franck's "Redemption" was played, and Casella's "Convent on the Water" seemed delicately lucid by contrast with the symphony.

FROM FEB 3 1922
Morning Telegraph
New York

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES NEW WORK

Pierre Monteux Offers Symphony by Karol Szymanovski at Carnegie Hall Concert Last Night.

At the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, its conductor, introduced Karol Szymanovski's Second Symphony, a work new to New York. Written in a form entirely foreign to the ordinary symphonic plan, the work failed to bring any heart-throbs to the audience. It was a singularly cold method of expression that Mr. Szymanovski used in building up his composition. The first part—an allegro moderato — contained two vigorous themes, developed in workmanlike fashion. The second section, however, after stating a definite theme, proceeded into a series of variations that went on and on "for no reason at all." Toward the end the contrapuntal effects resolved themselves into an incongruous jumble with now and then a thin shriek from the violins; it was a disappointing end to a work that had a promising beginning.

Laura Littlefield was soloist in four excerpts from Alfredo Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," music of descriptive character which offered much interesting material for the audience to hear. A symphonic piece from Cesar Franck's strong symphonic-poem, "The Redemption," helped to give contrast, as did von Weber's "Oberon" overture.

FROM FEB 3 1922
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

At Carnegie Hall last night Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra in the first of that organization's penultimate pair of concerts for the season. His programme, one of exceptional interest, included an extract from Franck's symphonic poem, "La Redemption," four excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The event of the evening was a first New York performance of Karol Szymanovski's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major. Mr. Szymanovski is a young Polish composer, at present living in New York, whose long list of compositions includes two operas, three symphonies, a symphonic poem and a number of songs and piano and violin pieces. The work played last night was composed in 1911, when he was but 28 years old, and has had numerous performances in Europe.

Several of his smaller works have been heard here this season, the best of them being two violin pieces that Paul Kochanski played at his Carnegie Hall recital. Nothing heretofore, however, has given more than a hint of the real gifts of the composer of the second symphony. This is real music. It is eloquent, well-knit and individual. In the opinion of at least one listener, the man who wrote it deserves to rank among the foremost living composers.

In form the work is unusual, although it looks more unorthodox on paper than it actually sounds. There is a first movement with two contrasting themes. Instead of the classic slow and scherzo movements, however, there are a theme, and variations, the theme and the first two variations taking the place of the slow movement, and the last three variations replacing the scherzo. For a finale there is a fugue, based upon the two themes of the first movement and the theme of the variations. The last three movements are played without a break.

In other words, here is a symphony that, instead of the conventional eight, has only three themes. The test that faced the composer was whether he had the skill and eloquence to develop his thematic material at such great length without being boresome.

Szymanovski meets the test with complete success. The small number of basic themes makes the structure crystal-clear to follow, and the masterly way in which the material is handled makes the work one of impressive power and beauty.

The first theme is based on a brief phrase made from the notes D, E-flat, F, d, heard first in the strings and then on the full orchestra. Follows a second theme, rather capricious in character, which alternates with the first and is finally combined with it. The theme of the variations is equally brief—a short four-note phrase on f, B-flat, c, d. The variations are handled with dazzling ingenuity. It is, in fact, doubtful whether the listener, unless warned in advance, would realize the amazing economy of material with which the composer has done his work.

It would be impossible on a first hearing to give any accurate description of the sequence of moods in this composition, of its bold and brilliant harmonic coloring, at once daring and strictly logical, and of the richly woven instrumental fabric. Suffice it to say that the second symphony is the best orchestral novelty of the season—a work of passionate and yearning loveliness.

It is customary to say of every new composer, "he will be heard from." Critics sometimes say it until the man is dead. Let us say, rather, that Karol Szymanovski was very definitely heard from last night, and that what he has to say is true and beautiful.

FROM FEB 3 1922
TIMES
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

Monteux Introduces Szymanowski's Symphony—Kreisler Plays With New York Orchestra.

Two orchestras played in Carnegie Hall yesterday, the evening concert of the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux introducing here the music "in large form" of Karol Szymanowski, the Polish composer, now sojourning in this city. Mr. Szymanowski's second symphony, Op. 19, in B flat major, had been played in Russia and Germany, and a fortnight since at Boston; it is not of the conventional four-square symphonic order, but is instead in two main parts, an opening allegro on broad melodic lines, and an elaborate theme and variations, which included a gavotte, minuet and fugue among the five played yesterday out of an original seven episodes. There was an audience of musicians keen to hear the much-discussed work.

Mr. Monteux and his virtuoso players gave a polished performance of the novelty; music marked, not by deep feeling, unless it were for beauty of tone and phrase, matters far from the thought of "free verse" tone-poets today, but compelling attention rather by its intrinsic quality as sheer music in an abstract view of art akin to the Greek.

Another recent visitor to New York was recalled in Alfred Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," with its quaint dances of children and ancient dames, and its barcarolle with solo for soprano, sung by Laura Littlefield. The work bears dedication to Monteux and was first produced by him in Paris. He added last night Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption" and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Fritz Kreisler appeared at the New York Symphony Orchestra's matinee under Albert Coates in the same hall, filled to overflowing earlier in the day, when the violinist was heard with breathless interest, as often before, in a superb performance of Brahms's concerto. Mr. Coates conducted Beethoven's seventh symphony, and, after many recalls following the solo work, added a dash of vermilion in the "Dance Infernal of King Kalschei," by Stravinsky.

FROM FEB 3
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Too Much Futurist Noise

M. Monteux cannot help it that he is not a Nikisch or a Muck or a Stransky or a Mengelberg; but he might easily offer the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a more alluring programme than he did last night. It surely would have been quite enough for one dose to present the cacophonous and noisy second symphony of the Polish composer Szymanowski without adding Casella's "Le Convent sur l'Eau." Fortunately critical duty did not compel a hearing of the Casella pieces, since they had been done previously by Walter Damrosch.

There was soothing balm in Monteux's other two pieces, the ever beautiful "Oberon" overture and César Franck's splendid symphonic piece from his "La Rédemption." But the "limit," exclaimed a prominent musician. I have certainly never heard anything that affected me so disagreeably, not because of its dissonantal exuberance and uncalled for racket, but because of its emptiness, its miserly doling out of themes, and their utter insignificance. In the afternoon I had hugely enjoyed the last piece on Mr. Coates's programme, the "Infernal Dance of King Katchei" from Stravinsky's "Firebird," in spite of its dissonantal exuberance, because Stravinsky, almost alone among the futurists, has something to say. There is not only stupendous technical skill in his music, but a message, the message of a man of genius. I was thing new to bring to the world, the messag- of a man of genius. I was stirred, thrilled, by Stravinsky's piece, but annoyed and at the same time vastly bored by the new Polish "symphony."

Yet I was not a bit surprised to find Deems Taylor praising this work highly in this morning's World. Taylor is a composer himself and that makes him see things through spectacles quite different from those of mere music lovers. After the performance another composer, Samuel Gardner, came to me to express his admiration of the Polish symphony. He liked particularly certain contrapuntal stunts in it. "Contrapuntal stunts be hanged," I retorted. "If you ever write anything like that I'll get myself metamorphosed into a centipede and jump on you with every one of my hundred feet.

Living composers are always applauded when discovered after a piece by them has been played. Mr. Szymanowski was discovered in a box and applauded. But I wager that the audience last night would have been happier—and larger—if M. Monteux had had on his programme a piece by another Pole named Ignace J. Paderewski, whose compositions show not only clever craftsmanship to interest composers, but splendid ideas to thrill the hearers.

From FEB 3 1922
EVENING WORLD
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays a New Symphony.

By Frank H. Warren.

A brand new symphony by a new composer is not to be sneezed at in a day of musical journeyings, so there was an air of expectancy around Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its monthly concert. Karol Szymanovski, born in Poland in 1883, now residing in this city, was the composer. Several of his instrumental numbers and songs have recently been featured on local programmes, works that disclosed their author as a member in good standing of the new school. His symphony is unusual in that it is in two parts, the second of which is a theme with seven variations.

The composition got away to a good, energetic start. The orchestral treatment was ambitious and colorful and its form could be followed. Presently, however, it became diffused and spotty and began to travel the new road with all the familiar banners flying. The composition as a whole sounded well but didn't seem to get much of anywhere and there were dull spots that could not be overlooked. A second feature of the concert was the large number of unoccupied seats.

Too Much Futurist Noise

M. Monteux cannot help it that he is not a Nikisch or a Muck or a Stransky or a Mengelberg; but he might easily offer the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a more alluring programme than he did last night. It surely would have been quite enough for one dose to present the cacophonous and noisy second symphony of the Polish composer Szymanowski without adding Casella's "Le Convent sur l'Eau." Fortunately critical duty did not compel a hearing of the Casella pieces, since they had been done previously by Walter Damrosch.

There was soothing balm in Monteux's other two pieces, the ever beautiful "Oberon" overture and César Franck's splendid symphonic piece from his "La Rédemption." But the Szymanowski symphony! "It's the limit," exclaimed a prominent musician. I have certainly never heard anything that affected me so disagreeably, not because of its dissonantal exuberance and uncalled for racket, but because of its emptiness, its miserly doling out of themes, and their utter insignificance. In the afternoon I had hugely enjoyed the last piece on Mr. Coates's programme, the "Infernal Dance of King Katchei" from Stravinsky's "Firebird," in spite of its dissonantal exuberance, because Stravinsky, almost alone among the futurists, has something to say. There is not only stupendous technical skill in his music, but a message, the message of a musician who has something new to bring to the world, the messag- of a man of genius. I was stirred, thrilled, by Stravinsky's piece, but annoyed and at the same time vastly bored by the new Polish "symphony."

Yet I was not a bit surprised to find Deems Taylor praising this work highly in this morning's World. Tay-

mere music lovers. After the performance another composer, Samuel Gardner, came to me to express his admiration of the Polish symphony. He liked particularly certain contrapuntal stunts in it. "Contrapuntal stunts be hanged," I retorted. "If you ever write anything like that I'll get myself metamorphosed into a centipede and jump on you with every one of my hundred feet."

Living composers are always applauded when discovered after a piece by them has been played. Mr. Szymanowski was discovered in a box and applauded. But I wager that the audience last night would have been happier—and larger—if M. Monteux had had on his programme a piece by another Pole named Ignace J. Paderewski, whose compositions show not only clever craftsmanship to interest composers, but splendid ideas to thrill the hearers.

N.Y. POST - FEB - 3

In the evening Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra appeared upon the scene and brought a torment to the mind of the smallest audience we have yet seen at a Boston concert, in the shape of a symphony by Szymanowski. It and a few other things which are imminent helped to make plain the fact that the evils which the World War has brought upon us are not all commercial and economical. We are become the asylum of all manner of foreign musicians and can no longer choose but hear all that they have to say, no matter how much we beat our breasts. There is no longer a European clearing house through which we can manage an artistic exchange.

The symphony was set down as the composer's second. It, or one of its companions, we are told, was recently taken in hand by the Symphony Society, but conductor and bandsmen confessed defeat and retired from the field. Mr. Monteux and his Bostonians are evidently made of sterner stuff. They mastered Mr. Szymanowski's music and gave it to us (all but two sections) last night. After it was over we wished that they, too, had gone down in the roar of the Big Berthas which were discharged in the final fugue, and we had been spared the din. Till the fugue was reached we had managed to keep heart of hope, for there were promising moments in some of the variations which make up the middle portion of the work, especially those which were cast in something like dance froms, but anguish and despair came at last. For the hearers who remained in the room after the symphony there was no doubt consolation and reward in the symphonic excerpt from César Franck's "Redemption," in portions of Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" and, surely, in the overture to "Oberon."

N.Y. TRIBUNE - FEB 3.

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

At Carnegie Hall last night Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra in the first of that organization's penultimate pair of concerts for the season. His programme, one of exceptional interest, included an extract from Franck's symphonic poem, "La Redemption," four excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The event of the evening was a first New York performance of Karol Szymanovski's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major. Mr. Szymanovski is a young Polish composer, at present living in New York, whose long list of compositions includes two operas, three symphonies, a symphonic poem and a number of songs and piano and violin pieces. The work played last night was composed in 1911, when he was but 28 years old, and has had numerous performances in Europe.

Several of his smaller works have been heard here this season, the best of them being two violin pieces that Paul Kochanski played at his Carnegie Hall recital. Nothing heretofore, however, has given more than a hint of the real gifts of the composer of the second symphony. This is real music. It is eloquent, well-knit and individual. In the opinion of at least one listener, the man who wrote it deserves to rank among the foremost living composers.

In form the work is unusual, although it looks more unorthodox on paper than it actually sounds. There is a first movement with two contrasting themes. Instead of the classic slow and scherzo movements, however, there are a theme, and variations, the theme and the first two variations taking the place of the slow movement, and the last three variations replacing the scherzo. For a finale there is a fugue, based upon the two themes of the first movement and the theme of the variations. The last three movements are played without a break.

In other words, here is a symphony that, instead of the conventional eight, has only three themes. The test that faced the composer was whether he had the skill and eloquence to develop his thematic material at such great length without being boresome.

Szymanovski meets the test with complete success. The small number of basic themes makes the structure crystal-clear to follow, and the masterly way in which the material is handled makes the work one of impressive power and beauty.

The first theme is based on a brief phrase made from the notes D, E-flat, [illegible]

[illegible] character [illegible] alternates with the first and is [illegible] combined with it. The theme of the variations is equally brief—a short four-note phrase on f, B-flat, c, d. The variations are handled with dazzling ingenuity. It is, in fact, doubtful whether the listener unless warned in advance, would realize the amazing economy of material with which the composer has done his work.

It would be impossible on a first hearing to give any accurate description of the sequence of moods in this composition, of its bold and brilliant harmonic coloring, at once daring and strictly logical, and of the richly woven instrumental fabric. Suffice it to say that the second symphony is the best orchestral novelty of the season—a work of passionate and yearning loveliness.

It is customary to say of every new composer, "he will be heard from." Critics sometimes say it until the man is dead. Let us say, rather, that Karol Szymanovski was very definitely heard from last night, and that what he has to say is true and beautiful.

WORLD - FEB - 3.

MIROVITCH SOLOIST

The third extra Boston Symphony concert of the series of five Monday evening concerts which will take place a week from next Monday night, February 13, at 3:15, will have a splendid program, and will be made additionally eventful in the appearance as soloist of Alfred Mirovitch, the extremely talented and highly artistic Russian pianist.

Pierre Monteux will present a notable program at this concert, which will begin with the immortal "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert, the two brief movements of which have placed this work in the estimation of the world as one of the highest achievements in lyrical beauty. Wagner will be represented by the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt by his third symphonic poem, "The Prelude," probably the most popular of the symphonic poems of this master.

AMER - FEB - 4.

Familiar and Unfamiliar Pieces from the Symphony Orchestra—Myra Hess of London for New Pianist—Mr. Heifetz Again Returns—Miscellaneous Recitals

FOR once in a way no new piece stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Yet one number has been unheard for so long as to be virtually novel—Smetana's tone-picture, "Wallenstein's Camp." Of late, the Bohemian composer has been overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. Of old the choice from his music usually fell upon the Overture to his opera "The Bartered Bride," or to one of the tone-poems in which he celebrated his country. Mr. Monteux has spied out a fresher piece and the subject should suit Smetana's vivacity of rhythm, frankness of melody and liveliness of tonal color. Not too familiar, either, are Liadov's three tales in tones out of Russian folklore, all brief and vivid pieces—"Kikimora," "Baba-Yaga," both of whom were witches, and "The Enchanted Lake." For the rest the concerts will begin with Schumann's ardent and songful Symphony in B-flat—his music of the spring—and continue with a Concerto of Handel for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, played as the composer wrote it, less a movement or two, and abounding in solo-passages in which the virtuosi of the orchestra should shine.

On Thursday evening, the orchestra and Mr. Monteux will go to Cambridge for the fifth concert of the current series in Sanders Theatre. Smetana's tone-picture of Wallenstein's Camp and Liadov's three tales in tones out of Russian folk-lore will then be played as above specified. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor, will begin the concert; and for the "assisting artist," Myra Hess, stands Mozart's Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra. Miss Hess, who will be heard for the first time hereabouts, is a long established and highly accomplished English pianist. In particular she excels with the clarity, the delicacy, the continence of eighteenth-century

Monday evening, Feb. 13, in Symphony Hall, the third in the series of "special" Symphony Concerts designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than usually frequents them. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct; and Mr. Mirovitch, as yet unheard here with orchestra, will assist as pianist. The chosen pieces are Schubert's unfinished Symphony; Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra; the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde"; Dukas's amusing Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes."

TRANS. FEB - 4.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The third extra Boston Symphony concert of the series of five Monday evening concerts, which will take place a week from next Monday night, Feb. 13, at 3:15, will have a splendid program, and will be made additionally eventful in the appearance as soloist of Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist.

TRAV. FEB 4.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date FEB 4 1922 D

Programs Presented Twice, In Boston and in New York, Show Contrast in Audiences

Symphony and Carnegie Halls Filled by Contrasting Races and Types With Warmer Spirit Than in Hub.

By MARY ELLIS OPDYCKE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on their trip this week to New York repeated, as is their wont, a program which they had given in Boston a fortnight before. To any one who was privileged to hear both performances the contrast in the reception of the audience and in the audience itself must necessarily have seemed a significant feature.

We are apt, if we notice audiences at all, to think of them as numbering few or many friends, or more or less paper. Applause we refer in quality and quantity to the type or the execution of the work; we forget that audiences vary as much in heat as the stars themselves in glory. But one trip to Boston, one pilgrimage to the Mecca that is Symphony Hall arouses our keenest analysis of the public, and we return to find new charms in the inhabitants of Carnegie and Aeolian.

Half an hour before the Boston Symphony players officiate at their own altar a radius of four blocks is crowded with votaries, most of them approaching in street cars, many parking their own motors, very few being brought to the temple steps by their chauffeurs. A good many women come veiled and hatless, for none may listen with head covered by anything except "a low headcovering without projection," which even Bostonians would shrink from, and the removal of headgear would disturb the sacred atmosphere.

Once seated one notices the audience at prayer, so to speak. There is no lobby for recalcitrant latecomers, no standing room for the masses. A dignified dedocracy has provided some fifty rows of orchestral seats and balconies that might almost be boxes. Here the critics sit, ready to escape by upper doors to the fastnesses of their own studies. A Boston critic never goes out to tea. Such beverages might curdle his reactions before they are committed to paper.

Those who fill the seats, and the seats are filled, seem to have done so for generations. One never gives a seat away in Boston. One bequeathes it to one's grandchildren. One never meets a friend on Beacon street at 3:10 and says, "Come, let's hear Monteux this afternoon." One influences one's great-aunt to remember one in her will so that one may sit within three rows of one's second cousin when the said greataunt dies.

Armed with the most copious of program books, which actually provide serious musical reading matter for the intermission, the Boston audience is chary of applause. When a new and somewhat difficult work was played, there was quite a pause. Then, having decided that Monteux must be right to put it on, the audience clapped loyally. When the composer came to the stage there was more applause, but no danger of riot. The hundreds of Anglo Saxon faces never moved an eyelid, except for one dear old patriarch who looked down his beard until he found the "Oberon" overture at the end of the program and heaved a patient sigh. "At least there will be some of the music I like," he said.

There may be other types of audiences in Boston, and Jordan Hall may contain spontaneous enthusiasts, but Bostonians assure one that musical interest is confined either to the Symphony or to the past. At times they appear synonymous.

Transplanted to New York the same program took on a different color. The new symphony that one had thought cerebral appeared almost passionate. The audience, though of half the size seemed to have come by its own will, not because of the testament of its ancestors. And it clapped as soon as the last note died away.

A superficial inquiry into this very startling contrast at once lights on the racial differences between the music lovers of the two cities. There are more dark skinned, smouldering eyed Southern Europeans in Carnegie Hall. The upper galleries provide for many who can afford little more than a car fare.

Then again the Carnegie lobbies are crowded with last minute purchasers who may have met on the avenue like spark and tinder and ignited with a wish to hear some music. A holiday enthusiasm results calculated to produce little head shaking but much hand clapping.

The very number and variety of New York concerts imply a similar variety in the audience. The Philadelphia Orchestra lures dinner jackets and tinseled coiffures, the Sunday symphonies attract husbands and wives in Episcopalian broadcloth, the popular priced Philharmonics draw family parties to hear how Wagner sounds after the phonograph records, there is the Saturday night opera audience and the Monday night opera audience, and never the twain shall meet, except in the museums. There is the central European audience with miniature scores and comparative criticism, there is the Chaliapin audience with hoarse cries and many beards, there is the papered debut with stolid listeners, smiling to get something for nothing.

Such diversity must not be compared with a single experience in another city. Out of Chelsea may redemption come to set even Symphony Hall aflame with zeal. Symphonies have issued before now from Medbury and symphonic poems from Cambridge. But so marked was the effect produced by a single program on the two cities, so differently did the two audiences react, that it is safe to assume that something beyond the particular brand of people that heard the music in either town accounted for the contrast between Hunt-

FR Feb 3 1922 M
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

Mr. Monteux in the evening offered a most interesting programme. It consisted of the first performance here of Karel Szymanowski's Second Symphony (which Walter Damrosch abandoned in the rehearsal stage earlier in the season); the "Morceau symphonique" from Franck's "Redemption"; the orchestral suite made by Alfredo Casella from his "choreographic comedy," "Le convent sur l'eau" with its delicious "Pas des vieilles dames" and, finally, the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

One other concert on the day's schedule was a piano recital last evening in Aeolian Hall by Victor Wittgenstein.

Szymanowski symphony! "It's the limit," exclaimed a prominent musician. I have certainly never heard anything that affected me so disagreeably, not because of its dissonantal exuberance and uncalled for racket, but because of its emptiness, its miserly doling out of themes, and their utter insignificance. In the afternoon I had hugely enjoyed the last piece on Mr. Coates's programme, the "Infernal Dance of King Katchei" from Stravinsky's "Firebird," in spite of its dissonantal exuberance, because Stravinsky, almost alone among the futurists, has something to say. There is not only stupendous technical skill in his music, but a message, the message of a man of genius. I was thing new to bring to the world, the message of a man of genius. I was stirred, thrilled, by Stravinsky's piece, but annoyed and at the same time vastly bored by the new Polish "symphony."

Yet I was not a bit surprised to find Deems Taylor praising this work highly in this morning's World. Taylor is a composer himself and that makes him see things through spectacles quite different from those of mere music lovers. After the performance another composer, Samuel Gardner, came to me to express his admiration of the Polish symphony. He liked particularly certain contrapuntal stunts in it. "Contrapuntal stunts be hanged," I retorted. "If you ever write anything like that I'll get myself metamorphosed into a centipede and jump on you with every one of my hundred feet.

Living composers are always applauded when discovered after a piece by them has been played. Mr. Szymanowski was discovered in a box and applauded. But I wager that the audience last night would have been happier—and larger—if M. Monteux had had on his programme a piece by another Pole named Ignace J. Paderewski, whose compositions show not only clever craftsmanship to interest composers, but splendid ideas to thrill the hearers.

From FEB 3 1922

EVENING WORLD

New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays a New Symphony.

By Frank H. Warren.

A brand new symphony by a new composer is not to be sneezed at in a day of musical journeyings, so there was an air of expectancy around Carnegie Hall last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its monthly concert. Karol Szymanovski, born in Poland in 1883, now residing in this city, was the composer. Several of his instrumental numbers and songs have recently been featured on local programmes, works that disclosed their author as a member in good standing of the new school. His symphony is unusual in that it is in two parts, the second of which is a theme with seven variations.

The composition got away to a good, energetic start. The orchestral treatment was ambitious and colorful and its form could be followed. Presently, however, it became diffused and spotty and began to travel the new road with all the familiar banners flying. The composition as a whole sounded well but didn't seem to get much of anywhere and there were dull spots that could not be overlooked. A second feature of the concert was the large number of unoccupied seats.

Too Much Futurist Noise

M. Monteux cannot help it that he is not a Nikisch or a Muck or a Stransky or a Mengelberg; but he might easily offer the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a more alluring programme than he did last night. It surely would have been quite enough for one dose to present the cacophonous and noisy second symphony of the Polish composer Szymanowski without adding Casella's "Le Convent sur l'Eau." Fortunately critical duty did not compel a hearing of the Casella pieces, since they had been done previously by Walter Damrosch.

There was soothing balm in Monteux's other two pieces, the ever beautiful "Oberon" overture and César Franck's splendid symphonic piece from his "La Rédemption." But the Szymanowski symphony! "It's the limit," exclaimed a prominent musician. I have certainly never heard anything that affected me so disagreeably, not because of its dissonantal exuberance and uncalled for racket, but because of its emptiness, its miserly doling out of themes, and their utter insignificance. In the afternoon I had hugely enjoyed the last piece on Mr. Coates's programme, the "Infernal Dance of King Katchei" from Stravinsky's "Firebird," in spite of its dissonantal exuberance, because Stravinsky, almost alone among the futurists, has something to say. There is not only stupendous technical skill in his music, but a message, the message of a musician who has something new to bring to the world, the message of a man of genius. I was stirred, thrilled, by Stravinsky's piece, but annoyed and at the same time vastly bored by the new Polish "symphony."

Yet I was not a bit surprised to find Deems Taylor praising this work highly in this morning's World. Taylor is a composer himself and that makes him see things through spectacles quite different from those of mere music lovers. After the performance another composer, Samuel Gardner, came to me to express his admiration of the Polish symphony. He liked particularly certain contrapuntal stunts in it. "Contrapuntal stunts be hanged," I retorted. "If you ever write anything like that I'll get myself metamorphosed into a centipede and jump on you with every one of my hundred feet."

Living composers are always applauded when discovered after a piece by them has been played. Mr. Szymanowski was discovered in a box and applauded. But I wager that the audience last night would have been happier—and larger—if M. Monteux had had on his programme a piece by another Pole named Ignace J. Paderewski, whose compositions show not only clever craftsmanship to interest composers, but splendid ideas to thrill the hearers.

N.Y. POST-FEB-3

In the evening Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra appeared upon the scene and brought a torment to the mind of the smallest audience we have yet seen at a Boston concert, in the shape of a symphony by Szymanowski. It and a few other things which are imminent helped to make plain the fact that the evils which the World War has brought upon us are not all commercial and economical. We are become the asylum of all manner of foreign musicians and can no longer choose but hear all that they have to say, no matter how much we beat our breasts. There is no longer a European clearing house through which we can manage an artistic exchange.

The symphony was set down as the composer's second. It, or one of its companions, we are told, was recently taken in hand by the Symphony Society, but conductor and bandsmen confessed defeat and retired from the field. Mr. Monteux and his Bostonians are evidently made of sterner stuff. They mastered Mr. Szymanowski's music and gave it to us (all but two sections) last night. After it was over we wished that they, too, had gone down in the roar of the Big Berthas which were discharged in the final fugue, and we had been spared the din. Till the fugue was reached we had managed to keep heart of hope, for there were promising moments in some of the variations which make up the middle portion of the work, especially those which were cast in something like dance froms, but anguish and despair came at last. For the hearers who remained in the room after the symphony there was no doubt consolation and reward in the symphonic excerpt from César Franck's "Redemption," in portions of Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" and, surely, in the overture to "Oberon."

N. TRIBUNE-FEB 3.

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

BOSTON AND NEW YORK.

At Carnegie Hall last night Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Orchestra in the first of that organization's penultimate pair of concerts for the season. His programme, one of exceptional interest, included an extract from Franck's symphonic poem, "La Redemption," four excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

The event of the evening was a first New York performance of Karol Szymanovski's Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major. Mr. Szymanovski is a young Polish composer, at present living in New York, whose long list of compositions includes two operas, three symphonies, a symphonic poem and a number of songs and piano and violin pieces. The work played last night was composed in 1911, when he was but 28 years old, and has had numerous performances in Europe.

Several of his smaller works have been heard here this season, the best of them being two violin pieces that Paul Kochanski played at his Carnegie Hall recital. Nothing heretofore, however, has given more than a hint of the real gifts of the composer of the second symphony. This is real music. It is eloquent, well-knit and individual. In the opinion of at least one listener, the man who wrote it deserves to rank among the foremost living composers.

In form the work is unusual, although it looks more unorthodox on paper than it actually sounds. There is a first movement with two contrasting themes. Instead of the classic slow and scherzo movements, however, there are a theme, and variations, the theme and the first two variations taking the place of the slow movement, and the last three variations replacing the scherzo. For a finale there is a fugue, based upon the two themes of the first movement and the theme of the variations. The last three movements are played without a break.

In other words, here is a symphony that, instead of the conventional eight, has only three themes. The test that faced the composer was whether he had the skill and eloquence to develop his thematic material at such great length without being boresome.

Szymanovski meets the test with complete success. The small number of basic themes makes the structure crystal-clear to follow, and the masterly way in which the material is handled makes the work one of impressive power and beauty.

The first theme is based on a brief phrase made from the notes D, E-flat, F, d, heard first in the strings and then on the full orchestra. Follows a second theme, rather capricious in character, which alternates with the first and is finally combined with it. The theme of the variations is equally brief—a short four-note phrase on F, B-flat, C, d. The variations are handled with dazzling ingenuity. It is, in fact, doubtful whether the listener unless warned in advance, would realize the amazing economy of material with which the composer has done his work.

It would be impossible on a first hearing to give any accurate description of the sequence of moods in this composition, of its bold and brilliant harmonic coloring, at once daring and strictly logical, and of the richly woven instrumental fabric. Suffice it to say that the second symphony is the best orchestral novelty of the season—a work of passionate and yearning loveliness.

It is customary to say of every new composer, "he will be heard from." Critics sometimes say it until the man is dead. Let us say, rather, that Karol Szymanovski was very definitely heard from last night, and that what he has to say is true and beautiful.

WORLD-FEB-3.

MIROVITCH SOLOIST

The third extra Boston Symphony concert of the series of five Monday evening concerts which will take place a week from next Monday night, February 13, at 8:15, will have a splendid program, and will be made additionally eventful in the appearance as soloist of Alfred Mirovitch, the extremely talented and highly artistic Russian pianist.

Pierre Monteux will present a notable program at this concert, which will begin with the immortal "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert, the two brief movements of which have placed this work in the estimation of the world as one of the highest achievements in lyrical beauty. Wagner will be represented by the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt by his third symphonic poem, "The Prelude," probably the most popular of the symphonic poems of this master.

AMER FEB-4.

Familiar and Unfamiliar Pieces from the Symphony Orchestra—Myra Hess of London for New Pianist—Mr. Heifetz Again Returns—Miscellaneous Recitals

FOR once in a way no new piece stands on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Yet one number has been unheard for so long as to be virtually novel—Smetana's tone-picture, "Wallenstein's Camp." Of late, the Bohemian composer has been overlooked at the Symphony Concerts. Of old the choice from his music usually fell upon the Overture to his opera "The Bartered Bride," or to one of the tone-poems in which he celebrated his country. Mr. Monteux has spied out a fresher piece and the subject should suit Smetana's vivacity of rhythm, frankness of melody and liveliness of tonal color. Not too familiar, either, are Liadov's three tales in tones out of Russian folk-lore, all brief and vivid pieces—"Kikimora," "Baba-Yaga," both of whom were witches, and "The Enchanted Lake." For the rest the concerts will begin with Schumann's ardent and songful Symphony in B-flat—his music of the spring—and continue with a Concerto of Handel for Strings and Two Wind Choirs, played as the composer wrote it, less a movement or two, and abounding in solo-passages in which the virtuosi of the orchestra should shine.

On Thursday evening, the orchestra and Mr. Monteux will go to Cambridge for the fifth concert of the current series in Sanders Theatre. Smetana's tone-picture of Wallenstein's Camp and Liadov's three tales in tones out of Russian folk-lore will then be played as above specified. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor, will begin the concert; and for the "assisting artist," Myra Hess, stands Mozart's Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra. Miss Hess, who will be heard for the first time hereabouts, is a long established and highly accomplished English pianist. In particular she excels with the clarity, the delicacy, the continence of eighteenth-century music.

Monday evening, Feb. 13, in Symphony Hall, the third in the series of "special" Symphony Concerts designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than usually frequents them. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct; and Mr. Mirovitch, at yet unheard here with orchestra, will assist as pianist. The chosen pieces are Schubert's unfinished Symphony; Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra; the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's opera, "Tristan and Isolde"; Dukas's amusing Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes."

TRANS. FEB-4.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The third extra Boston Symphony concert of the series of five Monday evening concerts, which will take place a week from next Monday night, Feb. 13, at 8:15, will have a splendid program, and will be made additionally eventful in the appearance as soloist of Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist.

TRAV. FEB-4.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date FEB 4 1922 D

Programs Presented Twice, In Boston and in New York, Show Contrast in Audiences

Symphony and Carnegie Halls Filled by Contrasting Races and Types With Warmer Spirit Than in Hub.

By MARY ELLIS OPDYCKE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on their trip this week to New York, repeated, as is their wont, a program which they had given in Boston a fortnight before. To any one who was privileged to hear both performances the contrast in the reception of the audience and in the audience itself must necessarily have seemed a significant feature.

We are apt, if we notice audiences at all, to think of them as numbering few or many friends, or more or less paper. Applause we refer in quality and quantity to the type or the execution of the work; we forget that audiences vary as much in heat as the stars themselves in glory. But one trip to Boston, one pilgrimage to the Mecca that is Symphony Hall arouses our keenest analysis of the public, and we return to find new charms in the inhabitants of Carnegie and Aeolian.

Half an hour before the Boston Symphony players officiate at their own altar a radius of four blocks is crowded with votaries, most of them approaching in street cars, many parking their own motors, very few being brought to the temple steps by their chauffeurs. A good many women come veiled and hatless, for none may listen with head covered by anything except "a low headcovering without projection," which even Bostonians would shrink from, and the removal of headgear would disturb the sacred atmosphere.

Once seated one notices the audience at prayer, so to speak. There is no lobby for recalcitrant latecomers, no standing room for the masses. A dignified dedocracy has provided some fifty rows of orchestral seats and balconies that might almost be boxes. Here the critics sit, ready to escape by upper doors to the fastnesses of their own studies. A Boston critic never goes out to tea. Such beverages might curdle his reactions before they are committed to paper.

Those who fill the seats, and the seats are filled, seem to have done so for generations. One never gives a seat away in Boston. One bequeathes it to one's grandchildren. One never meets a friend on Beacon street at 3:10 and says, "Come, let's hear Monteux this afternoon." One influences one's great-aunt to remember one in her will so that one may sit within three rows of one's second cousin when the said greataunt dies.

Armed with the most copious of program books, which actually provide serious musical reading matter for the intermission, the Boston audience is chary of applause. When a new and somewhat difficult work was played, there was quite a pause. Then, having decided that Monteux must be right to put it on, the audience clapped loyally. When the composer came to the stage there was more applause, but no danger of riot. The hundreds of Anglo Saxon faces never moved an eyelid, except for one dear old patriarch who looked down his beard until he found the "Oberon" overture at the end of the program and heaved a patient sigh. "At least there will be some of the music I like," he said.

There may be other types of audiences in Boston, and Jordan Hall may contain spontaneous enthusiasts, but Bostonians assure one that musical interest is confined either to the Symphony or to the past. At times they appear synonymous.

Transplanted to New York the same program took on a different color. The new symphony that one had thought cerebral appeared almost passionate. The audience, though of half the size seemed to have come by its own will, not because of the testament of its ancestors. And it clapped as soon as the last note died away.

A superficial inquiry into this very startling contrast at once lights on the racial differences between the music lovers of the two cities. There are more dark skinned, smouldering eyed Southern Europeans in Carnegie Hall. The upper galleries provide for many who can afford little more than a car fare.

Then again the Carnegie lobbies are crowded with last minute purchasers who may have met on the avenue like spark and tinder and ignited with a wish to hear some music. A holiday enthusiasm results calculated to produce little head shaking but much hand clapping.

The very number and variety of New York concerts imply a similar variety in the audience. The Philadelphia Orchestra lures dinner jackets and tinseled coiffures, the Sunday symphonies attract husbands and wives in Episcopalian broadcloth, the popular priced Philharmonics draw family parties to hear how Wagner sounds after the phonograph records, there is the Saturday night opera audience and the Monday night opera audience, and never the twain shall meet, except in the museums. There is the central European audience with miniature scores and comparative criticism, there is the Chaliapin audience with hoarse cries and many beards, there is the papered debut with stolid listeners, smiling to get something for nothing.

Such diversity must not be compared with a single experience in another city. Out of Chelsea may redemption come to set even Symphony Hall aflame with zeal. Symphonies have issued before now from Medbury and symphonic poems from Cambridge. But so marked was the effect produced by a single program on the two cities, so differently did the two audiences react, that it is safe to assume that something beyond the particular brand of people that heard the music in either town accounted for the contrast between Hunt-

FR Feb 3

EVENING JOURNAL

New York City

Mr. Monteux in the evening offered a most interesting programme. It consisted of the first performance here of Karel Szymanowski's Second Symphony (which Walter Damrosch abandoned in the rehearsal stage earlier in the season); the "Morceau symphonique" from Franck's "Redemption"; the orchestral suite made by Alfredo Casella from his "choreographic comedy," "Le couvent sur l'eau" with its delicious "Pas des vieilles dames" and, finally, the overture to Weber's "Oberon."

One other concert on the day's schedule was a piano recital last evening in Aeolian Hall by Victor Wittgenstein.

[86]

Youthful Letter of Nikisch Tells of Praise from Liszt

Conducting in Seventies Regarded as Something Outside Domain of Conservatory Training

By WINTHROP P. TRYON

Documents and anecdotes for a biography of Arthur Nikisch can be gathered in almost any quarter of the musical world. For Nikisch, though not such a traveler as many another opera and symphony conductor, had friends everywhere; and to those of them who were near him he talked much, while to those who were away from him he wrote much. The sooner the available facts about the man are brought together and discussed, doubtless the better for the cause of musical history. In the biographical chapter herewith given, an early letter of Nikisch's is quoted and the old-school view of the training of conductors is noted.

In 1877, at the very outset of his career as a public performer, Nikisch traveled with the famous violinist, Wieniawski, assisting him at his concerts as piano accompanist. Early in March of that year he found himself at Budapest. Delighted with his experiences there, which included meeting Liszt, and concerned at the same time about his duties as player in the Vienna Opera Orchestra, which he was soon to resume, he wrote to a youthful fellow-musician a letter, which, freely translated from the German, runs as follows:

Pest, 3—3. 1877.

Dearest friend:

The twenty-seventh of February was one of the most glorious days of my life.

Let me begin with our first concert. Wieniawski, of course, as everywhere, was almost worshiped; and his success was immense. After the concert, there was a party—all men—at Liszt's; and think of it! I was invited personally by Liszt, whom I meet every day. You may be sure I did not fail to attend.

After the supper, Liszt played the piano! And how! You will not expect me to describe the indescribable. After that, Liszt and others, including Wieniawski, went into another room to play whist. Inasmuch as the men who remained with me conversed in Hungarian, and insamuch, too, as the doors between the two rooms seemed to be tightly closed, I sat down at the piano and started to play whatever came into my head. I played long and much, one of my pieces being the C major fantasy of Schumann's.

Approved by Liszt

As I have just indicated, I thought I could not be heard. You may, therefore, be able to imagine my astonishment when finishing the Schumann fantasy, to have Liszt come out through the door, approach me, hug me, kiss me and praise me in the most flattering way, assuring me that he was immeasurably happy to find in me a genuinely artistic nature.

Wieniawski afterwards told me that Liszt, during the whole time of playing, most attentively listened, and repeatedly commended my interpretation. The interesting point in the whole affair was his approval of my playing of a passage in the fantasie in a manner contrary to the markings of the composer. It seems that Liszt has changed the directions for the playing of this passage, to suit his own ideas, and that he insists on his pupils' practicing it his way. Now I have always played this passage according to my individual fancy; and my way happened to correspond exactly with that of Liszt—a circumstance which pleased him hugely.

Am I right, now, to call this day one of the most glorious of my life? It is beyond me to tell you how happy I am. And yet, my excursion, which has been so rich in joyous experiences, is unfortunately soon to end.

Yesterday we made our second appearance. After the concert, Wieniawski gave a great banquet, at which Liszt was present. During the feast a gypsy band entertained us. And no mistake, those fellows played beautifully.

On Tuesday next we shall appear in Pressburg, when our tour ends. On Wednesday morning I shall arrive in Vienna. I beg you most earnestly, dear ——, to send my violin in the morning to my house, as most probably I shall have to play on Wednesday evening at the opera; and I have not touched my violin for five full weeks. I think I ought to play a few finger exercises and scales to [illegible]

And now I send you a thousand heartfelt greetings to all your dear ones and all my dear Vienna friends; and I remain

Your most affectionate friend, ARTHUR.

Studying at Conservatory

The young man whom Wieniawski chose to play accompaniments for him, and whom Liszt, at his house in Budapest, commended, was a brilliant pianist, we may be sure. Playing accompaniments on the piano for soloists, whether singers or violin players, was one of the things, indeed, for which in after years Nikisch won distinction. By the majority, perhaps, of European musicians, he was regarded as the first accompanist of his day. But conducting, rather than accompanying, is what, undoubtedly, he will be best remembered for.

Should the question be asked concerning Nikisch—who taught him to conduct?—the answer would have to be—nobody. For in the seventies, when he was a student, along with Emil Pauer, Gustav Mahler and Felix Mottl, at the Vienna Conservatory, conducting was not regarded as a subject that could be taught. Predecessors of Nikisch's, like Liszt, von Bülow and Herbeck, and contemporaries of his as well, like Richter, Mahler, Mottl and Seidl, were trained in every line that was supposed to be related to their profession; but they were never given formal lessons in conducting. Far from it. They would, without doubt, all of them have thought the thing ridiculous; because, according to their view, and according to the view of musicians generally in their periods, conducting is a native gift, which some persons have, and which others have not. They would not have entertained for a moment the notion that it could be imparted to anybody by process of education.

On Teaching Conductors

How they justified this theory to their intelligences and their consciences, is not clear, unless they were convinced of a resemblance existing between conductors and poets. And yet, the facts on which they built their theory are plain to see. Some musicians, like those just named, were good conductors; while others, like Schumann, Brahms and Rubinstein, were poor conductors. Some, apparently, could not help conducting well. Others—more particularly illustrious composers—never succeeded, with all the opportunity in the world, in conducting even their own works well. The question whether Schumann, Brahms and Rubinstein might not have been made passable conductors, had they, at a suitable time in their student days, been taught something of the technique of directing an orchestra or a chorus by an accomplished professor of conducting, is too large a one for offhand answer; so, too, is the question whether modern heads of music schools have given conducting the place it ought to have in the curriculum. But all that aside, an incident which old student friends of Nikisch refer to may be noted, as illustrating the idea that conductors are conductors almost, in some instances, in spite of themselves.

Délibes a Born Conductor

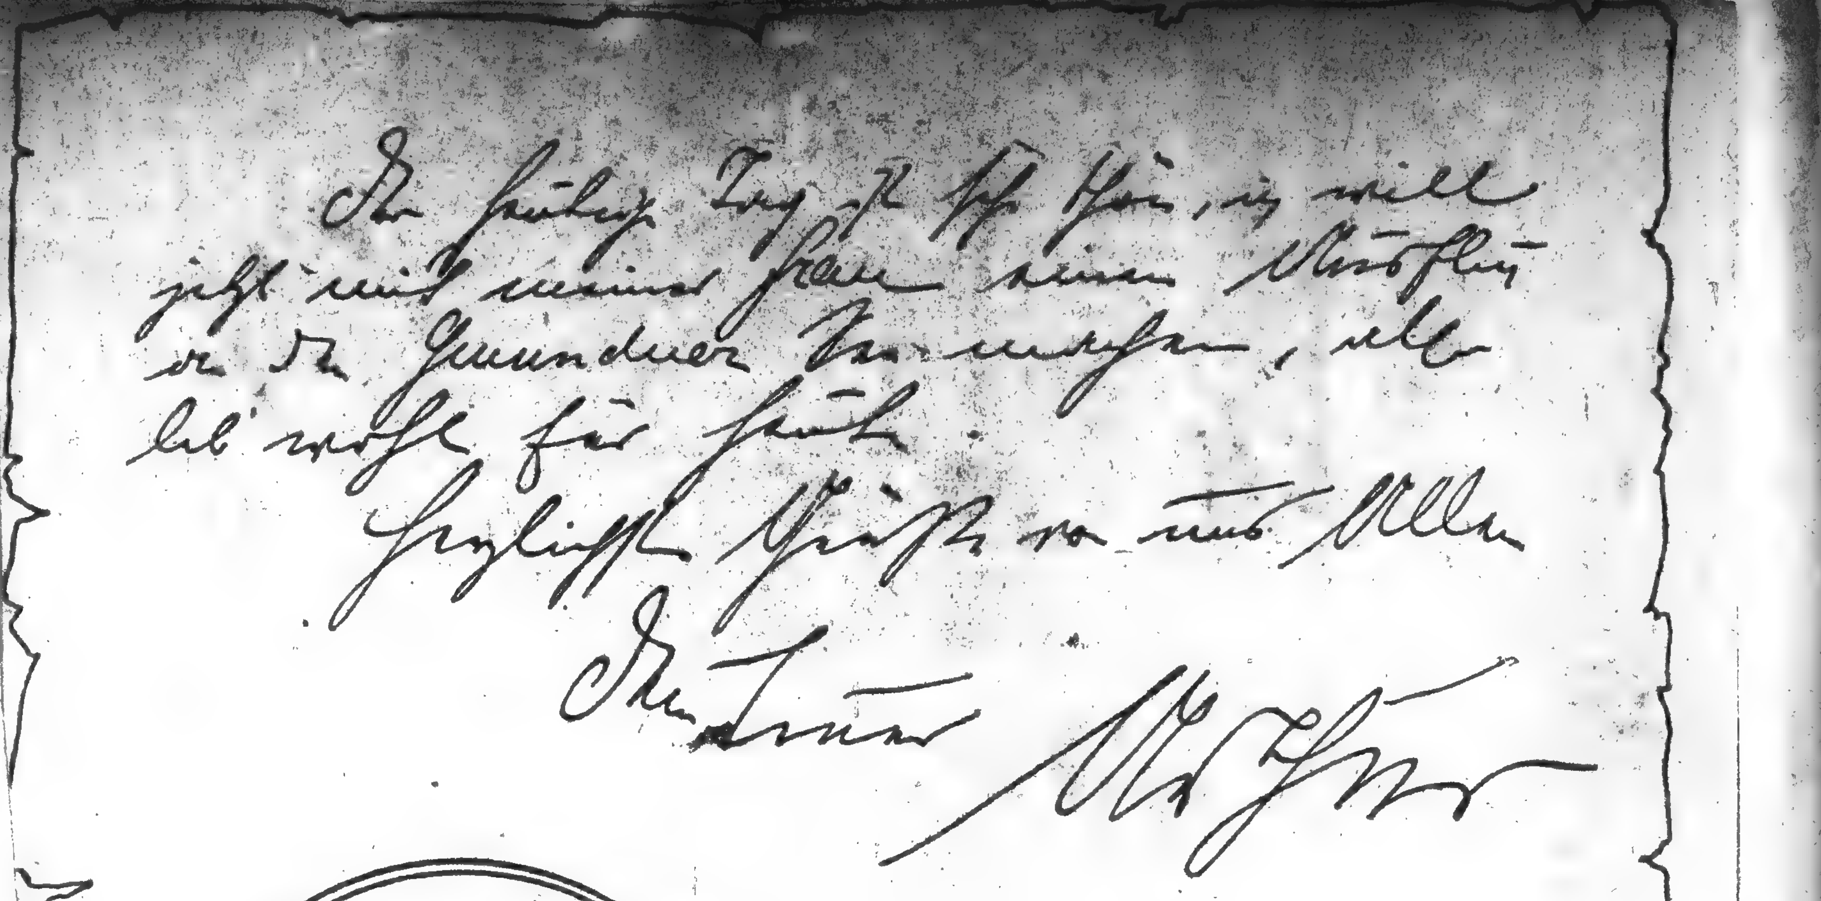
When Nikisch was a young man at Vienna, Leo Délibes, the French composer, visited the town to superintend the production of his ballet, "Coppélia," which had lately been highly acclaimed at Paris. Now Délibes, so he supposed, was there in the character of composer only. He had no intention of doing anything but looking on and helping the stage-director and the music-director with advice. The manager of the opera house, however, wishing to pay him a compliment, and at the same time to make the first performance of the ballet in Vienna a brilliant occasion, asked Délibes, so the story runs, to conduct.

"But," protested Délibes, "I do not know how to conduct."

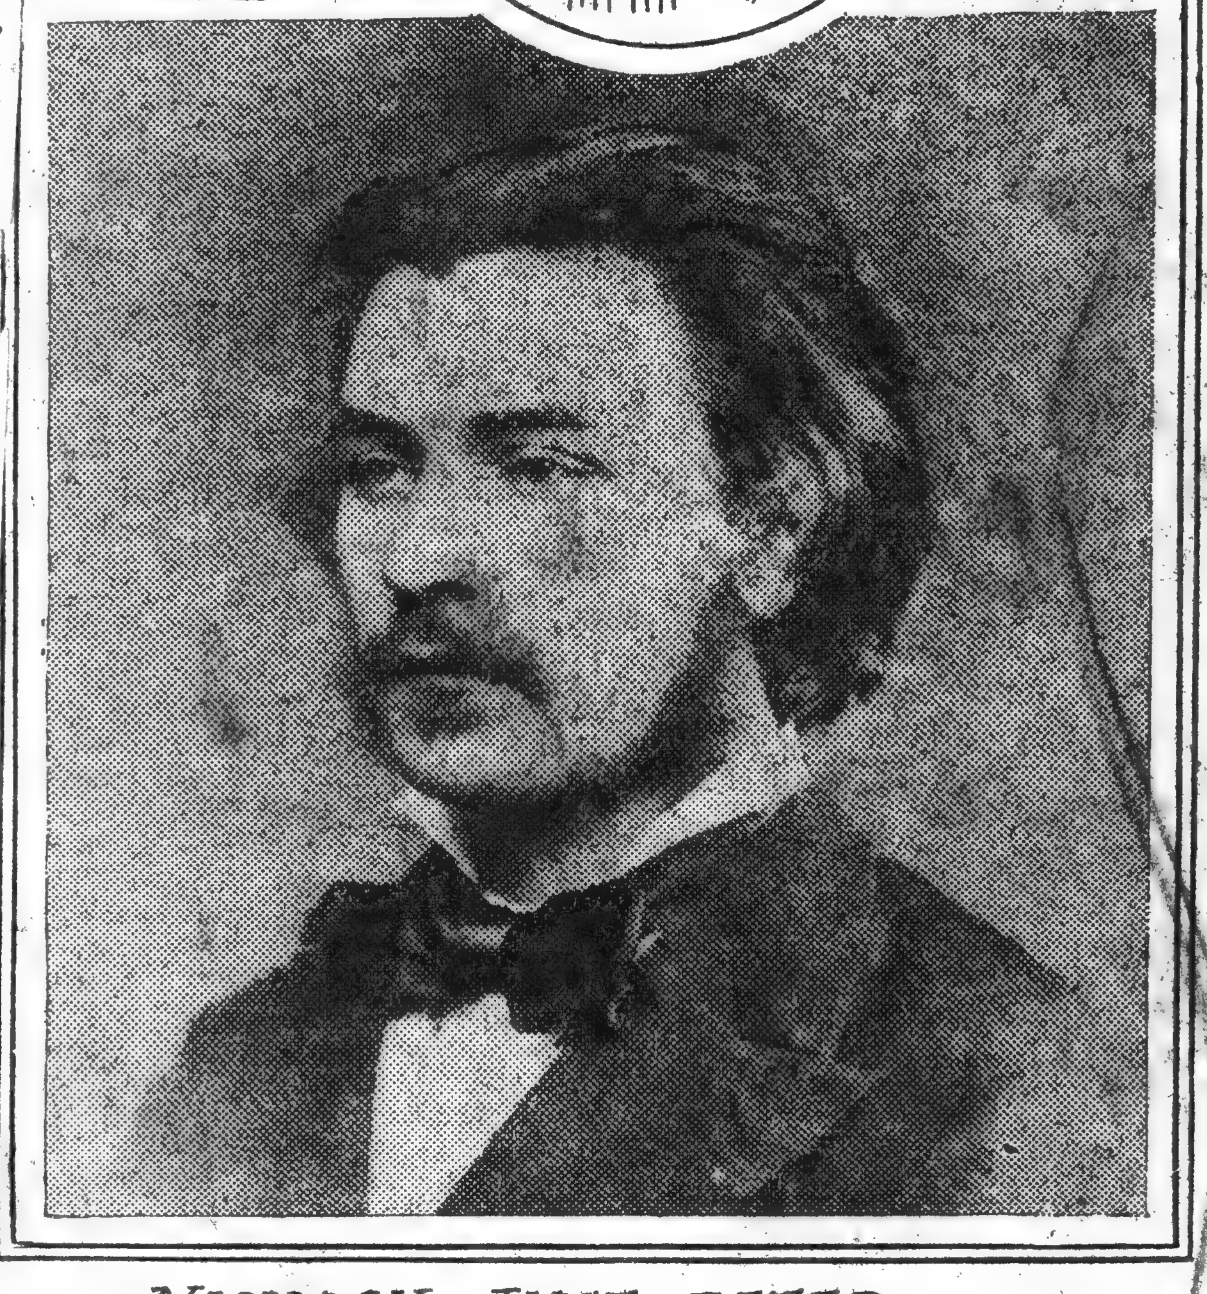
"Please do, just the same," insisted the manager.

So, finally, he did. And young Nikisch—was he not at that time a violinist in the opera house orchestra?—is said to have been so impressed that he pronounced the composer of "Coppélia" a conductor of the highest order. Nor was he surprised, forsooth, that Délibes proved to be a master with the baton the first time seriously trying. Composers, indeed, often conduct drearily; but here was a composer who conducted gloriously.

It was something, truly, for even the most important ballet composer of the nineteenth century to be called a fine conductor by young Nikisch, who was himself recognized by no less a man than Liszt as one of the great musicians of the [illegible]



CONCLUSION OF LETTER IN GERMAN SIGNED "ARTHUR"



NIKISCH JUST AFTER LEAVING CONSERVATORY

NIKISCH AT LEIPSIC IN THE EIGHTIES

MONITOR — FEB-4.

FROM FEB 2 1922 X
Evening Globe
New York

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays a Symphony by Szymanovski.

The name of Karol Szymanovski has been appearing on recital programmes here of late, but not until last evening was a large work by this young Russian composer played here. The work in question is his second symphony in B flat major, and it opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. This symphony is in two sections—the first, an allegro moderato; the second, a theme with variations—there being seven variations, followed by a fugue.

The first section is based on two principal themes—one, according to the programme notes, "vigorous and manly; the other episodic and womanly." Alas, did the wicked nurse mix up the babies in the cradle? From the evidence supplied by the composer it was difficult indeed last night to decide which was which, and even if you reached a decision, cui bono?

"Damn variations, anyway!" laconically remarked William IV. when at a soirée in Buckingham Palace he heard a lady playing on the pianoforte "God Save the King" with variations. The reaction to fugues of the monarch in question has not been handed down to posterity. Though the Sailor King was notoriously no mincer of words, it would perhaps have been unutterable save on the quarter deck of a man-of-war in a hurricane. Mr. Szymanovski composed this symphony over ten years ago, and it is said to have now a secure place in the concert repertory of central Europe. So no tears need be shed on the hitherside of the Atlantic Ocean. There was persistent applause after the symphony until Mr. Szymanovski, who is now residing in New York, rose from his seat in a box and bowed his acknowledgments. For the sake of the record one adds that Mr. Monteux omitted two of the variations.

The programme continued with the symphonic piece from César Franck's "Redemption." French conductors seem to believe implicitly in this piece, though it never shows Franck at his best, and some passages recall less the Belgo-French composer than Liszt at his cheapest. However, it was played persuasively, and the audience received it most cordially.

Then followed four movements from the five-part suite taken by Alfredo Casella from his unperformed ballet "Le Couvent sur l'eau." All of these pieces, played with great spirit, won favor from the audience. Indeed, the "Dance of the Old Ladies," most clever and whimsical in its orchestration, might have been repeated if the Boston Symphony Orchestra indulged in "encores." Mr. Casella wrote this music in 1911, and, with the exception of the last movement, "Nocturne; Danse Finale," it gives scarcely an intimation of the composer's later and more "futuristic" style. Indeed, aside from the orchestration, best in the "Dance of the Old Ladies," the other movements played yesterday sound rather banal. The score is dedicated to Mr. Monteux, and he conducted a performance calculated to reveal the work at its best.

He also conducted an exceedingly noteworthy performance of the overture to "Oberon," which concluded the concert, a performance in harmony with the very highest traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was technically superb, most euphonious, richly lyrical, and of a commanding brilliance. The overture to "Oberon," always a hard-worked composition, has done especially hard service since the Metropolitan Opera House revived for a while the opera that it prefaces, and yet this war-worn piece was really the feature of last night's concert.

The audience was of only moderate size, but it was quick of response and ready with applause.

[67]

AGLE FEB 4 1922 D
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony at Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth in its series of concerts here last evening at the Academy of Music and Conductor Pierre Monteux presented a program that deftly combined the grave and gay. The opening number was the Beethoven Symphony in A major and under Mr. Monteux's suave direction all the charm of this familiar composition was brought out in fullest measure. The first movement with its pastoral suggestion was exquisitely played and the restrained force and harmony of the last movement won a spontaneous measure of applause from the big audience.

Two nocturnes by Debussy aroused special attention. The first, termed "Nuages" is a characteristically elusive bit of composition that would have been monotonous in its grayness were it not for the color note introduced in the sharp accents of the horn and the ripple of the harps. The second, "Fetes," was in marked contrast, every player apparently striving to make his instrument the special messenger of the spirit of joyousness that pervades the number. It was fete music that would have been appropriate anywhere but peculiarly expressed the French interpretation of gaiety.

The soloist was Jean Bedetti, cellist of the orchestra, who played the concerto in A minor for cello and orchestra by Saint Saens, and did it excellently. With dextrous fingering and lovely smooth tones he made his cello sing like a talented vocalist through the entire three movements. The orchestral accompaniment rounded out a most satisfactory performance. After he had been recalled several times Mr. Bedetti slipped back into his place in the orchestra and contributed his share to the rendition of the two dances by Dvorak that completed the program. These dances were designated Slavonic and they depicted the vivacity characteristic of Slav music and were played with so much spirit that they contributed a joyous finale to a delightful concert.

HERALD
New York City
FEB 3 - 1922 H

Boston Orchestra Plays New Symphony

Great Expectations Poor in Fulfillment From Performance of Music by Polish Composer.

BY W. [illegible] HENDERSON.

The fourth Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was rich in promise but poor in fulfillment. The great expectations were aroused by the announcement that a symphony by an almost unknown composer would be produced. This composer is a Pole, Karol Szymanowski by name, and the symphony was his second. Reports of large doings by this still young musician had drifted across the Western ocean, and since Poles had done so much in the tone world no astonishment was caused by the stories.

The symphony left the great expectations unsatisfied. It proved to be a very ambitious work, but not one which impressed any warm convictions upon the minds of its hearers. The composition is in two movements, the first an allegro moderato and the second a theme and variations with a short finale consisting of an introduction and fugue. The composer betrayed his eagerness for novelty by beginning his first movement with the proclamation of the fundamental theme by a violin solo.

The development of the thematic material was sufficiently logical to entitle Mr. Szymanowski to commendation for his grasp of form. If he had been content to present his developments in plain instrumental speech without disguising them in such a motley garb of orchestration, strings divided so often and in so many different ways, fragmentary exclamations from so many voices, inconsequential and rudely obtrusive solo effects and mass combinations apparently designed merely to stun the ear, he might have given us a first movement with solid merit to commend it.

But it quickly became manifest that Mr. Szymanowski's chief concern was not what he was going to say but how cleverly and variously he could say it. This was also the case with his theme and variations, although in this movement he attained at times more genuinely musical beauty than he did in the first. His introduction to the fugue was violent in character but mercifully short, while the fugue itself was a fugue by courtesy only. It started as if it meant indeed to be a fugue, but speedily wore itself out.

In melody and harmony the composer proved himself to be quite up with the contemporaneous procession. Broken lines in melodic progression and harmonic sequences built on separations rather than relations are very dear to all these young adventurers. They tell us that music is the youngest of the arts and that it must make progress. This indeed all music lovers admit. But why so panting an eagerness to make music, heavenly maid, old before her time? Why not let her grow old gracefully? Or better still, why not help her to remain perpetually youthful, fair and captivating?

The pride of celestial serenity is humbled in the dust by these clamorous makers of orchestral disturbance. Their music lacks repose, dignity, grace and pure, simple beauty. The music lover grows weary of the incessant battering of his ears by noises and ugly sounds. It is not the use of modern idioms, but the abuse of them that makes such music burdensome. No music lover of to-day wishes to confine composers to the primitive ways of Haydn or Mozart. But there are moderns and moderns, and those who have messages to deliver find responsive hearers.

After Mr. Szymanowski's symphony Conductor Pierre Monteux directed the gentlemen of Boston in the familiar symphonic piece from Cesar Franck's "Redemption," Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" excerpts, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." The audience was polite in its applause after the new symphony.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program will include the Schumann Symphony in B-flat major, the Handel concerto in F major for strings and wind orchestras, three short pieces by the Russian composer, Liadov, and the symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana.

EXTRA SYMPHONY BILL

Alfred Mirovitch, the gifted young Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the third extra Monday night Symphony concert, scheduled for February 13. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in E-flat, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Litzt's third symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the orchestral selections. Mirovitch will play the D minor concerts by Rubenstein.

DISP F

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

Alfred Mirovitch, the gifted young Russian pianist who has made an enviable name for himself since he first came to this country last season, will contribute to the splendid program that Mr Monteux has arranged for the third concert of the extra Monday evening series of five by the full Boston Symphony orchestra a week from tomorrow night, Feb. 13. The principal work on this program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Wagner will be represented by the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." The closing number will be Liszt's Third Symphonic poem, "The Preludes." That orchestral "tour de force," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after Goethe's ballad), by Dukas, which has become an important part of all symphonic repertoire, will also be played.

The brilliant Concerto in D minor, by Rubenstein, has been chosen by Mr. Mirovitch. Mirovitch is the only pupil of Mme. Essipov in this country. He is a cousin of Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Born in Petrograd in 18[illegible], he has played the piano since the age of 6. Several tours of Western Europe were interrupted by the world war, when he toured the Orient and thence came to America. His [illegible] concerts in New York following [illegible] here last year caused those who heard him to praise his artistry. An equally enthusiastic reception was accorded him in Boston when he gave a concert in Symphony Hall late last spring.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 4 1922

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Bedetti Appears as Soloist at the Academy of Music.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of a series of five, at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. The conventional programme, with Pierre Monteux leading, was rendered with the usual charm and finish of this orchestra's work.

Jean Bedetti, 'cello soloist, won much applause for his delightful rendition of Saint-Saens' Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A Minor, Opus. 33.

The other numbers on the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Opus 92, two nocturnes of Debussy and two Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be the first by Schumann in B-flat major. Handel's Concerto in F-major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras, postponed from an earlier concert, will also be played. There are in this work important solo passages for the double choir of wind instruments. Three short pieces based on folk tales by the Russian composer, Liadov, will be played: "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga." The closing number will be the symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana.

HERALD-FEB-5

Choosing a New Conductor

Speculations are being made in private and in the newspapers about the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season. Mr Monteux' contract expires this year, and it is rumored extensively that he will not return. The trustees have made no announcement, nor has Mr Monteux, so that all the talk is mere gossip. Yet whether or no the Symphony is again to change leaders the subject of choosing a new conductor is in the air, and open to random speculations.

If Mr Monteux succeeds himself for a new term of office the Symphony will have a leader who has greatly improved its capacity for good ensemble playing in the face of difficulties far more serious than any other conductor in the past 30 years has had to contend with. As Richard Aldrich said of him the other day in the New York Times, he is "respected as a capable, intelligent and vigorous conductor of wide sympathies." His good humored yet dignified behavior in public, his admirable choice of programs, and the really brilliant performances he has often given us of music that happens to be especially congenial to his temperament all count heavily in Mr Monteux's favor.

We might go farther and fare much worse. But Mr Monteux cannot to the ultra fastidious satisfy the demand Maj Higginson used to make of the conductors he chose; that they should be thoroughly in sympathy with the great classics as well as with modern music. The recently published "Life and Letters of Maj Higginson" revealed among other interesting new data about the orchestra the fact that Dr Muck had resigned before his arrest, and was to have left in any event at the end of that season.

Maj Higginson had previously expressed the intention of abandoning the orchestra, because as he wrote to Pres Eliot July 9, 1917, "I could not keep the orchestra going without Dr Muck, and should not try. In the first place conductors who like old and new music are very rare; next, Dr Muck is the most industrious, painstaking and the ablest conductor we have ever had . . . I do not want the modern men, that is, the men who [illegible] in the modern music only, and [illegible] little respect for [illegible] tomorrow, I [illegible] look for a conductor in Europe."

Shortage of Great Conductors

This statement of the difficulty of choosing a new conductor, coming from the man who built up the finest orchestra America has yet known, is striking, and not much exaggerated. Every other orchestra in the country is at present suffering from the lack of a really great leader, equally at home in Mozart and Stravinsky, in Beethoven and Strauss. Boston cannot better her orchestra by taking Stransky or Damrosch from New York, Stock from Chicago, or Stokowski from Philadelphia.

Three Italians, each best known as an operatic conductor, are the only men heard in this country of late years as who have possible qualifications for Mr Monteux's job. Toscanini, Polacco and Marinuzzi, if that indefinable, but definitely recognizable personal impetus called "temperament" is to be the test. To them should be added Weingartner and Mengelberg.

In Europe there are few outstanding figures among conductors. Richard Strauss and Dr Muck are ineligible because of the late unpleasantness, assuming that either of them could be bribed to come here. Nikisch is dead, and the few other notable German conductors, such as Bruno Walter in Munich, are fully occupied at home, if it were deemed advisable to let bygones be bygones.

So with France and England. It does not seem likely that either Sir Henry Wood or any other well known Englishman or Frenchman would excel Mr Monteux in temperament or in wide range of musical sympathies. There is no Spaniard, Dane or Pole, or Czecho-Slovak, with a world-wide reputation as a conductor open to possible persuasion to come to us.

The trouble with the Italians named is that, Toscanini excepted, they have won reputation only by operatic conducting and have shown no evidence of sympathy for German classics. Mr Mengelberg is said to have refused the conductorship here in the past because he would have to give up his work in Amsterdam. Mr Weingartner, like Strauss and Bruno Walter, is Teutonic, and one doubts the expediency even now of appointing a German or Austrian conductor, because the fact would cause unfavorable comment.

Unless we are to experiment with an untried man who has shown marked promise, preferably, if possible, an American, it boils down to either bribing Toscanini away from La Scala in Milan or keeping Monteux. There are others, Casella, for instance, who seem to have many of the necessary qualifications, but there is nobody to be found without painstaking search who would come here with an assured reputation as well founded as was and is Mr Monteux' made as conductor of first-rank orchestras. And it should not be forgotten that Toscanini and his temperament would have drawbacks. If Monteux is to leave us, the chances are that, as in the case of the Papacy, it will be someone not among those mentioned in advance who is finally chosen.

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday at 8; Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program: Symphony in B Flat, No. 1, Schumann; Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, Handel; Three Symphonic Pieces, Liadov; "Wallenstein's Camp," Smetana. There is no soloist.

Boston Symphony in Third Extra Concert

The third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra series of five will be given at Symphony Hall next Monday night, Feb 13, with Alfred Mirovitch as soloist. He will play Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor. The orchestra will give more attractive selections, including Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," in B minor; the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

GLOBE-FEB-5

New York Discusses Monteux's Successor

New York has begun blandly to assume that when the contract of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expires at the end of this season he will not look for its renewal. This assurance is given quite definitely by Richard Aldrich of the Times, although no statement has come from Boston. Guesses on the subject have been in progress among New England musicians for some time, but it is safe to say that many Providence concertgoers, to whom Mr. Monteux has endeared himself, will be surprised at the possibility of his retirement.

In Boston and other New England cities Mr. Monteux has won a convincing degree of approval. His New York experience has been less happy. Taking the orchestra at a time when it was badly upset by the Muck episode, he had difficulty with it on its first New York appearance, and only slowly did he win his way. Not till the end of last season, in fact, did he convince the last of the doubting Thomases among New York critics that he possessed qualities worth praising. Meanwhile, it is reported that the New York concerts of the orchestra have been less successful financially than they were in years before.

Should Mr. Aldrich be well informed, the trustees of the orchestra have no simple task before them. As Mr. Aldrich points out, they would have two alternatives—either to engage at inflated salary some conspicuous figure, or to select someone of achievement plus promise and rely on him to develop himself at the same time he develops the orchestra. "There is danger in both courses," says the New York writer, continuing:

"If you pick the man of supposed talent, you may saddle yourself with a mediocrity; and this has happened in regrettable instances. To do it successfully you must have the prescience and the judgment of men and musicianship and of musical promise that will be able to select a man not yet famous, and perhaps not yet wholly developed, who has the qualities that give him the potency of development.

"On the other hand, is it wise to pay an enormous salary for the great reputation of a noted conductor of the "prima donna" class? There are grave objections to doing so, some of which are rooted in facts of human nature. When you pay a famous man, say, $45,000 for conducting half a season, it may justly be said that he cannot possibly give you $45,000 worth of conducting in that period. But the trouble is he will try to. He will be almost irresistibly impelled to demonstrate to his employers and the public that he can do what other men cannot."

The blow to true musical art which this latter mood invites is obvious.

Recent Affairs in Realm of Music

American concert goers have especial reason to mourn the sudden death of Arthur Nikisch. It is reported that for next year a tour of this country had been arranged for him, and that nearly every orchestra in the United States had invited him as "guest conductor." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose third conductor he was, was represented at the funeral by a wreath.

PROV. JOURNAL-FEB-5

MONTEUX GIVES SUPERB CONCERT AT AUDITORIUM

Great Frenchman Delights the 2,500 Enthusiastic Music Lovers.

BY G. WATSON JAMES, JR.

Fully 2,500 Richmond music lovers plowed their way through snow drift and slush to the City Auditorium last night, in order to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, with Jean Bedetti, cellist, as the soloist.

We have Mrs. Wilson-Greene to thank for making possible the appearance of this superb organization, which set another milestone in the onward march of this city toward a genuine artistic and musical culture.

Last night's program represented, with one exception—that of Richard Strauss—the Alpha and Omega of orchestra development—Beethoven to Wagner.

Many, it is true, will say we have heard the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, Op. 67 (the fifth), and the Wagner "Tannhauser" Overture. Yes, we have, but let me remind them, that they have seen many copies of the Mona Lisa, but few have gazed on the original. We have heard orchestras give Beethoven's works, but last night we heard Beethoven in all his tragic brooding, somber tonal beauty, and joyous frenzy of musical rapture. The lion-headed Teuton soared as never before in Richmond. Monteux's triple choir of strings, wood-wind and brass poured out the very heart of the master from a period of his life when he was sure of his greatness and defied the cant of his enemies to drown out the majesty of his song.

Monteux's orchestra and conducting were to many (who had heard Toscanini and the La Scala give the same work) a deep study in contrast. The distinguished Frenchman was not as vivid, or tense in his reading of the score as one heard in the great Italian; his climaxes were under far better control and breathed the very essence of refinement. He never once allowed his men to break bounds as was the case with Toscanini, notable in what was programmed as the Allegro Trio and Allegro, sometimes called the Scherzo-Finale. Beethoven in this symphony not only connects the third and fourth movements, but also introduces a reminiscence of the former in the latter, and Monteux had not only due regard for this, but he realized that a scherzo of Beethoven is far different from the usual acceptation of the word.

One of the great delights of the Boston Symphony is its utmost precision in execution and suavity of tone. There is a richness and ensemble that generally disarms criticism, and has won for it, the world over, the title of the best organization that culture and musicianship can produce.

The Boston Symphony, playing Beethoven, affords another study in solidity, the very heart of orchestral playing. Solidity is produced by two means; good writing for the strings, in other words, a proper dispersal of the harmony, which we have to the nth degree in the German composer, and a knowledge of the strength of each instrument. In this organization we not only have solidity, but a great flexibility, a wide range of tone, and above all, a group of men—all soloists—who are subservient to the will of their conductor, and who in pianissimo, forte, release and attack speak as one voice. There is a certain tenseness and reserve which always impresses the hearer that they could give more and more—and as the violinist would say, never reach wood.

M. Monteux's reading of the "Tannhauser" Overture in many respects overshadowed the rest of the orchestral numbers. It was truly the tribute of one artist to another. When has one heard such sonority, such variety of tonal color or balance? It is hard to recall. There was a sweep to his crescendos that fairly brought the audience to their feet. When has been heard such [illegible] a stirring sea of sound as he drew from his orchestra. Monteux's Wagner was a revelation. When will we be privileged again, is a question which will engage the minds of those who love the best and beautiful in orchestral playing and conducting.

Yes, it was a memorable concert. Beethoven in the heydey of his powers, and Wagner just pruning his wings to soar to those transcending heights of Parsifal, and the orchestra—all of which reminds me that I once said "to hear Toscanini conduct the C minor Op. 67 was to ride on the tail of a comet"—if this be true, then to hear Monteux conduct the same is to soar on the winbs of a dove.

Even the stage was decorated. Boston always could work wonders.

RICHMOND DISPATCH-JAN 31.

FROM FEB 1 1922 E
STAR,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As finely balanced, executed and led program as ever has been heard in Washington was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra demonstrated, on its first appearance here this season, that it has "come back," and is now on a par with any other orchestra in the country, bar none.

Under the baton of M. Monteux, the orchestra played with a verve and precision that was a revelation, at the same time securing a depth of tone that was astonishing. The program indicated the excellent taste of the conductor, comprising some of the world's immortal music. Russia, Norway, France and Germany were represented. Peter Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, formed the first section.

The four movements of the symphony constituted a musical treat, being presented with the greatest attention to detail; at the same time the grand conception of the symphony as a whole was ably kept in mind. The andante sostenuto movement was a gem, and the andantino movement no less enjoyable. It was in the scherzo, however, that the orchestra revealed the ability which it now possesses as a body, and which its members possess as individual musicians. Playing pizziacoto throughout, this fetching movement became a veritable water color in tone, being crisp, clean and without flaw. At the end of the movement the audience accorded the conductor and the players an ovation. The finale was no less effective, forming a climax to as superb a presentation of this favorite symphony as has ever been the pleasure of local music lovers to hear.

Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris," with its contrasting themes, now gay and clashing, now sweet and melting, alternately thrilled and charmed the audience. This episode for full orchestra must be reckoned with the master compositions, combining as it does real melody of the highest type and grace with the cleverest of orchestration. Two nocturnes by Debussy followed, "Nuages" and "Fetes," the second being the more enjoyable.

Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," with its inspiring measures, and use of the brass choir, which closed the program, held the audience until the last note. Repeated applause forced the conductor to return and bow appreciation. Taken as a whole and in its individual numbers, the program was of the highest type, melodious and masterly, and it does not seem possible that the playing could have been excelled. A great orchestra has taken its rightful place among orchestras.

FROM FEB 2 1922 M
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

MUSIC

By J. O. L.

The Boston Symphony.

It was an inestimable privilege last evening to hear once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave one of the most satisfying performances that any orchestra has presented in the Lyric for many a season. There are certain features, qualities one might better say, about the Boston orchestra that it apart from the other great symphonic organizations which visit us from time to time, and its return, after so long an absence, serves to accentuate these things. For mellowness of tone and round, suave beauty the string choir of this band stands alone. It has a timbre that is quite unique and there is a certain mellowness about the entire group of instruments, an exquisiteness about the wood wind and a richness of tone when the brasses are concerned that makes the student of these things again sense "the perfect instrument" of past years.

It is interesting to note, however, that the Boston orchestra in its present development is inherently a French orchestra, embued with the Gallic spirit of its French conductor. It plays with an extraordinary delicacy and finesse, a graceful sweetness that is very fascination. As a result of this an even, perfectly balanced musical fabric is produced in which no special choirs are obtruded. Mr. Monteux does not "pick out" certain phrases, accentuate certain

HERALD
w York City
FEB 3 - 1922 H

Boston Orchestra Plays New Symphony

Great Expectations Poor in Fulfillment From Performance of Music by Polish Composer.

BY W. J. HENDERSON.

The fourth Thursday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening was rich in promise but poor in fulfillment. The great expectations were aroused by the announcement that a symphony by an almost unknown composer would be produced. This composer is a Pole, Karol Szymanowski by name, and the symphony was his second. Reports of large doings by this still young musician had drifted across the Western ocean, and since Poles had done so much in the tone world no astonishment was caused by the stories.

The symphony left the great expectations unsatisfied. It proved to be a very ambitious work, but not one which impressed any warm convictions upon the minds of its hearers. The composition is in two movements, the first an allegro moderato and the second a theme and variations with a short finale consisting of an introduction and fugue. The composer betrayed his eagerness for novelty by beginning his first movement with the proclamation of the fundamental theme by a violin solo.

The development of the thematic material was sufficiently logical to entitle Mr. Szymanowski to commendation for his grasp of form. If he had been content to present his developments in plain instrumental speech without disguising them in such a motley garb of orchestration, strings divided so often and in so many different ways, fragmentary exclamations from so many voices, inconsequential and rudely obtrusive solo effects and mass combinations apparently designed merely to stun the ear, he might have given us a first movement with solid merit to commend.

But it quickly became manifest that Mr. Szymanowski's chief concern was not what he was going to say but how cleverly and variously he could say it. This was also the case with his theme and variations, although in this movement he attained at times more genuinely musical beauty than he did in the first. His introduction to the fugue was violent in character but mercifully short, while the fugue itself was a fugue by courtesy only. It started as if it meant indeed to be a fugue, but speedily wore itself out.

In melody and harmony the composer proved himself to be quite up with the contemporaneous procession. Broken lines in melodic progression and harmonic sequences built on separations rather than relations are very dear to all these young adventurers. They tell us that music is the youngest of the arts and that it must make progress. This indeed all music lovers admit. But why so panting an eagerness to make music, heavenly maid, old before her time? Why not let her grow old gracefully? Or better still, why not help her to remain perpetually youthful, fair and captivating?

The pride of celestial serenity is humbled in the dust by these clamorous makers of orchestral disturbance. The music lacks repose, dignity, grace and pure, simple beauty. The music lover grows weary of the incessant battering of his ears by noises and ugly sounds. It is not the use of modern idioms, but the abuse of them that makes such music burdensome. No music lover of to-day wishes to confine composers to the primitive ways of Haydn or Mozart. But there are moderns and moderns, and those who have messages to deliver find responsive hearers.

After Mr. Szymanowski's symphony Conductor Pierre Monteux directed the gentlemen of Boston in the familiar symphonic piece from Cesar Franck's "Redemption," Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" excerpts, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." The audience was polite in its applause after the new symphony.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 4 1922

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Bedetti Appears as Soloist at the Academy of Music.

Last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of a series of five, at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. The conventional programme, with Pierre Monteux leading, was rendered with the usual charm and finish of this orchestra's work.

Jean Bedetti, 'cello soloist, won much applause for his delightful rendition of Saint-Saens' Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A Minor, Opus. 33.

The other numbers on the programme were Beethoven's Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Opus 92, two nocturnes of Debussy and two Slavonic dances by Dvorak.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program will include the Schumann Symphony in B-flat major, the Handel concerto in F major for strings and wind orchestras, three short pieces by the Russian composer, Liadov, and the symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana.

EXTRA SYMPHONY BILL

Alfred Mirovitch, the gifted young Russian pianist, will be the soloist at the third extra Monday night Symphony concert, scheduled for February 13. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in E-flat, the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," Litzt's third symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" will be the orchestral selections. Mirovitch will play the D minor concerts by Rubenstein.

[illegible]

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

Alfred Mirovitch, the gifted young Russian pianist who has made an enviable name for himself since he first came to this country last season, will contribute to the splendid program that Mr. Monteux has arranged for the third concert of the extra Monday evening series of five by the full Boston Symphony orchestra a week from tomorrow night, Feb. 13. The principal work on this program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. Wagner will be represented by the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." The closing number will be Liszt's Third Symphonic poem, "The Preludes." That orchestral "tour de force," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after Goethe's ballad) by Dukas, which has become an important part of all symphonic repertories, will also be played.

The brilliant Concerto in D minor, by Rubenstein, has been chosen by Mr. Mirovitch. Mirovitch is the only pupil of Mme. Essipov in this country. He is a cousin of Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Born in Petrograd in 1884, he has played the piano since the age of 6. Several tours of eastern Europe were interrupted by the world war, when he toured the Orient and thence came to America. His several concerts in New York following his arrival here last year caused those who heard him to praise his artistry. An equally enthusiastic reception was accorded him in Boston when he gave a concert in Symphony Hall late last spring.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The symphony will be the first by Schumann in B-flat major. Handel's Concerto in F-major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras, postponed from an earlier concert, will also be played. There are in this work important solo passages for the double choir of wind instruments. Three short pieces based on folk tales by the Russian composer, Liadov, will be played: "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga." The closing number will be the symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana.

HERALD - FEB 5

Choosing a New Conductor

Speculations are being made in private and in the newspapers about the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season. Mr Monteux' contract expires this year, and it is rumored extensively that he will not return. The trustees have made no announcement, nor has Mr Monteux, so that all the talk is mere gossip. Yet whether or no the Symphony is again to change leaders the subject of choosing a new conductor is in the air, and open to random speculations.

If Mr Monteux succeeds himself for a new term of office, the Symphony will have a leader who has greatly improved its capacity for good ensemble playing in the face of difficulties far more serious than any other conductor in the past 30 years has had to contend with. As Richard Aldrich said of him the other day in the New York Times, he is "respected as a capable, intelligent and vigorous conductor of wide sympathies." His good humored yet dignified behavior in public, his admirable choice of programs, and the really brilliant performances he has often given us of music that happens to be especially congenial to his temperament all count heavily in Mr Monteux's favor.

We might go farther and fare much worse. But Mr Monteux cannot to the ultra fastidious satisfy the demand Maj Higginson used to make of the conductors he chose; that they should be thoroughly in sympathy with the great classics as well as with modern music. The recently published "Life and Letters of Maj Higginson" revealed among other interesting new data about the orchestra the fact that Dr Muck had resigned before his arrest, and was to have left in any event at the end of that season.

Maj Higginson had previously expressed the intention of abandoning the orchestra, because as he wrote to Pres Eliot July 8, 1917, "I could not keep the orchestra going without Dr Muck, and should not try. In the first place conductors who like old and new music are very rare; next, Dr Muck is the most industrious, painstaking and the ablest conductor we have ever had . . . I do not want the modern men, that is, the men who believe in the modern music only, and have little respect for the old music, and that is the tendency of the conductors . . . If peace came tomorrow, I should not know where to look for a conductor in Europe."

Shortage of Great Conductors

This statement of the difficulty of choosing a new conductor, coming from the man who built up the finest orchestra America has yet known, is striking, and not much exaggerated. Every other orchestra in the country is at present suffering from the lack of a really great leader, equally at home in Mozart and Stravinsky, in Beethoven and Strauss. Boston cannot better her orchestra by taking Stransky or Damrosch from New York, Stock from Chicago, or Stokowski from Philadelphia.

Three Italians, each best known as an operatic conductor, are the only men heard in this country of late years as who have possible qualifications for Mr Monteux's job. Toscanini, Polacco and Marinuzzi, if that indefinable, but definitely recognizable personal impetus called "temperament" is to be the test. To them should be added Weingartner and Mengelberg.

In Europe there are few outstanding figures among conductors. Richard Strauss and Dr Muck are ineligible because of the late unpleasantness, assuming that either of them could be bribed to come here. Nikisch is dead, and the few other notable German conductors, such as Bruno Walter in Munich, are fully occupied at home, if it were deemed advisable to let bygones be bygones.

So with France and England. It does not seem likely that either Sir Henry Wood or any other well known Englishman or Frenchman would excel Mr Monteux in temperament or in wide range of musical sympathies. There is no Spaniard, Dane or Pole, or Czecho-Slovak, with a world-wide reputation as a conductor open to possible persuasion to come to us.

The trouble with the Italians named is that, Toscanini excepted, they have won reputation only by operatic conducting and have shown no evidence of sympathy for German classics. Mr Mengelberg is said to have refused the conductorship here in the past because he would have to give up his work in Amsterdam. Mr Weingartner, like Strauss and Bruno Walter, is Teutonic, and one doubts the expediency even now of appointing a German or Austrian conductor, because the fact would cause unfavorable comment.

Unless we are to experiment with an untried man who has shown marked promise, preferably, if possible, an American, it boils down to either bribing Toscanini away from La Scala in Milan or keeping Monteux. There are others, Casella, for instance, who seem to have many of the necessary qualifications, but there is nobody to be found without painstaking search who would come here with an assured reputation as well founded as was and is Mr Monteux', made as conductor of first-rank orchestras. And it should not be forgotten that Toscanini and his temperament would have drawbacks. If Monteux is to leave us, the chances are that, as in the case of the Papacy, it will be someone not among those mentioned in advance who is finally chosen.

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday at 8; Boston Symphony Orchestra, 14th program: Symphony in B Flat, No. 1, Schumann; Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, Handel; Three Symphonic Pieces, Liadov; "Wallenstein's Camp," Smetana. There is no soloist.

Boston Symphony in Third Extra Concert

The third concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra series of five will be given at Symphony Hall next Monday night, Feb 13, with Alfred Mirovitch as soloist. He will play Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor. The orchestra will give more attractive selections, including Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," in B minor; the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

GLOBE - FEB - 5

New York Discusses Monteux's Successor

New York has begun blandly to assume that when the contract of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expires at the end of this season he will not look for its renewal. This assurance is given quite definitely by Richard Aldrich of the Times, although no statement has come from Boston. Guesses on the subject have been in progress among New England musicians for some time, but it is safe to say that many Providence concertgoers, to whom Mr. Monteux has endeared himself, will be surprised at the possibility of his retirement.

In Boston and other New England cities Mr. Monteux has won a convincing degree of approval. His New York experience has been less happy. Taking the orchestra at a time when it was badly upset by the Muck episode, he had difficulty with it on its first New York appearance, and only slowly did he win his way. Not till the end of last season, in fact, did he convince the last of the doubting Thomases among New York critics that he possessed qualities worth praising. Meanwhile, it is reported that the New York concerts of the orchestra have been less successful financially than they were in years before.

Should Mr. Aldrich be well informed, the trustees of the orchestra have no simple task before them. As Mr. Aldrich points out, they would have two alternatives—either to engage at inflated salary some conspicuous figure, or to select someone of achievement plus promise and rely on him to develop himself at the same time he develops the orchestra. "There is danger in both courses," says the New York writer, continuing:

"If you pick the man of supposed talent, you may saddle yourself with a mediocrity; and this has happened in regrettable instances. To do it successfully you must have the prescience and the judgment of men and musicianship and of musical promise that will be able to select a man not yet famous, and perhaps not yet wholly developed, who has the qualities that give him the potency of development.

"On the other hand, is it wise to pay an enormous salary for the great reputation of a noted conductor of the 'prima donna' class? There are grave objections to doing so, some of which are rooted in facts of human nature. When you pay a famous man, say, $45,000 for conducting half a season, it may justly be said that he cannot possibly give you $45,000 worth of conducting in that period. But the trouble is he will try to. He will be almost irresistibly impelled to demonstrate to his employers and the public that he can do what other men cannot."

The blow to true musical art which this latter mood invites is obvious.

Recent Affairs in Realm of Music

American concert goers have especial reason to mourn the sudden death of Arthur Nikisch. It is reported that for next year a tour of this country had been arranged for him, and that nearly every orchestra in the United States had invited him as "guest conductor." The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose third conductor he was, was represented at the funeral by a wreath.

PROV. JOURNAL - FEB - 5

MONTEUX GIVES SUPERB CONCERT AT AUDITORIUM

Great Frenchman Delights the 2,500 Enthusiastic Music Lovers.

BY G. WATSON JAMES, JR.

Fully 2,500 Richmond music lovers plowed their way through snow drift and slush to the City Auditorium last night, in order to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, with Jean Bedetti, cellist, as the soloist.

We have Mrs. Wilson-Greene to thank for making possible the appearance of this superb organization, which set another milestone in the onward march of this city toward a genuine artistic and musical culture.

Last night's program represented, with one exception—that of Richard Strauss—the Alpha and Omega of orchestra development—Beethoven to Wagner.

Many, it is true, will say we have heard the Beethoven C Minor Symphony, Op. 67 (the fifth), and the Wagner "Tannhauser" Overture. Yes, we have, but let me remind them, that they have seen many copies of the Mona Lisa, but few have gazed on the original. We have heard orchestras give Beethoven's works, but last night we heard Beethoven in all his tragic brooding, somber tonal beauty, and joyous frenzy of musical rapture. The lion-headed Teuton soared as never before in Richmond. Monteux's triple choir of strings, wood-wind and brass poured out the very heart of the master from a period of his life when he was sure of his greatness and defied the cant of his enemies to drown out the majesty of his song.

Monteux's orchestra and conducting were to many (who had heard Toscanini and the La Scala give the same work) a deep study in contrast. The distinguished Frenchman was not as vivid, or tense in his reading of the score as one heard in the great Italian; his climaxes were under far better control and breathed the very essence of refinement. He never once allowed his men to break bounds as was the case with Toscanini, notable in what was programmed as the Allegro Trio and Allegro, sometimes called the Scherzo-Finale. Beethoven in this symphony not only connects the third and fourth movements, but also introduces a reminiscence of the former in the latter, and Monteux had not only due regard for this, but he realized that a scherzo of Beethoven is far different from the usual acceptation of the word.

One of the great delights of the Boston Symphony is its utmost precision in execution and suavity of tone. There is a richness and ensemble that generally disarms criticism, and has won for it, the world over, the title of the best organization that culture and musicianship can produce.

The Boston Symphony, playing Beethoven, affords another study in solidity, the very heart of orchestral playing. Solidity is produced by two means; good writing for the strings, in other words, a proper dispersal of the harmony, which we have to the nth degree in the German composer, and a knowledge of the strength of each instrument. In this organization we not only have solidity, but a great flexibility, a wide range of tone, and above all, a group of men—all soloists—who are subservient to the will of their conductor, and who in pianissimo, forte, release and attack speak as one voice. There is a certain tenseness and reserve which always impresses the hearer that they could give more and more—and as the violinist would say, never reach wood.

M. Monteux's reading of the "Tannhauser" Overture in many respects overshadowed the rest of the orchestral numbers. It was truly the tribute of one artist to another. When has one heard such sonority, such variety of tonal color or balance? It is hard to recall. There was a sweep to his crescendos that fairly brought the audience to their feet. When has been heard such [illegible] beauty in the strings, or such a surging sea of sound as he drew from his orchestra. Monteux's Wagner was a revelation. When will we be privileged again, is a question which will engage the minds of those who love the best and beautiful in orchestral playing and conducting.

Yes, it was a memorable concert. Beethoven in the heydey of his powers, and Wagner just pruning his wings to soar to those transcending heights of Parsifal, and the orchestra—all of which reminds me that I once said "to hear Toscanini conduct the C minor Op. 67 was to ride on the tail of a comet"—if this be true, then to hear Monteux conduct the same is to soar on the winbs of a dove.

Even the stage was decorated. Boston always could work wonders.

RICHMOND DISPATCH. J-31.

FROM STAR, FEB 1 1922 E
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As finely balanced, executed and led program as ever has been heard in Washington was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra demonstrated, on its first appearance here this season, that it has "come back," and is now on a par with any other orchestra in the country, bar none.

Under the baton of M. Monteux, the orchestra played with a verve and precision that was a revelation, at the same time securing a depth of tone that was astonishing. The program indicated the excellent taste of the conductor, comprising some of the world's immortal music. Russia, Norway, France and Germany were represented. Peter Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, formed the first section.

The four movements of the symphony constituted a musical treat, being presented with the greatest attention to detail; at the same time the grand conception of the symphony as a whole was ably kept in mind. The andante sostenuto movement was a gem, and the andantino movement no less enjoyable. It was in the scherzo, however, that the orchestra revealed the ability which it now possesses as a body, and which its members possess as individual musicians. Playing pizziacoto throughout, this fetching movement became a veritable water color in tone, being crisp, clean and without flaw. At the end of the movement the audience accorded the conductor and the players an ovation. The finale was no less effective, forming a climax to as superb a presentation of this favorite symphony as has ever been the pleasure of local music lovers to hear.

Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris," with its contrasting themes, now gay and clashing, now sweet and melting, alternately thrilled and charmed the audience. This episode for full orchestra must be reckoned with the master compositions, combining as it does real melody of the highest type and grace with the cleverest of orchestration. Two nocturnes by Debussy followed, "Nuages" and "Fetes," the second being the more enjoyable.

Wagner's overture to "Rienzi," with its inspiring measures, and use of the brass choir, which closed the program, held the audience until the last note. Repeated applause forced the conductor to return and bow appreciation. Taken as a whole and in its individual numbers, the program was of the highest type, melodious and masterly, and it does not seem possible that the playing could have been excelled. A great orchestra has taken its rightful place among orchestras.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM FEB 2 1922 M
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

MUSIC

By J. O. L.

The Boston Symphony.

It was an inestimable privilege last evening to hear once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave one of the most satisfying performances that any orchestra has presented in the Lyric for many a season. There are certain features, qualities one might better say, about the Boston orchestra that it apart from the other great symphonic organizations which visit us from time to time, and its return, after so long an absence, serves to accentuate these things. For mellowness of tone and round, suave beauty the string choir of this band stands alone. It has a timbre that is quite unique and there is a certain mellowness about the entire group of instruments, an exquisiteness about the wood wind and a richness of tone when the brasses are concerned that makes the student of these things again sense "the perfect instrument" of past years.

It is interesting to note, however, that the Boston orchestra in its present development is inherently a French orchestra, embued with the Gallic spirit of its French conductor. It plays with an extraordinary delicacy and finesse, a graceful sweetness that is very fascination. As a result of this an even, perfectly balanced musical fabric is produced in which no special choirs are obtruded. Mr. Monteux does not "pick out" certain phrases, accentuate certain instruments, as so many of his contemporaries do. He is not a modern conductor, as this phrase is understood to mean a leader who introduces great splashes of tonal color, and if the organization under his baton does not always plumb the profound emotional depths that the bands of some of his contemporaries do, his orchestra does achieve an entirely different goal than the others, for it has a spiritual quality, a kind of ecstatic fineness, that is a thing apart. One has, perhaps, heard a more stirring reading of the glorious Tschaikowsky fourth symphony, because Mr. Monteux's reaction to Russian music is possibly less emotional than spiritual, but it is doubtful if one will ever hear a more exalted one.

The conductor and hsi men were given an ovation that was prolonged for many minutes after its performance. Following the symphony the mystic "Istar" variations of d'Indy were played with the most subtle understanding, and then the picturesque Casella "Le Couvent sur l'eau" suite, an imaginative and vivid work replete with Latin coloring, in which the voice part was most beautifully sung by Laura Littlefield. The concert closed with a fine rhythmic interpretation of the Rimskq-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." In many respects the occasion was a memorable one. It is to be hoped that, now the ice has been broken, the Boston orchestra will visit us more frequently.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922 L
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Beethoven Seventh Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Monteux's Reading Slightly More Spirited Than That of Stransky, Less Erratic Than Rendition by Coates

By H. E. Krehbiel

Something may be found in another section of The Tribune to-day touching the occasional muting of minds of conductors as to the desirability of compelling, or at least inviting, the concert goers to hear the same composition day after day. The case directly in point was Beethoven's symphony in A, the Seventh of the supposedly immortal Nine. Between Thursday night of week before last and yesterday afternoon the symphony was played five times in Carnegie Hall. It was on the programs of three organizations, and therefore those who even heard a single concert by the Philharmonic, the Symphony Society and the Boston Orchestra within the period heard the work three times. By the same token, they were permitted—if we do not intimate that they were challenged—to form an opinion as to the comparative value of the interpretations of Messrs. Stransky, Coates and Monteux.

In the article printed elsewhere in The Tribune to-day we have ventured upon some reflections concerning the music of as Beethoven wrote it and as we modestly think he itnended that it should be played and as it was made to sound. To those observations we have little to add ofter the performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The players at the command uof Mr. Monteux, did not give out a body of tone as ingratiating to the ears as did those directed by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Coates, butthe performance, a little more spirited than that of the Philharmonic Society, and a great deal less erratic than that of the Symphony Society, approached the former in being, so far as tempi were concerned, consonant with the manifest purposes of the composer. There were diviations from the fundamental rates of speed indicated by Beethoven's markings, but they were not radically or virtuntly different.

Mr. Monteux's conception of the Allegretto is not quite that which Beethoven conceived to be the movement of an Allegretto, but it was not that of a melancholy march spurred into a quickstep by the entrance of the lovely major melody. Beethoven's notion concerning its tempo may be gathered from the corresponding movement in the symphony which he wrote immediately after it. The Allegretto Scherzano of the Eighth Symphony is an allegretto played jocosely. We doubt if Mr. Coates would associate a heavy-hearted or halfway heavy-footed mood with that exquisite bit of humor. Yet it is an allegretto. Mr. Monteux permitted the characteristic dactyl in the pizicato bass to the second subject to turn into an anapaist by overlooking the dynamic stress in the eighth notes which results from their being played on the higher open strings instead of placing the accent on the first beat, where it belongs, but where the A has less volume of tone because it is sounded an octave lower in contrabasses and violin cellos. And the second and last tones of the theme of the finale were inaudible, as usual

Uncertainty is beginning to enter into our concert programs as well as the symphony of the Manhattan Opera House. Mr. Monteux had promised a first New York performance of Ravel's "La Valse," but replaced it yesterday with Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht." Other numbers were the "Istar" variations by d'Indy and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris."

[illegible] at the Metropolitan [illegible]

---

rotchka" in the afternoon and "Mefistofele" in the evening. In the former the principal part was sung by Miss Alice Miriam, who was called in as a substitute for Miss Bori. A fresh voice, a youthful figure and simplicity of action which begets sympathy are the qualities most essential in an interpr of the fragile creature compounded of wintry snow and the balmy breath of spring, and these attributes were agreeably disclosed by Miss Miriam. "Snegourotchka" is an opera in which youthfulness is a characteristic element, and the younger members of Mr. Gatti's company, Mr. Laurenti, in particular, give an excellent account of themselves in its representation. The performers in "Mefistofile" were those who took part in the first of this season's performances of the opera—Mme. Alda, Mme. Easton, Miss Perini, and Messrs. Mardones, Gigle and Paltrinieri.

TIMES
ss: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just why it happened that Beethoven's seventh symphony should have been three times played in New York within a week will doubtless never be explained. Mr. Monteux played it for the third time yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Coates having played it earlier in the pair of the New York Symphony Orchestra's concerts. By quick action on the part of both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Mengelberg, a similar duplication in the case of Ravel's "La Valse" was avoided. The conductor of each of the four orchestras giving concerts regularly in New York may be supposed to spend time both in the day and in the still watches of the night trying to think of compositions for his programs that the others are not going to play in New York, but they do so frequently with singularly unsuccessful results.

But Mr. Monteux was successful in his performance of the symphony, which was right in tempo, rhythmically elastic, fine and well balanced in tone, a performance that sounded like Beethoven's music.

In place of Ravel's piece, Mr. Monteux played the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's sextet, "Verklärte Nache," music now not unfamiliar and that still seems the product of imagination and a sense of beauty. The string orchestra grows monotonous in color before the piece is ended; and singularly enough, this monotony is conveyed much more by the orchestra than by the sextet for which the composition was originally written.

It was a gratification to hear again d'Indy's "Istar" variations, music that is not often played and deserves a more frequent hearing. This music no longer seems "cerebral" or dry, but finely imaginative, deeply felt and written with great skill not only in the development of the variations but in the orchestral color. Nor need there be anxious reflections as to nature and appearance of the ornaments and garments successively stripped from the Babylonian woman. The music gives no information about them, and can give none. But it is engrossing and impressive as music and was played with brilliancy and clarity by the orchestra.

There was none too great interest in Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which closed the concert. It seeks to represent purely exterior effects, which it does with some success till they begin to pall through undue length.

From Herald
New York Ci

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

The last matinee concert but one of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony. Schoenberg's arrangement for string orchestra of his "Klaerte Nacht" sextet, based on an episode in Richard Dehmel's "Weib und Welt"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Svendsen's episode for full orchestra, opus 9, entitled "The Carnival at Paris."

The Schoenberg music, already played here this season at an earlier concert of the orchestra, was substituted yesterday by Mr. Monteux for Ravel's "La Valse," a work new here, which had been announced. The Beethoven symphony, played for the third time in two days in the same hall, received from Mr. Monteux a reading which brought him enthusiastic applause. The fine, statuesque, yet rather bloodless d'Indy variations were given with admirable repose and finish.

The seldom heard Paris "Carnival," by the Norwegian Svendsen, 1840-1911, who came to New York in 1871 to take an American wife, sounded rather old fashioned and pointless, but it had some effective moments and at least showed

---

WORLD FEB 5 - 1922 L

SZYMANOVSKI, on the other hand, may turn out to be a composer of genius. His youthful symphony is an astoundingly eloquent work for one who was only twenty-eight at the time of its composition. It evidences a grasp of form and a grip on his material that is rare among his contemporaries. In outline his themes bear a faint resemblance to Strauss in their tendency to diatonic simplicity and sudden leaps over wide intervals. Not that they are in the least reminiscent of Strauss. One ventures to say that they have more spontaneity. A Strauss theme, such as the "hero" theme in "Ein Heldenleben," compels admiration for the composer's ingenuity in constructing it, but it is sometimes hard to believe that the composer did not deliberately plan those wide leaps, rather than feel them. Szymanovski always rings true. His themes "speak." After hearing them you have an instant resire to repeat them to yourself—a fairly good rough test of genuine music.

HIS harmonic scheme is one of restless chromatism. He seldom stays in one key very long. For the most part, the inner voices of his music are weaving a kaleidoscopic maze of chromatic counterpoint. This lack of definite tonality would tend to make his music vague, except that his themes have such striking individuality that their melodic definiteness holds the structure firm. He is fond of using a long, thematic line, of making the close of one passage fuse with the beginning of another, so that the effect of one of his symphonic movements is that of a single continuous melody that winds through the various orchestral choirs, never pausing until the final cadence. His orchestration is colorful, but beautifully reticent, with an odd preponderance of string quality. He writes for strings with complete understanding of their technical resources and with an evident [illegible] tone quality.

BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS
ISSUE OF
FEB 3 1922 - 8

Boston Symphony At Lyric

Famous Organization Under Pierre Monteux Gives Only Concert Of The Season Here.

By W. G. OWST

THE return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, if even for one performance only, is a most welcome happening. Unfortunately, owing to the exceedingly unpropitious weather of last night, the Lyric was not so well filled as the occasion warranted; and those music-lovers who are usually to be found at all notable musical events were thus deprived of one of the most pleasurable affairs of the season.

Baltimoreans have always evinced great enthusiasm over the Boston organization and have long had a sentimental feeling for it, remembering that it was the very first orchestra of importance to place the city on its regular visiting list. It was through the Bostonians' work that local music-lovers first learned to understand and appreciate the high ideals expressed in orchestral playing. Owing to several changes in the conductors, the standard of the orchestra deteriorated until finally Mr. Monteux was selected. Nearly three years ago, when he commenced his work, he found the orchestra in a state of disorganization. But those three years have sufficed to re-establish it and to place it on the high plane it formerly occupied. Today it is an orchestra instinct with life. Vitality, delicacy and refinement, strength, perfection of attack, shading, remarkable dynamic adjustment, tone quality, in fact every attribute that a modern orchestra should possess, all these are to be found at the bidding of the conductor. It is, therefore, not a matter of wonder that such a splendid program as was offered should receive such a striking and impressive presentation as that of last evening.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the concert. All the beauties, melodic and harmonic, and all the colorful orchestral effects that are inherent in Tschaikowsky's writings were translated by the conductor into instrumental pictures, in which a musical sensibility delights. Each movement received an interpretation absolutely in accordance with its innermost significance, and particularly was the "Scherzo," with its dainty Pizzicato, exquisitely given. At the close of the symphony long and hearty applause greeted the conductor and orchestra in recognition of their fine work.

Symphonic Variations, "Istar," by d'Indy, a composition full of real interest, was made doubly attractive on account of the musical conception which M. Monteux so lucidly interpreted to his hearers.

Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," a series of four pieces from a ballet of the same name by Casella, is a work of much originality and diversity of moods. In the second movement an innovation was introduced in the shape of a voice, the singer being Miss Laura Littlefield, soprano. She sang her part well, but the vocal portion was rather a thankless task, and ineffective on account of an almost incessant series of chromatic progressions. The orchestra, however, displayed great finish in the performance of each number.

Rimsky-Korsakow's Caprice on Spanish Themes brought to a conclusion an intensely interesting and gratifying concert, and left the entire audience filled with the earnest desire that the organization may be induced to commence its annual five visits again next year.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
FEB 5 1922 K

The Szymanowski Symphony.

I have been told that Karol Szymanowski looks upon his B-flat Symphony as a mistake of his youth. Composed in 1911, the work was first produced in Warsaw under the direction of Georg Fitelberg, and during the months immediately succeeding played under the same conductor in Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig, Munich and other German and Austrian cities. At the same performances, I believe, the Sonata in M major, which was composed during this particular period in the composer's development, was played by the pianist, Artur Rubinstein.

Since 1911 Mr. Szymanowski has worked far along the tortuous paths of modernism. He has shed, it seems, the encumbrances of technical facility and thematic invention which found such direct and delightful utterance in this symphony as played Thursday evening by the Boston orchestra under Pierre Monteux. So audiences have of recent days had their ears tortured with what Mr. Szymanowski chooses to designate as songs and compositions of other media of expression.

It looks as though the Polish composer were sowing his oats comparatively late in life, as though he had reversed the usual order of things, substituting the drunken helotries of youth for what ought to be the sobering days of middle age. The B-flat Symphony has order, precision, logic. More important, it may boast ideas of value and of beauty. But most important, in its measures the composer speaks with an individuality all his own. One may note the influences of other composers—natural in the case of so young a man—but ever one is impressed with the feeling that despite all Mr. Szymanowski's assimilation of his forerunners his assimilation has been complete. He takes what others have contributed to the art, but has so colored this material with his own personality as to make his own music essentially that of Szymanowski and of no other composer.

There is a third symphony which Mr. Damrosch announced but did not play. "Insufficient time for rehearsals" was offered as an excuse. Possibly when that veteran returns to the leadership of the New York Symphony, during the course of next month, he will take up the burden where he dropped it, and we may have an opportunity of hearing another work of pretentious size from a composer who in this symphony has given every indication of his ability to write such music as ought to have a hearing.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922 L
WORLD,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS HEARD

Two Recitals and Three Operas Are the Day's Other Offerings in Music.

Pierre Monteux and his excellent symphony orchestra from Boston opened the afternoon of music here yesterday at Carnegie Hall with a masterly performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" followed the symphony, and for the second time that the listener has heard it played by the Boston orchestra it impressed him once more as a splendid accompaniment for the action which is described in the programme notes, but it must be a tiresome affair to a listener who is not supplied with a programme, and who therefore cannot know what is being accompanied.

Most of the audience yesterday afternoon could not have known, because the "Verklaerte Nacht" was put on in place of Ravel's "Valse" at the last moment, and no programme notes were supplied.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
FEB 5 1922 K

The single composition of value to be divulged during the week was Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony, that in the key of B flat. The work has taken 10 years to reach New York and it remained for the Boston Orchestra to reveal its unique individuality to this town. A curious state of affairs in a city that supports two resident orchestras.

Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony was introduced to New York on Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. This 40-year-old Polish composer has produced a work abounding in color, originality and force.

Established [illegible]
FROM FEB 6
Evening Globe
New York

The Boston Band.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's string sextet, "Verklärte Nacht," Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris" made the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's reading of the Seventh Symphony is familiar here and justly admired. The Schönberg piece replaced Ravel's "La Valse," which nearly all the orchestras have been announcing for immediate performance.

SUN, FEB 7
Baltimore, Md.

Music Lovers Seeking Renewal Of Concerts By Boston Symphony

J. R. Huber And Harold Randolph Petition Orchestra To Resume Engagements Here.

Efforts are being made by Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, to induce the Boston Symphony Orchestra to resume its concerts in Baltimore. This series was canceled last season, and the concerts have been greatly missed by music lovers of this city. The attendance at the performance last week at the Lyric was interpreted by Mr. Huber as evidence that in not visiting Baltimore the Boston Orchestra is making a mistake, and he at once entered into negotiations with the manager, W. H. Brennan, to induce the return of the concerts to Baltimore.

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, also has written Mr. Brennan asking for the return of these concerts, and saying that he is sure he speaks for all the music lovers of Baltimore when he "expresses the earnest hope that means may be found to resume the annual series of concerts in Baltimore."

instruments, as so many of his contemporaries do. He is not a modern conductor, as this phrase is understood to mean a leader who introduces great splashes of tonal color, and if the organisation under his baton does not always plumb the profound emotional depths that the bands of some of his contemporaries do, his orchestra does achieve an entirely different goal than the others, for it has a spiritual quality, a kind of ecstatic fineness, that is a thing apart. One has, perhaps, heard a more stirring reading of the glorious Tschaikowsky fourth symphony, because Mr. Monteux's reaction to Russian music is possibly less emotional than spiritual, but it is doubtful if one will ever hear a more exalted one.

The conductor and hsi men were given an ovation that was prolonged for many minutes after its performance. Following the symphony the mystic "Istar" variations of d'Indy were played with the most subtle understanding, and then the picturesque Casella "Le Convent sur l'eau" suite, an imaginative and vivid work replete with Latin coloring, in which the voice part was most beautifully sung by Laura Littlefield. The concert closed with a fine rhythmic interpretation of the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." In many respects the occasion was a memorable one. It is to be hoped that, now the ice has been broken, the Boston orchestra will visit us more frequently.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922

TRIBUNE

NEW YORK CITY

Beethoven Seventh Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Monteux's Reading Slightly More Spirited Than That of Stransky, Less Erratic Than Rendition by Coates

By H. E. Krehbiel

Something may be found in another section of The Tribune to-day touching the occasional muting of minds of conductors as to the desirability of compelling, or at least inviting, the concert goers to hear the same composition day after day. The case directly in point was Beethoven's symphony in A, the Seventh of the supposedly immortal Nine. Between Thursday night of week before last and yesterday afternoon the symphony was played five times in Carnegie Hall. It was on the programs of three organizations, and therefore those who even heard a single concert by the Philharmonic, the Symphony Society and the Boston Orchestra within the period heard the work three times. By the same token, they were permitted—if we do not intimate that they were challenged—to form an opinion as to the comparative value of the interpretations of Messrs. Stransky, Coates and Monteux.

In the article printed elsewhere in The Tribune to-day we have ventured upon some reflections concerning the music of as Beethoven wrote it and as we modestly think he itnended that it should be played and as it was made to sound. To those observations we have little to add ofter the performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The players at the command uof Mr. Monteux, did not give out a body of tone as ingratiating to the ears as did those directed by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Coates, butthe performance, a little more spirited than that of the Philharmonic Society, and a great deal less erratic than that of the Symphony Society, approached the former in being, so far as tempi were concerned, consonant with the manifest purposes of the composer. There were diviations from the fundamental rates of speed indicated by Beethoven's markings, but they were not radically or virtuntly different.

Mr. Monteux's conception of the Allegretto is not quite that which Beethoven conceived to be the movement of an Allegretto, but it was not that of a melancholy march spurred into a quickstep by the entrance of the lovely major melody. Beethoven's notion concerning its tempo may be gathered from the corresponding movement in the symphony which he wrote immediately after it. The Allegretto Scherzano of the Eighth Symphony is an allegretto played jocosely. We doubt if Mr. Coates would associate a heavy-hearted or halfway heavy-footed mood with that exquisite bit of humor. Yet it is an allegretto. Mr. Monteux permitted the characteristic dactyl in the pizicato bass to the second subject to turn into an anapaist by overlooking the dynamic stress in the eighth notes which results from their being played on the higher open strings instead of placing the accent on the first beat, where it belongs, but where the A has less volume of tone because it is sounded an octave lower in contrabases and violin cellos. And the second and last tones of the theme of the finale were inaudible, as usual

Uncertainty is beginning to enter into our concert programs as well as the symphony of the Manhattan Opera House. Mr. Monteux had promised a first New York performance of Ravel's "La Valse," but replaced it yesterday with Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht." His other numbers were the "Istar" variations by d'Indy and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris."

The operas at the Metropolitan yesterday were "Snegourotchka" in the afternoon and "Mefistofele" in the evening. In the former the principal part was sung by Miss Alice Miriam, who was called in as a substitute for Miss Bori. A fresh voice, a youthful figure and simplicity of action which begets sympathy are the qualities most essential in an interpr of the fragile creature compounded of wintry snow and the balmy breath of spring, and these attributes were agreeably disclosed by Miss Miriam. "Snegourotchka" is an opera in which youthfulness is a characteristic element, and the younger members of Mr. Gatti's company, Mr. Laurenti, in particular, give an excellent account of themselves in its representation. The performers in "Mefistofile" were those who took part in the first of this season's performances of the opera—Mme. Alda, Mme. Easton, Miss Perini, and Messrs. Mardones, Gigle and Paltrinieri.

TIMES

ess: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just why it happened that Beethoven's seventh symphony should have been three times played in New York within a week will doubtless never be explained. Mr. Monteux played it for the third time yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Coates having played it earlier in the pair of the New York Symphony Orchestra's concerts. By quick action on the part of both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Mengelberg, a similar duplication in the case of Ravel's "La Valse" was avoided. The conductor of each of the four orchestras giving concerts regularly in New York may be supposed to spend time both in the day and in the still watches of the night trying to think of compositions for his programs that the others are not going to play in New York, but they do so frequently with singularly unsuccessful results.

But Mr. Monteux was successful in his performance of the symphony, which was right in tempo, rhythmically elastic, fine and well balanced in tone, a performance that sounded like Beethoven's music.

In place of Ravel's piece, Mr. Monteux played the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's sextet, "Verklärte Nache," music now not unfamiliar and that still seems the product of imagination and a sense of beauty. The string orchestra grows monotonous in color before the piece is ended; and singularly enough, this monotony is conveyed much more by the orchestra than by the sextet for which the composition was originally written.

It was a gratification to hear again d'Indy's "Istar" variations, music that is not often played and deserves a more frequent hearing. This music no longer seems "cerebral" or dry, but finely imaginative, deeply felt and written with great skill not only in the development of the variations but in the orchestral color. Nor need there be anxious reflections as to nature and appearance of the ornaments and garments successively stripped from the Babylonian woman. The music gives no information about them, and can give none. But it is engrossing and impressive as music and was played with brilliancy and clarity by the orchestra.

There was none too great interest in Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which closed the concert. It seeks to represent purely exterior effects, which it does with some success till they begin to pall through undue length.

From Herald

New York Ci

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

The last matinee concert but one of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Schoenberg's arrangement for string orchestra of his "Klaerte Nacht" sextet, based on an episode in Richard Dehmel's "Weib und Welt"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Svendsen's episode for full orchestra, opus 9, entitled "The Carnival at Paris."

The Schoenberg music, already played here this season at an earlier concert of the orchestra, was substituted yesterday by Mr. Monteux for Ravel's "La Valse," a work new here, which had been announced. The Beethoven symphony, played for the third time in two days in the same hall, received from Mr. Monteux a reading which brought him enthusiastic applause. The fine, statuesque, yet rather bloodless d'Indy variations were given with admirable repose and finish.

The seldom heard Paris "Carnival," by the Norwegian Svendsen, 1840-1911, who came to New York in 1871 to take an American wife, sounded rather old fashioned and pointless, but it had some effective moments and at least showed

---

WORLD! FEB 5 - 1922

SZYMANOVSKI, on the other hand, may turn out to be a composer of genius. His youthful symphony is an astoundingly eloquent work for one who was only twenty-eight at the time of its composition. It evidences a grasp of form and a grip on his material that is rare among his contemporaries. In outline his themes bear a faint resemblance to Strauss in their tendency to diatonic simplicity and sudden leaps over wide intervals. Not that they are in the least reminiscent of Strauss. One ventures to say that they have more spontaneity. A Strauss theme, such as the "hero" theme in "Ein Heldenleben," compels admiration for the composer's ingenuity in constructing it, but it is sometimes hard to believe that the composer did not deliberately plan those wide leaps, rather than feel them. Szymanovski always rings true. His themes "speak." After hearing them you have an instant resire to repeat them to yourself—a fairly good rough test of genuine music.

HIS harmonic scheme is one of restless chromatism. He seldom stays in one key very long. For the most part, the inner voices of his music are weaving a kaleidoscopic maze of chromatic counterpoint. This lack of definite tonality would tend to make his music vague, except that his themes have such striking individuality that their melodic definiteness holds the structure firm. He is fond of using a long, thematic line, of making the close of one passage fuse with the beginning of another, so that the effect of one of his symphonic movements is that of a single continuous melody that winds through the various orchestral choirs, never pausing until the final cadence. His orchestration is colorful, but beautifully reticent, with an odd preponderance of string quality. He writes for strings with complete understanding of their technical resources and with an evident fondness for their tone quality.

BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS

ISSUE OF

FEB 3 1922

Boston Symphony At Lyric

Famous Organization Under Pierre Monteux Gives Only Concert Of The Season Here.

By W. G. OWST

THE return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, if even for one performance only, is a most welcome happening. Unfortunately, owing to the exceedingly unpropitious weather of last night, the Lyric was not so well filled as the occasion warranted; and those music-lovers who are usually to be found at all notable musical events were thus deprived of one of the most pleasurable affairs of the season.

Baltimoreans have always evinced great enthusiasm over the Boston organization and have long had a sentimental feeling for it, remembering that it was the very first orchestra of importance to place the city on its regular visiting list. It was through the Bostonians' work that local music-lovers first learned to understand and appreciate the high ideals expressed in orchestral playing. Owing to several changes in the conductors, the standard of the orchestra deteriorated until finally Mr. Monteux was selected. Nearly three years ago, when he commenced his work, he found the orchestra in a state of disorganization. But those three years have sufficed to re-establish it and to place it on the high plane it formerly occupied. Today it is an orchestra instinct with life. Vitality, delicacy and refinement, strength, perfection of attack, shading, remarkable dynamic adjustment, tone quality, in fact every attribute that a modern orchestra should possess, all these are to be found at the bidding of the conductor. It is, therefore, not a matter of wonder that such a splendid program as was offered should receive such a striking and impressive presentation as that of last evening.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the concert. All the beauties, melodic and harmonic, and all the colorful orchestral effects that are inherent in Tschaikowsky's writings were translated by the conductor into instrumental pictures, in which a musical sensibility delights. Each movement received an interpretation absolutely in accordance with its innermost significance, and particularly was the "Scherzo," with its dainty Pizzicato, exquisitely given. At the close of the symphony long and hearty applause greeted the conductor and orchestra in recognition of their fine work.

Symphonic Variations, "Istar," by d'Indy, a composition full of real interest, was made doubly attractive on account of the musical conception which M. Monteux so lucidly interpreted to his hearers.

Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," a series of four pieces from a ballet of the same name by Casella, is a work of much originality and diversity of moods. In the second movement an innovation was introduced in the shape of a voice, the singer being Miss Laura Littlefield, soprano. She sang her part well, but the vocal portion was rather a thankless task, and ineffective on account of an almost incessant series of chromatic progressions. The orchestra, however, displayed great finish in the performance of each number.

Rimsky-Korsakow's Caprice on Spanish Themes brought to a conclusion an intensely interesting and gratifying concert, and left the entire audience filled with the earnest desire that the organization may be induced to commence its annual five visits again next year.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

ISSUE OF

FEB 5 1922

The Szymanowski Symphony.

I have been told that Karol Szymanowski looks upon his B-flat Symphony as a mistake of his youth. Composed in 1911, the work was first produced in Warsaw under the direction of Georg Fitelberg, and during the months immediately succeeding played under the same conductor in Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig, Munich and other German and Austrian cities. At the same performances, I believe, the Sonata in M major, which was composed during this particular period in the composer's development, was played by the pianist, Artur Rubinstein.

Since 1911 Mr. Szymanowski has worked far along the tortuous paths of modernism. He has shed, it seems, the encumbrances of technical facility and thematic invention which found such direct and delightful utterance in this symphony as played Thursday evening by the Boston orchestra under Pierre Monteux. So audiences have of recent days had their ears tortured with what Mr. Szymanowski chooses to designate as songs and compositions of other media of expression.

It looks as though the Polish composer were sowing his oats comparatively late in life, as though he had reversed the usual order of things, substituting the drunken helotries of youth for what ought to be the sobering days of middle age. The B-flat Symphony has order, precision, logic. More important, it may boast ideas of value and of beauty. But most important, in its measures the composer speaks with an individuality all his own. One may note the influences of other composers—natural in the case of so young a man—but ever one is impressed with the feeling that despite all Mr. Szymanowski's assimilation of his forerunners his assimilation has been complete. He takes what others have contributed to the art, but has so colored this material with his own personality as to make his own music essentially that of Szymanowski and of no other composer.

There is a third symphony which Mr. Damrosch announced but did not play. "Insufficient time for rehearsals" was offered as an excuse. Possibly when that veteran returns to the leadership of the New York Symphony, during the course of next month, he will take up the burden where he dropped it, and we may have an opportunity of hearing another work of pretentious size from a composer who in this symphony has given every indication of his ability to write such music as ought to have a hearing.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922
WORLD,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS HEARD

Two Recitals and Three Operas Are the Day's Other Offerings in Music.

Pierre Monteux and his excellent symphony orchestra from Boston opened the afternoon of music here yesterday at Carnegie Hall with a masterly performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" followed the symphony, and for the second time that the listener has heard it played by the Boston orchestra it impressed him once more as a splendid accompaniment for the action which is described in the programme notes, but it must be a tiresome affair to a listener who is not supplied with a programme, and who therefore cannot know what is being accompanied.

Most of the audience yesterday afternoon could not have known, because the "Verklaerte Nacht" was put on in place of Ravel's "Valse" at the last moment, and no programme notes were supplied.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

ISSUE OF

FEB 5

The single composition of value to be divulged during the week was Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony, that in the key of B flat. The work has taken 10 years to reach New York and it remained for the Boston Orchestra to reveal its unique individuality to this town. A curious state of affairs in a city that supports two resident orchestras.

Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony was introduced to New York on Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. This 40-year-old Polish composer has produced a work abounding in color, originality and force.

Established

FROM FEB

Evening Globe
New York

The Boston Band.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's string sextet, "Verklärte Nacht," Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris" made the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's reading of the Seventh Symphony is familiar here and justly admired. The Schönberg piece replaced Ravel's "La Valse," which nearly all the orchestras have been announcing for immediate performance.

SUN, FE

Baltimore, Md.

Music Lovers Seeking Renewal Of Concerts By Boston Symphony

J. R. Huber And Harold Randolph Petition Orchestra To Resume Engagements Here.

Efforts are being made by Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, to induce the Boston Symphony Orchestra to resume its concerts in Baltimore.

This series was canceled last season, and the concerts have been greatly missed by music lovers of this city. The attendance at the performance last week at the Lyric was interpreted by Mr. Huber as evidence that in not visiting Baltimore the Boston Orchestra is making a mistake, and he at once entered into negotiations with the manager, W. H. Brennan, to induce the return of the concerts to Baltimore.

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, also has written Mr. Brennan asking for the return of these concerts, and saying that he is sure he speaks for all the music lovers of Baltimore when he "expresses the earnest hope that means may be found to resume the annual series of concerts in Baltimore."

instruments, as so many of his contemporaries do. He is not a modern conductor, as this phrase is understood to mean a leader who introduces great splashes of tonal color, and if the organization under his baton does not always plumb the profound emotional depths that the bands of some of his contemporaries do, his orchestra does achieve an entirely different goal than the others, for it has a spiritual quality, a kind of ecstatic fineness, that is a thing apart. One has, perhaps, heard a more stirring reading of the glorious Tschaikowsky fourth symphony, because Mr. Monteux's reaction to Russian music is possibly less emotional than spiritual, but it is doubtful if one will ever hear a more exalted one.

The conductor and hsi meu were given an ovation that was prolonged for many minutes after its performance. Following the symphony the mystic "Istar" variations of d'Indy were played with the most subtle understanding, and then the picturesque Casella "Le Couvent sur l'eau" suite, an imaginative and vivid work replete with Latin coloring, in which the voice part was most beautifully sung by Laura Littlefield. The concert closed with a fine rhythmic interpretation of the Rimskq-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." In many respects the occasion was a memorable one. It is to be hoped that, now the ice has been broken, the Boston orchestra will visit us more frequently.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922

TRIBUNE

NEW YORK CITY

Beethoven Seventh Svmphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Monteux's Reading Slightly More Spirited Than That of Stransky, Less Erratic Than Rendition by Coates

By H. E. Krehbiel

Something may be found in another section of The Tribune to-day touching the occasional muting of minds of conductors as to the desirability of compelling, or at least inviting, the concert goers to hear the same composition day after day. The case directly in point was Beethoven's symphony in A, the Seventh of the supposedly immortal Nine. Between Thursday night of week before last and yesterday afternoon the symphony was played five times in Carnegie Hall. It was on the programs of three organizations, and therefore those who even heard a single concert by the Philharmonic, the Symphony Society and the Boston Orchestra within the period heard the work three times. By the same token, they were permitted—if we do not intimate that they were challenged—to form an opinion as to the comparative value of the interpretations of Messrs. Stransky, Coates and Monteux.

In the article printed elsewhere in The Tribune to-day we have ventured upon some reflections concerning the music of as Beethoven wrote it and as we modestly think he itnended that it should be played and as it was made to sound. To those observations we have little to add ofter the performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The players at the command uof Mr. Monteux, did not give out a body of tone as ingratiating to the ears as did those directed by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Coates, butthe performance, a little more spirited than that of the Philharmonic Society, and a great deal less erratic than that of the Symphony Society, approached the former in being, so far as tempi were concerned, consonant with the manifest purposes of the composer. There were diviations from the fundamental rates of speed indicated by Beethoven's markings, but they were not radically or virtuntly different.

Mr. Monteux's conception of the Allegretto is not quite that which Beethoven conceived to be the movement of an Allegretto, but it was not that of a melancholy march spurred into a quickstep by the entrance of the lovely major melody. Beethoven's notion concerning its tempo may be gathered from the corresponding movement in the symphony which he wrote immediately after it. The Allegretto Scherzano of the Eighth Symphony is an allegretto played jocosely. We doubt if Mr. Coates would associate a heavy-hearted or halfway heavy-footed mood with that exquisite bit of humor. Yet it is an allegretto. Mr. Monteux permitted the characteristic dactyl in the pizicato bass to the second subject to turn into an anapaist by overlooking the dynamic stress in the eighth notes which results from their being played on the higher open strings instead of placing the accent on the first beat, where it belongs, but where the A has less volume of tone because it is sounded an octave lower in contrabases and violin cellos. And the second and last tones of the theme of the finale were inaudible, as usual

Uncertainty is beginning to enter into our concert programs as well as the symphony of the Manhattan Opera House. Mr. Monteux had promised a first New York performance of Ravel's "La Valse," but replaced it yesterday with Schonberg's "Verklarte Nacht." His other numbers were the "Istar" variations by d'Indy and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris."

The operas at the Metropolitan [illegible] yesterday were "Snegourotchka" in the afternoon and "Mefistofele" in the evening. In the former the principal part was sung by Miss Alice Miriam, who was called in as a substitute for Miss Bori. A fresh voice, a youthful figure and simplicity of action which begets sympathy are the qualities most essential in an interpr of the fragile creature compounded of wintry snow and the balmy breath of spring, and these attributes were agreeably disclosed by Miss Miriam. "Snegourotchka" is an opera in which youthfulness is a characteristic element, and the younger members of Mr. Gatti's company, Mr. Laurenti, in particular, give an excellent account of themselves in its representation. The performers in "Mefistofile" were those who took part in the first of this season's performances of the opera—Mme. Alda, Mme. Easton, Miss Perini, and Messrs. Mardones, Gigle and Paltrinieri.

TIMES

ess: New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Just why it happened that Beethoven's seventh symphony should have been three times played in New York within a week will doubtless never be explained. Mr. Monteux played it for the third time yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Coates having played it earlier in the pair of the New York Symphony Orchestra's concerts. By quick action on the part of both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Mengelberg, a similar duplication in the case of Ravel's "La Valse" was avoided. The conductor of each of the four orchestras giving concerts regularly in New York may be supposed to spend time both in the day and in the still watches of the night trying to think of compositions for his programs that the others are not going to play in New York, but they do so frequently with singularly unsuccessful results.

But Mr. Monteux was successful in his performance of the symphony, which was right in tempo, rhythmically elastic, fine and well balanced in tone, a performance that sounded like Beethoven's music.

In place of Ravel's piece, Mr. Monteux played the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's sextet, "Verklärte Nache," music now not unfamiliar and that still seems the product of imagination and a sense of beauty. The string orchestra grows monotonous in color before the piece is ended; and singularly enough, this monotony is conveyed much more by the orchestra than by the sextet for which the composition was originally written.

It was a gratification to hear again d'Indy's "Istar" variations, music that is not often played and deserves a more frequent hearing. This music no longer seems "cerebral" or dry, but finely imaginative, deeply felt and written with great skill not only in the development of the variations but in the orchestral color. Nor need there be anxious reflections as to nature and appearance of the ornaments and garments successively stripped from the Babylonian woman. The music gives no information about them, and can give none. But it is engrossing and impressive as music and was played with brilliancy and clarity by the orchestra.

There was none too great interest in Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," which closed the concert. It seeks to represent purely exterior effects, which it does with some success till they begin to pall through undue length.

From Herald

New York Ci

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

The last matinee concert but one of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Schoenberg's arrangement for string orchestra of his "Klaerte Nacht" sextet, based on an episode in Richard Dehmel's "Weib und Welt"; Vincent d'Indy's symphonic variations, "Istar," and Svendsen's episode for full orchestra, opus 9, entitled "The Carnival at Paris."

The Schoenberg music, already played here this season at an earlier concert of the orchestra, was substituted yesterday by Mr. Monteux for Ravel's "La Valse," a work new here, which had been announced. The Beethoven symphony, played for the third time in two days in the same hall, received from Mr. Monteux a reading which brought him enthusiastic applause. The fine, statuesque, yet rather bloodless d'Indy variations were given with admirable repose and finish.

The seldom heard Paris "Carnival," by the Norwegian Svendsen, 1840-1911, who came to New York in 1871 to take an American wife, sounded rather old fashioned and pointless, but it had some effective moments and at least showed what the composer could do. The work was well played by the orchestra.

---

ay turn out to be a composer of astoundingly eloquent work for time of its composition. It evimaterial that is rare among his contemporaries. In outline his themes bear a faint resemblance to Strauss in their tendency to diatonic simplicity and sudden leaps over wide intervals. Not that they are in the least reminiscent of Strauss. One ventures to say that they have more spontaneity. A Strauss theme, such as the "hero" theme in "Ein Heldenleben," compels admiration for the composer's ingenuity in constructing it, but it is sometimes hard to believe that the composer did not deliberately plan those wide leaps, rather than feel them. Szymanovski always rings true. His themes "speak." After hearing them you have an instant resire to repeat them to yourself—a fairly good rough test of genuine music.

HIS harmonic scheme is one of restless chromatism. He seldom stays in one key very long. For the most part, the inner voices of his music are weaving a kaleidoscopic maze of chromatic counterpoint. This lack of definite tonality would tend to make his music vague, except that his themes have such striking individuality that their melodic definiteness holds the structure firm. He is fond of using a long, thematic line, of making the close of one passage fuse with the beginning of another, so that the effect of one of his symphonic movements is that of a single continuous melody that winds through the various orchestral choirs, never pausing until the final cadence. His orchestration is colorful, but beautifully reticent, with an odd preponderance of string quality. He writes for strings with complete understanding of their technical resources and with an evident [illegible] for their tone quality.

BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS

ISSUE OF

FEB 3 1922

Boston Symphony At Lyric

Famous Organization Under Pierre Monteux Gives Only Concert Of The Season Here.

By W. G. OWST

THE return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, if even for one performance only, is a most welcome happening. Unfortunately, owing to the exceedingly unpropitious weather of last night, the Lyric was not so well filled as the occasion warranted; and those music-lovers who are usually to be found at all notable musical events were thus deprived of one of the most pleasurable affairs of the season.

Baltimoreans have always evinced great enthusiasm over the Boston organization and have long had a sentimental feeling for it, remembering that it was the very first orchestra of importance to place the city on its regular visiting list. It was through the Bostonians' work that local music-lovers first learned to understand and appreciate the high ideals expressed in orchestral playing. Owing to several changes in the conductors, the standard of the orchestra deteriorated until finally Mr. Monteux was selected. Nearly three years ago, when he commenced his work, he found the orchestra in a state of disorganization. But those three years have sufficed to re-establish it and to place it on the high plane it formerly occupied. Today it is an orchestra instinct with life. Vitality, delicacy and refinement, strength, perfection of attack, shading, remarkable dynamic adjustment, tone quality, in fact every attribute that a modern orchestra should possess, all these are to be found at the bidding of the conductor. It is, therefore, not a matter of wonder that such a splendid program as was offered should receive such a striking and impressive presentation as that of last evening.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the concert. All the beauties, melodic and harmonic, and all the colorful orchestral effects that are inherent in Tschaikowsky's writings were translated by the conductor into instrumental pictures, in which a musical sensibility delights. Each movement received an interpretation absolutely in accordance with its innermost significance, and particularly was the "Scherzo," with its dainty Pizzicato, exquisitely given. At the close of the symphony long and hearty applause greeted the conductor and orchestra in recognition of their fine work.

Symphonic Variations, "Istar," by d'Indy, a composition full of real interest, was made doubly attractive on account of the musical conception which M. Monteux so lucidly interpreted to his hearers.

Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," a series of four pieces from a ballet of the same name by Casella, is a work of much originality and diversity of moods. In the second movement an innovation was introduced in the shape of a voice, the singer being Miss Laura Littlefield, soprano. She sang her part well, but the vocal portion was rather a thankless task, and ineffective on account of an almost incessant series of chromatic progressions. The orchestra, however, displayed great finish in the performance of each number.

Rimsky-Korsakow's Caprice on Spanish Themes brought to a conclusion an intensely interesting and gratifying concert, and left the entire audience filled with the earnest desire that the organization may be induced to commence its annual five visits again next year.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

ISSUE OF

FEB 5 1922

The Szymanowski Symphony.

I have been told that Karol Szymanowski looks upon his B-flat Symphony as a mistake of his youth. Composed in 1911, the work was first produced in Warsaw under the direction of Georg Fitelberg, and during the months immediately succeeding played under the same conductor in Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig, Munich and other German and Austrian cities. At the same performances, I believe, the Sonata in M major, which was composed during this particular period in the composer's development, was played by the pianist, Artur Rubinstein.

Since 1911 Mr. Szymanowski has worked far along the tortuous paths of modernism. He has shed, it seems, the encumbrances of technical facility and thematic invention which found such direct and delightful utterance in this symphony as played Thursday evening by the Boston orchestra under Pierre Monteux. So audiences have of recent days had their ears tortured with what Mr. Szymanowski chooses to designate as songs and compositions of other media of expression.

It looks as though the Polish composer were sowing his oats comparatively late in life, as though he had reversed the usual order of things, substituting the drunken helotries of youth for what ought to be the sobering days of middle age. The B-flat Symphony has order, precision, logic. More important, it may boast ideas of value and of beauty. But most important, in its measures the composer speaks with an individuality all his own. One may note the influences of other composers—natural in the case of so young a man—but ever one is impressed with the feeling that despite all Mr. Szymanowski's assimilation of his forerunners his assimilation has been complete. He takes what others have contributed to the art, but has so colored this material with his own personality as to make his own music essentially that of Szymanowski and of no other composer.

There is a third symphony which Mr. Damrosch announced but did not play. "Insufficient time for rehearsals" was offered as an excuse. Possibly when that veteran returns to the leadership of the New York Symphony, during the course of next month, he will take up the burden where he dropped it, and we may have an opportunity of hearing another work of pretentious size from a composer who in this symphony has given every indication of his ability to write such music as ought to have a hearing.

FROM FEB 5 - 1922
WORLD,
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS HEARD

Two Recitals and Three Operas Are the Day's Other Offerings in Music.

Pierre Monteux and his excellent symphony orchestra from Boston opened the afternoon of music here yesterday at Carnegie Hall with a masterly performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" followed the symphony, and for the second time that the listener has heard it played by the Boston orchestra it impressed him once more as a splendid accompaniment for the action which is described in the programme notes, but it must be a tiresome affair to a listener who is not supplied with a programme, and who therefore cannot know what is being accompanied.

Most of the audience yesterday afternoon could not have known, because the "Verklaerte Nacht" was put on in place of Ravel's "Valse" at the last moment, and no programme notes were supplied.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE

ISSUE OF

FEB 5 1922

The single composition of value to be divulged during the week was Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony, that in the key of B flat. The work has taken 10 years to reach New York and it remained for the Boston Orchestra to reveal its unique individuality to this town. A curious state of affairs in a city that supports two resident orchestras.

Karol Szymanowski's Second Symphony was introduced to New York on Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. This 40-year-old Polish composer has produced a work abounding in color, originality and force.

FROM FEB 6
Evening Globe
New York

The Boston Band.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the arrangement for string orchestra of Schönberg's string sextet, "Verklärte Nacht," Vincent d'Indy's "Istar" variations, and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris" made the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux's reading of the Seventh Symphony is familiar here and justly admired. The Schönberg piece replaced Ravel's "La Valse," which nearly all the orchestras have been announcing for immediate performance.

SUN, FEB
Baltimore, Md.

Music Lovers Seeking Renewal Of Concerts By Boston Symphony

J. R. Huber And Harold Randolph Petition Orchestra To Resume Engagements Here.

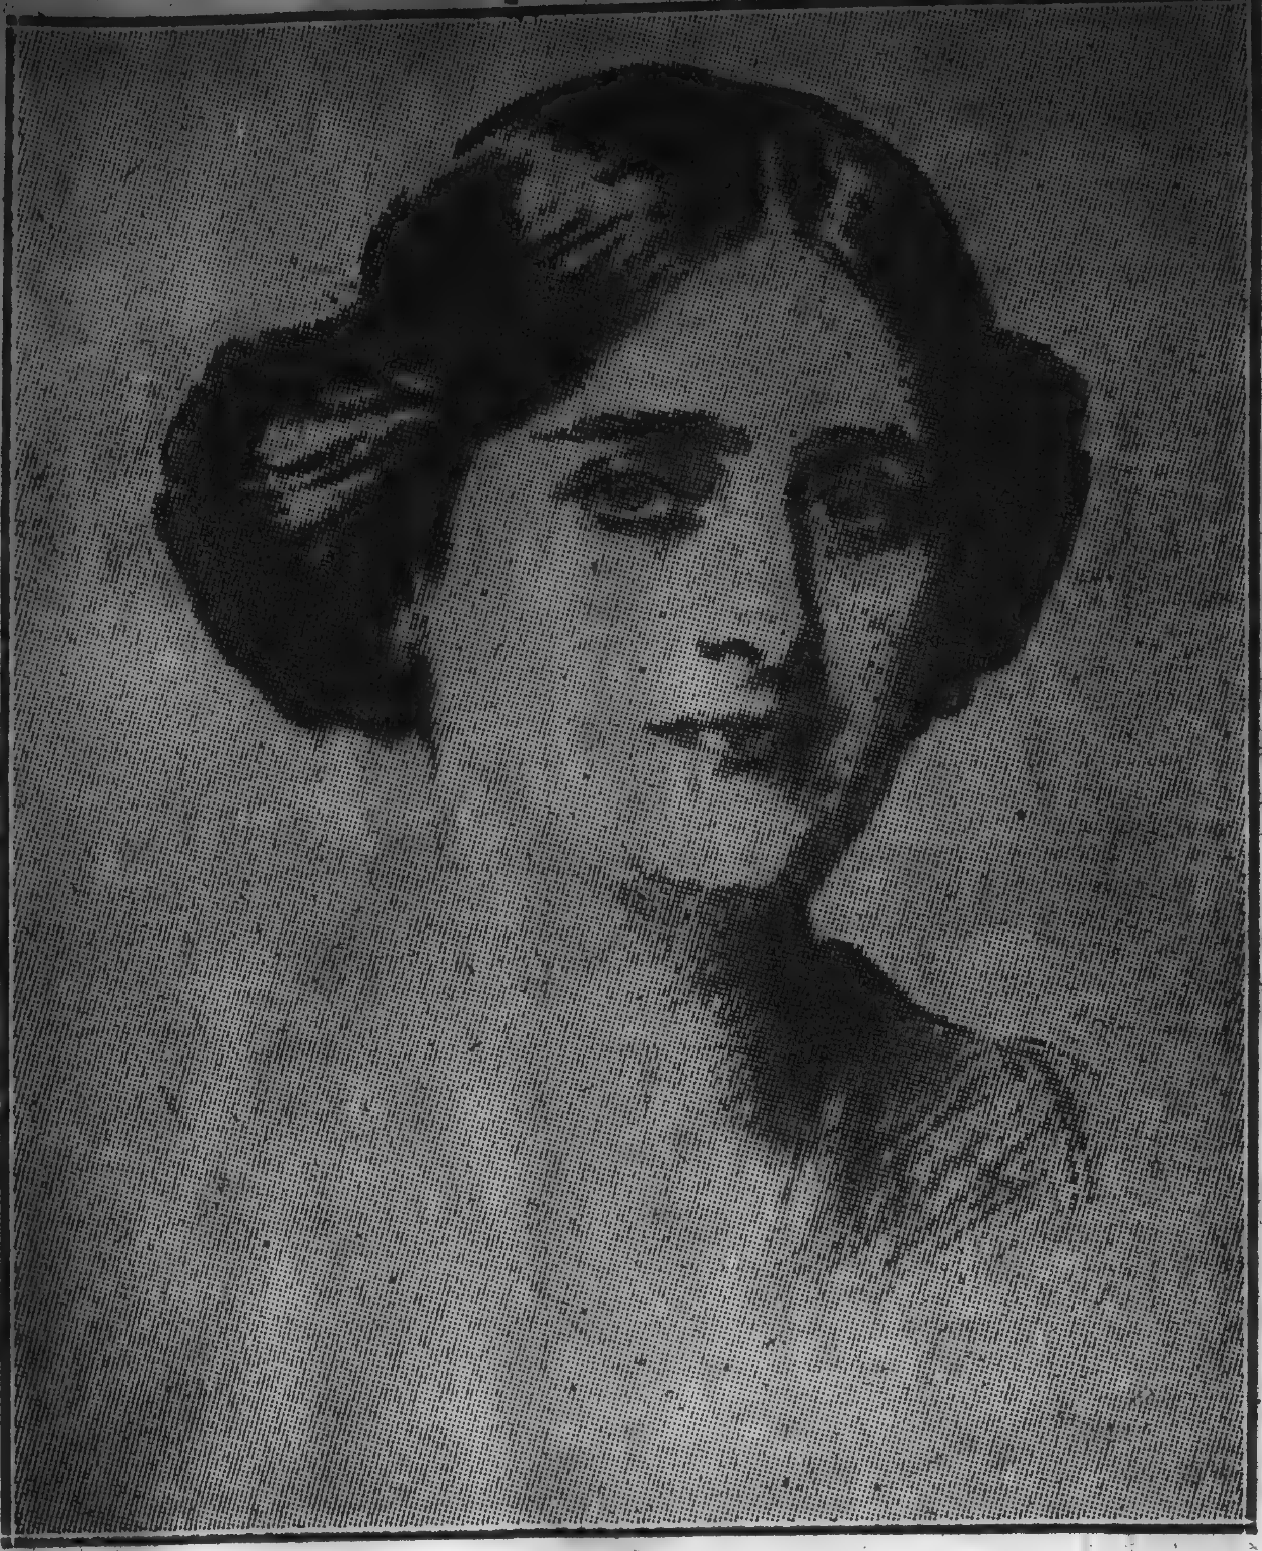
Efforts are being made by Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, to induce the Boston Symphony Orchestra to resume its concerts in Baltimore.

This series was canceled last season, and the concerts have been greatly missed by music lovers of this city. The attendance at the performance last week at the Lyric was interpreted by Mr. Huber as evidence that in not visiting Baltimore the Boston Orchestra is making a mistake, and he at once entered into negotiations with the manager, W. H. Brennan, to induce the return of the concerts to Baltimore.

Harold Randolph, director of the Peabody Conservatory of Music, also has written Mr. Brennan asking for the return of these concerts, and saying that he is sure he speaks for all the music lovers of Baltimore when he "expresses the earnest hope that means may be found to resume the annual series of concerts in Baltimore."

[69]

Candor and Charm



Myra Hess (From the Drawing by Sargent)

New English Pianist to Be Heard with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge Tomorrow

TRANS. FEB-8.

MONTEUX REENGAGED AS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

PIERRE MONTEUX

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the present leader, to include the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr Monteux has accepted.

Mr Monteux is fulfilling his third season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the Boston Sympohny Orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River.

Before he came to the orchestra, Mr Monteux had won an enviable name as conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music activities in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestra of Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the World War, he first came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and he was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the Autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeaated and accepted.

GLOBE - FEB. 9.

Monteux Remains

By announcement printed elsewhere in this newspaper, Mr. Monteux will continue to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra through the spring of 1924. Completing then a term of five years, he will give place to a successor whom, in the interval, the Trustees of the band and the concerts will, doubtless, diligently seek. So have they prudently adjusted the present and the future. By many titles Mr. Monteux deserved to be reengaged and approved. Within easy recollection, his wisdom, work and courage saved the orchestra—others aiding—from threatening dissolution. Little by little he has reconstituted it, reenforcing it with youth, rekindling its spirit and pride. It is now his responsive instrument that, to the fullness of his abilities, he is restoring to prowess and prestige. To the best of his powers, he upholds its established standards; under his hand from year to year, more and more they blossom anew.

With equal zeal and sagacity, Mr. Monteux has maintained the scope, the vitality of the Symphony Concerts. Under none of his predecessors were they freer from dry routine. Under none have they kept truer balance between the old and the new in music. No conductor could be more opeamninded to all men and all things, so long as they be deserving; none more unsparing in pains upon whatever he has undertaken.

Here in Boston, an old public and a new has understood and [illegible]. Seldom at home have the Symphony Concerts been more nourishing. Young hearers are seeking them—rare experience in the past. For the first time in the forty years of the orchestra, audiences have flocked to a "supplementary series." Elsewhere, save only in New York, Mr. Monteux has been as fortunate. Enjoying such freedom, fulfilling such ambitions, receiving such response, no wonder that he has ripened until with each new year, he has proved an abler and abler conductor.

Here and there is a conductor of acknowledged "genius." Some would have had such a one forthwith for the Symphony Orchestra. Not so easily or so swiftly are they persuaded to new posts. Here and there also is a conductor of unmistakable and mounting abilities. Some, again, would have such a one immediately installed at the Symphony Concerts to prove and to deepen his mettle. Not quite so confidently may decisions be made to stretch over years. The first obligation of the trustees was to deal justly with the present and to assure it. They have done so in the reëngagement of Mr. Monteux. They are equally bound to look prudently to the future. They do so when they give themselves time and opportunity to persuade the "genius," to descry and test the rising talent. Most wisely of all they have declined change for the sake of change and given to a conductor who has served well the orchestra, the public and the whole art of music, his just and honorable due.

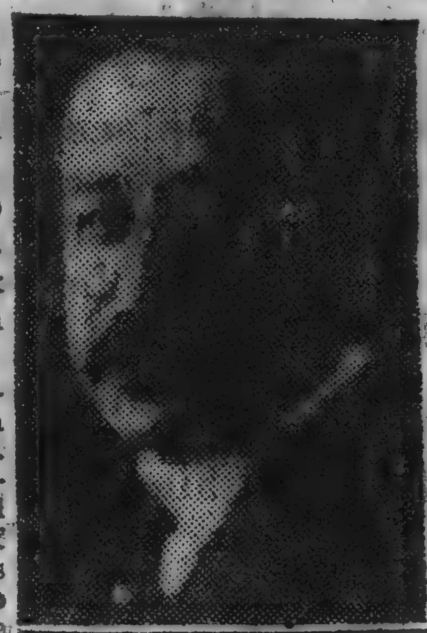
H. T. P.

TRANS. Feb. 9

MONTEUX AGAIN HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Present Conductor Reappointed by the Trustees for Two More Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra today settled the question as to the conductorship of the orchestra after this season by reappointing Pierre Monteux, the present conductor, for two years more.



PIERRE MONTEUX

Monteux has been conductor of the orchestra since 1919. He succeeded Henri Rabaud of the Paris Opera, who took charge of the band following the unpleasantness during which Dr. Muck was deposed.

Monteux was a well known French conductor at that time. He had come to America with the Diaghileff Russian Ballet and the following season had become the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The directors of the Boston Opera were assisted in securing both Rabaud and Monteux by the French high commission, then in Washington.

As Rabaud was delayed in reaching America, the Metropolitan Opera allowed Monteux to take a month's leave of absence and conduct the Boston Symphony. After one season in Boston, Rabaud returned to France and Monteux was engaged as regular conductor.

During his first two seasons Monteux was criticized for his interpretation of the symphonic works. In New York and other cities which the orchestra visits he has been violently attacked by the critics. However, at the end of his first year the trustees engaged him for two seasons more, and now that this period had expired he has been continued in office for another two years.

AMER - FEB. 9.

MONTEUX RE-ENGAGED FOR TWO YEARS MORE

TO CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNTIL MAY OF 1924—THEREAFTER A NEW LEADER

Pierre Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as such during two years more. His standing contract with the trustees of the band runs through the current season, expiring next May. Yesterday, by unanimous vote, they extended it until May of 1924. At that time by mutual understanding Mr. Monteux will complete his term as conductor and a newcomer will be his successor. In all he will have filled for five years the post that he now adorns—through the past seasons of 1919-20 and 1920-21; through the present season of 1921-22; through the seasons to come of 1922-23 and 1923-24. So does action end the current debates over change.

TRANS - FEB - 9.

Monteux To Stay Two Years More

Pierre Monteux has been re-engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two seasons more. This is his third season in Boston.

Mr. Monteux first came to Boston with the Ballet-Russe Orchestra. He has perhaps no peer as a conductor of ballet music. During his stay in Boston the Symphony Orchestra has greatly increased its repertoire and its field of endeavor, which now extends north to Montreal and south as far as Richmond. The new Monday night series in Boston is also an innovation.

ADVTSR - FEB-10.

Symphony Orchestra Again Engages Monteux

Noted Conductor Signs Contract for Two More Seasons

PIERRE MONTEUX

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

College Concerts

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendeucy toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Has Fine Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odean, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghlieff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

TRAV. - FEB - 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY REENGAGES MONTEU

Pierre Monteux, who is now in h third year as conductor of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra, has been r engaged for the seasons of 1922-23 an 1923-24. This action was taken by unanimous vote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees and a nounced by them yesterday afternoo Mr. Monteux had a long experience conductor in the opera houses ar concert halls of Europe before came to the United States. H "Concerts Monteux" in Paris we widely known and his conductorsh of the Russian Ballet on its fir American tour acquainted Bosto concert-goers with his abilities. Lat he became a staff conductor with t Metropolitan Opera Company in Ne York. In the autumn of 1918 he w offered the conductorship of the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra but w unable to obtain his release from e isting engagements except for a sho period, when he conducted the ope ing concerts of that season. The fo lowing year the offer was repeate and accepted.

MONITOR - FEB. 10

A Wise Choice

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be congratulated on their choice of a conductor. Mr. Monteux will succeed himself. He will continue to rule over the orchestra that he has created; for the superb band that is justly the pride of Boston is surely his creation. It is due to his courage in the hour of trial, his unfailing patience, his skill as a drill-master, firm and courteous in rehearsal, his contagious enthusiasm, his thorough musicianship that the orchestra is today renowned, as in the past under Wilhelm Gericke, for its technical proficiency, its incomparable euphony.

And all this has been achieved without show of labor or of ostentation. There are conductors belonging to what is known as the prima donna class; poseurs, mindful of the audience, admitting the composer only as a spring-board for their personal display. Mr. Monteux's aim is far different. It is to bring out the beauty, the grandeur, the splendor of a composition, so that the hearer will share with him his intelligent and lively appreciation.

Mr. Monteux has also felt it his duty to acquaint his audiences with contemporaneous music, even when it is ultra-modern in its tendencies; but not as a propagandist; rather as a musician who believes that rank conservatism is as fatal to art as is youthful or deliberate extravagance. There are some, no doubt, who would prefer to remain in ignorance of what is doing in the musical world; who now resent the unusual and the unexpected, as they in turn protested against Wagner, Strauss, Cesar Franck and Debussy.

Yet no one since the foundation of this orchestra has displayed a greater affection for the older masters or interpreted them more eloquently than Pierre Monteux. He is a man of unusual catholicity, without a trace of chauvinism, welcoming what is good, from whatever country it may come, to whatever age it may belong.

And it may be said without exaggeration that no conductor in the long and honorable history of this orchestra has entertained a more sympathetic attitude towards that sensitive plant, the American composer.

HERALD - FEB. 10.

MONTEUX SIGNS WITH SYMPHONY

Re-engaged to Conduct Orchestra During 1922-23 and 1923-24

IN THIRD SEASON WITH ORGANIZATION

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

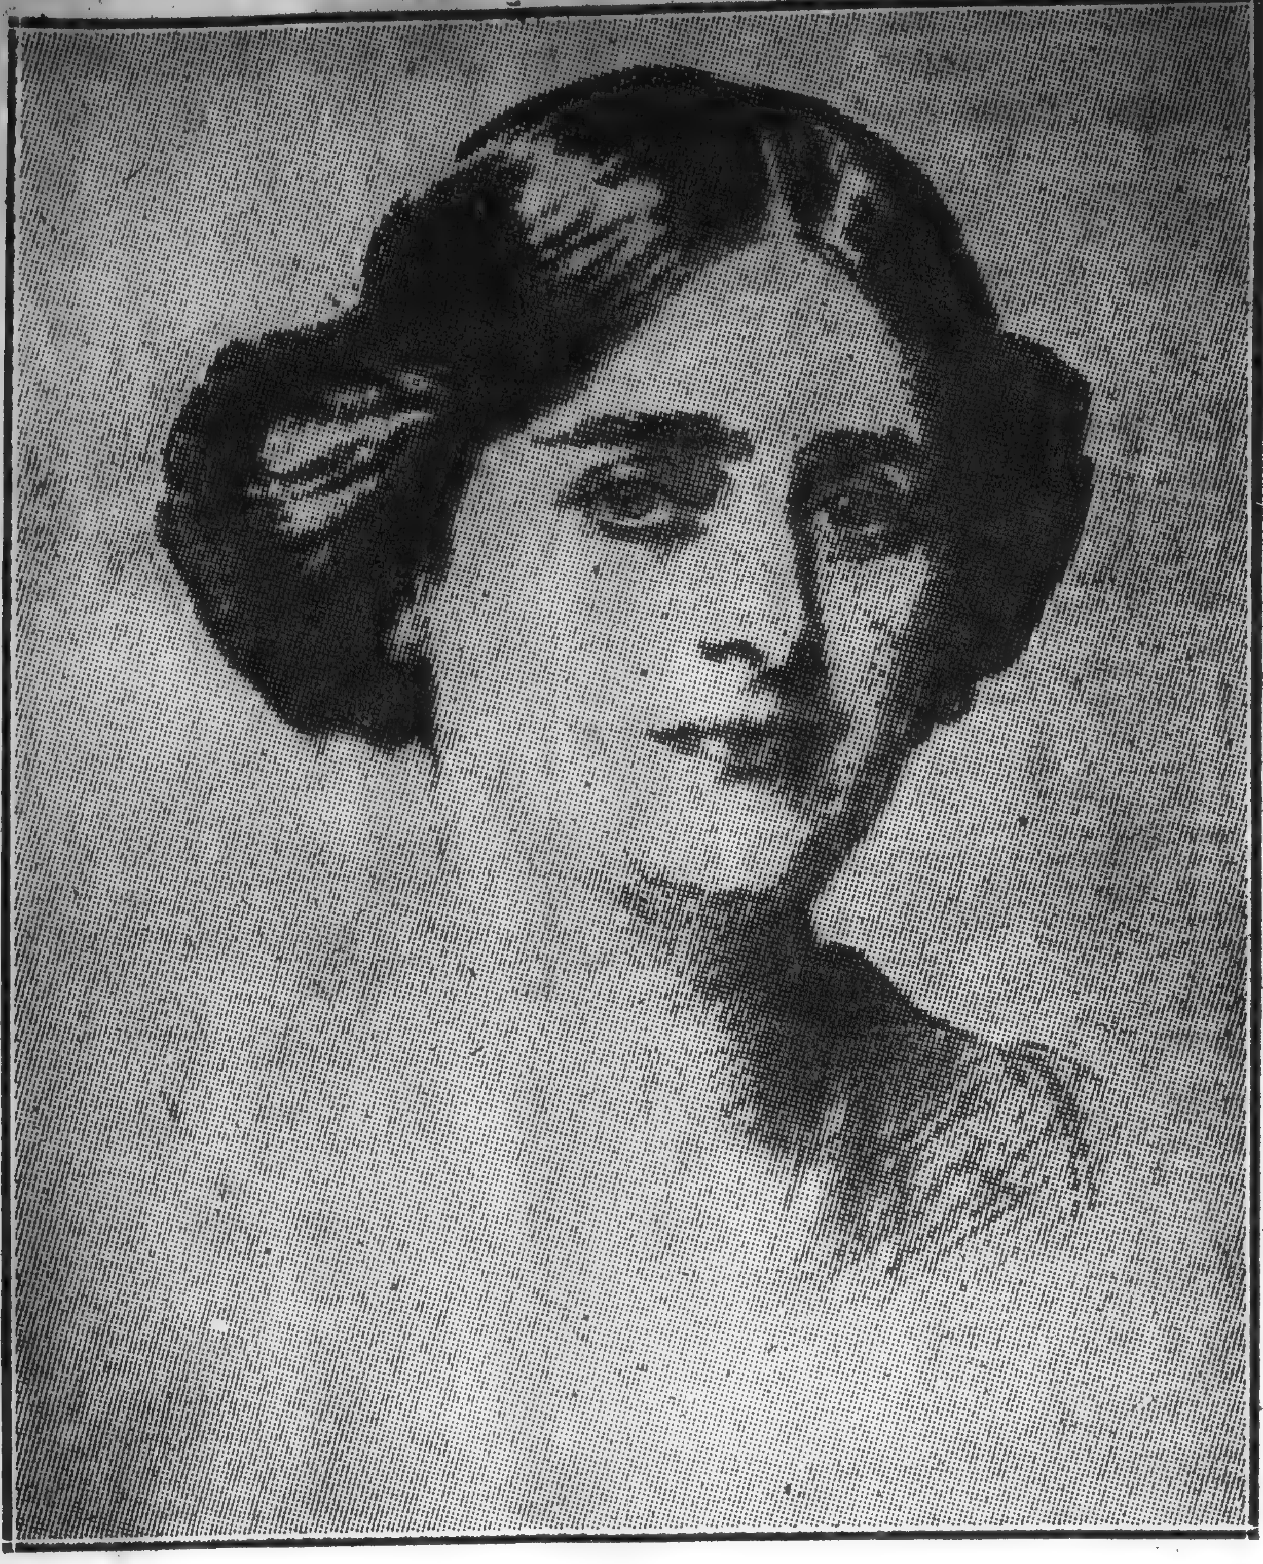
He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Increased Demand

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Broc

Candor and Charm



Myra Hess (From the Drawing by Sargent)

New English Pianist to Be Heard with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge Tomorrow

---

TRANS. FEB-8.

MONTEUX REENGAGED AS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the present leader, to include the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr Monteux has accepted.

Mr Monteux is fulfilling his third season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the Boston Sympohny Orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River.

Before he came to the orchestra, Mr Monteux had won an enviable name as conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music activities in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestra of Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

PIERRE MONTEUX

After active service in the World War, he first came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and he was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the Autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeaated and accepted.

GLOBE - FEB-9.

Monteux Remains

By announcement printed elsewhere in this newspaper, Mr. Monteux will continue to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra through the spring of 1924. Completing then a term of five years, he will give place to a successor whom, in the interval, the Trustees of the band and the concerts will, doubtless, diligently seek. So have they prudently adjusted the present and the future. By many titles Mr. Monteux deserved to be reengaged and approved. Within easy recollection, his wisdom, work and courage saved the orchestra — others aiding — from threatening dissolution. Little by little he has reconstituted it, reenforcing it with youth, rekindling its spirit and pride. It is now his responsive instrument that, to the fullness of his abilities, he is restoring to prowess and prestige. To the best of his powers, he upholds its established standards; under his hand from year to year, more and more they blossom anew.

With equal zeal and sagacity, Mr. Monteux has maintained the scope, the vitality of the Symphony Concerts. Under none of his predecessors were they freer from dry routine. Under none have they kept truer balance between the old and the new in music. No conductor could be more openminded to all men and all things, so long as they be deserving; none more unsparing in pains upon whatever he has undertaken.

Here in Boston, an old public and a new has understood and answered. Seldom at home have the Symphony Concerts been more nourishing. Young hearefs are seeking them—rare experience in the past. For the first time in the forty years of the orchestra, audiences have flocked to a "supplementary series." Elsewhere, save only in New York, Mr. Monteux has been as fortunate. Enjoying such freedom, fulfilling such ambitions, receiving such response, no wonder that he has ripened until with each new year, he has proved an abler and abler conductor.

Here and there is a conductor of acknowledged "genius." Some would have had such a one forthwith for the Symphony Orchestra. Not so easily or so swiftly are they persuaded to new posts. Here and there also is a conductor of unmistakable and mounting abilities. Some, again, would have such a one immediately installed at the Symphony Concerts to prove and to deepen his mettle. Not quite so confidently may decisions be made to stretch over years. The first obligation of the trustees was to deal justly with the present and to assure it. They have done so in the reëngagement of Mr. Monteux. They are equally bound to look prudently to the future. They do so when they give themselves time and opportunity to persuade the "genius," to descry and test the rising talent. Most wisely of all they have declined change for the sake of change and given to a conductor who has served well the orchestra, the public and the whole art of music, his just and honorable due.

H. T. P.

TRANS. Feb. 9

MONTEUX AGAIN HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Present Conductor Reappointed by the Trustees for Two More Years

The Boston Symphony Orchestra today settled the question as to the conductorship of the orchestra after this season by reappointing Pierre Monteux, the present conductor, for two years more.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Monteux has been conductor of the orchestra since 1919. He succeeded Henri Rabaud of the Paris Opera, who took charge of the band following the unpleasantness during which Dr. Muck was deposed.

Monteux was a well known French conductor at that time. He had come to America with the Diaghileff Russian Ballet and the following season had become the French conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The directors of the Boston Opera were assisted in securing both Rabaud and Monteux by the French high commission, then in Washington.

As Rabaud was delayed in reaching America, the Metropolitan Opera allowed Monteux to take a month's leave of absence and conduct the Boston Symphony. After one season in Boston, Rabaud returned to France and Monteux was engaged as regular conductor.

During his first two seasons Monteux was criticized for his interpretation of the symphonic works. In New York and other cities which the orchestra visits he has been violently attacked by the critics. However, at the end of his first year the trustees engaged him for two seasons more, and now that this period had expired he has been continued in office for another two years.

AMER- FEB. 9

MONTEUX RE-ENGAGED FOR TWO YEARS MORE

TO CONDUCT THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA UNTIL MAY OF 1924—THEREAFTER A NEW LEADER

Pierre Monteux, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as such during two years more. His standing contract with the trustees of the band runs through the current season, expiring next May. Yesterday, by unanimous vote, they extended it until May of 1924. At that time by mutual understanding Mr. Monteux will complete his term as conductor and a newcomer will be his successor. In all he will have filled for five years the post that he now adorns—through the past seasons of 1919-20 and 1920-21; through the present season of 1921-22; through the seasons to come of 1922-23 and 1923-24. So does action end the current debates over change.

TRANS - FEB-9.

Monteux To Stay Two Years More

Pierre Monteux has been re-engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two seasons more. This is his third season in Boston.

Mr. Monteux first came to Boston with the Ballet Russe Orchestra. He has perhaps no peer as a conductor of ballet music. During his stay in Boston the Symphony Orchestra has greatly increased its repertoire and its field of endeavor, which now extends north to Montreal and south as far as Richmond. The new Monday night series in Boston is also an innovation.

ADVTSR - FEB-10

Symphony Orchestra Again Engages Monteux

Noted Conductor Signs Contract for Two More Seasons

PIERRE MONTEUX

TRAV.-FEB-9.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

College Concerts

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendensy toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Has Fine Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odean, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghlieff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

BOSTON SYMPHONY REENGAGES MONTEU

Pierre Monteux, who is now in h third year as conductor of the Bost Symphony Orchestra, has been r engaged for the seasons of 1922-23 an 1923-24. This action was taken by unanimous vote of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees and a nounced by them yesterday afternoo Mr. Monteux had a long experience a conductor in the opera houses an concert halls of Europe before l came to the United States. H "Concerts Monteux" in Paris we widely known and his conductorsh of the Russian Ballet on its fir American tour acquainted Bost concert-goers with his abilities. Lat he became a staff conductor with t Metropolitan Opera Company in Ne York. In the autumn of 1918 he w offered the conductorship of the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra but w unable to obtain his release from e isting engagements except for a sho period, when he conducted the ope ing concerts of that season. The fo lowing year the offer was repeate and accepted.

MON-TR-FEB. 9

A Wise Choice

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to be congratulated on their choice of a conductor. Mr. Monteux will succeed himself. He will continue to rule over the orchestra that he has created; for the superb band that is justly the pride of Boston is surely his creation. It is due to his courage in the hour of trial, his unfailing patience, his skill as a drill-master, firm and courteous in rehearsal, his contagious enthusiasm, his thorough musicianship that the orchestra is today renowned, as in the past under Wilhelm Gericke, for its technical proficiency, its incomparable euphony,

And all this has been achieved without show of labor or of ostentation. There are conductors belonging to what is known as the prima donna class; poseurs, mindful of the audience, admitting the composer only as a spring-board for their personal display. Mr. Monteux's aim is far different. It is to bring out the beauty, the grandeur, the splendor of a composition, so that the hearer will share with him his intelligent and lively appreciation.

Mr. Monteux has also felt it his duty to acquaint his audiences with contemporaneous music, even when it is ultra-modern in its tendencies; but not as a propagandist; rather as a musician who believes that rank conservatism is as fatal to art as is youthful or deliberate extravagance. There are some, no doubt, who would prefer to remain in ignorance of what is doing in the musical world; who now resent the unusual and the unexpected, as they in turn protested against Wagner, Strauss, Cesar Franck and Debussy.

Yet no one since the foundation of this orchestra has displayed a greater affection for the older masters or interpreted them more eloquently than Pierre Monteux. He is a man of unusual catholicity, without a trace of chauvinism, welcoming what is good, from whatever country it may come, to whatever age it may belong.

And it may be said without exaggeration that no conductor in the long and honorable history of this orchestra has entertained a more sympathetic attitude towards that sensitive plant, the American composer.

HERALD-FEB.10

MONTEUX SIGNS WITH SYMPHONY

Re-engaged to Conduct Orchestra During 1922-23 and 1923-24

IN THIRD SEASON WITH ORGANIZATION

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Increased Demand

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brock-

Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Brilliant Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London and the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

HERALD-FEB.10.

MONTEUX TO RETAIN POST

Will Conduct Symphony Two More Years

BY OLIN DOWNES

Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two more years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This announcement was made yesterday. By unanimous vote the trustees of the orchestra requested him to continue in his present position, and Mr. Monteux accepted.

He has reason to be gratified with the results of his work in Boston, with the development of the orchestra under his direction, with the support, constantly increasing in its warmth, which the public of the city is giving him. The musical public, in turn, has found in Mr. Monteux a conductor admirably equipped for his post. Under him the programmes have been better balanced and richer in material than under any other conductor the Boston Symphony has had. Mr. Monteux is interested equally in the music of all schools. It was feared when he came to Boston that he might be as prone to over-emphasize French music, as German conductors had been prone before him to over-emphasize the music of Germany.

This has not proved the case. More German than French compositions were played by Mr. Monteux last season. He did not carry war or chauvanism into his art. He prepared with equal fidelity and performed with equal enthusiasm any and all music which he found, in itself, worthy of production.

POST-FEB.16

GRACEFUL TRIBUTE TO MONTEUX

Audience and Orchestra Stand as Conductor Appears

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Pierre Monteux appeared on the stage at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall he was given a hearty and prolonged greeting by the audience, in recognition of his re-engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony for two more seasons. The audience rose to its feet. The orchestra stood while the conductor bowed his acknowledgements.

A BEAUTIFUL PERFORMANCE

Whether this greeting particularly inspired Mr. Monteux, whether the effect was wholly due to the greatly increased efficiency of the orchestra since he took it in hand three seasons ago, or whether he is an exceptionally gifted interpreter of Schumann—for whatever reason, the performance of this composer's "Spring" symphony was one of the most beautiful we have ever heard, beautiful in detail, admirable, clear and coherent in its exposition, and above all, throbbing with the youthful and poetic spirit which inspired the work.

It is the fashion of a certain sophomoric school of criticism to speak condescendingly of Schumann as an orchestral composer, to find shortcomings which are indeed not impossible to find in his instrumental scheme to [illegible] sameness of rhythm in certain movements and then to exclaim that he was never by nature a symphonist. If this and much more were true it would not deprive the "Spring" symphony of its incomparable freshness and charm.

One Long Love Song

As a matter of fact, however, the dreamy melody of the slow movement is a wonderfully complete and proportionate idea for a symphonic andante, and no movement lacks delightful fancies of instrumental color which Schumann and Schumann alone could conceive.

It may be old-fashioned to adore this symphony. Then we are old-fashioned. Nor is it a small thing, or a thing to view with condescendsion, when a composer produces a work which is one love-song from the first to the last, and which makes everyone who listens to it happy. Nor is it the least of Mr. Monteux's accomplishments, that he can turn from the subtleties and the complex instrumental effects of music by ultra-modern composers, and give a performance of the "Spring" symphony which recreates the music, hot with the composer's spirit, and presents it in a way for which Schumann surely would have thanked his interpreter, yesterday afternoon.

Three Russian Pieces

The other music on the programme was Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, with Mr. Burgin, concertmaster, Mr. Thillois, leader of the second violinist, and Mr. Bedetti, first 'cellist, as the players of solo parts; "Three Pieces for Orchestra" after Russian folk-lora, by Liadoff were played, two of them for the first time. These pieces have not a great deal of body, but they are often imaginative and the orchestration is novel and brilliant. Perhaps the finest musical moment is the introduction of the first piece, "Kikimora." Over a very beautiful orchestral back ground the English horn plays a haunting melody, probably of folk origin, and we are off on our tale. Kikimora, a monster of Russian fabrication, "is lanky and dark, her head as small as a thimble, her body like a straw. She is noisy from morning till evening; she whistles and hisses from twilight to midnight . . . she spins and plots in her mind evil against mankind." And the whistle of the fantastical Kikimora is heard more than once in these pieces.

"The Enchanted Lake"

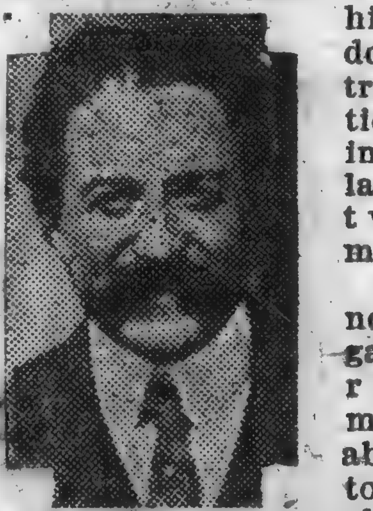
The second piece, played like the first, for the first time here, is "The Enchanted Lake." It has no story, no plot, but this is obviously a lake on which two confiding ones sail, and their bark recedes is a haze of beauty and mystery. The music is a little Tristanish, but the atmosphere is the composer's, and the principal melody very engaging. The third piece, "Baba Yaga," has been heard here under Mr. Fiedler. It is the slightest of the three, but it has the humor, the manner of telling the stories to a child, which characterize the whole suite.

For a foil to Schumann and Liadoff there was the broad and melodious music of Handel—the Concerto Grosso in D minor—and at last the noisy music that Smetana wrote as a tone picture of the life in Wallenstein's camp.

POST-FEB.11

MONTEUX GIVEN GREAT OVATION

Pierre Monteux was given an ovation when he came out yesterday to conduct the Symphony Orchestra. Players and the spectators rose to greet and applaud him, thus endorsing the trustees' action in engaging the popular leader for two seasons more.



PIERRE MONTEUX

There was no doubt regarding his re-engagement. No abler conductor is available, and it is a question whether a more popular one could possibly be secured. Since Mr. Fiedler's time no leader has so favorably impressed both the orchestra and the patrons of the concets.

Immediately after the ovation Mr. Monteux gave a brilliant interpretation of Schuman's "Spring Symphony." The orchestra deservel to share in the applause. Handel's "Concerto Grosso" in D minor, for strings, was also given a beautiful performance, with Richard Bergin, Fernand Thillois and Jean Bedetti as soloists. Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" poem and three short pieces by Liadoff complete the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-FEB.11.

[71]

TRIBUTE TO MONTEUX GIVEN AT CONCERT

When Mr Monteux, who has just been reengaged for two more seasons as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage at the beginning of yesterday's concert, the orchestra stood and applauded him heartily. Most of the audience also stood up and everybody clapped vigorously for several minutes. The demonstration was apparently spontaneous, and certainly a deserved and timely tribute to the capable leader, who has carried the orchestra successfully through the worst difficulties in its history.

The performance of Schumann's First Symphony, which followed, showed Mr Monteux at his best as an interpreter of romantic music. Other recent performances have had a more flawless technical excellence, but none has more surely conveyed the spirit and essence of the chosen piece. This symphony is ineffectively orchestrated, so that many of Schumann's best musical ideas lose much of their point in the medium for which he clumsily arranged them. His procedure in composition reversed Beethoven's way of thinking all his music, even the piano sonatas, in terms of the orchestra. The finale of this symphony makes obvious the known fact that Schumann imagined all his music for orchestra in terms of the piano. Mr Monteux made the orchestration seem less turgid than usual, possibly by revisions of the score.

Instead of the originally announced Double Concerto of Handel, the Concerto Grosso in D minor was played. This is one of the familiar set for strings. The performance brought out much of the delicate elegance of Handel's music, too often forgotten by a generation which has as its chief memory of the composer's works the customary pompously stodgy performances of his oratorios, where music written for a chorus of not over 50 professional singers and as many orchestral players is given by choruses of 400 or 4000 amateurs with perhaps 20 in the orchestra, spoiling all the nuances and proportions.

Three tone pictures by Liadov, two of them new to these concerts, were warmly applauded. They are rather tritely and obviously coloristic, the work of a mediocre imagination using the idiom of such geniuses as Musorgsky and Borodin at second hand.

Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" has much more life and vigor in its rather crudely noisy music than Liadov's music showed. The performance of these two selections was workmanlike, but not fiery.

Next week Josef Hofmann will play Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto." The other numbers are the overture to "Egmont," a novel piece by the noted German composer Schreker, and Debussy's "Iberia."

GLOBE-FEB.11

OVATION FOR MONTEUX AT CONCERT

Re-Engaged Conductor Offers Excellent Program by Symphony Orchestra

By FRED J. McISAAC.

When Pierre Monteux appeared at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon he was tendered a polite ovation by the symphony audience, as it was his first appearance since the announcement of his re-engagement. In response he conducted an excellent concert. The program was varied and interesting.

It began with the first symphony of Schumann, included the big concerto of Handel, which calls for two solo violins and a solo cello, as well as full orchestra, three Russian bits of impressionism by Liadov, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

Vincent D'Indy, who recently visited us, composed a tone poem called "The Camp of Wallenstein," which has been played here with fair frequency. The Smetana composition has only been done twice in thirty years. However, it is much more tuneful than D'Indy work, if it offers less of interest to the student of orchestration.

This person, Wallenstein, was a nobleman of Austria, who owned and operated a private army during the Thirty Years War of Germany, which he offered to the highest bidder. He had as many as 50,000 men on his payroll. It was a matter of luck and money that he took the Catholic side, and held off Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, the Protestant champion, for many years. His camp must have been a disorderly place, but D'Indy makes it more disorderly than Smetana.

The Liadov tone pictures are the usual Russian fairy tale set to music. To say they are good description of anything is going very far, but they are wierd, exotic, colorful, full of spirit and lacking in respect for musical formulas.

There probably never lived a composer who was more appreciated during his lifetime than Handel, and who has steadily declined in size as he has done, until little of his is now performed save "The Messiah." Yet he was a skillful musician, as the concerto which was performed yesterday [illegible] symphony provoked applause.

HOFMANN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the great pianist. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major, which has been called the "Emperor" Concerto. [illegible]

Overture to "Egmont" of the same composer.

A novelty of considerable interest on this program will be the "Prelude to a Drama," by Schreker, the daring German composer of the younger school, whose music as yet has not been heard in Boston. The program will close with Debussy's "Iberia."

AMER-FEB.11

From JAN 2 2 1922 X
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Program.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the third season at this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the only concert to be given by this famous organization in Baltimore this year, which will take place in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evening, February 1, at 8.15.

The novelty on this program will be the Orchestral Suite, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented young Italian composer, who is now visiting America for the first time. The solo part in one of the four movements will be sung by Laura Littlefield, soprano.

The symphony on this program will be the Fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. This work was considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement, and the subsequent verdict of posterity is more and more inclining to his view.

The remaining numbers will be the Symphonic Variations "Istar" by Vincent d'Indy, the illustrious French composer, who has just returned from a visit here, and the Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the brilliant exponent of the modern Russian school of music.

From
EAGLE JAN 2 2 1922 D
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

The Institute announces a recital by Paul Kochanski, violinist, in the Academy of Music Monday evening, Jan. 30. Mr. Kochanski's program includes the Tschaikowski Concerto, the Saint-Saens Rondo Capriccioso, and many shorter pieces.

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 3. The program runs: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, two "Nocturnes" of Debussy, two "Slavonic Dances" of Dvorak; and the Saint-Saens Concerto for cello and orchestra. In the last-named work the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, first-desk of the orchestra's 'cello section.

For the next of the Brooklyn series of concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Saturday afternoon, Feb. 11, the soloist will be Erika Morini, violinist.

POST
ess: Washington, D. C.
JAN 2 2 1922 L

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in the third season at this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the only concert to be given by the famous organization in Washington this year at the New National theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony on this program will be the fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. The remainder of the program will consist of "The Carnival in Paris," by the Norwegian composer, Svendsen; Debussy's two nocturnes "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), one of the finest examples of the modern French school of music. The final number will be Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

FROM JAN 2 3 1922 X
COMMERCIAL
New York

The Symphony Orchestras

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karl Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert and thus give to this Polish composer, who is so highly spoken of in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

The other numbers will be Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," the suite "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water"), by Alfredo Casella, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

For the Saturday concert the novelty will be Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York; also Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, d'Indy's "Istar" Variations and Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris."

The Young People's Symphony concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Albert Coates, guest conductor, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 28, in Carnegie Hall, will have Guy Maier, pianist, as the assisting artist.

Mr. Coates will present a program

[illegible] of Schubert's Marche Militaire, orchestrated by Leopold Damrosch; the Rossini-Respighi Suite de Ballet, "La Boutique Fantasque," arranged by Howard Carr; Bach's Sicilienne from the Sonata in E Flat orchestrated by Gavaert; Menuet de Bourgeois Gentilhomme by Lulli, and the suite from the opera ballet, "The Golden Cockerel," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS HEARD

Two Recitals and Three Operas Are the Day's Other Offerings in Music.

Pierre Monteux and his excellent symphony orchestra from Boston opened the afternoon of music here yesterday at Carnegie Hall with a masterly performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" followed the symphony, and for the second time that the listener has heard it played by the Boston orchestra it impressed him once more as a splendid accompaniment for the action which is described in the programme notes, but it must be a tiresome affair to a listener who is not supplied with a programme, and who therefore cannot know what is being accompanied.

Most of the audience yesterday afternoon could not have known, because the "Verklaerte Nacht" was put on in place of Ravel's "Valse" at the last moment, and no programme notes were supplied.

WORLD FEB 3

Fourteenth Symphony Programme

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct performances of Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat, Liadoff's light-charactered suite, the movements of which are built on Russian folk themes, including "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga," Handel's double concerto for strings and two wind orchestras and, as the closing number, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

POST-FEB.5.

Beethoven Seventh Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Monteux's Reading Slightly More Spirited Than That of Stransky, Less Erratic Than Rendition by Coates

By H. E. Krehbiel

(Reprinted from yesterday's last edition)

Something may be found in another section of The Tribune to-day touching the occasional meeting of minds of conductors as to the desirability of compelling, or at least inviting, the concertgoers to hear the same composition day after day. The case directly in point was Beethoven's symphony in A, the Seventh of the supposedly immortal Nine. Between Thursday night of week before last and yesterday afternoon the symphony was played five times in Carnegie Hall. It was on the programs of three organizations, and therefore those who heard even a single concert by the Philharmonic, the Symphony Society and the Boston Orchestra within the period heard the work three times. By the same token, they were permitted—if we do not intimate that they were challenged—to form an opinion as to the comparative value of the interpretations of Messrs. Stransky, Coates and Monteux.

In the article printed elsewhere in The Tribune to-day we have ventured upon some reflections concerning the music as Beethoven wrote it and as we modestly think he intended that it should be played and as it was made to sound. To those observations we have little to add after the performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The players at the command of Mr. Monteux, did not give out a body of tone as ingratiating to the ear as did those directed by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Coates, but the performance, a little more spirited than that of the Philharmonic Society and a great deal less erratic than that of the Symphony Society, approached the former in being, so far as tempi were concerned, consonant with the manifest purposes of the composer. There were deviations from the fundamental rates of speed indicated by Beethoven's markings, but they were not radically or violently different.

Mr. Monteux's conception of the Allegretto is not quite that which Beethoven conceived to be the movement of an allegretto, but it was not that of a melancholy march spurred into a quickstep by the entrance of the lovely major melody. Beethoven's notion concerning its tempo may be gathered from the corresponding movement in the symphony which he wrote immediately after it. The Allegretto Scherzando of the Eighth Symphony is an allegretto played jocosely. We doubt if Mr. Coates would associate a heavy-hearted or halfway heavy-footed mood with that exquisite bit of humor. Yet it is an allegretto. Mr. Monteux permitted the characteristic dactyl in the pizzicato basses to the second subject to turn into an anapæst by overlooking the dynamic stress in the eighth notes which results from their being played on the higher open strings instead of [illegible] ton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Brilliant Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London and the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

HERALD-FEB.10.

MONTEUX TO RETAIN POST

Will Conduct Symphony Two More Years

BY OLIN DOWNES

Pierre Monteux has been engaged for two more years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This announcement was made yesterday. By unanimous vote the trustees of the orchestra requested him to continue in his present position, and Mr. Monteux accepted.

He has reason to be gratified with the results of his work in Boston, with the development of the orchestra under his direction, with the support, constantly increasing in its warmth, which the public of the city is giving him. The musical public, in turn, has found in Mr. Monteux a conductor admirably equipped for his post. Under him the programmes have been better balanced and richer in material than under any other conductor the Boston Symphony has had. Mr. Monteux is interested equally in the music of all schools. It was feared when he came to Boston that he might be as prone to overemphasize French music, as German conductors had been prone before him to over-emphasize the music of Germany.

This has not proved the case. More German than French compositions were played by Mr. Monteux last season. He did not carry war or chauvanism into his art. He prepared with equal fidelity and performed with equal enthusiasm any and all music which he found, in itself, worthy of production.

POST- FEB.16

GRACEFUL TRIBUTE TO MONTEUX

Audience and Orchestra Stand as Conductor Appears

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Pierre Monteux appeared on the stage at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall he was given a hearty and prolonged greeting by the audience, in recognition of his re-engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony for two more seasons. The audience rose to its feet. The orchestra stood while the conductor bowed his acknowledgements.

A BEAUTIFUL PERFORMANCE

Whether this greeting particularly inspired Mr. Monteux, whether the effect was wholly due to the greatly increased efficiency of the orchestra since he took it in hand three seasons ago, or whether he is an exceptionally gifted interpreter of Schumann—for whatever reason, the performance of this composer's "Spring" symphony was one of the most beautiful we have ever heard, beautiful in detail, admirable, clear and coherent in its exposition, and above all, throbbing with the youthful and poetic spirit which inspired the work.

It is the fashion of a certain sophomoric school of criticism to speak condescendingly of Schumann as an orchestral composer, to find shortcomings which are indeed not impossible to find—in his instrumental scheme to point to a sameness of rhythm in certain movements and then to exclaim that he was never by nature a symphonist. If this and much more were true it would not deprive the "Spring" symphony of its incomparable freshness and charm.

One Long Love Song

As a matter of fact, however, the dreamy melody of the slow movement is a wonderfully complete and proportionate idea for a symphonic andante, and no movement lacks delightful fancies of instrumental color which Schumann and Schumann alone could conceive.

It may be old-fashioned to adore this symphony. Then we are old-fashioned. Nor is it a small thing, or a thing to view with condescendsion, when a composer produces a work which is one love-song from the first to the last, and which makes everyone who listens to it happy. Nor is it the least of Mr. Monteux's accomplishments, that he can turn from the subtleties and the complex instrumental effects of music by ultra-modern composers, and give a performance of the "Spring" symphony which recreates the music, hot with the composer's spirit, and presents it in a way for which Schumann surely would have thanked his interpreter, yesterday afternoon.

Three Russian Pieces

The other music on the programme was Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, with Mr. Burgin, concertmaster. Mr. Thillois, leader of the second violinist, and Mr. Bedetti, first 'cellist, as the players of solo parts; "Three Pieces for Orchestra" after Russian folk-lore by Liadoff were played, two of them for the first time. These pieces have not a great deal of body, but they are often imaginative and the orchestration is novel and brilliant. Perhaps the finest musical moment is the introduction of the first piece, "Kikimora." Over a very beautiful orchestral back ground the English horn plays a haunting melody, probably of folk origin, and we are off on our tale. Kikimora, a monster of Russian fabrication, "is lanky and dark, her head as small as a thimble, her body like a straw. She is noisy from morning till evening; she whistles and hisses from twilight to midnight . . . she spins and plots in her mind evil against mankind." And the whistle of the fantastical Kikimora is heard more than once in these pieces.

"The Enchanted Lake"

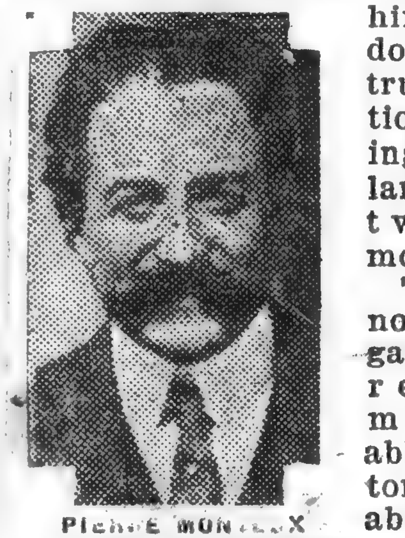
The second piece, played like the first, for the first time here, is "The Enchanted Lake." It has no story, no plot, but this is obviously a lake on which two confiding ones sail, and their bark recedes is a haze of beauty and mystery. The music is a little Tristanish, but the atmosphere is the composer's, and the principal melody very engaging. The third piece, "Baba Yaga," has been heard here under Mr. Fiedler. It is the slightest of the three, but it has the humor, the manner of telling the stories to a child, which characterize the whole suite.

For a foil to Schumann and Liadoff there was the broad and melodious music of Handel—the Concerto Grosso in D minor—and at last the noisy music that Smetana wrote as a tone picture of the life in Wallenstein's camp.

POST-FEB.11

MONTEUX GIVEN GREAT OVATION

Pierre Monteux was given an ovation when he came out yesterday to conduct the Symphony Orchestra. Players and the spectators rose to greet and applaud him, thus endorsing the trustees' action in engaging the popular leader for two seasons more.



PIERRE MONTEUX

There was no doubt regarding his re-engagement.. No abler conductor is available, and it is a question whether a more popular one could possibly be secured. Since Mr. Fiedler's time no leader has so favorably impressed both the orchestra and the patrons of the concets.

Immediately after the ovation Mr. Monteux gave a brilliant interpretation of Schuman's "Spring Symphony." The orchestra deservel to share in the applause. Handel's "Concerto Grosso" in D minor, for strings, was also given a beautiful performance, with Richard Bergin, Fernand Thillois and Jean Bedetti as soloists. Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" poem and three short pieces by Liadoff complete the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-FEB.11.

TRIBUTE TO MONTEUX GIVEN AT CONCERT

When Mr Monteux, who has just been reengaged for two more seasons as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, came on the stage at the beginning of yesterday's concert, the orchestra stood and applauded him heartily. Most of the audience also stood up and everybody clapped vigorously for several minutes. The demonstration was apparently spontaneous, and certainly a deserved and timely tribute to the capable leader, who has carried the orchestra successfully through the worst difficulties in its history.

The performance of Schumann's First Symphony, which followed, showed Mr Monteux at his best as an interpreter of romantic music. Other recent performances have had a more flawless technical excellence, but none has more surely conveyed the spirit and essence of the chosen piece. This symphony is ineffectively orchestrated, so that many of Schumann's best musical ideas lose much of their point in the medium for which he clumsily arranged them. His procedure in composition reversed Beethoven's way of thinking all his music, even the piano sonatas, in terms of the orchestra. The finale of this symphony makes obvious the known fact that Schumann imagined all his music for orchestra in terms of the piano. Mr Monteux made the orchestration seem less turgid than usual, possibly by revisions of the score.

Instead of the originally announced Double Concerto of Handel, the Concerto Grosso in D minor was played. This is one of the familiar set for strings. The performance brought out much of the delicate elegance of Handel's music, too often forgotten by a generation which has as its chief memory of the composer's works the customary pompously stodgy performances of his oratorios, where music written for a chorus of not over 50 professional singers and as many orchestral players is given by choruses of 400 or 4000 amateurs with perhaps 20 in the orchestra, spoiling all the nuance and proportions.

Three tone pictures by Liadov, two of them new to these concerts, were warmly applauded. They are rather tritely and obviously coloristic, the work of a mediocre imagination using the idiom of such geniuses as Musorgsky and Borodin at second hand.

Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" has much more life and vigor in its rather crudely noisy music than Liadov's music showed. The performance of these two selections was workmanlike, but not fiery.

Next week Josef Hofmann will play Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto." The other numbers are the overture to "Egmont," a novel piece by the noted German composer Schreker, and Debussy's "Iberia."

GLOBE-FEB.11

OVATION FOR MONTEUX AT CONCERT

Re-Engaged Conductor Offers Excellent Program by Symphony Orchestra

By FRED J. McISAAC.

When Pierre Monteux appeared at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon he was tendered a polite ovation by the symphony audience, as it was his first appearance since the announcement of his re-engagement. In response he conducted an excellent concert. The program was varied and interesting.

It began with the first symphony of Schumann, included the big concerto of Handel, which calls for two solo violins and a solo cello, as well as full orchestra, three Russian bits of impressionism by Liadov, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

Vincent D'Indy, who recently visited us, composed a tone poem called "The Camp of Wallenstein," which has been played here with fair frequency. The Smetana composition has only been done twice in thirty years. However, it is much more tuneful than D'Indy work, if it offers less of interest to the student of orchestration.

This person, Wallenstein, was a nobleman of Austria, who owned and operated a private army during the Thirty Years War of Germany, which he offered to the highest bidder. He had as many as 50,000 men on his payroll. It was a matter of luck and money that he took the Catholic side, and held off Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, the Protestant champion, for many years. His camp must have been a disorderly place, but D'Indy makes it more disorderly than Smetana.

The Liadov tone pictures are the usual Russian fairy tale set to music. To say they are good description of anything is going very far, but they are wierd, exotic, colorful, full of spirit and lacking in respect for musical formulas.

There probably never lived a composer who was more appreciated during his lifetime than Handel, and who has steadily declined in size as he has done, until little of his is now performed save "The Messiah." Yet he was a skillful musician, as the concerto which was performed yesterday showed. The Schumann symphony provoked applause.

HOFMANN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 17 and 18, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the great pianist. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major, which has been called the "Emperor" Concerto. This will be preceded by the Overture to "Egmont," of the same composer.

A novelty of considerable interest on this program will be the "Prelude to a Drama," by Schreker, the daring German composer of the younger school, whose music as yet has not been heard in Boston. The program will close with Debussy's "Iberia."

AMER-FEB.11

From JAN 2 2 1922
AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Program.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the third season at this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the only concert to be given by this famous organization in Baltimore this year, which will take place in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evening, February 1, at 8.15.

The novelty on this program will be the Orchestral Suite, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented young Italian composer, who is now visiting America for the first time. The solo part in one of the four movements will be sung by Laura Littlefield, soprano.

The symphony on this program will be the Fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. This work was considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement, and the subsequent verdict of posterity is more and more inclining to his view

The remaining numbers will be the Symphonic Variations "Istar" by Vincent d'Indy, the illustrious French composer, who has just returned from a visit here, and the Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the brilliant exponent of the modern Russian school of music.

From JAN 2 2 1922
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

The Institute announces a recital by Paul Kochanski, violinist, in the Academy of Music Monday evening, Jan. 30. Mr. Kochanski's program includes the Tschaikowski Concerto, the Saint-Saens Rondo Capriccioso, and many shorter pieces.

The fourth Boston Symphony Concert will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Feb. 3. The program runs: Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, two "Nocturnes" of Debussy, two "Slavonic Dances" of Dvorak; and the Saint-Saens Concerto for cello and orchestra. In the last-named work the soloist will be Jean Bedetti, first-desk of the orchestra's 'cello section.

For the next of the Brooklyn series of concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Saturday afternoon, Feb. 11, the soloist will be Erika Morini, violinist.

POST
ess: Washington, D. C.
JAN 2 2 1922

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in the third season at this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the only concert to be given by the famous organization in Washington this year at the New National theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 31, at 4:30, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony on this program will be the fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. The remainder of the program will consist of "The Carnival in Paris," by the Norwegian composer, Svendsen; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), one of the finest examples of the modern French school of music. The final number will be Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

FROM JAN 2 3 1922
COMMERCIAL
New York

The Symphony Orchestras

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2 and 4. The Second Symphony of Karl Szymanowski will open the Thursday concert and thus give to this Polish composer, who is so highly spoken of in Europe, a first hearing in New York of his larger works.

The other numbers will be Franck's symphonic piece from "The Redemption," the suite "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water"), by Alfredo Casella, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

For the Saturday concert the novelty will be Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which will on this occasion have its first performance in New York; also Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, d'Indy's "Istar" Variations and Svendsen's "The Carnival in Paris."

The Young People's Symphony concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Albert Coates, guest conductor, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 28, in Carnegie Hall, will have Guy Maier, pianist, as the assisting artist.

Mr. Coates will present a program consisting of Schubert's Marche Militaire, orchestrated by Leopold Damrosch; the Rossini-Respighi Suite de Ballet, "La Boutique Fantasque," arranged by Howard Carr; Bach's Sicilienne from the Sonata in E Flat orchestrated by Gavaert; Menuet du Bourgeois Gentilhomme by Lulli, and the suite from the opera ballet, "The Golden Cockerel," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS HEARD

Two Recitals and Three Operas Are the Day's Other Offerings in Music.

Pierre Monteux and his excellent symphony orchestra from Boston opened the afternoon of music here yesterday at Carnegie Hall with a masterly performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" followed the symphony, and for the second time that the listener has heard it played by the Boston orchestra it impressed him once more as a splendid accompaniment for the action which is described in the programme notes, but it must be a tiresome affair to a listener who is not supplied with a programme, and who therefore cannot know what is being accompanied.

Most of the audience yesterday afternoon could not have known, because the "Verklaerte Nacht" was put on in place of Ravel's "Valse" at the last moment, and no programme notes were supplied.

WRLD-FEB.

Fourteenth Symphony Programme

At the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct performances of Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat, Liadoff's light-charactered suite, the movements of which are built on Russian folk themes, including "Kikimora," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga," Handel's double concerto for strings and two wind orchestras and, as the closing number, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp."

POST-FEB.

Beethoven Seventh Symphony Played by Boston Orchestra

Monteux's Reading Slightly More Spirited Than That of Stransky, Less Erratic Than Rendition by Coates

By H. E. Krehbiel

(Reprinted from yesterday's last edition)

Something may be found in another section of The Tribune to-day touching the occasional meeting of minds of conductors as to the desirability of compelling, or at least inviting, the concertgoers to hear the same composition day after day. The case directly in point was Beethoven's symphony in A, the Seventh of the supposedly immortal Nine. Between Thursday night of week before last and yesterday afternoon the symphony was played five times in Carnegie Hall. It was on the programs of three organizations, and therefore those who heard even a single concert by the Philharmonic, the Symphony Society and the Boston Orchestra within the period heard the work three times. By the same token, they were permitted—if we do not intimate that they were challenged—to form an opinion as to the comparative value of the interpretations of Messrs. Stransky, Coates and Monteux.

In the article printed elsewhere in The Tribune to-day we have ventured upon some reflections concerning the music as Beethoven wrote it and as we modestly think he intended that it should be played and as it was made to sound. To those observations we have little to add after the performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The players at the command of Mr. Monteux did not give out a body of tone as ingratiating to the ear as did those directed by Mr. Stransky and Mr. Coates, but the performance, a little more spirited than that of the Philharmonic Society and a great deal less erratic than that of the Symphony Society, approached the former in being, so far as tempi were concerned, consonant with the manifest purposes of the composer. There were deviations from the fundamental rates of speed indicated by Beethoven's markings, but they were not radically or violently different.

Mr. Monteux's conception of the Allegretto is not quite that which Beethoven conceived to be the movement of an allegretto, but it was not that of a melancholy march spurred into a quickstep by the entrance of the lovely major melody. Beethoven's notion concerning its tempo may be gathered from the corresponding movement in the symphony which he wrote immediately after it. The Allegretto Scherzando of the Eighth Symphony is an allegretto played jocosely. We doubt if Mr. Coates would associate a heavy-hearted or halfway heavy-footed mood with that exquisite bit of humor. Yet it is an allegretto. Mr. Monteux permitted the characteristic dactyl in the pizzicato basses to the second subject to turn into an anapæst by overlooking the dynamic stress in the eighth notes which results from their being played on the higher open strings instead of placing the accent on the first beat where it belongs, but where the [illegible] violoncello [illegible] the last tones of the theme of [illegible] were inaudible, as usual.

Uncertainty is beginning to enter into our concert programs as well as the repertoire of the Manhattan Opera House. Mr. Monteux had promised a first New York performance of Ravel's "La Valse," but replaced it yesterday with Schonberg's "Verklärte Nacht." His other numbers were the "Istar" variations by D'Indy and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris."

TRIBUNE - FEB. 6.

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN

INS. ARTS - SCNCE

PIERRE MONTEUX

PIERRE MONTEUX

Announcement of the unanimous vote of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux as Conductor of the Orchestra for the seasons 1922-1923 and 1923-1924, and of Mr. Monteux's acceptance of the same, will be received with satisfaction by subscribers to the Symphony concerts. Largely through Mr. Monteux's devotion and ability the vicissitudes brought upon the Orchestra by the War and Mr. Higginson's death have been overcome.

For three seasons, this eminent musician has worked untiringly as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, setting new standards and maintaining those traditions that have made the Orchestra an important factor in the musical world. Its prestige and widespread favor, under Mr. Monteux's direction, are seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston and elsewhere. In addition to the regular series of twenty-four pairs of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Cambridge have also been increased from eight to nine. The schedule beyond Boston has taken the Orchestra as far North as Montreal, as far South as Richmond, and West into New York State.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, no doubt owes a large part of its beauty of ensemble to the creative efforts and executive skill of its Conductor, but it is also not unlikely that Pierre Monteux's genius has found its highest fruition in this post. He had been widely acclaimed as a successful Conductor, both here and abroad, before assuming his present relations with the Boston organization, conducting prominent orchestras in Paris, London, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest. His first work in this country, after active service in the War, was as head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Later he became a principal Conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, accepting in 1918 the offer of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux's authoritative and finely appreciative interpretation of the established repertory, and his discriminating and even prophetic choice from the music of today and tomorrow, have given an added interest to the Orchestra's concerts.

Philadelphia
PA
~~N. American~~ Record
ISSUE OF
FEB 10 1922

Boston Symphony Retains Monteux.

Boston, Feb. 9.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor.

HERALD
New York City
FEB 10 1922

BOSTON REENGAGES MONTEUX.

French Conductor to Remain Two More Years With Orchestra.

BOSTON, Feb. 9.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Pierre Monteux of France had been reengaged as conductor for a term of two years.

This ends speculation prevalent for some time that another would be engaged. He was formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan and was re[illegible] a contract there to [illegible]

Philadelphia
PA
Public Ledger
ISSUE OF
FEB 10 1922

Boston—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor for two years.

MONTEUX SIGNS WITH SYMPHONY

Re-engaged to Conduct Orchestra During 1922-23 and 1923-24

IN THIRD SEASON WITH ORGANIZATION

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Increased Demand

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Brilliant Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London and the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

HERALD - FEB - 10

At Least We Shall Have the Greatest Orchestra in Boston

The reappointment of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra means that the directors of the organization have modified the aim of the late Major Henry L. Higginson to have the finest orchestra in the world, and are content to have the finest orchestra in Boston.

Mr. Monteux is a good conductor. He is not an inspiring leader, but he is an intelligent musician, and his performances are always respectable. But to have the greatest orchestra in the world Boston needs the greatest conductor. Mr. Monteux is not the greatest conductor in the world or in America. He is not one of the six greatest conductors.

Perhaps Major Higginson's ambition, which he realized for a lifetime, was too big an ambition for a city like Boston. Perhaps the trustees are right in being content with an ordinary conductor and a possibly smaller annual deficit.

But those of us who have loved the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to regret its passing into control of men who are not musicians and who are willing to lower the prestige of a mighty orchestra in this manner.

HOFMANN

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 17 and 18, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major.

THIRD EXTRA SYMPHONY

Next Monday evening at 8 o'clock the third of the newly instituted extra series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. The soloist will be Alfred Mirovitch, the young Russian pianist, who first came to this country last season.

TRAV. FEB. 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHUMANN, HANDEL, TRIFLES AND MONTEUX

Orchestra and Audience Warm to the Conductor — A Thick-Voiced and Inelastic Version of the Spring Symphony — The Day's Work by Handel and Also Liadov —Smetana and a Void—The Tone of the Band

Exacting in work but fair-minded and kindly is Mr. Monteux toward the players in the Symphony Orchestra. Toward him they are "men of good will." They are also men who, absorbing, perhaps, the Bostonian atmosphere, prefer the comfortable routine of things as they are. Accordingly they were well content when the conductor's stay with the band was prolonged through two years. As he came to his place in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening they rose to welcome him, tapped upon their instruments, gave other signs of satisfaction. Taking cue, the audience also clapped Mr. Monteux long, heartily, sincerely. In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, in the regular course of concerts at home, the players renewed this little ceremony. Again the audience added its applause; while some, according to a singular parochial custom, at which the larger world often smiles, stood for an instant, as the word goes, "in homage." By these signs the band prefers Mr. Monteux to change and the major part of the public of the Symphony Concerts is like-minded. A minority would have welcomed a new conductor next autumn; but it reserves for private discussion its chagrins over the recent decision of the Trustees, while it is mindful also of Mr. Monteux's substantial virtues and large service.

With audience and orchestra so minded, the more the pity that the conductor's version of Schumann's "Spring Symphony"—the first piece of the afternoon—was not one of his happiest achievements. According to his frequent custom with music of the first half of the nineteenth century, he doubled various wood-wind instruments. So doing he has gained with some pieces a fuller body, a better balance of tone. With others, this increase has merely thickened the instrumental web and impeded the plastic progress of the tonal strands. Now Schumann was no adept distributor of orchestral voices, least of all in this symphony of his young years. Through measure after measure it is too thickly, uniformly and monotonously scored. The true, the imperative, concern of the conductor is to lighten, clarify and diversify this harmonic and instrumental vesture, and one or another, like Mr. Gericke, Mr. Weingartner, Dr. Muck, each in his day, has appreciably succeeded therewith. Mr. Monteux, however, by this doubling of sundry parts, only added thickness to thickness and unwieldiness to unwieldiness.

Above all, this symphony of the lights, the airs, the exhilarations of the spring exacts transparency of tone. The orchestral song, elate or musing, must be luminous; else it is only half itself. Such limpid brightness, such tender glow of voice, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra often missed. Compared with what it should be in imagination, with what it has been within recollection "at these concerts," the tone yesterday was opaque, heavy, monotonous beyond even Schumann's inevitable shortcomings. Similarly with the motion, the progress of the symphony. If ever there were a winged music, here it is written; the ardor with which, in four days, the composer set it to paper, seems fact as well as legend. The first movement leaps forth to meet the spring:

> O wende, wende Deinen Lauf,
> Im Thale blüht der Frühling auf!

The second pauses for no more than brief and songful musing in the clear glow of spring twilights. The third skips, like the lambs of the Psalms, through vernal impulses. Into the fourth floods, full tide, the vernal awakening alike upon the earth and within the spirits of men.

Such a music written in Schumann's fullest flights of mood and song must skim the air with dancing feet, take every turn lightly, quiver with every flicker of sun and breeze. In spite of the fashion in which the instrumentally clumsy Schumann now and again fabricates it, the ideal conductor, the ideal orchestra might lend it an infinite brightness and lightness, suppleness and sensibility. Under human limitations, the best of them may only approximate these glories. Yet Mr. Monteux seemed to fall needlessly short of them. Not that his pace was sluggish, not that he missed the flow of songful line. He was, in fact, both as brisk and as clear as the thickened instrumental web permitted. Rather, as he missed transparency of tone, so also he missed the plasticity, the changeful glow, the recurring leap and up-leap of the music. His pæan of spring was too square-cut, too sturdy, too bourgeois, lacked fancy, élan, exhilaration: it was middle-aged, it was sober; whereas Schumann's symphony is one of the masterpieces of symphonic music to be heard by the ear of the imagination in ideal voice, by the ear of the body, now and again, in performances to be [illegible]. Was there a hint of [illegible]

[illegible] time? [illegible] orchestra well on the way to old prowess; but yesterday it was easy to discern how far it has yet to go before it regains the transparency of tone, the elasticity of movement, the play of light and shade that were its long-standing glories.

A miscellany, none too interesting, filled the remainder of the concert. Since Mr. Wendling at the first horn is still disabled, the conductor put by the announced Concerto of Handel for string and wind choirs, substituting for it a Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings alone. No doubt any music of Handel is preferable to the magnified and usually platitudinous "Messiah" of the choral societies; to the Largo of summer-evening concerts. There are perverse ears that would listen gladly to some of his forgotten numbers—say, the pieces for the water fête of old exhumed by Mr. Gericke—that would hear with curiosity, and probably with boredom, one of his operas. Nobody, unless it is John McCormack in quest of old airs, goes a-searching nowadays in Handel. If one or another did, they might discover instrumental pieces more engaging and amusing than the Concerto Grosso of yesterday. The composers of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries from Bach through Haydn did no little of the day's work. They were men of genius in music and wrote their masterpieces. They were also journeymen who must live, and did their daily stint, each after his manner.

Into this stint falls the present Concerto Grosso, even as do some of Handel's minor oratorios and choral pieces. The familiar pattern of interwoven or answering voices sounded once more. In due place came the broad, suave, slow-paced Handelian air, exfoliating, ascending, coming full circle, but in this instance no treasure-trove of melody. Before and after stood the Handelian Allegros, even or diversified with running figures, skilfully varied by rhythm, modulation, divided or united voices. Every eighteenth-century composer wrote such music—pages upon pages. A few, like Handel, could give it the grand air. This time he tends usually to be workaday, and his only originality—in a single movement—is a piquant, fascinating, rather modern rhythm. In the day's work, likewise, the string choir played the piece—skilfully, faithfully, neatly, as good journeymen to another. Yet only the other day in Schönberg's "Transfiguring Night," those same string voices teemed with every finesse and felicity, themselves possessed with the music, no less possessing an audience with its beauty and its power. Nowadays, it is the moderns, more than the ancients, that kindle the Symphony Orchestra.

Trifles ensued—Liadov re-telling Russian folk-tales in tones and Smetana fondly fancying that music was to be made out of the din of Wallenstein's camp. Again composers at their job, like dutiful journalists, with Liadov contributing to the children's page and Smetana turning out an especially "thumping" article. Once upon a time there was Kikimora, a sort of Russian witch, who spun malignant spells, still and secret, and now and again whistled balefully at her spinning. Liadov's English horn mists her in mystery; his piccolo whistles for her; he and she spin an insinuating but hardly uncanny melody. Once upon a time there was also an Enchanted Lake, beside which princesses may have lain in bonds of sleep and high-hearted youth come to rescue them while fairies peered from the coverts. Pleasantly undulates the lake through Liadov's measures; once and again the horns of elfland blow; but the light upon the music is the light of the concert-hall; the Russian follows no gleam. Once upon a time, finally, there was Baba-Yaga. She rode the air in a mortar, cudgelled it with a pestle, swept away her track with a broom. A busy witch for whom Liadov writes a whirring, bustling music, and at the end the piccolo also whistles for her. . . .

Better, however, these tonal pastimes, alternately trite or fanciful, than the void of Smetana's tone-picture. Beyond peradventure, Wallenstein's camp of mercenaries in the Thirty Years' War was a noisy place—in history, in Schiller's play, in much-enduring concert-halls. It shouted, swore, danced, caroused, capered, stilled through an hour or two of darkness, perhaps, in the morning marched away. But why make music of these commonplace tumults, these dull spirits, these frowsy revelries? Smetana, being a simple-minded Bohemian, with a tune or two in his pocket and an instinct for rhythmed din, may have known no better. But the austere, the lofty, the professionally noble Monsieur d'Indy also made a "Wallenstein's Camp" in tones, made it indeed more variedly, more imaginatively—and by this time may have repented of such youthful futility. Yet need the composer's will be the conductors' must? Never were fifteen minutes of a Symphony Concert more wasted than through the trouncing and bouncing of Smetana's clumping pages.

H. T. Parker.

TRANS. FEB. 11

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York
FEB 12 1922

From Boston comes the news that Pierre Monteux will serve as conductor of the Boston Symphony for at least two years more. This sets at rest all rumors with regard to the coming of Arturo Toscanini, Felix Weingartner et alies. The French conductor has not been too popular on the road, but in Boston he has been well liked; and apparently the trustees have decided that it is better to please the home folks.

has less volume of tone because it sounded an octave lower in contrabasses and violoncellos. And the second and last tones of the theme of the finale were inaudible, as usual.

Uncertainty is beginning to enter into our concert programs as well as the repertoire of the Manhattan Opera House. Mr. Monteux had promised a first New York performance of Ravel's "La Valse," but replaced it yesterday with Schonberg's "Verklärte Nacht." His other numbers were the "Istar" variations by D'Indy and Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris."

TRIBUNE - FEB. 6.

THE BULLETIN OF THE BROOKLYN

PIERRE MONTEUX

PIERRE MONTEUX

Announcement of the unanimous vote of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to extend the contract of PIERRE MONTEUX as Conductor of the Orchestra for the seasons 1922-1923 and 1923-1924, and of Mr. MONTEUX's acceptance of the same, will be received with satisfaction by subscribers to the Symphony concerts. Largely through Mr. MONTEUX's devotion and ability the vicissitudes brought upon the Orchestra by the War and Mr. HIGGINSON's death have been overcome.

For three seasons, this eminent musician has worked untiringly as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, setting new standards and maintaining those traditions that have made the Orchestra an important factor in the musical world. Its prestige and widespread favor, under Mr. MONTEUX's direction, are seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston and elsewhere. In addition to the regular series of twenty-four pairs of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Cambridge have also been increased from eight to nine. The schedule beyond Boston has taken the Orchestra as far North as Montreal, as far South as Richmond, and West into New York State.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as at present constituted, no doubt owes a large part of its beauty of ensemble to the creative efforts and executive skill of its Conductor, but it is also not unlikely that PIERRE MONTEUX's genius has found its highest fruition in this post. He had been widely acclaimed as a successful Conductor, both here and abroad, before assuming his present relations with the Boston organization, conducting prominent orchestras in Paris, London, Berlin, Vienna and Budapest. His first work in this country, after active service in the War, was as head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. Later he became a principal Conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, accepting in 1918 the offer of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. MONTEUX's authoritative and finely appreciative interpretation of the established repertory, and his discriminating and even prophetic choice from the music of today and tomorrow, have given an added interest to the Orchestra's concerts.

Philadelphia
PA.
~~N. American~~ Record
ISSUE OF
FEB 10 1922

Boston Symphony Retains Monteux.

Boston, Feb. 9.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor.

HERALD
New York City
FEB 10 1922

BOSTON REENGAGES MONTEUX.

French Conductor to Remain Two More Years With Orchestra.

BOSTON, Feb. 9.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced to-day that Pierre Monteux of France had been reengaged as conductor for a term of two years.

This ends speculation prevalent for some time that another would be engaged. He was formerly French conductor at the Metropolitan and was released from a contract there to accept [illegible] offer.

Philadelphia
PA.
Public Ledger
ISSUE OF
FEB 10 1922

Boston—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor for two years.

MONTEUX SIGNS WITH SYMPHONY

Re-engaged to Conduct Orchestra During 1922-23 and 1923-24

IN THIRD SEASON WITH ORGANIZATION

The trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra have voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the season of 1922-23 and 1923-24. Mr. Monteux has signed the contract.

He is now in his third season at the head of the orchestra. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of today and tomorrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

Increased Demand

Another sign of the prestige and widespread favor of the concerts under his direction is seen in the increased demand for symphonic music in Boston. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

Likewise, in this vicinity, there has been, during this three-year period, a tendency toward more regular visits by the orchestra, notably in Lynn, Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Haverhill and Fall River. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York state. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this great orchestra under Mr. Monteux. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Brilliant Record

Before Monteux came to the orchestra he had won an enviable name as a conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opera, the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the Chatelet and Odeon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres in London and the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

HERALD-FEB-10

At Least We Shall Have the Greatest Orchestra in Boston

The reappointment of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra means that the directors of the organization have modified the aim of the late Major Henry L. Higginson to have the finest orchestra in the world, and are content to have the finest orchestra in Boston.

Mr. Monteux is a good conductor. He is not an inspiring leader, but he is an intelligent musician, and his performances are always respectable. But to have the greatest orchestra in the world Boston needs the greatest conductor. Mr. Monteux is not the greatest conductor in the world or in America. He is not one of the six greatest conductors.

Perhaps Major Higginson's ambition, which he realized for a lifetime, was too big an ambition for a city like Boston. Perhaps the trustees are right in being content with an ordinary conductor and a possibly smaller annual deficit.

But those of us who have loved the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to regret its passing into control of men who are not musicians and who are willing to lower the prestige of a mighty orchestra in this manner. Sic Transit Gloria.

AMER. FEB. 11

HOFMANN

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 17 and 18, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann. He will play with the orchestra Beethoven's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major.

THIRD EXTRA SYMPHONY

Next Monday evening at 8 o'clock the third of the newly instituted extra series of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall. The soloist will be Alfred Mirovitch, the young Russian pianist, who first came to this country last season.

TRAV FEB. 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHUMANN, HANDEL, TRIFLES AND MONTEUX

Orchestra and Audience Warm to the Conductor — A Thick-Voiced and Inelastic Version of the Spring Symphony — The Day's Work by Handel and Also Liadov —Smetana and a Void—The Tone of the Band

EXACTING in work but fair-minded and kindly is Mr. Monteux toward the players in the Symphony Orchestra. Toward him they are "men of good will." They are also men who, absorbing, perhaps, the Bostonian atmosphere, prefer the comfortable routine of things as they are. Accordingly they were well content when the conductor's stay with the band was prolonged through two years. As he came to his place in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening they rose to welcome him, tapped upon their instruments, gave other signs of satisfaction. Taking cue, the audience also clapped Mr. Monteux long, heartily, sincerely. In Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, in the regular course of concerts at home, the players renewed this little ceremony. Again the audience added its applause; while some, according to a singular parochial custom, at which the larger world often smiles, stood for an instant, as the word goes, "in homage." By these signs the band prefers Mr. Monteux to change and the major part of the public of the Symphony Concerts is likeminded. A minority would have welcomed a new conductor next autumn; but it reserves for private discussion its chagrins over the recent decision of the Trustees, while it is mindful also of Mr. Monteux's substantial virtues and large service.

With audience and orchestra so minded, the more the pity that the conductor's version of Schumann's "Spring Symphony"—the first piece of the afternoon—was not one of his happiest achievements. According to his frequent custom with music of the first half of the nineteenth century, he doubled various wood-wind instruments. So doing he has gained with some pieces a fuller body, a better balance of tone. With others, this increase has merely thickened the instrumental web and impeded the plastic progress of the tonal strands. Now Schumann was no adept distributor of orchestral voices, least of all in this symphony of his young years. Through measure after measure it is too thickly, uniformly and monotonously scored. The true, the imperative, concern of the conductor is to lighten, clarify and diversify this harmonic and instrumental vesture, and one or another, like Mr. Gericke, Mr. Weingartner, Dr. Muck, each in his day, has appreciably succeeded therewith. Mr. Monteux, however, by this doubling of sundry parts, only added thickness to thickness and unwieldiness to unwieldiness.

Above all, this symphony of the lights, the airs, the exhilarations of the spring exacts transparency of tone. The orchestral song, elate or musing, must be luminous; else it is only half itself. Such limpid brightness, such tender glow of voice, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra often missed. Compared with what it should be in imagination, with what it has been within recollection "at these concerts," the tone yesterday was opaque, heavy, monotonous beyond even Schumann's inevitable shortcomings. Similarly with the motion, the progress of the symphony. If ever there were a winged music, here it is written; the ardor with which, in four days, the composer set it to paper, seems fact as well as legend. The first movement leaps forth to meet the spring:

> O wende, wende Deinen Lauf,
> Im Thale blüht der Frühling auf!

The second pauses for no more than brief and songful musing in the clear glow of spring twilights. The third skips, like the lambs of the Psalms, through vernal impulses. Into the fourth floods, full tide, the vernal awakening alike upon the earth and within the spirits of men.

Such a music written in Schumann's fullest flights of mood and song must skim the air with dancing feet, take every turn lightly, quiver with every flicker of sun and breeze. In spite of the fashion in which the instrumentally clumsy Schumann now and again fabricates it, the ideal conductor, the ideal orchestra might lend it an infinite brightness and lightness, suppleness and sensibility. Under human limitations, the best of them may only approximate these glories. Yet Mr. Monteux seemed to fall needlessly short of them. Not that his pace was sluggish, not that he missed the flow of songful line. He was, in fact, both as brisk and as clear as the thickened instrumental web permitted. Rather, as he missed transparency of tone, so also he missed the plasticity, the changeful glow, the recurring leap and up-leap of the music. His pæan of spring was too square-cut, too sturdy, too bourgeois, lacked fancy, élan, exhilaration: it was middle-aged, it was sober; whereas Schumann's symphony is one of the masterpieces of symphonic music to be heard by the ear of the imagination in ideal voice, by the ear of the body, now and again, in performances to be treasured. Was there a hint of disappointment when sluggish applause barely recalled Mr. Monteux a second time? He has indeed carried the orchestra well on the way to old prowess; but yesterday it was easy to discern how far it has yet to go before it regains the transparency of tone, the elasticity of movement, the play of light and shade that were its long-standing glories.

A miscellany, none too interesting, filled the remainder of the concert. Since Mr. Wendling at the first horn is still disabled, the conductor put by the announced Concerto of Handel for string and wind choirs, substituting for it a Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings alone. No doubt any music of Handel is preferable to the magnified and usually platitudinous "Messiah" of the choral societies; to the Largo of summer-evening concerts. There are perverse ears that would listen gladly to some of his forgotten numbers—say, the pieces for the water fête of old exhumed by Mr. Gericke—that would hear with curiosity, and probably with boredom, one of his operas. Nobody, unless it is John McCormack in quest of old airs, goes a-searching nowadays in Handel. If one or another did, they might discover instrumental pieces more engaging and amusing than the Concerto Grosso of yesterday. The composers of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries from Bach through Haydn did no little of the day's work. They were men of genius in music and wrote their masterpieces. They were also journeymen who must live, and did their daily stint, each after his manner.

Into this stint falls the present Concerto Grosso, even as do some of Handel's minor oratorios and choral pieces. The familiar pattern of interwoven or answering voices sounded once more. In due place came the broad, suave, slow-paced Handelian air, exfoliating, ascending, coming full circle, but in this instance no treasure-trove of melody. Before and after stood the Handelian Allegros, even or diversified with running figures, skilfully varied by rhythm, modulation, divided or united voices. Every eighteenth-century composer wrote such music—pages upon pages. A few, like Handel, could give it the grand air. This time he tends usually to be workaday, and his only originality—in a single movement—is a piquant, fascinating, rather modern rhythm. In the day's work, likewise, the string choir played the piece—skilfully, faithfully, neatly, as good journeymen to another. Yet only the other day in Schönberg's "Transfiguring Night," those same string voices teemed with every finesse and felicity, themselves possessed with the music, no less possessing an audience with its beauty and its power. Nowadays, it is the moderns, more than the ancients, that kindle the Symphony Orchestra.

Trifles ensued—Liadov re-telling Russian folk-tales in tones and Smetana fondly fancying that music was to be made out of the din of Wallenstein's camp. Again composers at their job, like dutiful journalists, with Liadov contributing to the children's page and Smetana turning out an especially "thumping" article. Once upon a time there was Kikimora, a sort of Russian witch, who spun malignant spells, still and secret, and now and again whistled balefully at her spinning. Liadov's English horn mists her in mystery; his piccolo whistles for her; he and she spin an insinuating but hardly uncanny melody. Once upon a time there was also an Enchanted Lake, beside which princesses may have lain in bonds of sleep and high-hearted youth come to rescue them while fairies peered from the coverts. Pleasantly undulates the lake through Liadov's measures; once and again the horns of elfland blow; but the light upon the music is the light of the concert-hall; the Russian follows no gleam. Once upon a time, finally, there was Baba-Yaga. She rode the air in a mortar, cudgelled it with a pestle, swept away her track with a broom. A busy witch for whom Liadov writes a whirring, bustling music, and at the end the piccolo also whistles for her. . . .

Better, however, these tonal pastimes, alternately trite or fanciful, than the void of Smetana's tone-picture. Beyond peradventure, Wallenstein's camp of mercenaries in the Thirty Years' War was a noisy place—in history, in Schiller's play, in much-enduring concert-halls. It shouted, swore, danced, caroused, capered, stilled through an hour or two of darkness, perhaps, in the morning marched away. But why make music of these commonplace tumults, these dull spirits, these frowsy revelries? Smetana, being a simple-minded Bohemian, with a tune or two in his pocket and an instinct for rhythmed din, may have known no better. But the austere, the lofty, the professionally noble Monsieur d'Indy also made a "Wallenstein's Camp" in tones, made it indeed more variedly, more imaginatively—and by this time may have repented of such youthful futility. Yet need the composer's will be the conductors' must? Never were fifteen minutes of a Symphony Concert more wasted than through the trouncing and bouncing of Smetana's clumping pages.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB 11

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

From Boston comes the news that Pierre Monteux will serve as conductor of the Boston Symphony for at least two years more. This sets at rest all rumors with regard to the coming of Arturo Toscanini, Felix Weingartner et alles. The French conductor has not been too popular on the road, but in Boston he has been well liked; and apparently the trustees have decided that it is better to please the home folks.

FOR the first times, at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a piece by a German composer, risen during and since the late war, will be played in Boston—Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." For the most part, he has written for the theatre and more than one account of his operas and of his new place in German music has already been printed in these columns. Occasionally, however, Schreker has ventured symphonic pieces and the best known of them is the Prelude of Mr. Monteux's choice, already played in many cities outside Germany. By a glimpse of the score, it smacks of Strauss, perfumed with Puccini and, for the players, seems an extremely intricate piece. Otherwise familiar numbers fill the conductor's programme, with Josef Hofmann, in the noon of his powers as master-pianist, for assisting artist. The list stands:

Overture to Goethe's Play, "Egmont" .Beethoven
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 5, in E-flat major, "The Emperor"..Beethoven
(Pianist: Mr. Hofmann)
Prelude to a Drama....................Schreker
(First Times in Boston)
Images for Orchestra, "Iberia".......Debussy

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the third of the new series of "extra concerts," which are winning them and symphonic music a fresh and eager public, far exceeding expectations, even filling every place. Wisely the conductor has put together a programme of standard pieces, well contrasted, making immediate and vivid impression. In one of them, Mr. Mirovitch, able pianist in recital last season, will play the solo part. The pieces are:

Unfinished Symphony ....Schubert
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4, in D Minor ....Rubinstein
(Pianist: Mr. Mirovitch).
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde"....................Wagner
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"....Dukas
Symphonic Poem, "Preludes"..........Liszt

TRANS. FEB. 11.

14TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Monteux Applauded as He Appears, to Note His Re-engagement

PROGRAM VARIED AND INTERESTING

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, B flat major, No. 1; Handel, Concerto Grosso, D minor, op. 6, No. 10; Liadov, Kikamora, The Enchanted Lake, Baba-Yaga, three folk tales for orchestra; Smetana, Wallenstein's Camp.

When Mr. Monteux came on the plat[illegible]asm, the orchestra and the greater [illegible] in the audience, applauding en[illegible]tically, rose from their seats, in [illegible]ition of his re-engagement. We [illegible]t recall in the history of the or[illegible]ra a tribute of this nature to any [illegible]ductor in the middle of the season. [illegible]he program was well-contrasted and [illegible]eresting. "Spring" symphonies and [illegible]rtures are ironically played as a [illegible]e in the dead of winter. This, after [illegible], is not so ironical in Boston, or in New England, for, as in the land of the lovely lady Christabel, "the Spring comes slowly up this way." The reading of the symphony was romantic and spirited, but neither Mr. Monteux nor the orchestra could make one ignore the abominable instrumentation of the work. Not long ago Mr. Stock of Chicago re-orchestrated Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony. Could this be done effectively to the one played yesterday? We doubt it. The opening is imposing as it is. It arouses great expectation of that which is to come. Charming is the lyric passage in the Scherzo that puts one in mind of Schubert's "Hark, hark, the lark;" but for the most part there is rhythmic uniformity and boresome repetition that no change in the instrumentation could redeem. As the thick orchestration stands, if the music is played according to Schumann's directions, Weingartner says, it is impossible to produce a true forte or an expressive pianissimo. Impossible? Yet Mr. Monteux succeeded in grateful nuances whenever the composer gave him opportunity.

The late John Runciman justly characterized Handel as "by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." Few composers, if there is any one, have been able to produce such pathetic or sublime effects by simple means, by a few chords even. He was one of the greatest melodists. His fugal pages seldom seem labored; they are distinguished by amazing vitality and spontaneity. In his slow movements, his instrumental airs, there is a peculiar dignity, a peculiar serenity, and a direct appeal that we find in no other composer. The riches of his storehouse are unknown, unfortunately, to the younger generation of concert-goers, who have been taught to believe that outside of "The Messiah," "The Harmonious Blacksmith" for piano, and the air of Xerxes to the plane tree (absurdly known as "Handel's Largo") he wrote little that is not hopelessly old-fashioned. While some regard the dullest pages of Bach—and they are many—as revealing plenary inspiration, the more human music of Handel is neglected.

Liadov's "Baba-Yaga" was played here at a Symphony concert 11 years ago. "Kikamora" and "The Enchanted Lake" were heard yesterday for the first time. They are refreshing, entertaining little compositions showing a fine poetic fancy. Kikamora in Russian [illegible], brought up by a wizard, is an [illegible] malignant being, grown up at [illegible] the spin[illegible]

Baba-Yaga is a sorceress, who rides through the forest, seated in a mortar, beating it onward with the pestle and rubbing out the traces with a broom. Two frightful demons, but Liadov has cunningly differentiated their characters. There is no program for "The Enchanted Lake." The hearer must meet the composer halfway. To some there will be only delightfully soothing music. Others, who still read the fairy tales of all nations, and find "The Thousand Nights and a Night" the golden book of the east, will weave fancies and see visions. If we are not mistaken, Rubinstein played some little pieces of Liadov in this country. Mr. Siloti made the name familiar by performing "The Music-Box." There was an informing sketch of Liadov, "this shy and sensitive man, the wizard of the Russian fairy tale and folk-song," who led a quiet monotonous life, in the Chesterian of October last.

The true Smetana is revealed in "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," the string quartet in E minor, and the overture to "The Sold Bride"—not in "Wallenstein's Camp." Four of his symphonic poems in the cycle "My Country" have been performed at these concerts. "Tabor" and "Blanik," have not been heard. There is no Slavonic touch in "Wallenstein's Camp." Written in Sweden, it might have been composed by any German sojourning there, a devout reader of Schiller. There is hubbub enough. Perhaps, as some think in the trombone phrase, there is a reference to the Capuchin's sermon, which urged d'Indy and Rheinberger to musical expression; but the most striking portion of Smetana's symphonic poem is the episode of the plucked strings with the strange harmonies for wood-wind.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; piano concerto, E flat major, No. 5 (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Schreker, prelude to a drama (first time here); Debussy, "Iberia."

HERALD-FEB. 11.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Third Extra Concert. "Unfinished Symphony," in B minor, Schubert. Prelude and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Concerto in D minor, Rubenstein; "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas; "Les Preludes," Liszt. Soloist, Alfred Mirovitch, pianist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15th program. Overture to "Egmont," and "Emperor Concerto," Beethoven: "Prelude to a Drama," Schreker, (first time in Boston); "Iberia," Debussy. Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

It is to be regretted even by those who do not especially desire soloists at Symphony concerts that Myra Hess was not asked to repeat in Boston the excellent performance of a Mozart concerto she gave last Thursday with the Symphony in Cambridge.

The reengagement of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two more seasons insures us well-chosen programs, competently performed, though some of the thrills felt under the more magnetic conducting of such geniuses as Toscanini and Muck may be denied us.

GLOBE-FEB. 12.

Boston Orchestra Re-engages Monteux

All speculation as to the intentions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was set at rest last week by the announcement that the contract of Pierre Monteux had been renewed for two more seasons, and that he had signed it. To many Providence music lovers this retention of Mr. Monteux will prove satisfying, the warmth and color of interpretation which he offers being more popular in its appeal than the more philosophic renditions often heard. Of his work the Boston Herald says, in reporting the new contract: "As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of to-day and to-morrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world."

Under Mr. Monteux there have been a number of expansions of the orchestra's schedule. These include a more extended itinerary in New England, a number of cities not previously included now having annual symphonic offerings. Indeed, the aim of the management appears to have been to make this organization a New England, instead of local-to-Boston, orchestra. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York State. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this organization. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

PROV. JOURNAL-FEB 12

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

Alfred Mirovitch, Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night at the third of the new series of Monday evening concerts. He will be heard in Rubenstein's concerto in D minor. Pierre Monteux's program also includes Schubert's masterpiece, the "Unfinished" symphony, the prelude and Love-death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, and Liszt's "Preludes."

HOFMANN AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will appear as soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Schreker, a prominent figure among the younger composers in Germany, will be represented by his "Prelude to a Drama." Debussy's "Ibelia" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture are also on the program.

[illegible] FEB 12

Mirovitch Soloist at Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, tomorrow night, at the third of the new series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Mirovitch will play the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. The programme will open with Schubert's masterpiece, the "Unfinished" Symphony in B flat. Another notable number will be the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" will follow and the closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

POST-FEB. 12

Boston Symphony Concerts Extra and Regular

The Symphony Orchestra will give its third extra concert tomorrow night with Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist, already heard here in recital, as soloist, playing a Rubinstein concerto of great difficulty. The orchestra will again wisely offer its new public several of the most loved things in its repertory, including Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Another sold-out house should result from so attractive a program, as happened last time.

At the concerts in the regular series Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, as he has too seldom been in the past, owing, it is said, to a violent difference of opinion with Dr Muck back in days before the war. He will play Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto," which will come as a relief after the trivial show pieces inflicted on us by the majority of this season's soloists. The orchestra will play a piece by Schreker, regarded by many in Germany as a genuinely great composer, but scoffed at in England since the war. His music is new to Boston.

GLOBE-FEB. 12!

WITH symphonies from the second half of the nineteenth century and the first decade of the twentieth our orchestral concerts usually move in narrow round. Dvorák, Franck, d'Indy, and in measure. There are Brahms and—longo intervallo—Saint-Saëns; Chaikovsky and the symphonic suites of Rimsky-Korsakov; Sibelius now and again; Chausson, not too often; Elgar hardly at all. So provided, complacent conductors lapse into routine and repetition; while eager conductors—like Mr. Monteux, for example—pursue vain searches, take refuge in passing symphonies, like Théodore Ysaye's of last autumn or Dukas's of Dr. Muck's day, forgotten as soon as heard. So doing, they overlook two composers, plentiful in symphonies, who might materially freshen current repertories—Bruckner and Mahler. For the time both are out of the fashion with conductors and audiences in America, but that mischance is no valid reason against the occasional hearing of their music.

It is quite true that Bruckner's symphonies run to length, breadth and thickness; that the opening and the closing movements suffer from his clumsiness in design, his prolixity in speech. On the other hand, by common consent, his slow movements rise to a unique and celestial beauty, like to none other; while his scherzi smack as individually of the good green earth, the open air and therein peasants treading their homely measure. Within easy recollection Bruckner's symphonies returned now and then to the Symphony Concerts. For fifteen minutes at the beginning, for as many more at the end, nearly everyone was bored. For half an hour between played the radiaut ecstasv of an adagio, the ruddy sonorities, the blowsy rhythms of a scherzo. By so much Bruckner was rare and stirring. Why should he not be restored—say once in a season—to the active repertory? Mr. Monteux and the orchestra bid fair to do well with him.

Not so long ago, Mahler's Fifth Symphony was many times repeated in Boston to the continuing pleasure of hearers. Other of his ten symphonies ask no chorus or exceptional apparatus, might in kind and degree reward conductor, players, audience. No doubt the "Mahlerites" overpraise their paragon's music; yet as plainly the detractors under-estimate it. Like or mislike his symphonies, they deserve occasional hearing, because they are songful, eloquent, many-sided, the work of a composer signally expert with his medium, following a mind, a will, an imagination of his own. They lie within the powers of Mr. Monteux and his band. A public that once applauded them might clap them yet again.

H. T. P.

Miss Hess and Mozart

The other day a pianist played with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge, who might wtih reason have assisted it in Symphony Hall—the Engisih woman, Myra Hess, now on first and little heralde visit to America. Past her youth but still comely to see, she is practised virtuosa, ripened musician, poised long since in the ways of the concert-hall. London and other British cities have long know and praised her as familiarly as we Americans with Mr. Bauer, say, or Mr. Gabrilowitach. There she has preferred modesty and intrinsic merit to reclaim and superficial show. She chooses to make her way similarly in the United States, so that almost obscurely she came to her audience in Sanders Theatre last Thursday. It was soon enlightened, and, as its way is, quickly sealed acquaintance with plaudits.

Miss Hess excels in particular with music of the eighteenth century and of the turn into the nineteenth. Hence, perhaps, she agreed with Mr. Monteux upon a Concerto of Mozart, in D minor, the eighteenth of the composer's twenty-five. It was written in his later years; is abundantly Mozartean; follows the common form of such pieces—Allegro, Romanza, Allegro; is adorned in the first and the last division with cadenzas by various hands, from which Miss Hess chose Reinecke's, measurably artful, appreciably congruous, festoons. As she and the orchestra made way through the piece it was hard to imagine an eighteenth-century concerto, a Mozartean concerto, more understandingly, more luminously played.

Miss Hess's tone was transparency itself, as limpid, supple, undulating, sensitive, as the music. She unfolded it in loveliness of line and suavity of phrase; she moulded it from period to period, yet it flowed; she paced and rhythmed it evenly; or she flecked it with light modulations, twined it with playful arabesques. She caught the grace of Mozart's turns and transitions, the delicacy of his inflections, his rippling brightness, his exquisite ease from measure to measure, from movement to movement. To his fancy she added her dexterity, without display, without a trace of over-emphasis. Above all, she kept his reticence of sentiment, his purling elegance. The listeners heard an aristocratic music in as aristocratic and finely shaded voice. Not too often are twentieth-century pianists so at one with Mozart. Miss Hess has instinct for him.

H. T. P.

TRANS. FEB 13.

Monteux and Mirovitch

Beyond question the additional Symphony Concerts an Monday evenings are filling a distinct need in the musical life of this city. As had the one before it, the third concert of the series which befell last evening, attracted an audience that virtually filled Symphony Hall and was plainly interested and appreciative throughout. Again Mr. Monteux had made a programme shrewdly suited to the occasion. Few conductors can gauge the tastes and capacities of varying audiences so successfully as he and he now has three publics to consider—the subscribers of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, the school-children who attend the Young People's Concerts and those not too sophisticated but increasingly eager folk who flock to the Pension Fund Concerts and are proving the mainstay of the Monday evening series. Beginning with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the programme proceeded yesterday through Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, played by Mr. Mirovitch; the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isode"; Dukas's witty Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; to conclude with the resounding clamors of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes." No one of these pieces might unduly tax the unpractised listener; no one of them, the blatant and threadbare "Preludes" aside, might fail to pleasure the more exacting.

Even Rubinstein's faded Concerto, unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1910, has interest for the musician—save in the final movement, which is now past redemption. So rarely is one of Rubinstein's orchestral pieces played nowadays that it is possible to listen to it as to the music of Spohr, for example, heedful of the composer's instrumentation, curious as to the degree of vitality his music may still display. On the former score this Concerto has indeed little to offer that is ingenious or arresting. In the second movement there is effective employment of the trumpet as a melodic instrument, but, except for this detail, the orchestration is singularly monotonous and commonplace—never clumsy and inept, yet never striking. Beside this Concerto the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert glows with color. The saving grace of the Concerto lies in the appeal of its melodies, which, in the first two movements, have considerable individuality. But the Adagio is over-long, and before it is half done its sweetness, that for a time is pleasantly soothing, begins to cloy. In his recital last season Mr. Mirovitch proved himself a capable pianist, not deeply emotional, not especially brilliant, but coolly competent, expert and musicianly. Last evening in Rubinstein's Concerto he did not equal the vigors of Paderewski or Hofmann with the two Allegros, but his playing was far from tame, and he made the most of the songful opportunities of the Adagio.

The service which Mr. Monteux has this season done the Third, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies of Beethoven, he did last evening for the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. Not in long recollection has the latter piece seemed so limpid and euphonious, so tinged with its composer's wistful melancholy. And once more there was cause to wonder at Schubert's remarkable command of the orchestra—more remarkable because of his almost complete lack of practical experience, his limited opportunity to hear his own music. Neither Mozart nor Beethoven had Schubert's feeling for the individuality of the wood-wind instruments, or could combine them in such exquisite sonorities. Indeed there were no existing scores, not even Weber's, from which he could have learned some of his orchestral procedures. Ineptly played, the Unfinished Symphony may at times prove dull and wearisome. Played as it was last evening it may still charm and, in the Andante, even ravish the hearer.

If Mr. Monteux usually excels with the music of Beethoven and Schubert, he is not always so successful with that of Wagner. True the "Liebestod" had nearly its full measure of passionate eloquence and instrumental glow, but the Prelude was lacking in intensity. At the beginning it was neither "langsam" nor "schmachtend." The initial tempo was too near that of the climax, which went excitingly enough; but not only did the music seem hurried, it was also wanting in the peculiar searching, heart-wringing quality, even the voluptuousness that is its very life. In his "Musical Portraits" Mr. Rosenfeld avers that Wagner has now receded from the ranks of the composers who make a direct and irresistible assault upon our emotions, and has taken his place among the classics, to be studied and respected, to be dispassionately praised and calmly criticised. Hearing the Prelude last evening it was possible to perceive this point of view, although to those who have doted undiscriminately upon the music of Wagner an admission of his fallibility comes not easily. Yes, hearing the "Liebestod" Mr. Rosenfeld's carpings were promptly forgotten and there came renewed conviction that this is still Music's most beautiful, most thrilling page.

It is the fashion to say that Dukas's "L'Apprenti-Sorcier" is already "dated." Beyond doubt the piece has lost much of its early magic; it now seems simpler and more obvious. Its tricks of instrumentation have been many times surpassed. But the piece has by no means outlived its usefulness; as the performance proved, it can still be vastly entertaining, often exhilarating. Dukas has complained bitterly that the popularity of this Scherzo has been fatal to all his other music, and it is said that he bade Arnold Bax beware lest the success of his piano-piece, "In the Vodka Shop" have the same disasterous effect. But to all appearances Bax's other pieces can better withstand competition than can the remaining compositions of Dukas, who seems destined to go down to posterity as the author of a single tune. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra strove valiantly with "Preludes" but, except for those whose ears are titillated by any sonority, this banal music, suitable only to a holiday celebration, has lost what little significance it once had. It is difficult to see how even Liszt could have written with sober countenance certain of its more trumpery measures.

W. S. S.

New Lights Upon Nikisch

In Europe and in America much has recently been written upon many pages of the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor. Too often one article has been only a variation of another; but in the columns of the London, Telegraph, its reviewer for music assembles a fresh detail or two:

> At rehearsal Nikisch appeared to a casual observer to give more thought to small things than to great. As a matter of fact, as soon as the detail was fixed in the right place the work was done. For the final act of gathering together, the various threads he relied on his own personality as interpreted for the player by a beat of extraordinarily magnetic quality. Outwardly calm and dispassionate, he taught his orchestra how to obey his least indication. He realized as few other conductors ever did that a full climax is all the more effective for rarity. His gestures were generally sober, parsimonious, undemonstrative. Only the steely eyes told of the hidden energy that lay behind them. The player in the orchestra felt he had to "get him on the wing," and that his own thoughts met the conductor's half-way. On the few occasions when the baton rose rose to the highest point, then all the pent-up energy broke loose. He may have been one of the subtlest masters of psychology. Probably he was only obeying that sixth sense which is the special gift of Providence to men of genius.

Thus it was that this outwardly undemonstrative conductor invariably obtained from his orchestras impassioned and fiery, as well as careful and finished performances.

TRANS. FEB 1[illegible]

CLASSICS PLEASE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its extra series last night at Symphony Hall to a capacity audience, which applauded both the soloist, Alfred Mirovitch, and the orchestra with a cordiality which showed that the new public the trustees are trying to reach appreciates the concerts highly. Mr Monteux set a very attractive program, with Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" as the high lights. The performance was spirited, if not always in accord with the traditions cherished by the ultra critical.

Mr Mirovitch chose Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto, played here in the past by a bewildering list of great virtuosos, for this, his first Boston appearance with orchestra. He showed the same technical command of his instrument noted at his local recitals. In the melodious slow movement his performance was sedulously romantic. In the other sections of the piece he made careful use of the numerous opportunities contrived by the composer for display of virtuosity. He is a very competent pianist, capable of everything that can be learned by taking pains. But somehow, perhaps through lack of incisive dynamics and subtly crisp phrasing, his performance lacked the vital energy others have been able to put into the rather trivial music.

Schubert's exquisite symphony has been more finely and delicately played here than it was last night. The composer never had a chance to revise the orchestration after hearing an actual performance, and Mr Monteux did not altogether succeed in the difficult task of making certain rough places plain. The wrong things sometimes stood out and obscured what Schubert probably meant to make prominent.

The excerpts from "Tristan" obviously moved Mr Monteux and the audience. But his excitement made him hurry over the climaxes, losing the effect of the carefully balanced, heaped up melodic phrases which, taken cumulatively and collectively, are so overpowering. This music is more carefully wrought, more closely knit than even Beethoven's. Both the prelude and the "Liebestod" are complete compositions, not collections of thrilling bits strung together at haphazard.

Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both among the most popular pieces of program music in the orchestral repertory, were played with great brilliance and received with marked enthusiasm. One wonders whether without the aid of Goethe's poem and Liszt's prose version of Lamartine they would stir audiences as deeply. As music they are both rather conventional treatments of not particularly wonderful themes. But sheer volume of sound from the modern orchestra aids their popularity.

The fourth concert of this Monday series will be given March 13, with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as the soloist.

GLOBE-FEB. 14

FOR the first times, at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, a piece by a German composer, risen during and since the late war, will be played in Boston—Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." For the most part, he has written for the theatre and more than one account of his operas and of his new place in German music has already been printed in these columns. Occasionally, however, Schreker has ventured symphonic pieces and the best known of them is the Prelude of Mr. Monteux's choice, already played in many cities outside Germany. By a glimpse of the score, it smacks of Strauss, perfumed with Puccini and, for the players, seems an extremely intricate piece. Otherwise familiar numbers fill the conductor's programme, with Josef Hofmann, in the noon of his powers as master-pianist, for assisting artist. The list stands:

Overture to Goethe's Play, "Egmont". Beethoven
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 5, in E-flat major, "The Emperor". . Beethoven
(Pianist: Mr. Hofmann)
Prelude to a Drama. Schreker
(First Times in Boston)
Images for Orchestra, "Iberia" . . . . Debussy

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the third of the new series of "extra concerts," which are winning them and symphonic music a fresh and eager public, far exceeding expectations, even filling every place. Wisely the conductor has put together a programme of standard pieces, well contrasted, making immediate and vivid impression. In one of them, Mr. Mirovitch, able pianist in recital last season, will play the solo part. The pieces are:

Unfinished Symphony . . . . Schubert
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4, in D Minor . . . . Rubinstein
(Pianist: Mr. Mirovitch).
Prelude and Closing Scene from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" . . . . Wagner
Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" . . . . Dukas
Symphonic Poem, "Preludes" . . . . Liszt

TRANS. FEB 11.

14TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Monteux Applauded as He Appears, to Note His Re-engagement

PROGRAM VARIED AND INTERESTING

By PHILIP HALE

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schumann, Symphony, B flat major, No. 1; Handel, Concerto Grosso, D minor, op. 6, No. 10; Liadov, Kikamora, The Enchanted Lake, Baba-Yaga, three folk tales for orchestra; Smetana, Wallenstein's Camp.

When Mr. Monteux came on the plat[illegible]m, the orchestra and the greater [illegible]er in the audience, applauding en[illegible]tically, rose from their seats, in [illegible]ition of his re-engagement. We [illegible]t recall in the history of the or[illegible]ra a tribute of this nature to any [illegible]ductor in the middle of the season. [illegible]he program was well-contrasted and [illegible]eresting. "Spring" symphonies and [illegible]rtures are ironically played as a [illegible]e in the dead of winter. This, after [illegible], is not so ironical in Boston, or in New England, for, as in the land of the lovely lady Christabel, "the Spring comes slowly up this way." The reading of the symphony was romantic and spirited, but neither Mr. Monteux nor the orchestra could make one ignore the abominable instrumentation of the work. Not long ago Mr. Stock of Chicago re-orchestrated Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony. Could this be done effectively to the one played yesterday? We doubt it. The opening is imposing as it is. It arouses great expectation of that which is to come. Charming is the lyric passage in the Scherzo that puts one in mind of Schubert's "Hark, hark, the lark;" but for the most part there is rhythmic uniformity and boresome repetition that no change in the instrumentation could redeem. As the thick orchestration stands, if the music is played according to Schumann's directions, Weingartner says, it is impossible to produce a true forte or an expressive pianissimo. Impossible? Yet Mr. Monteux succeeded in grateful nuances whenever the composer gave him opportunity.

The late John Runciman justly characterized Handel as "by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." Few composers, if there is any one, have been able to produce such pathetic or sublime effects by simple means, by a few chords even. He was one of the greatest melodists. His fugal pages seldom seem labored; they are distinguished by amazing vitality and spontaneity. In his slow movements, his instrumental airs, there is a peculiar dignity, a peculiar serenity, and a direct appeal that we find in no other composer. The riches of his storehouse are unknown, unfortunately, to the younger generation of concertgoers, who have been taught to believe that outside of "The Messiah," "The Harmonious Blacksmith" for piano, and the air of Xerxes to the plane tree (absurdly known as "Handel's Largo") he wrote little that is not hopelessly old-fashioned. While some regard the dullest pages of Bach—and they are many—as revealing plenary inspiration, the more human music of Handel is neglected.

Liadov's "Baba-Yaga" was played here at a Symphony concert 11 years ago. "Kikamora" and "The Enchanted Lake" were heard yesterday for the first time. They are refreshing, entertaining little compositions showing a fine poetic fancy. Kikamora in Russian folk-lore, brought up by a wizard, is an uncanny, malignant being, grown up at [illegible] evil as she spin[illegible] Baba-Yaga is a sorceress, who rides through the forest, seated in a mortar, beating it onward with the pestle and rubbing out the traces with a broom. Two frightful demons, but Liadov has cunningly differentiated their characters. There is no program for "The Enchanted Lake." The hearer must meet the composer halfway. To some there will be only delightfully soothing music. Others, who still read the fairy tales of all nations, and find "The Thousand Nights and a Night" the golden book of the east, will weave fancies and see visions. If we are not mistaken, Rubinstein played some little pieces of Liadov in this country. Mr. Siloti made the name familiar by performing "The Music-Box." There was an informing sketch of Liadov, "this shy and sensitive man, the wizard of the Russian fairy tale and folk-song," who led a quiet monotonous life, in the Chesterian of October last.

The true Smetana is revealed in "Vysehrad," "The Moldau," the string quartet in E minor, and the overture to "The Sold Bride"—not in "Wallenstein's Camp." Four of his symphonic poems in the cycle "My Country" have been performed at these concerts. "Tabor" and "Blanik," have not been heard. There is no Slavonic touch in "Wallenstein's Camp." Written in Sweden, it might have been composed by any German sojourning there, a devout reader of Schiller. There is hubbub enough. Perhaps, as some think in the trombone phrase, there is a reference to the Capuchin's sermon, which urged d'Indy and Rheinberger to musical expression; but the most striking portion of Smetana's symphonic poem is the episode of the plucked strings with the strange harmonies for wood-wind.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont"; piano concerto, E flat major, No. 5 (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Schreker, prelude to a drama (first time here); Debussy, "Iberia."

HERALD-FEB 11.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Third Extra Concert. "Unfinished Symphony," in B minor, Schubert. Prelude and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; Concerto in D minor, Rubenstein; "L'Apprenti Sorcier," Dukas; "Les Preludes," Liszt. Soloist, Alfred Mirovitch, pianist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 15th program. Overture to "Egmont," and "Emperor Concerto," Beethoven: "Prelude to a Drama," Schreker, (first time in Boston); "Iberia," Debussy. ~~Soloist~~, Josef Hofmann.

It is to be regretted even by those who do not especially desire soloists at Symphony concerts that Myra Hess was not asked to repeat in Boston the excellent performance of a Mozart concerto she gave last Thursday with the Symphony in Cambridge.

The reengagement of Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two more seasons insures us well-chosen programs, competently performed, though some of the thrills felt under the more magnetic conducting of such geniuses as Toscanini and Muck may be denied us.

GLOBE-FEB 12

Boston Orchestra Re-engages Monteux

All speculation as to the intentions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was set at rest last week by the announcement that the contract of Pierre Monteux had been renewed for two more seasons, and that he had signed it. To many Providence music lovers this retention of Mr. Monteux will prove satisfying, the warmth and color of interpretation which he offers being more popular in its appeal than the more philosophic renditions often heard. Of his work the Boston Herald says, in reporting the new contract: "As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating and even prophetic pioneer of the music of to-day and to-morrow, he has given the concert a new interest and additional importance in the musical world."

Under Mr. Monteux there have been a number of expansions of the orchestra's schedule. These include a more extended itinerary in New England, a number of cities not previously included now having annual symphonic offerings. Indeed, the aim of the management appears to have been to make this organization a New England, instead of local-to-Boston, orchestra. This season its concert schedule has taken it as far north as Montreal, as far south as Richmond and west into New York State. There has also been a great desire on the part of colleges and universities to hear this organization. University concerts this season include Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, a series of five Monday evening concerts has been instituted, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, have also been increased from eight to nine.

[illegible]-FEB 12

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

Alfred Mirovitch, Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night at the third of the new series of Monday evening concerts. He will be heard in Rubenstein's concerto in D minor. Pierre Monteux's program also includes Schubert's masterpiece, the "Unfinished" symphony, the prelude and Love-death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, and Liszt's "Preludes."

HOFMANN AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will appear as soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Schreker, a prominent figure among the younger composers in Germany, will be represented by his "Prelude to a Drama." Debussy's "Ibelia" and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture are also on the program.

[illegible]-FEB 12

Mirovitch Soloist at Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, tomorrow night, at the third of the new series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Mirovitch will play the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. The programme will open with Schubert's masterpiece, the "Unfinished" Symphony in B flat. Another notable number will be the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" will follow and the closing number will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

POST-FEB 12

Boston Symphony Concerts Extra and Regular

The Symphony Orchestra will give its third extra concert tomorrow night with Alfred Mirovitch, the Russian pianist, already heard here in recital, as soloist, playing a Rubinstein concerto of great difficulty. The orchestra will again wisely offer its new public several of the most loved things in its repertory, including Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." Another sold-out house should result from so attractive a program, as happened last time.

At the concerts in the regular series Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist, as he has too seldom been in the past, owing, it is said, to a violent difference of opinion with Dr Muck back in days before the war. He will play Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto," which will come as a relief after the trivial show pieces inflicted on us by the majority of this season's soloists. The orchestra will play a piece by Schreker, regarded by many in Germany as a genuinely great composer, but scoffed at in England since the war. His music is new to Boston.

GLOBE-FEB 12

WITH symphonies from the second half of the nineteenth century and the first decade of the twentieth our orchestral concerts usually move in narrow round. Dvoràk, Franck, d'Indy, and in measure. There are Brahms and—longo intervallo—Saint-Saëns; Chaikovsky and the symphonic suites of Rimsky-Korsakov; Sibelius now and again; Chausson, not too often; Elgar hardly at all. So provided, complacent conductors lapse into routine and repetition; while eager conductors—like Mr. Monteux, for example—pursue vain searches, take refuge in passing symphonies, like Théodore Ysaye's of last autumn or Dukas's of Dr. Muck's day, forgotten as soon as heard. So doing, they overlook two composers, plentiful in symphonies, who might materially freshen current repertories—Bruckner and Mahler. For the time both are out of the fashion with conductors and audiences in America, but that mischance is no valid reason against the occasional hearing of their music.

It is quite true that Bruckner's symphonies run to length, breadth and thickness; that the opening and the closing movements suffer from his clumsiness in design, his prolixity in speech. On the other hand, by common consent, his slow movements rise to a unique and celestial beauty, like to none other; while his scherzi smack as individually of the good green earth, the open air and therein peasants treading their homely measure. Within easy recollection Bruckner's symphonies returned now and then to the Symphony Concerts. For fifteen minutes at the beginning, for as many more at the end, nearly everyone was bored. For half an hour between played the radiaut ecstasy of an adagio, the ruddy sonorities, the blowsy rhythms of a scherzo. By so much Bruckner was rare and stirring. Why should he not be restored—say once in a season—to the active repertory? Mr. Monteux and the orchestra bid fair to do well with him.

Not so long ago, Mahler's Fifth Symphony was many times repeated in Boston to the continuing pleasure of hearers. Other of his ten symphonies ask no chorus or exceptional apparatus, might in kind and degree reward conductor, players, audience. No doubt the "Mahlerites" overpraise their paragon's music; yet as plainly the detractors under-estimate it. Like or mislike his symphonies, they deserve occasional hearing, because they are songful, eloquent, many-sided, the work of a composer signally expert with his medium, following a mind, a will, an imagination of his own. They lie within the powers of Mr. Monteux and his band. A public that once applauded them might clap them yet again.

H. T. P.

Miss Hess and Mozart

The other day a pianist played with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge, who might wtih reason have assisted it in Symphony Hall—the Englsih woman, Myra Hess, now on first and little heralde visit to America. Past her youth but still comely to see, she is practised virtuosa, ripened musician, poised long since in the ways of the concert-hall. London and other British cities have long known and praised her as familiarly as we Americans with Mr. Bauer, say, or Mr. Gabrilowitsch. There she has preferred modesty and intrinsic merit to reclaim and superficial show. She chooses to make her way similarly in the United States, so that almost obscurely she came to her audience in Sanders Theatre last Thursday. It was soon enlightened, and, as its way is, quickly sealed acquaintance with plaudits.

Miss Hess excels in particular with music of the eighteenth century and of the turn into the nineteenth. Hence, perhaps, she agreed with Mr. Monteux upon a Concerto of Mozart, in D minor, the eighteenth of the composer's twenty-five. It was written in his later years; is abundantly Mozartean; follows the common form of such pieces—Allegro, Romanza, Allegro; is adorned in the first and the last division with cadenzas by various hands, from which Miss Hess chose Reinecke's, measurably artful, appreciably congruous, festoons. As she and the orchestra made way through the piece it was hard to imagine an eighteenth-century concerto, a Mozartean concerto, more understandingly, more luminously played.

Miss Hess's tone was transparency itself, as limpid, supple, undulating, sensitive, as the music. She unfolded it in loveliness of line and suavity of phrase; she moulded it from period to period, yet it flowed; she paced and rhythmed it evenly; or she flecked it with light modulations, twined it with playful arabesques. She caught the grace of Mozart's turns and transitions, the delicacy of his inflections, his rippling brightness, his exquisite ease from measure to measure, from movement to movement. To his fancy she added her dexterity, without display, without a trace of over-emphasis. Above all, she kept his reticence of sentiment, his purling elegance. The listeners heard an aristocratic music in as aristocratic and finely shaded voice. Not too often are twentieth-century pianists so at one with Mozart. Miss Hess has instinct for him. H. T. P.

TRANS. FEB 13.

Monteux and Mirovitch

Beyond question the additional Symphony Concerts an Monday evenings are filling a distinct need in the musical life of this city. As had the one before it, the third concert of the series which befell last evening, attracted an audience that virtually filled Symphony Hall and was plainly interested and appreciative throughout. Again Mr. Monteux had made a programme shrewdly suited to the occasion. Few conductors can gauge the tastes and capacities of varying audiences so successfully as he and he now has three publics to consider—the subscribers of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, the school-children who attend the Young People's Concerts and those not too sophisticated but increasingly eager folk who flock to the Pension Fund Concerts and are proving the mainstay of the Monday evening series. Beginning with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the programme proceeded yesterday through Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, played by Mr. Mirovitch; the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isode"; Dukas's witty Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; to conclude with the resounding clamors of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Preludes." No one of these pieces might unduly tax the unpractised listener; no one of them, the blatant and threadbare "Preludes" aside, might fail to pleasure the more exacting

Even Rubinstein's faded Concerto, unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1910, has interest for the musician—save in the final movement, which is now past redemption. So rarely is one of Rubinstein's orchestral pieces played nowadays that it is possible to listen to it as to the music of Spohr, for example, heedful of the composer's instrumentation, curious as to the degree of vitality his music may still display. On the former score this Concerto has indeed little to offer that is ingenious or arresting. In the second movement there is effective employment of the trumpet as a melodic instrument, but, except for this detail, the orchestration is singularly monotonous and commonplace—never clumsy and inept, yet never striking. Beside this Concerto the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert glows with color. The saving grace of the Concerto lies in the appeal of its melodies, which, in the first two movements, have considerable individuality. But the Adagio is over-long, and before it is half done its sweetness, that for a time is pleasantly soothing, begins to cloy. In his recital last season Mr. Mirovitch proved himself a capable pianist, not deeply emotional, not especially brilliant, but coolly competent, expert and musicianly. Last evening in Rubinstein's Concerto he did not equal the vigors of Paderewski or Hofmann with the two Allegros, but his playing was far from tame, and he made the most of the songful opportunities of the Adagio.

The service which Mr. Monteux has this season done the Third, Fifth and Seventh Symphonies of Beethoven, he did last evening for the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. Not in long recollection has the latter piece seemed so limpid and euphonious, so tinged with its composer's wistful melancholy. And once more there was cause to wonder at Schubert's remarkable command of the orchestra—more remarkable because of his almost complete lack of practical experience, his limited opportunity to hear his own music. Neither Mozart nor Beethoven had Schubert's feeling for the individuality of the wood-wind instruments, or could combine them in such exquisite sonorities. Indeed there were no existing scores, not even Weber's, from which he could have learned some of his orchestral procedures. Ineptly played, the Unfinished Symphony may at times prove dull and wearisome. Played as it was last evening it may still charm and, in the Andante, even ravish the hearer.

If Mr. Monteux usually excels with the music of Beethoven and Schubert, he is not always so successful with that of Wagner. True the "Liebestod" had nearly its full measure of passionate eloquence and instrumental glow, but the Prelude was lacking in intensity. At the beginning it was neither "langsam" nor "schmachtend." The initial tempo was too near that of the climax, which went excitingly enough; but not only did the music seem hurried, it was also wanting in the peculiar searching, heart-wringing quality, even the voluptuousness that is its very life. In his "Musical Portraits" Mr. Rosenfeld avers that Wagner has now receded from the ranks of the composers who make a direct and irresistible assault upon our emotions, and has taken his place among the classics, to be studied and respected, to be dispassionately praised and calmly criticised. Hearing the Prelude last evening it was possible to perceive this point of view, although to those who have doted undiscriminately upon the music of Wagner an admission of his fallibility comes not easily. Yea, hearing the "Liebestod" Mr. Rosenfeld's carpings were promptly forgotten and there came renewed conviction that this is still Music's most beautiful, most thrilling page.

It is the fashion to say that Dukas's "L'Apprenti-Sorcier" is already "dated." Beyond doubt the piece has lost much of its early magic; it now seems simpler and more obvious. Its tricks of instrumentation have been many times surpassed. But the piece has by no means outlived its usefulness; as the performance proved, it can still be vastly entertaining, often exhilarating. Dukas has complained bitterly that the popularity of this Scherzo has been fatal to all his other music, and it is said that he bade Arnold Bax beware lest the success of his piano-piece, "In the Vodka Shop" have the same disasterous effect. But to all appearances Bax's other pieces can better withstand competition than can the remaining compositions of Dukas who seems destined to go down to posterity as the author of a single tune. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra strove valiantly with "Preludes" but, except for those whose ears are titillated by any sonority, this banal music, suitable only to a holiday celebration, has lost what little significance it once had. It is difficult to see how even Liszt could have written with sober countenance certain of its more trumpery measures.

W. S. S.

New Lights Upon Nikisch

In Europe and in America much has recently been written upon many pages of the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor. Too often one article has been only a variation of another: but in the columns of the London, Telegraph, its reviewer for music assembles a fresh detail or two:

> At rehearsal Nikisch appeared to a casual observer to give more thought to small things than to great. As a matter of fact, as soon as the detail was fixed in the right place the work was done. For the final act of gathering together, the various threads he relied on his own personality as interpreted for the player by a beat of extraordinarily magnetic quality. Outwardly calm and dispassionate, he taught his orchestra how to obey his least indication. He realized as few other conductors ever did that a full climax is all the more effective for rarity. His gestures were generally sober, parsimonious, undemonstrative. Only the steely eyes told of the hidden energy that lay behind them. The player in the orchestra felt he had to "get him on the wing." and that his own thoughts met the conductor's half-way. On the few occasions when the baton rose rose to the highest point, then all the pent-up energy broke loose. He may have been one of the subtlest masters of psychology. Probably he was one obeying that sixth sense which is the special gift of Providence to men of genius.

Thus it was that this outwardly undemonstrative conductor invariably obtained from his orchestras impassioned and fiery, as well as careful and finished performances.

TRANS. [illegible]

CLASSICS PLEASE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its extra series last night at Symphony Hall to a capacity audience, which applauded both the soloist, Alfred Mirovitch, and the orchestra with a cordiality which showed that the new public the trustees are trying to reach appreciates the concerts highly. Mr Monteux set a very attractive program, with Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" as the high lights. The performance was spirited, if not always in accord with the traditions cherished by the ultra critical.

Mr Mirovitch chose Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto, played here in the past by a bewildering list of great virtuosos, for this, his first Boston appearance with orchestra. He showed the same technical command of his instrument noted at his local recitals. In the melodious slow movement his performance was sedulously romantic. In the other sections of the piece he made careful use of the numerous opportunities contrived by the composer for display of virtuosity. He is a very competent pianist, capable of everything that can be learned by taking pains. But somehow, perhaps through lack of incisive dynamics and subtly crisp phrasing, his performance lacked the vital energy others have been able to put into the rather trivial music.

Schubert's exquisite symphony has been more finely and delicately played here than it was last night. The composer never had a chance to revise the orchestration after hearing an actual performance, and Mr Monteux did not altogether succeed in the difficult task of making certain rough places plain. The wrong things sometimes stood out and obscured what Schubert probably meant to make prominent.

The excerpts from "Tristan" obviously moved Mr Monteux and the audience. But his excitement made him hurry over the climaxes, losing the effect of the carefully balanced, heaped up melodic phrases which, taken cumulatively and collectively, are so overpowering. This music is more carefully wrought, more closely knit than even Beethoven's. Both the prelude and the "Liebestod" are complete compositions, not collections of thrilling bits strung together at haphazard.

Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Liszt's "Les Preludes," both among the most popular pieces of program music in the orchestral repertory, were played with great brilliance and received with marked enthusiasm. One wonders whether without the aid of Goethe's poem and Liszt's prose version of Lamartine they would stir audiences as deeply. As music they are both rather conventional treatments of not particularly wonderful themes. The sheer volume of sound from the modern orchestra aids their popularity.

The fourth concert of this Monday series will be given March 13, with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as the soloist.

GLOBE-FE

IROVITCH LAYS WITH SYMPHONY

hird of Extra Series Heard by Capacity Audience

BY OLIN DOWNES

The third of the extra series of concerts being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was at once well balanced and popular, in the best sense of that word. Alfred Mirovitch, pianist, was the soloist, playing Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral compositions were Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; the "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde"; Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

CONCERTO EXCITING

Mr. Mirovitch, playing a thrice familiar work, was received with exceptional enthusiasm. That musical specialists find the D minor concerto aging is a fact, and they can give reasons for this opinion. But the breadth, the melodiousness and the rhythmical swing of the first and the last movements of the concerto are exciting and very effective from the standpoint of the pianist. Mr. Mirovitch was, moveover, entirely adequate to the very considerable technical demands of the work, while in passages of sustained melody his tone was very beautiful.

If there were a fault to find it would be that his performance was almost too finished in quality, too fine in its proportions, for this rather swashbuckling piece. With this reservation—if reservation it can be called—his performance was in every way admirable, and Mr. Mirovitch was recalled again and again. He has proven the most popular of all the soloists who have appeared thus far at this series of concerts.

The orchestral performances were brilliant, and the ineffable loveliness of Schubert's music came upon one again with the sense of the miraculous, the incredible. Yet the melodies are so simple, the sentiment so direct, the instrumentation so uncomplicated! The same or an even greater sense of the incredible comes with the glowing music of Wagner, in which there is a magic which makes not merely this group of instruments or that solo voice in the orchestra eloquent, but endows every instrument, every note in the whole tonal mass with a flaming eloquence and a changing, prismatic color of its own. There is indeed no music more wonderful than this. Duka's piece served to display in a different way the virtuosity of the orchestra, although this musical joke is unquestionably staling a little with the years. Liszt's "Les Preludes" made a brilliant and impressive close of the concert. For this concert, as for the one preceding, the hall was sold out. The attention and the enthusiasm showed what a hold conductor and orchestra are gaining on a public which has not always attended Symphony concerts.

Mirovitch Plays With Symphony

Alfred Mirovitch's magnificent rendition of Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor aroused last evening's Symphony Hall audience to delighted enthusiasm. The occasion was the third of the extra concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Schubert's unfinished symphony opened the program. Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" was given with overwhelming feeling. Mr. Monteux surpassing himself. Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Liszt's third symphonic poem also gave pleasure.

HERALD. FEB.

HOFMANN PLAYS SYMPHONY CONCERT

His Part in Beethoven Number Revelation

Josef Hofmann's performance of the piano part in Beethoven's E Flat Major concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert was beyond praise. He took no liberties, made no attempt to display his technique or his temperament, but instead gave a faithful interpretation of Beethoven's intentions as indicated in the printed music, with every note and every nuance in the right place. The music is among Beethoven's masterpieces. The orchestral accompaniment lacked the shadings of dynamics and phrasing that made Mr Hofmann's performance so extraordinary. Mr Monteux and his men did a good routine job, but worked no miracles.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which began the concert, made the novelty of the afternoon, Schrecker's "Prelude to a Drama" seems even more vulgar, tawdry and groping than it might have otherwise appeared. The composer is regarded by many in Germany as a rising genius, capable of carrying on worthily the great tradition that Beethoven and so many others have set in German music.

But if this Prelude is a fair specimen of his work German music is indeed in the bad way anti-Teutonic criticis have been claiming since the war. The themes are commonplace, the orchestration turgid, the plan of the whole composition not firmly knit. Tschaikovsky and Puccini seem to be Schrecker's spiritual affinities, though his borrowings of technique and ideas range far wider. The performance was apparently faithful to the composer's intentions.

Debussy's familiar "Iberia" in a rather noisy and heavy handed performance kept its power to stir the hearer's imagination. It was very warmly applauded for a piece at the end of the program.

Yesterday's concert suggested the general comment on Mr Monteux' conducting that mass effects crisply and accurately executed are only one of the rudiments of fine orchestral playing. Now that the reorganized orchestra is easily capable of this and all other rudiments, or essentials, of orchestral performance, he might well cultivate a few more subtleties of dynamic gradation, phrasing and tempi. He has often led individual works with an enviable command of nuances. But he, too, often seems satisfied with a good routine job where a little more thought and controlled emotion on his part would have produced a remakable performance. He could make the orchestra sound like a great virtuoso, as it used to, and has occasionally done under his conducting.

Next week Schubert's C major symphony, a new piece by Prof E. B. Hill, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Russian Easter," will be played. There is to be no soloist.

GLOBE. FEB. 18

HOFMANN AGAIN WITH SYMPHONY

Josef Hofmann is making his first appearance in eight years as Symphony soloist this week—his first since his row with Dr. Muck.

JOSEF HOFMANN

Yesterday, at the matinee concert, there was nothing but harmony. The pianist and Mr. Monteux vied with each other in giving an ideal interpretation to Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Hofmann's performance was in every way admirable. His restraint in the forte passages might be said to mark a new departure in his playing. Too often he has torn a passion to tatters. In fact, his performance was eminently poetical. Technically it was perfection. He was recalled time after time.

But the orchestra, under Mr. Monteux's direction, also achieved an artistic triumph in the performance of the time-honored concerto. The pianist shook hands warmly with the conductor: and this time the compliment was richly deserved.

Franz Schrecker's "Prelude to a Drama" is the symphonic novelty on this week's program, which will be repeated tonight. It is a somewhat futuristic piece suggesting Richard Strauss, not only in its dissonances, but in its pleasant lyrical passages and its elaborate, ingenious structure. On the whole, it made a rather favorable impression. Abroad there have been many disputes over this gifted Teuton's music.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Debussy's "Iberia," respectively, open and close a well contrasted program.

ADVSR. FEB. 18.

15TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux Reads "Egmont" Overture Simply as Music by Beethoven

MR. HOFMANN PLAYS PIANO CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont" and piano concerto, E flat major, No. 5; Schrecker, Prelude to a Drama; Debussy, "Iberia."

Strange things have been done by conductors to Beethoven's overture. We remember Franz Wuellner in Berlin slackening the pace in the allegro section when he came to the heavy chords that are supposed by some commentators, finders of sunbeams in cucumbers, to represent Alva, and then playing the chords with brutal emphasis and a long pause between them. Another conductor, no less a person than Arthur Nikisch, made a long hold on the short incisive violin stroke just before the coda and then brought the figure slowly down portamento. We doubt if he did this in later years. Mr. Monteux performed none of these tricks. Not anxious to excite wonder by his readings at the expense of composers, he contented himself with an eloquent interpretation of Beethoven's music, not the music that Mueller, Martin or Robinson thought Beethoven should have written. Seldom has the introduction to this overture been played here in so impressive a manner.

Mr. Hofmann gave a noble performance of the concerto; an interpretation, not a dissection by a pedant; not formal as from one standing in awe of Beethoven's name and obsequious to traditions that probably are without foundation, romantic in the Adagio, but sanely beautiful, without a touch of sentimentalism. Is it blasphemous to wish that this concerto could be shortened; that many of the tiresome repetitions could be cut out mercilessly? The accompaniment by the orchestra was worthy of the pianist's interpretation.

Franz Schrecker has been for some years a hotly discussed man. By some he is extolled to the skies; by others he is loathed; feared as anti-Christ in music. Before this Prelude was played, we knew him here only by one song which was ineffectively and uninterestingly ugly. Those who yesterday anticipated the worst must have been disappointed. This Prelude is often noisy, but it is not a wholly fearsome thing. When it has melodic lines in the manner of Puccini, it even gives pleasure. When Schrecker composed this overture in 1913 he was 35 years old, so he could not bring his youth as an excuse for employing a huge orchestra and scoring so thickly that some of the instruments were superfluous. If he had not used them, they never would be missed. There is no program; but from the music it would appear that the hero of this unwritten drama had a stormy time of it, without cheering amorous episodes, and just as it was reasonable to suppose that his ending was, if not happy, at least peaceful, the final measures hinted at tragedy. There are stirring pages; there are exciting climaxes. The trouble is that the music is full frenzy most of the time; that as a consequence there is not one great overwhelming climax. It is the fate of works like this, which require much rehearsal, to be performed, then put on the shelf for two seasons, usually longer before they are taken down, if they are taken down at all and dusted. A work of this character should be played again at the succeeding concert. This would be only fair to composer, audience, conductor and orchestra.

Is "Iberia" fast growing old? Yesterday it did not make the vivid impression that it made in former years. This was true especially of the second section, "The Fragrance of the Night." We should have preferred a more nocturnal effect, without so much detail exposed as if at high-noon; a more mysterious atmosphere, with strange whisperings, reminding one of Whitman's "mad, summer night; night of the large few stars." This would have made the final scene of the festal day still more riotous.

The concert will be repeated tonight. At the concerts next week these pieces will be performed: Schubert, Symphony in C-major, No. 7; Hill, Waltzes for orchestra (first performance); Rimsky Korsakov, "The Russian Easter."

HERALD - FEB 18

Sixteenth Symphony Program.

Schubert's large proportioned Symphony in C major will be the principal number on the program of th next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hal next Friday afternoon and Saturda evening, February 24-25. A new wor by Edward Burlingame Hill—"Waltz for Orchestra"—will have its first pe formance. The closing number will b Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter which, based upon Russian ritu themes, met with such enthusias when performed at these concerts tw seasons ago.

AMER. FEB 18.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

HOFMANN, BEETHOVEN AND A NEW GERMAN

The Pianist and the Composer Join Hands in the "Emperor" Concerto—Mr. Monteux Dramatizes the "Egmont" Overture, Yet Misses Much of Debussy's "Iberia"—Schreker's Montrous Mosaic for First Taste of a Teuton Risen Since the War

AGAIN at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the "assisting artist" exceeded all else. A month ago, it was the unfamiliar Mr. Kochanski who so prevailed with the violin; Friday it was the familiar Mr. Hofmann. The pianist's piece was Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto; and it, the occasion, his own mood—or all three together—plainly stirred him. For once he did not saunter to the stage as one saying "What the devil are we here for anyway?"; while during the pauses in the piano-part, his eye, his ear, his whole attention were obviously fixed upon the orchestra. If clothes signify, Mr. Hofmann had come to work; since, contrary to all custom, he substituted the jacket of business for the morning coat of semi-ceremony. Hitherto only youthful composers have taken such "liberties" with the Symphony Concerts; whereas Mr. Hofmann has turned his forty-fourth year and risen to the very heights of his profession.

Certainly no pianist of our time is such assured and manifold master of technique, touch and tone. At will—and far beyond the necessities of the "Emperor" Concerto—he can exhaust every resource, summon every display, ply every subtlety of the piano. The range of his touch from power to finesse, through every gradation between, is endless. The beauty of his tone is triple perfection of the finger, the ear, the imagination. Recall from yesterday the harp-like voice, soft, bright, quivering, that he drew from the treble of the piano where often it sounds as a smitten xylophone; the shaded blendings of the voice of the solo-instrument with the voices of the orchestra wherein they melted, not joined; the unflecked clarity, the shapen contours of the more declamatory passages; the undulations of the melody through the slow division as though momentary fancy were touching pace and beat; the changeful glow, but never the hard glint, of the wreathing finale. Technique, touch, tone—in themselves—may hardly further go. In such full estate they have become as second nature to Mr. Hofmann. Undiminished, ever quickened, occasionally amplified, he maintains them. Whatever he wills, he may bring therewith to the fullest utterance.

More than half way, on this score, pianist and composer met in the "Emperor" Concerto. The music is altogether self-contained, "expressing" nothing but itself. Yet the first movement remains through a hundred years magnificent tonal architecture. The musical thought is lofty and sustained; it expands tapestry-like in rich pattern upon the ear; the listening imagination courses upward with the design; feels the impulse of the changing line as piano and orchestra measure or modulate it. Mottos were seldom Beethoven's way, but above the first movement of the "Emperor" Concerto, he might have written Shakspeare's line of him "who spoke nobly of the soul." A hackneyed word "nobly," a word that by this time ought to be shame-faced; yet there is no other for Mr. Hofmann's playing of the piano-part through these long measures. To nobility, he often added splendor, when the music moved in such guise; while ever he bestowed upon it an inexhaustible beauty and diversity of voice. Sound more vibrant than his tone to every inflection composer or pianist laid upon it were hard to imagine; yet sound perfectly poised; sound that without rhetoric, yet with a pervading eloquence, renewed what the elders like to call "the grand manner." Our day has stripped it of a pardonable tendency to magniloquence; has clothed it in deeper, honester intensity. Exemplified by Mr. Hofmann, it is as serene and sensitive as it is stately and noble. The "records" will not deserve the name until they can perpetuate through the years such a quarter hour in the concert hall.

The varying song of the Adagio ensued. Mr. Hofmann's pace brought it to lucent and characteristic voice; his rhythm gave it life; his tone clothed it in a multifold beauty—grave, "noble" again, of a deep yet a measured, a guided contemplation, of Beethoven moved, of the pianist moved with him, yet both—as they should be—conscious artists. The moment of suspense between the declining song and the upspringing finale seemed for once not the stroke of calculation, but the pausing instant in which the music took fresh wing. The Rondo is a circling flight, kept by Mr. Hofmann luminously clear, rhythmically alert—curve within curve until it droys away to vanish in the trail of its own beauty. If only Beethoven had stopped there, renouncing for once a resonant end. But even he must follow the fashions of his time.

Mr. Monteux usually does well with Beethoven, though in the Concerto of yesterday, it was possible to wish him now and again more of the pianist's intuition in the moulding of a phrase, the shading of a euphony. Especially well fared the conductor with the preceding Overture to "Egmont." Not only had he Beethoven's striding vigors and direct amplitudes to kindle him, but also a music written for the theatre. Nowadays few outside Germany hear the overture as aught but a concert-piece; yet it was written and played as prelude to Goethe's "Egmont" on the stage. It is the custom to say largely on the evidence of his one opera, "Fidelio"—that Beethoven lacked sense of the theatre. If so, Mr. Monteux, who clearly has it, made amends. The introduction foretold and mourned tragedy; the "main body," as the programme-books like to say, sounded the wavering and the wistfulness of impending fate; the tumult of time and play beat through it, to swell into the exuberant victory of the end. With reason could the curtain rise. Not as "absolute" music, but as the dramatized music that it really was and is, went at last the "Egmont" Overture. So heard, only a little way behind does it follow the third "Leonora."

Not so discerning and imparting was the conductor with Debussy's "Iberia." Of course it is easy to shift the blame to the composer, especially if the listener counts the Spanish "images" as secondary rather than companion piece to the Nocturnes, the Sea-Sketches, the Prelude of the Faun's Afternoon. The youngsters—bless them!—from the Boul' Mich' to the Fenway, will have Debussy already outmoded and outdone; while to the dullest of us he no longer sounds new and strange. Yet in itself, "Iberia" may still go with unbowed head. The ebb and flow of sound upon stillness that Debussy could clothe with a beauty illuding and drugging the senses, pulses through the second "Image." Around it Debussy weaves harmonies as faint or as pungent as the odors of this southern night. In the music are the depths of sky, the warmth of air, the enfolding blue and silver of such nights sumptuous, voluptuous upon the senses. The solo measures for the wood-winds thrill with this intoxication. It was not a declining Debussy but a Monteux failing to divine, that yesterday dulled and thickened this music of sheer sensuous imagery. "In an alert rhythm, but precise," wrote Debussy over the first "Image"—of the stir and the color of highways and byways flashing with the folk. Yet Mr. Monteux blurred this precision, smeared these colors—as it seemed by too driving a pace, too thick and insistent a tone, too little vivid modulation. Only in the glinting pageant of the third "Image"—music alive with the trooping, thronging folk, dazzling with the mingled colors of Spanish and of orchestral dress, flaring with the hot transparency of southern light and air—were conductor and orchestra at one with composer.

Between whiles, and heartily welcome by every sign of interest and applause, the first German of the Germans risen in music through the years of the late war—Schreker of Vienna, of Berlin and every opera house from Lubeck to Gratz. Of course the theatre is his chosen field and for one or another of his music-dramas we in America must look to the Metropolitan. Already Mr. Gatti and Mr. Bodanzky are turning curiously the pages of his scores. Occasionally, however, Schreker has written symphonic music and from it, to glimpse him, the conductors with one accord have chosen the "Prelude to a Drama," heard yesterday for the first time in Boston. Sir H. Wood played it in London a year ago; Mr. Štransky or Mr. Damrosch followed suit in New York; simultaneously with Mr. Monteux, Mr. Stock was leading it into Chicago. By these signs the Prelude is "standard" Schreker; yet by what has been written of his operas and often printed in this place, no more than a loophole through which to discover him.

As such pieces go, the Prelude is long and far from compact. Time and again the music needs "pulling together," as they say in the studios; once and again it sprawls. Schreker employs a vast orchestra; even the resources of Symphony Hall could not yield him quite all the instruments he asked. He keeps his huge band well in hand; when he is most prolix and loose-jointed, his instrumental voices are plainly doing his will. Incessantly he divides and sub-divides them; groups and regroups them, so gaining as incessant wave-like motion and glitter of color. Unlike the Italian or the English "ultra-moderns," he does not court the vivid play of isolated timbres. Rather he prefers the orchestra as a glinting, undulating mass, surging upward almost Bruckner-wise, shattering or dissolving into a few voices, falling only to rise again.

For matter, Schreker has clearly heard the voice of Strauss, marshalling plain-spoken melody into sweeping, sonorous progression. Beyond the Alps, Puccini has obviously caught his ear, as he has the ears of most operatic Germans of the hour—say Korngold of "The Dead City." Consequently in the "Prelude to a Drama" is melody as full-throated, ascendent, as candid, or as obvious, as Butterfly's or Tosca's own. Schreker, however, is too restless for the long unfolding Straussian line, too moody for Puccini's frank insistences and cumulated "effects." Apparently, the drama of the imagination, to which he would set symphonic prelude is all things by turns and nothing long. It begins in sensuous, intensified, longing song; at the end, it sighs itself into the void. Between is music festive, pompous, mocking, amorous, ardent, misty, dance-like, grave, gay, graceful, glamorous, clamorous, as inconstant as water, as multifold as the play. No passing motiv arrests the ear, catches the imagination; few contours of melody stand firm and clear; the rhythmical figures beat and pass; like colored glass in a kaleidescope the harmonic patterns take form, glint, dissolve; a child moods may hardly be more uncertain and changeful. So Schreker makes his monstruous mosaic in orchestral tones. Not so certainly has he made a music perceived, felt, remembered, set apart.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB 18.

16TH SYMPHONY

Schubert's large proportioned symphony in C-major will be the principal number on the program of the Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "Waltzes for Orchestra," will have its first performance. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," which, based upon Russian ritual themes, met with great success when performed two

HERALD-FEB. 19.

On January 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra formed for the first time here the second symphony Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer now in this co try. The composition had a certain dignity and serious aspiration to commend it; but, like so much of the music devoted to the publication of melodic distortions and harmonic complications, it seemed never to arrive anywhere. These "long-tailed birds of paradise that float through heaven and cannot light" are excessively wearisome. One burns with the desire that they will sit down somewhere, and possibly keep quiet. There is ugliness enough in the world without making more and gravely calling it art.

IND-WEEKLY-REVIEW. FEB.18.

Sixteenth Symphony Programme

Schubert's symphony in C major will be the principal number on the programme of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 24 and 25.

A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "Waltzes for Orchestra," will have its first performance.

The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter," which, based upon Russian ritual themes, met with such enthusiasm when performed at these concerts seasons ago

POST-FEB-19.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra. 16th program. Symphony in C major, Schubert; "Waltzes," E. B. Hill, (first time); "A Russian Easter," Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is no soloist.

Mr Monteux has in preparation for the Symphony concerts a complete performance of Franck's "Psyche," with chorus.

GLOBE-FEB.19.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Schubert's symphony in C-major will be the principal number on the program of the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "Waltzes for Orchestra," will have its first performance. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

ADVTSR-FEB.19.

INTERESTINGLY both for himself and for hearers, Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill sets his work in sharp contrasts. A year and more ago Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra played his tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," suggested by Poe's darksome, ominous, macabre tale of like title. Tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, also for the first times anywhere, they will play his Nine Waltzes for Orchestra. These pieces were originally written for the pianoforte; in the present version they have been somewhat elaborated, amplified, and rounded off with a Finale. There is little inter-relation between the separate numbers; rather they are agreeably contrasted each to each, but a re-working and development in the Finale of the material of the first waltz, with hints of various others, gives unity to the series. Frankly light and unpretentious, seeking to charm rather than to startle or impress, the music, through harmonic subtleties and orchestral niceties, contrives to avoid the obvious. Yet it is never finicky or recondite. By all appearances Mr. Hill has successfully threaded the path that lies between these two temptations to the modern writer of symphonic waltzes.

An analysis of the structure of these waltzes, a detailed account of the instrumentation, is neither necessary nor suitable. Both will be easily discoverable in performance. Indeed, to forewarn the hearer of some of Mr. Hill's piquant and ingenious orchestral combinations and devices might rob them of the element of pleasant surprise. As proof of the composer's consideration of "key-relation," and as broad indication of the course of the pieces, the following details of key and tempo may be of service. D major is the underlying tonality. It is the key of the first waltz (Moderato), and it is the key in which this waltz reappears in the Finale. Number two is in D minor (Lento, un poco pesante); number three (Allegro Scherzando sempre grazioso) is in the relative major, F. Passing to the dominant of the latter key, C. major, for number four (Vivace) the composer wanders a little afield, but the key of E minor in the next waltz (Moderato) leads towards the "key-centre," and number six (Moderato tranquillo) brings the stabilizing Dominant, A major. There is a digression to F-sharp minor in number seven (Poco vivace), and a further digression to F-sharp major in the lyrical waltz that follows (Un poco lento con sentimento). Number nine, the Finale, begins with the theme of the previous waltz, in F.-sharp minor, and ingenious modulations lead the way to the return of the original tonality and tune.

W. S. S.

TRAN. FEB 28.

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Famous Schubert Work Heads Program — Excellently Performed

'THE RUSSIAN EASTER' ANOTHER NUMBER

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C Major, No. 7; Hill, Waltzes for orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter."

As Novalis was drunk with divinity, so was Schubert melodically intoxicated. No matter how frequently this symphony has been heard, one wonders anew at its melodic wealth, at the ease with which Schubert went from one tonality into another, at his rhythmic zest. Perhaps the Scherzo is the weakest of the four movements; yet how delightful its Viennese spirit, its suggestion of the dance, and in the Trio the suggestion of part-songs in praise of the woods, wine or women! And so in the first and the second movements there is Hungarian influence, noteworthy also in works of Brahms after he made Vienna his dwelling place. Grant that the movements of the symphony are long; the repetitions are not boresome as they are in Schuman's symphonies. It has been said that this C major symphony plays itself, if a conductor lets it alone. There is a grain of truth in the remark if regard is paid only to the general contents; but under a skilful conductor, the music is still more beautiful. A matter-of-fact, highly respectable leader might not bring out in all its impressiveness the wonderful trombone measures in the first movement, or he might treat perfunctorily the equally wonderful horn measures in the introduction and in the andante. Here he would sin by overdoing. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave an excellent performance. As played, the symphony was not too long.

Mr. Hill's waltzes were composed for the piano in 1920. As some of them suggested the orchestra, he arranged them, and they were performed yesterday for the first time. A high compliment was paid them unwittingly by a young woman in the corridor after the concert: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to." These fleeting melodies, often fragments, often mere suggestions of waltz measures, are harmonized and orchestrated with true French skill. While there is an avoidance of the obvious, this avoidance is not painfully achieved. The succession of moods, languor alternating with gaiety; these are as a natural speech.

"The Russian Easter" is a gorgeous composition and it was gorgeously played. Rimsky-Korsakov's program on a fly leaf of the score is made up of verses from a Psalm, from the Gospel according to Mark, and two paragraphs of his own. His chief theme is a melody of the Russian Church. The overture reminds one of that wildly imagined church in Moscow. Is this composition Rimsky-Korsokov's idea of what church music should be? In his program he speaks of the priests chanting "Resurrexit" in the temples, amid thick, pungent incense clouding them, while thousands of candles are a-light and bells are chiming melodiously and gloriously. One could not help wondering why the Russians had not used this music for a "grand sacred ballet." When the overture was first performed in Boston—Mr. Paur brought it out in 1897—it did not impress the audience deeply. Probably the performance then was somewhat faint-hearted, experimental; nor were we all then so well-acquainted with the Russian Muse as we are today. Yesterday the impression made was overpowering. But Mr. Monteux is always fortunate in his interpretation of the Russian, and the orchestra played as if swayed now by deep religious emotion, now by sacred frenzy.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Saminsky, two fragments from the ballet, "The Lament of Rachel" (first time in America), and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Mme. Nina Koshetz will sing with orchestra an air from Rimsky--Korsakov's "The Tsar's Bride"; a song without words by Prokofiev, and the "Revery and Dance" from Moussorgsy's opera, "The Fair of Sorotchink." Truly an interesting program.

HERALD FEB.25.

PROF HILL'S WALTZES PART OF SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Schubert's Symphony in C-major was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Drastic cuts, chiefly in the last movement, sheared it of some of what Schumann called its "heavenly lengths," but enough remained to fill nearly an hour. This music, though it lacks the logical, concise structure of Beethoven, makes amends by an inexhaustible wealth of melodic and rhythmic invention. Schubert wrote it in the manner of one improvising, pouring out a full heart "in profuse strains of unpremeditated art," like Shelley's skylark. The performance had an almost perfunctory efficiency, with nothing rhapsodic in it. The finale, in particular, obviously failed to stir Mr Monteux' imagination.

A set of concert waltzes arranged for orchestra by the composer, Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard, was played for the first time in this version. They were composed for piano. The audience received them with cordiality. Mr Hill rose in his place in the center of the hall and bowed repeatedly in acknowledgment, though with an obvious reluctance.

These waltzes do not pretend to pomp, vehemence or tragic intensity, qualities which would obviously be out of place in a set of conventionalized dances. They are amiable and pleasing light music, skillfully orchestrated except for a use of percussion instruments that fails to integrate them with the rest of the orchestra, producing an effect a little like that of finding a lump of salt in one's dish of ice cream. They lack the melodic invention and rhythmic vitality that have caused Johann Strauss' waltzes to be popular for half a century.

The other number was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," based on the rhythms of the liturgical music of the Greek Orthodox Church. One prefers the pieces like "Scheherezade" in which the chameleon-like composer takes his color from Oriental music. His originality, like Meyerbeer's, is turning out upon closer inspection of his music to be at second hand. It was well played and warmly applauded.

Next week Nina Koshetz, the Russian soprano, appearing as soloist for the first time in Boston, will sing unfamiliar numbers by Prokofiev, Musprgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov. The orchestra will play a new piece by Saminsky, Brahms' First Symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

GLOBE-FEB.25

NINA KOSHETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Russian Prima Donna to Sing at Next Concerts of Boston Orchestra

Nina Koshetz, the Russian prima donna, who is a newcomer to this country, and who in her own land is placed before all others as a singing actress and interpreter of song, will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 3 and 4. At these concerts she will sing with the orchestra an air from the opera, "The Czar's Bride," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Song (without words) written especially for Mme. Koshnetz by Prokofiev, the talented, daring, young Russian composer, who is now residing in this country, and Moussorgsky's Revery and Dance from "The Fair of Sorotchin."

A new work to be performed for the first time in America at these concerts will be Saminsky's Two Fragments from the Ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." Lazare Saminsky, the young Russian composer and pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is so far almost unknown in the new world.

AMER- FEB.25.

HILL'S WALTZES WIN APPLAUSE AT SYMPHONY

Waltzes for orchestra written by Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge delighted the Symphony audience yesterday. The composer was compelled to rise from his seat several times in acknowledgment of the enthusiastic applause.

Though written in the unconventional manner characteristic of the 20th century symphonic works, nevertheless these waltzes are not imitative. They have a charm quite their own. Lyric beauty tinges them genially; and they are scored with admirable skill and ingenuity. These morceaux are not merely technical feats to pique the interest of dabblers in musical conundrums. They will please music lovers in general for they have grace, sparkle, melodic distinction. They are like impressions of mallrooms aglow with elegance, old-time or Old World ballrooms, before the jazz age.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Schubert's symphony in C major, which Schumann described as "heavenly, long-drawn-out," is the first number on this week's program. The fact that it opens the concert should be noted by is a beautiful achievement. Yesterday Mr. Monteux and his men were given an ovation after the splendid performance.

[75]

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture is the final number.

ADVTSR-FEB.25.

HIGHBROW WALTZES BY SYMPHONY

"The Russian Easter" Feature of the Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's wonderful C major symphony, a new set of waltzes, written originally for piano and later orchestrated by Edward Burlingame Hill, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," made the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FINDS GREAT FAVOR

The symphony found great favor. There was prolonged applause at its conclusion, and after Mr. Monteux had twice returned to the stage the orchestra rose also to acknowledge the tribute of the audience.

In some respects, this was one of the poorest performances we remember from Mr. Monteux. The performance was heavy-footed, at times over-accented, and episodic in its nature. This and that passage stood out, as for example the dramatic climax of the slow movement, which was the finest moment of the whole reading. But of the ecstatic rush and whirl of the music, especially in the opening movement, there was little.

Is a Winged Thing

This symphony is a winged thing. It is one long marvelous sustained flight of inspiration from the first note to the last. The fact that there is too much of it from the standpoint of form and economy of material never makes it laborious or dull.

"Heavenly length," as Schumann said of this symphony, is right. The very planets seem to whirl and sing. As the theme of the introduction reappears at the end of the first movement one thinks of the thunder march of the sun through the heavens, in the prologue to Faust. Or at least, this will be the emotion of the symphony if it is allowed to speak for itself, if the wondrous thoughts of the composer are allowed freedom to sweep forward on the hythmical surrent of the music. As a rule, yesterday, this sweep was lacking, and the orchestral tone was more than once so thick and so harsh that one wondered whether Mr. Monteux had experimented with the instrumentation. That there were passages of brilliancy is of course true. The score itself would achieve so much. That solo players, as always in performances by this orchestra, frequently distinguished themselves, is also true.

And Schubert's symphony played much more poorly than yesterday afternoon, would remain Schubert's symphony. But where was the beauty and transparency of tone which this score makes possible, where was the unutterable grace, the wistful melancholy, the tumultuous joy that make this symphony echo down the ages?

Mr. Hill's Waltzes

Mr. Hill has escaped the banal in his set of waltzes. He has achieved pleasing instrumental effects. He is now fanciful, now gracefully sensuous, but he has written with more freshness of invention. The composer was present. He rose to acknowledge the applause. The feature of the concert was the superb playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on themes of the Russian Greek Church, "the Russian Easter," music of stained glass, ikons, the swinging of censers, the odor of incense; of antiphonal responses and religious ceremonies which derive from the music and the ceremonials of ancient paganism.

It is an amazing piece, and here Mr. Monteux was in a domain particularly his. Here he revealed the last tint of color, the uttermost intentions of the composer.

POST-FEB.25.

SYMPHONY CONC

SCHUBERT AND SONG, CHURCH A STAGE

Again "The Heavenly Lengths" and No Too Much Freshened in Performance— Mr. Hill's Ingenious and Fanciful Waltzes — Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture of the Church According to the Theatre —A Word About Current Programmes

EVEN from the catholic, the cosmopolitan, Mr. Monteux the conservative instinct innate in most Frenchmen will out. In Paris, beyond many another city that is capital of music, symphony concerts come and go in a deadly routine—unless some "foreign intruder," like Mr. Kusevitzky, disturb and animate them. There the caked and crusted formula for programmes prescribes a classic symphony at the beginning and thereafter a miscellany of short pieces. To this prescription with his symphonies, Mr. Monteux seems, for the hour, to have returned in Boston. Last week he began the concerts with Schumann's symphony of the spring; yesterday with Schubert's symphony of the "heavenly lengths"; while for next week he sets in like place Brahms's symphony in C minor. No doubt, most of us hear these pieces gladly, if only they recur not too often. Yet it is possible to believe that unhallowed symphonies, even by living hands, add zest to the long course of twenty-four concerts before a single audience.

One and another of Mr. Monteux's predecessors sought to alternate classic and modern symphonies—or tone-poems of large dimensions, latter-day equivalent thereto. He himself has seemed to incline to such course. Yet for the time classic symphony succeeds classic symphony at the head of his programmes and not for lack of deserving matter on the modern side. Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, already heard in New York and Philadelphia, lies on his table; once and twice he has spoken warmly of Bantock's Symphony of the Hebrides; it is easy to believe him eloquent with a symphony—say the fifth—of Mahler. There is not little curiosity hereabouts over Holst's symphonic suite, "The Planets," known both to Chicago and New York. By his own saying, the longer tone-poems of Strauss stir Mr. Monteux. Yet to Schumann thrice familiar, succeeds Schubert perennial; while upon both folows reiterated Brahms. It would be pity, indeed, if the conductor's elasticity as programme maker were stiffening into Franco-German formulas.

Nobody nowadays questions the beauty of this Symphony of Schubert, though his own generation, especially in London and in Paris, was mistrustful enough. Indeed the piece has come into unique place in the "standard repertory" as the embodiment in kind of pure instrumental song—the song that springs inexhaustible from the lips of the composer; that flows as spontaneously from mood to mood as it wings from flight to flight; the song of divine simplicities and of as divine abundance, wherein modulation is magic; and subtlety wears the eyes of innocence; and melodic imagination pours itself out as in living waters. By this time almost every saying about Schubert's melody is trite. With reason, the dissectors, the commentators, fall back upon the endless felicities of his modulations; upon the intuitive sense of beauty and of character with which, in the midst of twenty formulas, he used his instrumental choirs. As some who write are changeless masters of the apt, the eluding word, so is Schubert among the composers of symphonic music, the master of the sound that the listener hears, believes and questions not. For the instant none other seems so to join a perfect fitness to a perfect beauty, to melt seeking into finding and both unlabored. If only such gift of genius could be caught, a hundred midnight hours would not be wasted upon this symphony of changeless and exhaustless song!

Yet the listener hears in the concert-hall and in the swift commerce there, details pass, like the countless flecks of sun and shade over the long course of a spring day. The hearer takes sensuous delight in the hour of Schubertian melody; knows the caress or the prick of this or that modulation; feels the instrumental voices stealing over him like lingering or eager fingers; somehow guesses the infinite ardor, the endless glow, the bottomless richness of the whole. Here, at once shut and opened within a symphony, is a world of beautiful sound, as changeful of surface as are the contours of Schubert's melody, as full of prospects as are his manifold moods, as various in light and shadow as are his inflections—a world where beauty is prodigal like to his invention; where felicity is spell, like to his loveliest strokes; a world steeped like his music in a calm radiance, yet turning the heart to water in the sheer intensity of answering longing.

Breathless under such lavish sensation, the hearer may emerge from the symphony in C major—withal in a very human relief. The cup, after all, may have been too brimming; the long draught of songful poesy too surfeiting; the translucent glow more than the eye may bear. Yes: as the learned say, Schubert could be prolix, monotonous, repetitious, as uncritical as a bird of its song and like it, sometimes irritating to nervous, twentieth-century ears. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux did not much help or hinder him. Like all discerning conductors, he gave the music free course, free voice; since to point accents, to mould details, to distribute finicking stresses, is to cloud and stay Schubert's rhapsody, to make out of magic mechanics. It was possible, however, to wish the orchestra, except when solo-voices ascended lark-like from it, a more transparent, more lambent tone, a finer shapeliness of songful phrase and period, a more responsive, a more kindling ardor. However practised and poised, even calculating, within, conductor and orchestra in this symphony should like them who, in Portia's garden, inquiring to the young-eyed cherubins. As it was oftenest, an intelligent band, well lead, was

On January 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra formed for the first time here the second symphony of Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer now in this country. The composition had a certain dignity and serious aspiration to commend it; but, like so much of the music devoted to the publication of melodic distortions and harmonic complications, it seemed never to arrive anywhere. These "long-tailed birds of paradise that float through heaven and cannot light" are excessively wearisome. One burns with the desire that they will sit down somewhere, and possibly keep quiet. There is ugliness enough in the world without making more and gravely calling it art.

IND-WEEKLY-REVIEW. FEB. 18.

Sixteenth Symphony Programme

Schubert's symphony in C major will be the principal number on the programme of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 24 and 25.

A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "Waltzes for Orchestra," will have its first performance.

The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter," which, based upon Russian ritual themes, met with such enthusiasm when performed [illegible] seasons ago at these concerts.

POST - FEB-19.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 16th program. Symphony in C major, Schubert; "Waltzes," E. B. Hill, (first time); "A Russian Easter," Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is no soloist.

Mr Monteux has in preparation for the Symphony concerts a complete performance of Franck's "Psyche," with chorus.

GLOBE - FEB. 19.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Schubert's symphony in C-major will be the principal number on the program of the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. A new work by Edward Burlingame Hill, "Waltzes for Orchestra," will have its first performance. The closing number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

ADVTSR - FEB. 19.

INTERESTINGLY both for himself and for hearers, Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill sets his work in sharp contrasts. A year and more ago Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra played his tone-poem, "The Fall of the House of Usher," suggested by Poe's darksome, ominous, macabre tale of like title. To-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening, also for the first times anywhere, they will play his Nine Waltzes for Orchestra. These pieces were originally written for the pianoforte; in the present version they have been somewhat elaborated, amplified, and rounded off with a Finale. There is little inter-relation between the separate numbers; rather they are agreeably contrasted each to each, but a re-working and development in the Finale of the material of the first waltz, with hints of various others, gives unity to the series. Frankly light and unpretentious, seeking to charm rather than to startle or impress, the music, through harmonic subtleties and orchestral niceties, contrives to avoid the obvious. Yet it is never finicky or recondite. By all appearances Mr. Hill has successfully threaded the path that lies between these two temptations to the modern writer of symphonic waltzes.

An analysis of the structure of these waltzes, a detailed account of the instrumentation, is neither necessary nor suitable. Both will be easily discoverable in performance. Indeed, to forewarn the hearer of some of Mr. Hill's piquant and ingenious orchestral combinations and devices might rob them of the element of pleasant surprise. As proof of the composer's consideration of "key-relation," and as broad indication of the course of the pieces, the following details of key and tempo may be of service. D major is the underlying tonality. It is the key of the first waltz (Moderato), and it is the key in which this waltz reappears in the Finale. Number two is in D minor (Lento, un poco pesante); number three (Allegro Scherzando sempre grazioso) is in the relative major, F. Passing to the dominant of the latter key, C major, for number four (Vivace) the composer wanders a little afield, but the key of E minor in the next waltz (Moderato) leads towards the "key-centre," and number six (Moderato tranquillo) brings the stabilizing Dominant, A major. There is a digression to F-sharp minor in number seven (Poco vivace), and a further digression to F-sharp major in the lyrical waltz that follows (Un poco lento con sentimento). Number nine, the Finale, begins with the theme of the previous waltz, in F.-sharp minor, and ingenious modulations lead the way to the return of the original tonality and tune.

W. S. S.

TRAN. FEB. 28

16TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Famous Schubert Work Heads Program—Excellently Performed

'THE RUSSIAN EASTER' ANOTHER NUMBER

By PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C Major, No. 7; Hill, Waltzes for orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter."

As Novalis was drunk with divinity, so was Schubert melodically intoxicated. No matter how frequently this symphony has been heard, one wonders anew at its melodic wealth, at the ease with which Schubert went from one tonality into another, at his rhythmic zest. Perhaps the Scherzo is the weakest of the four movements; yet how delightful its Viennese spirit, its suggestion of the dance, and in the Trio the suggestion of part-songs in praise of the woods, wine or women! And so in the first and the second movements there is Hungarian influence, noteworthy also in works of Brahms after he made Vienna his dwelling place. Grant that the movements of the symphony are long; the repetitions are not boresome as they are in Schuman's symphonies. It has been said that this C major symphony plays itself, if a conductor lets it alone. There is a grain of truth in the remark if regard is paid only to the general contents; but under a skilful conductor, the music is still more beautiful. A matter-of-fact, highly respectable leader might not bring out in all its impressiveness the wonderful trombone measures in the first movement, or he might treat perfunctorily the equally wonderful horn measures in the introduction and in the andante. Here he would sin by overdoing. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave an excellent performance. As played, the symphony was not too long.

Mr. Hill's waltzes were composed for the piano in 1920. As some of them suggested the orchestra, he arranged them, and they were performed yesterday for the first time. A high compliment was paid them unwittingly by a young woman in the corridor after the concert: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to." These fleeting melodies, often fragments, often mere suggestions of waltz measures, are harmonized and orchestrated with true French skill. While there is an avoidance of the obvious, this avoidance is not painfully achieved. The succession of moods, languor alternating with gaiety; these are as a natural speech.

"The Russian Easter" is a gorgeous composition and it was gorgeously played. Rimsky-Korsakov's program on a fly leaf of the score is made up of verses from a Psalm, from the Gospel according to Mark, and two paragraphs of his own. His chief theme is a melody of the Russian Church. The overture reminds one of that wildly imagined church in Moscow. Is this composition Rimsky-Korsokov's idea of what church music should be? In his program he speaks of the priests chanting "Resurrexit" in the temples, amid thick, pungent incense clouding them, while thousands of candles are a-light and bells are chiming melodiously and gloriously. One could not help wondering why the Russians had not used this music for a "grand sacred ballet." When the overture was first performed in Boston—Mr. Paur brought it out in 1897—it did not impress the audience deeply. Probably the performance then was somewhat faint-hearted, experimental; nor were we all then so well-acquainted with the Russian Muse as we are today. Yesterday the impression made was overpowering. But Mr. Monteux is always fortunate in his interpretation of the Russian, and the orchestra played as if swayed now by deep religious emotion, now by sacred frenzy.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Saminsky, two fragments from the ballet, "The Lament of Rachel" (first time in America), and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Mme. Nina Koshetz will sing with orchestra an air from Rimsky--Korsakov's "The Tsar's Bride"; a song without words by Prokofiev, and the "Revery and Dance" from Moussorgsy's opera, "The Fair of Sorotchink." Truly an interesting program.

HERALD - FEB. 25.

PROF HILL'S WALTZES PART OF SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Schubert's Symphony in C-major was the chief item on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Drastic cuts, chiefly in the last movement, sheared it of some of what Schumann called its "heavenly lengths," but enough remained to fill nearly an hour. This music, though it lacks the logical, concise structure of Beethoven, makes amends by an inexhaustible wealth of melodic and rhythmic invention. Schubert wrote it in the manner of one improvising, pouring out a full heart "in profuse strains of unpremeditated art," like Shelley's skylark. The performance had an almost perfunctory efficiency, with nothing rhapsodic in it. The finale, in particular, obviously failed to stir Mr Monteux' imagination.

A set of concert waltzes arranged for orchestra by the composer, Prof E. B. Hill of Harvard, was played for the first time in this version. They were composed for piano. The audience received them with cordiality. Mr Hill rose in his place in the center of the hall and bowed repeatedly in acknowledgment, though with an obvious reluctance.

These waltzes do not pretend to pomp, vehemence or tragic intensity, qualities which would obviously be out of place in a set of conventionalized dances. They are amiable and pleasing light music, skillfully orchestrated except for a use of percussion instruments that fails to integrate them with the rest of the orchestra, producing an effect a little like that of finding a lump of salt in one's dish of ice cream. They lack the melodic invention and rhythmic vitality that have caused Johann Strauss' waltzes to be popular for half a century.

The other number was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," based on the rhythms of the liturgical music of the Greek Orthodox Church. One prefers the pieces like "Scheherezade" in which the chameleon-like composer takes his color from Oriental music. His originality, like Meyerbeer's, is turning out upon closer inspection of his music to be at second hand. It was well played and warmly applauded.

Next week Nina Koshetz, the Russian soprano, appearing as soloist for the first time in Boston, will sing unfamiliar numbers by Prokofiev, Musorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov. The orchestra will play a new piece by Saminsky, Brahms' First Symphony and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

GLOBE - FEB 25

NINA KOSHETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Russian Prima Donna to Sing at Next Concerts of Boston Orchestra

Nina Koshetz, the Russian prima donna, who is a newcomer to this country, and who in her own land is placed before all others as a singing actress and interpreter of song, will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 3 and 4. At these concerts she will sing with the orchestra an air from the opera, "The Czar's Bride," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Song (without words) written especially for Mme. Koshnetz by Prokofiev, the talented, daring, young Russian composer, who is now residing in this country, and Moussorgsky's Revery and Dance from "The Fair of Sorotchin."

A new work to be performed for the first time in America at these concerts will be Saminsky's Two Fragments from the Ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." Lazare Saminsky, the young Russian composer and pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is so far almost unknown in the new world.

AMER - FEB. 25.

HILL'S WALTZES WIN APPLAUSE AT SYMPHONY

Waltzes for orchestra written by Edward Burlingame Hill of Cambridge delighted the Symphony audience yesterday. The composer was compelled to rise from his seat several times in acknowledgment of the enthusiastic applause.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Though written in the unconventional manner characteristic of the 20th century symphonic works, nevertheless these waltzes are not imitative. They have a charm quite their own. Lyric beauty tinges them genially; and they are scored with admirable skill and ingenuity. These morceaux are not merely technical feats to pique the interest of dabblers in musical conundrums. They will please music lovers in general for they have grace, sparkle, melodic distinction. They are like impressions of ballrooms aglow with elegance, old-time or Old World ballrooms, before the jazz age.

Schubert's symphony in C major, which Schumann described as "heavenly, long-drawn-out," is the first number on this week's program. The fact that it opens the concert should be noted by those who attend the Saturday night concerts. Every movement is a beautiful achievement. Yesterday Mr. Monteux and his men were given an ovation after the splendid performance.

---

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture is the final number.

ADVTSR - FEB. 25.

HIGHBROW WALTZES BY SYMPHONY

"The Russian Easter" Feature of the Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

Schubert's wonderful C major symphony, a new set of waltzes, written originally for piano and later orchestrated by Edward Burlingame Hill, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," made the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

FINDS GREAT FAVOR

The symphony found great favor. There was prolonged applause at its conclusion, and after Mr. Monteux had twice returned to the stage the orchestra rose also to acknowledge the tribute of the audience.

In some respects, this was one of the poorest performances we remember from Mr. Monteux. The performance was heavy-footed, at times over-accented, and episodic in its nature. This and that passage stood out, as for example the dramatic climax of the slow movement, which was the finest moment of the whole reading. But of the ecstatic rush and whirl of the music, especially in the opening movement, there was little.

Is a Winged Thing

This symphony is a winged thing. It is one long marvelous, sustained flight of inspiration from the first note to the last. The fact that there is too much of it from the standpoint of form and economy of material never makes it laborious or dull.

"Heavenly length," as Schumann said of this symphony, is right. The very planets seem to whirl and sing. As the theme of the introduction reappears at the end of the first movement one thinks of the thunder march of the sun through the heavens, in the prologue to Faust. Or at least, this will be the emotion of the symphony if it is allowed to speak for itself, if the wondrous thoughts of the composer are allowed freedom to sweep forward on the hythmical surrent of the music. As a rule, yesterday, this sweep was lacking, and the orchestral tone was more than once so thick and so harsh that one wondered whether Mr. Monteux had experimented with the instrumentation. That there were passages of brilliancy is of course true. The score itself would achieve so much. That solo players, as always in performances by this orchestra, frequently distinguished themselves, is also true.

And Schubert's symphony played much more poorly than yesterday afternoon, would remain Schubert's symphony. But where was the beauty and transparency of tone which this score makes possible, where was the unutterable grace, the wistful melancholy, the tumultuous joy that make this symphony echo down the ages?

Mr. Hill's Waltzes

Mr. Hill has escaped the banal in his set of waltzes. He has achieved pleasing instrumental effects. He is now fanciful, now gracefully sensuous, but he has written with more freshness of invention. The composer was present. He rose to acknowledge the applause. The feature of the concert was the superb playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture on themes of the Russian Greek Church, "the Russian Easter," music of stained glass, ikons, the swinging of censers, the odor of incense; of antiphonal responses and religious ceremonies which derive from the music and the ceremonials of ancient paganism.

It is an amazing piece, and here Mr. Monteux was in a domain particularly his. Here he revealed the last tint of color, the uttermost intention of the composer.

POST - FEB. 25.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SCHUBERT AND SONG, CHURCH AND STAGE

Again "The Heavenly Lengths" and None Too Much Freshened in Performance—Mr. Hill's Ingenious and Fanciful Waltzes—Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture of the Church According to the Theatre—A Word About Current Programmes

EVEN from the catholic, the cosmopolitan, Mr. Monteux the conservative instinct innate in most Frenchmen will out. In Paris, beyond many another city that is capital of music, symphony concerts come and go in a deadly routine—unless some "foreign intruder," like Mr. Kusevitzky, disturb and animate them. There the caked and crusted formula for programmes prescribes a classic symphony at the beginning and thereafter a miscellany of short pieces. To this prescription with his symphonies, Mr. Monteux seems, for the hour, to have returned in Boston. Last week he began the concerts with Schumann's symphony of the spring; yesterday with Schubert's symphony of the "heavenly lengths"; while for next week he sets in like place Brahms's symphony in C minor. No doubt most of us hear these pieces gladly, if only they recur not too often. Yet it is possible to believe that unhallowed symphonies, even by living hands, add zest to the long course of twenty-four concerts before a single audience.

One and another of Mr. Monteux's predecessors sought to alternate classic and modern symphonies—or tone-poems of large dimensions, latter-day equivalent thereto. He himself has seemed to incline to such course. Yet for the time classic symphony succeeds classic symphony at the head of his programmes—and not for lack of deserving matter on the modern side. Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, already heard in New York and Philadelphia, lies on his table; once and twice he has spoken warmly of Bantock's Symphony of the Hebrides; it is easy to believe him eloquent with a symphony—say the fifth—of Mahler. There is not a little curiosity hereabouts over Holst's symphonic suite, "The Planets," known only to Chicago and New York. By his own saying, the longer tone-poems of Strauss stir Mr. Monteux. Yet to Schumann's thrice familiar, succeeds Schubert perennial; while upon both follows reiterated Brahms. It would be pity, indeed, if the conductor's elasticity as programme-maker were stiffening into Franco-German formulas.

Nobody nowadays questions the beauty of this Symphony of Schubert, though his own generation, especially in London and in Paris, was mistrustful enough. Indeed, the piece has come into unique place in the "standard repertory" as the embodiment in kind of pure instrumental song—the song that springs inexhaustible from the lips of the composer; that flows as spontaneously from mood to mood as it wings from flight to flight; the song of divine simplicities and of a divine abundance, wherein modulation is magic; and subtlety wears the eyes of innocence; and melodic imagination pours itself out as a "living waters. By this time almost every saying about Schubert's melody is trite. With reason, the dissectors, the commentators, fall back upon the endless felicities of his modulations; upon the intuitive sense of beauty and of character with which, in the midst of twenty formulas, he used the instrumental choirs. As some who write are changeless masters of the apt, the illuding word, so is Schubert among the composers of symphonic music, the master of the sound that the listener hears, believes and questions not. For the instant none other seems so to join a perfect fitness to a perfect beauty, to unite ease in finding and both unlabored. If only such gift of genius could be caught, a hundred midnight hours would not be wasted upon this symphony of changeless and exhaustless song!

Yet the listener hears in the concert-hall and in the swift commerce there, details pass, like the countless flecks of sun and shade over the long course of a spring day. The hearer takes sensuous delight in the hour of Schubertian melody; knows the caress or the prick of this or that modulation; feels the instrumental voices stealing over him like lingering or eager fingers; somehow guesses the infinite ardor of the endless glow, the bottomless richness of the whole. Here, at once shut and opened within a symphony, is a world of beautiful sound, as changeful of surface as are the contours of Schubert's melody, as full of prospects as are his manifold moods, as various in light and shadow as are his inflections—a world where beauty is prodigal like to his invention; where felicity is spell, like to his loveliest strokes; a world steeped like his music in a calm radiance, yet turning the heart to water in the intensity of answering longing.

Breathless under such lavish spending, the hearer may emerge from the Symphony in C minor—withal in a very human relief. The cup, after all, may have been too brimming; the long draught of songful poesy too surfeiting; the translucent glow more than the eye may bear. Yes: as the learned say, Schubert could be prolix, monotonous, repetitious, as uncritical as a bird of its song and like it, sometimes irritating to nervous, twentieth-century ears. Yesterday, Mr. Monteux did not much help or hinder him. Like all discerning conductors, he gave the music free course, free voice; since to point accents, to round details, to distribute finicking stresses is to cloud and stay Schubert's rhapsody, to make out of magic mechanics. It was possible, however, to wish the orchestra, except when solo-voices ascended larklike from it, a more transparent, more fluent tone, a finer shapeliness of songful phrase and period, a more responsive, a more kindling ardor. However poised, even calculating, within, conductor and orchestra in this symphony should be like them who, in Portia's garden, were "quiring to the young-eyed cherubins." Such was oftenest, an intelligent and efficient band, well lead, was playing bert in C major—item number one, in the programme of the day.

The other items of the afternoon made sufficient contrast to Schubert's Symphony and to each other. One was the nine waltzes of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill written originally for piano; scored subsequently for orchestra; heard yesterday for the first time in any concert. They are brief; they shift readily in matter and in voice; they are unified by an ingenious relation of keys and, in the finale, by a return and a re-working of previous motivs. At every turn Mr. Hill avoids the obvious and the conventional—without laboring too obviously at that desirable process. His motivs flower less into waltzes—in the sense of the ballroom, operetta and even of Monsieur Ravel in a recent tone-poem—than into the suggestion of waltzes, glamored by studious, fanciful or technically imaginative mood. By so much Mr. Hill walks in the ways of Chopin, without the Pole's romantic impulse or of Ravel in the "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes" without the Parisian's ironies.

Most of all, however, the composer's invention and skill flower in his handling. If his motivs hardly arrest the ear, if his moods do not much quicken the listening fancy, it is pleasure to hear the play of his harmonies, the suggestion of his instrumental voices, the aptness, the ingenuity, the fertility with which he plies both. Without excess, without eccentricity, Mr. Hill clothes his waltzes in the present vesture of Paris—and adds agreeable frills and furbelows of his own. His fellow-composers are sure to savor his skill and fancy, his readiness and sureness; even the casual hearer of the concert-hall tastes the spice of these virtues. It is Mr. Hill's good fortune to be, when he chooses—and as composers should be—a serious writer of light, playful, sensitive music. He caught the vein notably in his "Stevensoniana"—a piece that ought not to have fallen from orchestral repertories, deplorably scanty in such numbers. He has renewed it, though hardly so freshly, in these nine waltzes.

The contrasting piece—as the movies say—was Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter." Few of his operas are known as yet to our western world. Possibly none of them contains a scene of churchly rite, splendor, illusion and emotion. Possibly, he was minded to write such a piece. Almost certainly, by inner sign, he so wrote this overture. His fly-leaf bear texts of Scripture—from a vindictive Psalm of the Jewish Jehovah, from the simple narrative of the resurrection of Jesus. To them, he adds a gloss of his own, curiously like a pious stage-direction for churchly spectacle. As vesture for such show, characterizing, enriching, intesifying, he cuts and colors his music. There is the preluding of the orchestra—grave, mysterious, piercing. The voice of the solo violin rises, falls, calling, calling, like a bidding priest. Then Rimsky's curtain rises. The stage is set for a great cathedral; the altar flares with lights and smokes with incense; the holy chants rise and wreathe through the arches; the great bells sound remote; a glad and grave emotion pervades the throng in tumultuous worship. It fills the theatre; it possesses the audience; sight, sound, emotion become as one. So Rimsky writes his overture of church and stage; while as eloquently, as illusively, Mr. Monteux—master always of music of the theatre—played it.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 25

IN these days, more than ever before, Mr. Monteux abounds in the classic symphonies. Accordingly he will begin the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Brahms's first Symphony, in C minor, familiar masterpiece these many years in many "readings." He will end the concerts with Wagner's Overture to his early opera, "The Flying Dutchman," unheard since Dr. Muck's day. The novel orchestral pieces on the programme are two fragments of "The Lament of Rachel," mimodrama by Lazare Saminsky, Russian composer now settled in America about whom a lengthy article was printed in this place last autumn. Mme. Nina Koshetz, Russian singer, will also assist the orchestra. Her numbers are an air from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; a piece from Musorgsky's light opera, "The Fair of Sorotchin"; and a wordless song written for her by the Russian, Prokofiev. Mme. Koshetz is one of the many singers engaged by Miss Garden for the Chicago Opera Company, but finding with it scanty opportunity. When she was heard, she was praised.

Mme. Koshetz will also assist the orchestra at its concert next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, singing the three numbers already noted. The orchestral pieces upon Mr. Monteux's programme are Schubert's Symphony in C major; Mr. Hill's new Waltzes and the Overture to Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

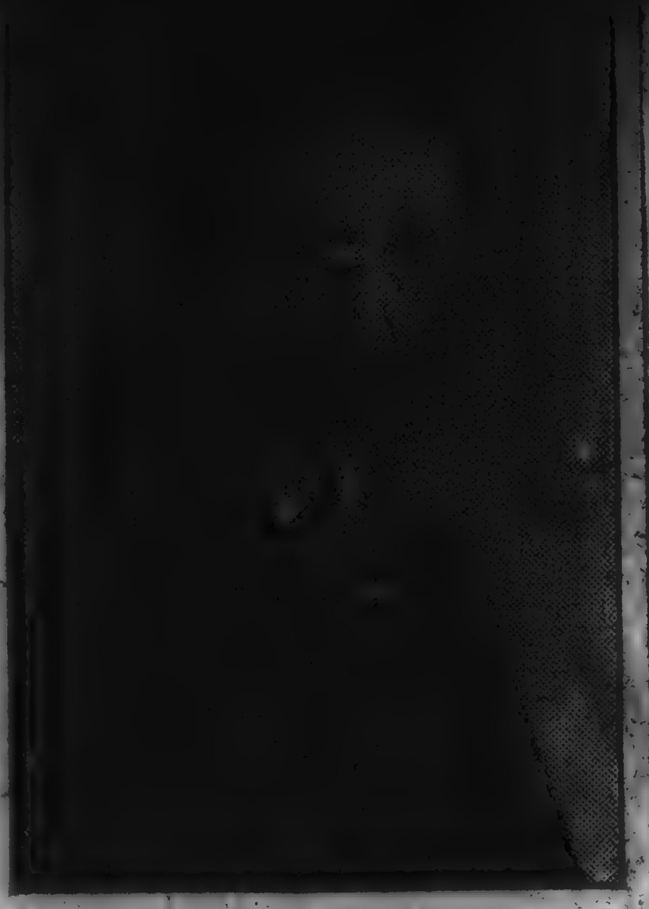
TRANS. FEB. 25

BEDETTI WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Brockton Concert, Feb. 26, Will be the Second Annual Event Here.

ONTEUX AND 100 PLAYERS

rgin Fills Customary Place s Concert Master



PIERRE MONTEUX.

Jean Bedetti, famous 'cellist, who gave a recital here earlier in the season under the auspices of the Brockton Teachers' Association, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the orchestra's second annual concert in City Theatre, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26. Bedetti is leader of the 'cello section and is regarded as one of the country's most eminent performers.

George J. Judd, assistant manager, visited Brockton on Thursday afternoon and called at City Hall to see Mayor Keith. The mayor is ill but Mr. Judd was assured by Mrs. Edith M. Blanchard, mayor's secretary, the permit for the concert will be granted.

Aside from the Boston series, stated to be the most successful on record, the orchestra will give concerts in Lawrence, Springfield, New Bedford, Fall River, Lynn and Brockton, with two at Smith College, Northampton.

Conductor Monteux will have 100 men with him for the Brockton concert a special train to convey the musicians to and from Brockton. As to the quality of the music, Philip Hale, noted critic, of Boston, said in a review Jan. 14:

"It may be said in all soberness that in no orchestra in this country, perhaps in Europe, is there a beauty of strings to be compared with that of the Boston Symyhony Orchestra. Grant that the material is in itself excellent; yet an orchestra is what the conductor makes it, and Mr. Monteux has made this orchestra what it is. Long famous, it was never in a higher state than it is to-day."

The orchestra this week accorded recognition to the death of Arthur Nikisch, its third conductor, who 30 years ago conducted it for four years, by playing the funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods." Sixteen of the musicians who served under Nikisch will be in Brockton. Richard Burgin, concert master, who was soloist a year ago, is also with the orchestra.

BROCKTON JAN. 27

KOSHETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Nina Koshetz, the Russian prima donna, will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 3 and 4. At these concerts she will sing with the orchestra an air from the opera, "The Czar's Bride" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, song (without words) written especially for Madame Koshetz by

TRAV. FEB. 25.

Koshetz Symphony Soloist

At the Symphony programme for the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, March 3, and Saturday evening, March 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The music of Lazare Saminsky, the highly gifted young Russian composer and pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, will have its first hearing in Boston at this concert, when Mr. Monteux conducts for the first time in this country Two Fragments from Saminsky's Ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." The numbers are "The Lament of Rachel" and "The Wedding Feast."

The soloist at this concert will be the Russian dramatic soprano, Nina Koshetz. She will sing with the orchestra an air from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Czar's Bride"; a "Song Without Words," written especially for Madame Koshetz by Prokofiev, the daring young Russian composer now residing in this country, and Moussorgsky's Revery and dance from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk."

The closing number on the programme will be "Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

POST FEB. 26

Nina Koshetz, who sings for the first time in Boston at this week's Symphony concerts, is a Russian lately heard in Chicago and New York with the Chicago Opera Association. She created a leading role in Prokofiev's fantastic opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The composer has written her a song without words which she will sing with the Symphony.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 17th program. First Symphony, in C minor, Brahms; Fragments from the Ballet, "Lament of Rachel," Saminsky (first time in America); Aria from "The Czar's Bride," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Song Without Words," Prokofiev; "Revery" and Dance from "The Fair of Sorotchin Musorgsky; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Soloist, N Koshetz (first Boston appearance).

GLOBE FEB. 26 [76]

Russian Singer at Symphony Concerts

AT the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor and two fragments form Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." The Saminsky music is new to this country. The composer is one of Russia's leading musicians.

The soloist will be Nina Koshetz, Russian prima donna, who will sing an air from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Czar's Bride"; "A Song Without Words," written for her by Prokofiev, a composer now residing in this country, and a selection from Moussorgsky's "Fair of Sorotchin."

The closing number on the program will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ADVTSR. FEB. 26

When Children Hear Symphonies

Providence musicians have occasionally expressed the hope that some time arrangements might be made to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give one of its children's concerts in this city. A series of them is now an established feature of the Boston season, and their popularity is unquestioned. Yet they offer problems both of programme-making and the audience's responsiveness. Of the first one for the season, recently given, the Globe's reviewer wrote:

"A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience" as if that, too, were a type. It isn't so any longer.

"A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same programme will be repeated to-morrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

"Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children."

The reviewer reports also that "the Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horseplay went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr. Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

"But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne,' suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted."

But such a work is carefully chosen from the most timid and anaemic of contemporary production, leaving absolutely unheard the composers who represent the true spirit of our time.

Raymond Havens

Former Providence Pianist Who Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall on Tuesday.

Raymond Haven, the young pianis who, a native of this city, has made a enviable mark both in America and Eu rope by his unusual talents and will ap pear as soloist with the Boston Sym phony Orchestra Tuesday evening, ha appeared a number of times with th great orchestra elsewhere, but as chanc has it, he has never been a symphon soloist in Providence. The concert chosen for this occasion will be that Liszt in E-flat No. 1.

Pierre Monteux will open the conce with Schumann's First Symphony whi the composed named the "Spring" sy phony. Its opening movement, aboun ing with bright and resilient rhythms, i slow movement (a love song), its fanta tic scherzo, and the swift and cl finale, all hold a particular place in the hearts of those familiar with symphonic music.

A notable number by Debussy will be his "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which was inspired by the poem of that name by Stephen Mallarme. This music contains flute passages of especial beauty, representing the faun. Mr. Monteux, a close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores, is considered one of the most authoritative and also the finest interpreter of Debussy's music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, constructed on the characteristic dance rhythms of Spain, is a piece of particularly brilliant and colorful orchestration, likewise with many important solos for the various instruments of the orchestra.

PROV JOURNAL - FEB. 26

SUNDAY CONCERT STIRS AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Enthralls Auditors.

Hundreds of music lovers who thronged City theater Sunday afternoon were lifted from the cares and monotony of everyday life by harmonic strains from classics by famous composers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, that talented band of musicians who never fail to receive a cordial welcome from Brocktonians.

The program was an attractive one, and the numbers were accorded hearty applause. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, was obliged to reappear several times at the close of the program to acknowledge the appreciation which was expressed.

Most delightful among the selections was "Lalo," the concerto for violoncello with orchestra, in which the solo work was done by Jean Bedetti, who was favorably received in this city last season, when he played to a concert given in High school hall by the Brockton Teachers' association. He received several enthusiastic encores, re-appearing four times to acknowledge the plaudits. The concerto included: Prelude, Allegro Maestoso, Intermezzo, Introduction, Rondo.

The program also comprised Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 7; Allegro con brio, Andante con moto, Allegro, Trio, Allegro; Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde;" and Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes," (after Lamartine) by Liszt.

BROCKTON TIMES FEB 27.

FROM FEB 12 1922
SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Monteux Signs New Contract As Conductor

Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Remain Two More Years.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting February 8, voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. After consulting with the conductor last evening, the board secured Mr. Monteux's acceptance of their offer.

Mr. Monteux is now fulfilling his third season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The new standards which he has set, and the traditional ones which he has maintained, are now eloquently apparent. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating pioneer of the music of today, he has given the Boston Symphony concerts a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra owes a large part of its beauty of ensemble to the creative effort and executive skill of its conductor, Pierre Monteux's genius has perhaps also found its highest fruition at this post. Yet, before he came to the Boston orchestra, he had won an enviable name as conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music activities in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, the Châtelet and Odéon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres, in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he first came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

---

rom FEB 12 1922
AGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Another Week's Reactions

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY

SPECULATION regarding the immediate future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be laid to rest. Pierre Monteux has arranged with the organization's directors to continue as conductor for at least two years more. Now perhaps the friends of Toscanini and the advocates of Felix Weingartner will be silent.

The trouble with us in New York is that we have not looked upon the Boston situation with the eyes of Boston. All that we have seen is that audiences attending the ten annual concerts in Carnegie Hall have been slimmer and less enthusiastic than were those which congregated of other years to listen to the artistic ministrations of Karl Muck. In addition, of course, we have universally believed that Mr. Monteux did not succeed in filling more than one of his predecessor's shoes.

In Boston, on the other hand, the audiences have not diminished, nor have they accepted a metropolitan verdict with regard to Mr. Monteux. In him they have had a stout faith since the beginning. They have stuck to the Monteux colors and they have discerned that the finest gentleman among conductors is also a musician of parts.

Mr. Monteux's role in Boston has been difficult to play. He was greeted by a disorganized orchestra, he stepped into the place vacated by a conducting genius. Possibly we in New York, with our usual indifference to a situation, asked the impossible. At least we drew comparisons that were not altogether fair. In the strictest sense of the musical word we were right; however, an allowance might well have been much to the point.

Today the Boston Orchestra is a marvel of tonal quality. Under Mr. Monteux it has not succeeded in playing the classics so well as under the conductors of former years. Mr. Monteux is not a classicist. In fact, when he first directed the orchestra his readings of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn were always of the nature of weather reports: Cloudy, or at least partly cloudy. But they have improved, an improvement revealed in his performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Carnegie Hall a week ago. Richard Wagner found much to praise in the Beethoven he heard in Paris 70 years ago. Now we also are learning that an earnest Frenchman may endow a Beethoven symphony with eloquence.

If Mr. Monteux is just beginning to see the classic rays that mark the classic dawn, he has been almost without rival as an interpreter of modern music. The younger Frenchmen and all the Russians are grist to his mill. There hasn't been a good performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or" since Mr. Monteux departed from the opera house, and it would be interesting at least to hear how much color he would reveal in a reading of "Sniegourochka." One may well fancy his doing an utterly different labor than has been done by Mr. Bodanzky.

NEWS, FEB 12 1922
Detroit, Mich.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD TO STAY 2 MORE YEARS

BOSTON, Feb. 11.—Pierre Monteaux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will remain in that position for two more years. The trustees of the orchestra, by unanimous vote, have extended his contract to May, 1924, when by mutual agreement he will complete his service of five years as conductor and will be succeeded by another bert in C major—item number one, in the programme of the day.

The other items of the afternoon made sufficient contrast to Schubert's Symphony and to each other. One was the nine waltzes of Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill written originally for piano; scored subsequently for orchestra; heard yesterday for the first time in any concert. They are brief; they shift readily in matter and in voice; they are unified by an ingenious relation of keys and, in the finale, by a return and a re-working of previous motivs. At every turn Mr. Hill avoids the obvious and the conventional—without laboring too obviously at that desirable process. His motivs flower less into waltzes—in the sense of the ballroom, operetta and even of Monsieur Ravel in a recent tone-poem—than into the suggestion of waltzes, glamored by studious, fanciful or technically imaginative mood. By so much Mr. Hill walks in the ways of Chopin, without the Pole's romantic impulse or of Ravel in the "Noble and Sentimental Waltzes" without the Parisian's ironies.

Most of all, however, the composer's invention and skill flower in his handling. If his motivs hardly arrest the ear, if his moods do not much quicken the listening fancy, it is pleasure to hear the play of his harmonies, the suggestion of his instrumental voices, the aptness, the ingenuity, the fertility with which he plies both. Without excess, without eccentricity, Mr. Hill clothes his waltzes in the present vesture of Paris—and adds agreeable frills and furbelows of his own. His fellow-composers are sure to savor his skill and fancy, his readiness and sureness; even the casual hearer of the concert-hall tastes the spice of these virtues. It is Mr. Hill's good fortune to be, when he chooses—and as composers should be—a serious writer of light, playful, sensitive music. He caught the vein notably in his "Stevensoniana"—a piece that ought not to have fallen from orchestral repertories, deplorably scanty in such numbers. He has renewed it, though hardly so freshly, in these nine waltzes.

The contrasting piece—as the movies say—was Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "Russian Easter." Few of his operas are known as yet to our western world. Possibly none of them contains a scene of churchly rite, splendor, illusion and emotion. Possibly, he was minded to write such a piece. Almost certainly, by inner sign, he so wrote this overture. His flyleaf bear texts of Scripture—from a vindictive Psalm of the Jewish Jehovah, from the simple narrative of the resurrection of Jesus. To them, he adds a gloss of his own, curiously like a pious stage-direction for churchly spectacle. As vesture for such show, characterizing, enriching, intesifying, he cuts and colors his music. There is the preluding of the orchestra—grave, mysterious, piercing. The voice of the solo violin rises, falls, calling, calling, like a bidding priest. Then Rimsky's curtain rises. The stage is set for a great cathedral; the altar flares with lights and smokes with incense; the holy chants rise and wreathe through the arches; the great bells sound remote; a glad and grave emotion pervades the throng in tumultuous worship. It fills the theatre; it possesses the audience; sight, sound, emotion become as one. So Rimsky writes his overture of church and stage; while as cloquently, as illusively, Mr. Monteux—master always of music of the theatre—played it.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. FEB. 25

IN these days, more than ever before, Mr. Monteux abounds in the classic symphonies. Accordingly he will begin the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with Brahms's first Symphony, in C minor, familiar masterpiece these many years in many "readings." He will end the concerts with Wagner's Overture to his early opera, "The Flying Dutchman," unheard since Dr. Muck's day. The novel orchestral pieces on the programme are two fragments of "The Lament of Rachel," mimodrama by Lazare Saminsky, Russian composer now settled in America about whom a lengthy article was printed in this place last autumn. Mme. Nina Koshetz, Russian singer, will also assist the orchestra. Her numbers are an air from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; a piece from Musorgsky's light opera, "The Fair of Sorotchin"; and a wordless song written for her by the Russian, Prokofiev. Mme. Koshetz is one of the many singers engaged by Miss Garden for the Chicago Opera Company, but finding with it scanty opportunity. When she was heard, she was praised.

Mme. Koshetz will also assist the orchestra at its concert next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, singing the three numbers already noted. The orchestral pieces upon Mr. Monteux's programme are Schubert's Symphony in C major; Mr. Hill's new Waltzes and the Overture to Wagner's opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

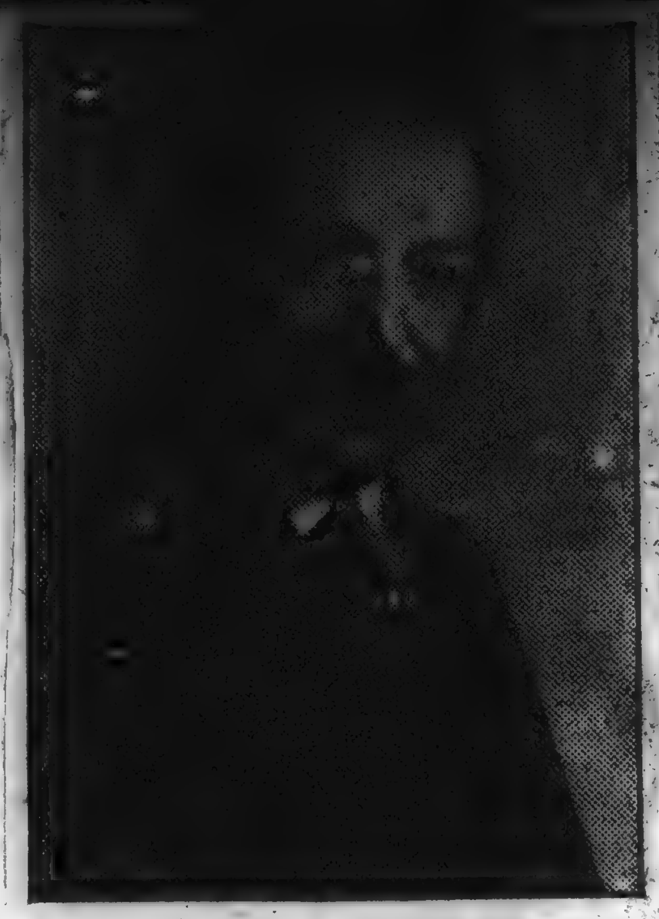
TRS. FEB. 25

BEDETTI WILL BE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Brockton Concert, Feb. 26, Will be the Second Annual Event Here.

MONTEUX AND 100 PLAYERS

Burgin Fills Customary Place as Concert Master



PIERRE MONTEUX.

Jean Bedetti, famous 'cellist, who gave a recital here earlier in the season under the auspices of the Brockton Teachers' Association, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the orchestra's second annual concert in City Theatre, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 26. Bedetti is leader of the 'cello section and is regarded as one of the country's most eminent performers.

George J. Judd, assistant manager, visited Brockton on Thursday afternoon and called at City Hall to see Mayor Keith. The mayor is ill but Mr. Judd was assured by Mrs. Edith M. Blanchard, mayor's secretary, the permit for the concert will be granted.

Aside from the Boston series, stated to be the most successful on record, the orchestra will give concerts in Lawrence, Springfield, New Bedford, Fall River, Lynn and Brockton, with two at Smith College, Northampton.

Conductor Monteux will have 100 men with him for the Brockton concert a special train to convey the musicians to and from Brockton. As to the quality of the music, Philip Hale, noted critic, of Boston, said in a review Jan. 14:

"It may be said in all soberness that in no orchestra in this country, perhaps in Europe, is there a beauty of strings to be compared with that of the Boston Symyhony Orchestra. Grant that the material is in itself excellent; yet an orchestra is what the conductor makes it, and Mr. Monteux has made this orchestra what it is. Long famous, it was never in a higher state than it is to-day."

The orchestra this week accorded recognition to the death of Arthur Nikisch, its third conductor, who 30 years ago conducted it for four years, by playing the funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods." Sixteen of the musicians who served under Nikisch will be in Brockton. Richard Burgin, concert master, who was soloist a year ago, is also with the orchestra.

BROCKTON JAN. 27.

KOSHETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Nina Koshetz, the Russian prima donna, will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 3 and 4. At these concerts she will sing with the orchestra an air from the opera, "The Czar's Bride" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, song (without words) written especially for Madame Koshetz by

TRAV. FEB. 25.

Koshetz Symphony Soloist

At the Symphony programme for the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, March 3, and Saturday evening, March 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The music of Lazare Saminsky, the highly gifted young Russian composer and pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff, will have its first hearing in Boston at this concert, when Mr. Monteux conducts for the first time in this country Two Fragments from Saminsky's Ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." The numbers are "The Lament of Rachel" and "The Wedding Feast."

The soloist at this concert will be the Russian dramatic soprano, Nina Koshetz. She will sing with the orchestra an air from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Czar's Bride"; a "Song Without Words," written especially for Madame Koshetz by Prokofiev, the daring young Russian composer now residing in this country, and Moussorgsky's Revery and dance from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk."

The closing number on the programme will be "Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

POST FEB. 26

Nina Koshetz, who sings for the first time in Boston at this week's Symphony concerts, is a Russian lately heard in Chicago and New York with the Chicago Opera Association. She created a leading role in Prokofiev's fantastic opera, "The Love of Three Oranges." The composer has written her a song without words which she will sing with the Symphony.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 17th program. First Symphony, in C minor, Brahms; Fragments from the Ballet, "Lament of Rachel," Saminsky (first time in America); Aria from "The Czar's Bride," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Song Without Words," Prokofiev; "Revery" and Dance from "The Fair of Sorotchin," Musorgsky; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Soloist, Nina Koshetz (first Boston appearance).

GLOBE FEB. 26 [76]

Russian Singer at Symphony Concerts

AT the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor and two fragments form Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel." The Saminsky music is new to this country. The composer is one of Russia's leading musicians.

The soloist will be Nina Koshetz, Russian prima donna, who will sing an air from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Czar's Bride"; "A Song Without Words," written for her by Prokofiev, a composer now residing in this country, and a selection from Moussorgsky's "Fair of Sorotchin."

The closing number on the program will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ADVTSR. FEB 26.

When Children Hear Symphonies

Providence musicians have occasionally expressed the hope that some time arrangements might be made to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give one of its children's concerts in this city. A series of them is now an established feature of the Boston season, and their popularity is unquestioned. Yet they offer problems both of programme-making and the audience's responsiveness. Of the first one for the season, recently given, the Globe's reviewer wrote:

"A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience" as if that, too, were a type. It isn't so any longer.

"A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same programme will be repeated to-morrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

"Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children."

The reviewer reports also that "the Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horseplay went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr. Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

"But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's 'L'Ariesienne,' suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted."

But such a work is carefully chosen from the most timid and anaemic of contemporary production, leaving absolutely unheard the composers who represent the true spirit of our time.

Raymond Havens

Former Providence Pianist Who Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall on Tuesday.

Raymond Haven, the young pianis who, a native of this city, has made a enviable mark both in America and Europe, by his unusual talents and will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening, ha appeared a number of times with th great orchestra elsewhere, but as chanc has it, he has never been a symphon soloist in Providence. The concert chosen for this occasion will be that Liszt in E-flat No. 1.

Pierre Monteux will open the conce with Schumann's First Symphony whi the composed named the "Spring" symphony. Its opening movement, aboun ing with bright and resilient rhythms, i slow movement (a love song), its fanta the scherzo, and the swift and charming finale, all hold a particular place in the hearts of those familiar with symphonic music.

A notable number by Debussy will be his "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," which was inspired by the poem of that name by Stephen Mallarme. This music contains flute passages of especial beauty, representing the faun. Mr. Monteux, a close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores, is considered one of the most authoritative and also the finest interpreter of Debussy's music.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, constructed on the characteristic dance rhythms of Spain, is a piece of particularly brilliant and colorful orchestration, likewise with many important solos for the various instruments of the orchestra.

PROV JOURNAL - FEB 26

SUNDAY CONCERT STIRS AUDIENCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Enthralls Auditors.

Hundreds of music lovers who thronged City theater Sunday afternoon were lifted from the cares and monotony of everyday life by harmonic strains from classics by famous composers played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, that talented band of musicians who never fail to receive a cordial welcome from Brocktonians.

The program was an attractive one, and the numbers were accorded hearty applause. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, was obliged to reappear several times at the close of the program to acknowledge the appreciation which was expressed.

Most delightful among the selections was "Lalo," the concerto for violoncello with orchestra, in which the solo work was done by Jean Bedetti, who was favorably received in this city last season, when he played to a concert given in High school hall by the Brockton Teachers' association. He received several enthusiastic encores, re-appearing four times to acknowledge the plaudits. The concerto included: Prelude, Allegro Maestoso, Intermezzo, Introduction, Rondo.

The program also comprised Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 7; Allegro con brio, Andante con moto, Allegro, Trio, Allegro; Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde;" and Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Preludes," (after Lamartine) by Liszt.

BROCKTON TIMES FEB 27.

rom FEB 12 1922

AGLE

Brooklyn, New York

Another Week's Reactions

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY

SPECULATION regarding the immediate future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be laid to rest. Pierre Monteux has arranged with the organization's directors to continue as conductor for at least two years more. Now perhaps the friends of Toscanini and the advocates of Felix Weingartner will be silent.

The trouble with us in New York is that we have not looked upon the Boston situation with the eyes of Boston. All that we have seen is that audiences attending the ten annual concerts in Carnegie Hall have been slimmer and less enthusiastic than were those which congregated of other years to listen to the artistic ministrations of Karl Muck. In addition, of course, we have universally believed that Mr. Monteux did not succeed in filling more than one of his predecessor's shoes.

In Boston, on the other hand, the audiences have not diminished, nor have they accepted a metropolitan verdict with regard to Mr. Monteux. In him they have had a stout faith since the beginning. They have stuck to the Monteux colors and they have discerned that the finest gentleman among conductors is also a musician of parts.

Mr. Monteux's role in Boston has been difficult to play. He was greeted by a disorganized orchestra, he stepped into the place vacated by a conducting genius. Possibly we in New York, with our usual indifference to a situation, asked the impossible. At least we drew comparisons that were not altogether fair. In the strictest sense of the musical word we were right; however, an allowance might well have been much to the point.

Today the Boston Orchestra is a marvel of tonal quality. Under Mr. Monteux it has not succeeded in playing the classics so well as under the conductors of former years. Mr. Monteux is not a classicist. In fact, when he first directed the orchestra his readings of Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Haydn were always of the nature of weather reports: Cloudy, or at least partly cloudy. But they have improved, an improvement revealed in his performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in Carnegie Hall a week ago. Richard Wagner found much to praise in the Beethoven he heard in Paris 70 years ago. Now we also are learning that an earnest Frenchman may endow a Beethoven symphony with eloquence.

If Mr. Monteux is just beginning to see the classic rays that mark the classic dawn, he has been almost without rival as an interpreter of modern music. The younger Frenchmen and all the Russians are grist to his mill. There hasn't been a good performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or" since Mr. Monteux departed from the opera house, and it would be interesting at least to hear how much color he would reveal in a reading of "Sniegourochka." One may well fancy his doing an utterly different labor than has been done by Mr. Bodanzky.

FROM FEB 12 1922

SUN,

Baltimore, Md.

Monteux Signs New Contract As Conductor

Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Remain Two More Years.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting February 8, voted unanimously to extend the contract of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor, to include the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. After consulting with the conductor last evening, the board secured Mr. Monteux's acceptance of their offer.

Mr. Monteux is now fulfilling his third season at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The new standards which he has set, and the traditional ones which he has maintained, are now eloquently apparent. As an authoritative and finely appreciative interpreter of the established repertory, and as a discriminating pioneer of the music of today, he has given the Boston Symphony concerts a new interest and additional importance in the musical world.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra owes a large part of its beauty of ensemble to the creative effort and executive skill of its conductor, Pierre Monteux's genius has perhaps also found its highest fruition at this post. Yet, before he came to the Boston orchestra, he had won an enviable name as conductor both here and abroad. First publicly prominent in chamber music activities in Paris, he soon found his true vocation and became a familiar figure presiding over the Concerts Colonne, the Opéra, the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, the Châtelet and Odéon, and his own "Concerts Monteux" in Paris, also the orchestras of the Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres, in London, the opera houses of Berlin, Vienna and Budapest.

After active service in the war, he first came to this country at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, and was subsequently engaged as a principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Company. In the autumn of 1918 he was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but was unable to obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening concerts of that season. The following year the offer was repeated and accepted.

NEWS, FEB 12 1922

Detroit, Mich.

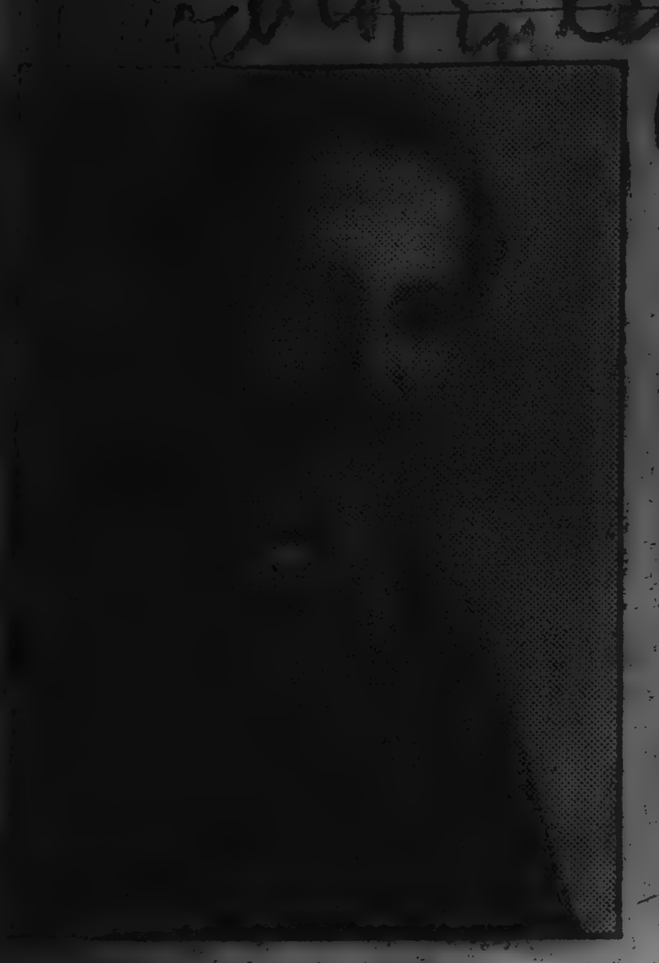
BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEAD TO STAY 2 MORE YEARS

BOSTON, Feb. 11.—Pierre Monteaux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will remain in that position for two more years. The trustees of the orchestra, by unanimous vote, have extended his contract to May, 1924, when by mutual agreement he will complete his service of five years as conductor and will be succeeded by another

[illegible] AUDIENCE [illegible] AT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT

Monteux, Conductor, and Bedetti, Soloist, Are Fairly Overwhelmed With Applause by Admirers.

Brockton Enterprise Feb 27/22



PIERRE MONTEUX.

JEAN BEDETTI.

TWO men were nearly overwhelmed with applause at the concert given in City Theatre on Sunday afternoon by the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra. One was Pierre Monteux, conductor; the other was Jean Bedetti, violoncello virtuoso. In each instance the tribute was well merited, an audience of more than 1200—there was not a seat vacant in the playhouse and many were standing—offering spontaneous tribute to artistry which makes mere words inadequate to convey any conception of its appeal.

Occupying an obscure seat and applauding with the same fervor as the hundreds from Brockton and nearby towns, also music lovers from Boston, was a third man whose personality, energy and ability also counted greatly in making the concert the most notable on record here, George J. Judd, assistant business manager.

Brockton has heard and applauded musicians of international reputation in times past. It nearly filled the same theatre a year ago, in the teeth of a howling blizzard, when Monteux's men made their first visit, but on no occasion during the past 20 years has there been so many present to acclaim musical talent as on Sunday.

It surpassed even the first night of George Sawyer Dunham's never-to-be-forgotten "Requiem," sung as a memorial to the Shoe City's sons who gave their lives in the world war.

Not even the prestige and matchless performance of Boston's superb orchestra, if unsupported by intelligent preliminary work, would have called out such an assemblage, hence the mention of Judd.

Mayor Keith Hears Concert.

Mayor Roger Keith and Mrs. Keith, accompanied by the mayor's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Horace A. Keith, occupied one of the boxes. In another were Mr. and Mrs. J. Joseph Cahill, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Doyle and Mr. and Mrs. E. F. O'Neill. Delegations came from the Bridgewater Normal school and Howard Seminary at West Bridgewater. Members of the city council, club leaders, representatives of various musical clubs, musicians and patrons of music also were noted. Up in the second balcony every seat was occupied and some were standing and there was no more enthusiastic group than a party of Italians present to hear and cheer one of their countrymen from a province in Italy which has a large representation in Brockton.

The musicians came here by special train, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock. Nearly 125 were aboard, including Mr. Monteux and his 100 musicians, the orchestra being intact, exactly as it plays in Symphony Hall, except for the organist.

Beginning at about 3:15 o'clock they played for two hours, first Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, four movements; then Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and as the closing number the Liszt symphonic poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes."

With the Gallery Leading.

Monteux was received with applause. When the symphony was finished he was called again and again to acknowledge the sustained expression of appreciation which arose from all parts of the house, the gallery leading.

After the Liszt number, which begins with a solemnity that is the kernel of the chief theme and which undergoes various transformations, robust, gentle, sentimental, pastoral and finally the great martial outburst that brings listeners almost to their feet, Monteux was recalled four times, not a person stirring for fully five minutes after the music had ceased.

He was asked later how this demonstration had impressed him. "There is a difference in audiences," he said. "This one was stimulating. We are pleased if they liked the programme. It has been a wonderful afternoon for us all."

Bedetti's triumph was nearly as pronounced. In the orchestra they call him "the beloved leader of the 'cello section." Bedetti is a big man physically—and bigger as an artist. Earlier in the season he played for the Brockton Teachers' Association, and the favorable impression made on that occasion was evidenced by the friendly wave of applause which swept up from the audience.

He selected Edouard Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, which exacts every resource and all the technique of the performer. With masterly skill Monteux shaded orchestral effects in a manner which heightened the marvellous flood of music which Bedetti's lightning fingers and skilled bowing drew from the instrument. Tenderness, sadness, animation, brilliancy and haunting sweetness were woven into a musical idyll that will long be remembered.

Thrice was Bedetti called to the front to bow low, and the conductor was first to clasp his hand in congratulation when he had finished.

The work of the orchestra as a whole was a revelation to those who heard it for the first time and a new inspiration to old admirers, the 100 men responding to Monteux as the violin answers to the master hand of Kreisler.

Philip Hale, who has heard many, has said: "After all, there is but one Symphony orchestra." Some other admirers of the orchestra, endowed with lesser competence as critics but with a sincerity second to none, echoed it.

Will they come again?

"Our two concerts in your city in as many years, and the remarkably cordial spirit evinced here make it practically certain the symphony concert will be an annual event," said Mr. Judd.

"Good!" answers Brockton.

FROM FEB 16 1922

POST DISPATCH

St. Louis

Boston Symphony Contract Signed.

Special to the Post-Dispatch.

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has signed a contract to continue in that position during the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. This disposes of rumors that the French conductor might, after this year, give place to Arturo Toscanini or Felix Weingartner.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From FEB 16 1922

EVENING MAIL

New York City

TODAY IN BOSTON

By J. E. CHAMBERLIN

Boston, Today.—Boston, supposed by some people to be the most musical city in the Union, and certainly a city which has a record for musical culture, as cities go, is "as operaless as Kankakee or Medicine Hat."

So says H. T. Parker, our leading music critic. He bases his comment on the fact that while opera is given in New York and Chicago and echoed in other cities, the singers come to Boston only in a [illegible] sort of concerts.

[illegible] has certainly been so all [illegible] this season. Boston has [illegible] usual wealth of orchestral [illegible] through the Symphony (for [illegible]

Boston's decline is certainly emphasized in this regard. What is to be done about it? Mr. Parker suggests that the Chicago Opera Company divide its twenty weeks of annual existence between Chicago and Boston. He advises the Boston people to get busy and obtain this concession.

Whether there is a hint from Chicago behind this suggestion I cannot say. Perhaps Chicago has no idea of giving up any share of its opera. Perhaps it might not be unwilling to be helped out a little. At all events the Boston public, opera hungry, would grab at the chance.

M. Monteux certainly has made a success of his two years with the orchestra. Diverse nationalities are harmoniously blended in one artistic brotherhood. M. Monteux is very popular both with his player and with the public. And he and his orchestra are well liked—praised, exalted—by the critics everywhere, except in New York. New York, for that matter, has never seemed to like the Boston organization.

Providence

R. I.

~~News~~ Journal

ISSUE OF Feb 19

Here and There in the Realm of Music

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the announcement of Pierre Monteux's re-engagement for two years was made, the Symphony Hall audience paid him a graceful tribute by standing and applauding as he entered. The orchestra stood while the conductor bowed his acknowledgements.

Providence

R. I.

~~News~~ Journal

ISSUE OF Feb 19

The fourth Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season will be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening, Feb. 28. The programme will open with the First Symphony in B-flat major of Schumann, which, written in the first year of the composer's marriage, abounds with the zest and romance of youth and is often called the "Spring" Symphony. Debussy will be represented by his Prelude to Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun." This work, which has gone probably farther than any other toward making known the recent French master's genius, is considered to have an especially fine and authoritative interpreter in his compatriot, Pierre Monteux. The closing number will be the Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the celebrated Russian composer, an especially brilliant work, with many fine solo passages and characteristic rhythms.

The soloist at this concert will be Raymond Havens, the young American pianist who has appeared with the orchestra in several cities. Although Mr. Havens is a former Providence man and has given concerts here, the fact that he has never before appeared at the local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this occasion a matter of keen interest for many. He will play the Concerto of Liszt in E-flat major, No. 1.

FEB 26 192

New York City

Gabriel Pierné's incidental music to Pierre Loti's play "Ramuntcho," comprising an overture on [illegible] themes of Biscay and a "Basque Rhapsody," has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and announced as for the first time at those concerts.

ESTABLISHED FEB 18 1922

From

The Independent

New York City

On January 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time here the second symphony of Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer now in this country. The composition had a certain dignity and serious aspiration to commend it; but, like so much of the music devoted to the publication of melodic distortions and harmonic complications, it seemed never to arrive anywhere. These "long-tailed birds of paradise that float through heaven and cannot light" are excessively wearisome. One burns with the desire that they will sit down somewhere, and possibly keep quiet. There is ugliness enough in the world without making more and gravely calling it art.

Providence

R. I.

News

ISSUE OF Feb 22

A brilliant programme has been compiled by Pierre Monteux for the Boston Symphony concert, which is the fourth and last but one of the Providence season and will take place in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Feb. 28, at 8:15.

The news has been eagerly welcomed that Pierre Monteux has agreed to remain two more years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following the present season, which will extend his term of conductorship to five years. The invitation was extended by the board of trustees of the orchestra, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is president, last week. In the opinion of the countless admirers of Mr. Monteux among the patrons of the concerts everywhere, his acceptance was a manifold fortune.

Mr. Monteux will open the Providence programme with the first symphony of Schumann in B-flat major, which, abounding with the romance and zest of youth, is known as the "spring" symphony. He will also play Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," probably the most popular score of the recent French master, which is said to find and inspired and particularly authoritative interpreter in the illustrious conductor. Closing number of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," one of the most gorgeously colorful and rhythmically exciting of Russian scores, which contains many notable solo passages for the various instruments of the orchestra.

Springfield

MASS.

~~Republican~~ Union

ISSUE OF Feb 10

Monteux Again Leads Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb 9—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor for a term of two years.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

FEB 23 1922

Franz Shreker (or is it Schreker? Both forms are used in the books), though born in Monaco, is regarded to-day in Germany, a country he has long made his home, as one of the foremost of the younger German composers. Shreker has been a voluminous writer for the stage and for the concert room. And yet in this country his name is almost unknown. Last week in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time there his "Prelude to a Drama." In the Boston Herald, Philip Hale comments interestingly on the piece.

Franz Schreker has been for some years a hotly discussed man. By some he is extolled to the skies; by others he is loathed; feared as Antichrist in music. Before this prelude was played we knew him here only by one song, which was ineffectively and uninterestingly ugly. Those who yesterday anticipated the worst must have been disappointed. This prelude is often noisy, but it is not a wholly fearsome thing. When it has melodic lines in the manner of Puccini it even gives pleasure. When Schreker composed this overture in 1913 he was thirty-five years old, so he could not bring his youth as an excuse for employing a huge orchestra and scoring so thickly that some of the instruments were superfluous. If he had not used them they never would be missed.

There is no programme, but from the music it would appear that the hero of this unwritten drama had a stormy time of it, without cheering amorous episodes, and just as it was reasonable to suppose that his ending was, if not happy, at least peaceful, the final measures hinted at tragedy. There are stir- [illegible] frenzy most of the time; that as a consequence there is not one great overwhelming climax. It is the fate of works like this, which require much rehearsal, to be performed, then put on the shelf for two seasons, usually longer before they are taken down, if they are taken down at all and dusted. A work of this character should be played again at the succeeding concert. This would be only fair to composer, audience, conductor, and orchestra.

New York might add the earnest wish that Mr. Monteux will do the prelude in this city when the Boston orchestra comes here again next month. The work was also given last week in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Providence

R. I.

News

ISSUE OF Feb 25

RAYMOND HAVENS TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 28, at 8:15. The notable soloist on this occasion will be Raymond Havens, the young American pianist, who was born and studied in Providence, and who has made so high a name for himself by his concerts in the cities of this country and Europe. It so happens that Mr. Havens has heretofore not appeared with the orchestra in Providence, although he has done so in several other cities. He will be heard at this concert in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat, No. 1.

Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat, called by the composer the "Spring" Symphony, and especially beloved by all who are fond of symphonic music, will be the first number on this programme.

The "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, one of the best-known numbers of the modern French school of music, will also be played. A close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores, Pierre Monteux, is considered to be one of the finest and most authoritative interpreters of his music. This number features famous solo passages for the flute (which represents the faun). Solos of interest by the various virtuosos of the orchestra are also to be heard in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which will close this concert. Constructed on characteristic Spanish rhythms this music includes Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song and Fandango of the Asturias.

FROM

New York City 1922

Pierre Monteux having been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as showing his popularity in Boston, the increased demand for symphonic music is instanced. In addition to the regular series of twenty-four pairs of concerts, a series of five Monday night performance has been begun, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard have been increased from eight to nine. There have been nine concerts given in neighboring cities. A great desire on the part of colleges to hear the orchestra has been shown, and besides two concerts at Harvard there have been others at Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

[77]

LARGEST AUDIENCE ON RECORD AT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S CONCERT

Monteux, Conductor, and Bedetti, Soloist, Are Fairly Overwhelmed With Applause by Admirers.

Brockton Enterprise Feb 27/22

PIERRE MONTEUX,

JEAN BEDETTI.

TWO men were nearly overwhelmed with applause at the concert given in City Theatre on Sunday afternoon by the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra. One was Pierre Monteux, conductor; the other was Jean Bedetti, violoncello virtuoso. In each instance the tribute was well merited, an audience of more than 1200—there was not a seat vacant in the playhouse and many were standing—offering spontaneous tribute to artistry which makes mere words inadequate to convey any conception of its appeal.

Occupying an obscure seat and applauding with the same fervor as the hundreds from Brockton and nearby towns, also music lovers from Boston, was a third man whose personality, energy and ability also counted greatly in making the concert the most notable on record here, George J. Judd, assistant business manager.

Brockton has heard and applauded musicians of international reputation in times past. It nearly filled the same theatre a year ago, in the teeth of a howling blizzard, when Monteux's men made their first visit, but on no occasion during the past 20 years has there been so many present to acclaim musical talent as on Sunday.

It surpassed even the first night of George Sawyer Dunham's never-to-be-forgotten "Requiem," sung as a memorial to the Shoe City's sons who gave their lives in the world war.

Not even the prestige and matchless performance of Boston's superb orchestra, if unsupported by intelligent preliminary work, would have called out such an assemblage, hence the mention of Judd.

✣

Mayor Keith Hears Concert.

Mayor Roger Keith and Mrs. Keith, accompanied by the mayor's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Horace A. Keith, occupied one of the boxes. In another were Mr. and Mrs. J. Joseph Cahill, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Doyle and Mr. and Mrs. E. F. O'Neill. Delegations came from the Bridgewater Normal school and Howard Seminary at West Bridgewater. Members of the city council, club leaders, representatives of various musical clubs, musicians and patrons of music also were noted. Up in the second balcony every seat was occupied and some were standing and there was no more enthusiastic group than a party of Italians present to hear and cheer one of their countrymen from a province in Italy which has a large representation in Brockton.

The musicians came here by special train, arriving shortly after 2 o'clock. Nearly 125 were aboard, including Mr. Monteux and his 100 musicians, the orchestra being intact, exactly as it plays in Symphony Hall, except for the organist.

Beginning at about 3:15 o'clock they played for two hours, first Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, four movements; then Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde" and as the closing number the Liszt symphonic poem, No. 3, "Les Preludes."

✣

With the Gallery Leading.

Monteux was received with applause. When the symphony was finished he was called again and again to acknowledge the sustained expression of appreciation which arose from all parts of the house, the gallery leading.

After the Liszt number, which begins with a solemnity that is the kernel of the chief theme and which undergoes various transformations, robust, gentle, sentimental, pastoral and finally the great martial outburst that brings listeners almost to their feet, Monteux was recalled four times, not a person stirring for fully five minutes after the music had ceased.

He was asked later how this demonstration had impressed him. "There is a difference in audiences," he said. "This one was stimulating. We are pleased if they liked the programme. It has been a wonderful afternoon for us all."

Bedetti's triumph was nearly as pronounced. In the orchestra they call him "the beloved leader of the 'cello section." Bedetti is a big man physically—and bigger as an artist. Earlier in the season he played for the Brockton Teachers' Association, and the favorable impression made on that occasion was evidenced by the friendly wave of applause which swept up from the audience.

He selected Edouard Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, which exacts every resource and all the technique of the performer. With masterly skill Monteux shaded orchestral effects in a manner which heightened the marvellous flood of music which Bedetti's lightning fingers and skilled bowing drew from the instrument. Tenderness, sadness, animation, brilliancy and haunting sweetness were woven into a musical idyll that will long be remembered.

Thrice was Bedetti called to the front to bow low, and the conductor was first to clasp his hand in congratulation when he had finished.

The work of the orchestra as a whole was a revelation to those who heard it for the first time and a new inspiration to old admirers, the 100 men responding to Monteux as the violin answers to the master hand of Kreisler.

Philip Hale, who has heard many, has said: "After all, there is but one Symphony orchestra." Some other admirers of the orchestra, endowed with lesser competence as critics but with a sincerity second to none, echoed it.

Will they come again?

"Our two concerts in your city in as many years, and the remarkably cordial spirit evinced here make it practically certain the symphony concert will be an annual event," said Mr. Judd.

"Good!" answers Brockton.

FROM FEB 16 1922

POST DISPATCH

St. Louis

Boston Symphony Contract Signed.

Special to the Post-Dispatch.

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has signed a contract to continue in that position during the seasons of 1922-23 and 1923-24. This disposes of rumors that the French conductor might, after this year, give place to Arturo Toscanini or Felix Weingartner.

ESTABLISHED 1881 FEB 16 1922

From

EVENING MAIL

New York City

TODAY IN BOSTON

By J. E. CHAMBERLIN

Boston, Today.—Boston, supposed by some people to be the most musical city in the Union, and certainly a city which has a record for musical culture, as cities go, is "as operaless as Kankakee or Medicine Hat."

So says H. T. Parker, our leading music critic. He bases his complaint on the fact that while opera is given in New York and Chicago and echoed in other cities, the singers come to Boston only in a skimpy sort of concerts.

It has certainly been so all through this season. Boston has had its usual wealth of orchestral music through the Symphony (for which, as conductor, M. Monteux has been re-engaged for a further period of two years), but in the matter of voices it has had nothing but a few concerts, and these not

Boston's decline is certainly emphasized in this regard. What is to be done about it? Mr. Parker suggests that the Chicago Opera Company divide its twenty weeks of annual existence between Chicago and Boston. He advises the Boston people to get busy and obtain this concession.

Whether there is a hint from Chicago behind this suggestion I cannot say. Perhaps Chicago has no idea of giving up any share of its opera. Perhaps it might not be unwilling to be helped out a little. At all events the Boston public, opera hungry, would grab at the chance.

M. Monteux certainly has made a success of his two years with the orchestra. Diverse nationalities are harmoniously blended in one artistic brotherhood. M. Monteux is very popular both with his player and with the public. And he and his orchestra are well liked—praised, exalted—by the critics everywhere, except in New York. New York, for that matter, has never seemed to like the Boston organization.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
Journal Feb 19

Here and There in the Realm of Music

At the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after the announcement of Pierre Monteux's re-engagement for two years was made, the Symphony Hall audience paid him a graceful tribute by standing and applauding as he entered. The orchestra stood while the conductor bowed his acknowledgements.

* * *

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
Journal Feb 19

The fourth Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season will be given in Infantry Hall a week from Tuesday evening, Feb. 28. The programme will open with the First Symphony in B-flat major of Schumann, which, written in the first year of the composer's marriage, abounds with the zest and romance of youth and is often called the "Spring" Symphony. Debussy will be represented by his Prelude to Mallarme's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun." This work, which has gone probably farther than any other toward making known the recent French master's genius, is considered to have an especially fine and authoritative interpreter in his compatriot, Pierre Monteux. The closing number will be the Caprice on Spanish Themes by Rimsky-Korsakoff, the celebrated Russian composer, an especially brilliant work, with many fine solo passages and characteristic rhythms.

The soloist at this concert will be Raymond Havens, the young American pianist who has appeared with the orchestra in several cities. Although Mr. Havens is a former Providence man and has given concerts here, the fact that he has never before appeared at the local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make this occasion a matter of keen interest for many. He will play the Concerto of Liszt in E-flat major, No. 1.

FEB

New York City

Gabriel Pierné's incidental music to Pierre Loti's play "Ramuntcho," comprising an overture on folk themes of Biscay and a "Basque Rhapsody," has been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and announced as for the first time at those concerts.

ESTABLISHED 18 FEB 18 1922

From
The Independent
New York City

On January 2 the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time here the second symphony of Karol Szymanowski, a Polish composer now in this country. The composition had a certain dignity and serious aspiration to commend it; but, like so much of the music devoted to the publication of melodic distortions and harmonic complications, it seemed never to arrive anywhere. These "long-tailed birds of paradise that float through heaven and cannot light" are excessively wearisome. One burns with the desire that they will sit down somewhere, and possibly keep quiet. There is ugliness enough in the world without making more and gravely calling it art.

frenzy most of the time; that as a consequence there is not one great overwhelming climax. It is the fate of works like this, which require much rehearsal, to be performed, then put on the shelf for two seasons, usually longer before they are taken down, if they are taken down at all and dusted. A work of this character should be played again at the succeeding concert. This would be only fair to composer, audience, conductor, and orchestra.

New York might add the earnest wish that Mr. Monteux will do the prelude in this city when the Boston orchestra comes here again next month. The work was also given last week in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
[illegible]

A brilliant programme has been compiled by Pierre Monteux for the Boston Symphony concert, which is the fourth and last but one of the Providence season and will take place in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Feb. 28, at 8:15.

The news has been eagerly welcomed that Pierre Monteux has agreed to remain two more years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, following the present season, which will extend his term of conductorship to five years. The invitation was extended by the board of trustees of the orchestra, of which Judge Frederick P. Cabot is president, last week. In the opinion of the countless admirers of Mr. Monteux among the patrons of the concerts everywhere, his acceptance was a manifold fortune.

Mr. Monteux will open the Providence programme with the first symphony of Schumann in B-flat major, which, abounding with the romance and zest of youth, is known as the "spring" symphony. He will also play Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," probably the most popular score of the recent French master, which is said to find and inspired and particularly authoritative interpreter in the illustrious conductor. Closing number of this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," one of the most gorgeously colorful and rhythmically exciting of Russian scores, which contains many notable solo passages for the various instruments of the orchestra.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF

RAYMOND HAVENS TO BE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 28, at 8:15. The notable soloist on this occasion will be Raymond Havens, the young American pianist, who was born and studied in Providence, and who has made so high a name for himself by his concerts in the cities of this country and Europe. It so happens that Mr. Havens has heretofore not appeared with the orchestra in Providence, although he has done so in several other cities. He will be heard at this concert in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat, No. 1.

Schumann's First Symphony in B-flat, called by the composer the "Spring" Symphony, and especially beloved by all who are fond of symphonic music, will be the first number on this programme.

The "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy, one of the best-known numbers of the modern French school of music, will also be played. A close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores, Pierre Monteux, is considered to be one of the finest and most authoritative interpreters of his music. This number features famous solo passages for the flute (which represents the faun). Solos of interest by the various virtuosos of the orchestra are also to be heard in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which will close this concert. Constructed on characteristic Spanish rhythms, this music includes Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song and Fandango of the Asturias.

Springfield
MASS.
Republican
ISSUE OF
[illegible]

Monteux Again Leads Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb 9—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that Pierre Monteux had been re-engaged as conductor for a term of two years.

EVENING GLOBE

New York City

FEB 23 1922

Franz Shreker (or is it Schreker? Both forms are used in the books), though born in Monaco, is regarded to-day in Germany, a country he has long made his home, as one of the foremost of the younger German composers. Shreker has been a voluminous writer for the stage and for the concert room. And yet in this country his name is almost unknown. Last week in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed for the first time there his "Prelude to a Drama." In the Boston Herald, Philip Hale comments interestingly on the piece.

Franz Schreker has been for some years a hotly discussed man. By some he is extolled to the skies; by others he is loathed; feared as Antichrist in music. Before this prelude was played we knew him here only by one song, which was ineffectively and uninterestingly ugly. Those who yesterday anticipated the worst must have been disappointed. This prelude is often noisy, but it is not a wholly fearsome thing. When it has melodic lines in the manner of Puccini it even gives pleasure. When Schreker composed this overture in 1913 he was thirty-five years old, so he could not bring his youth as an excuse for employing a huge orchestra and scoring so thickly that some of the instruments were superfluous. If he had not used them they never would be missed.

There is no programme, but from the music it would appear that the hero of this unwritten drama had a stormy time of it, without cheering amorous episodes, and just as it was reasonable to suppose that his ending was, if not happy, at least peaceful, the final measures hinted at tragedy. There are stirring pages. There are exciting climaxes. The trouble is that the music is full

---

New York City

Pierre Monteux having been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as showing his popularity in Boston, the increased demand for symphonic music is instanced. In addition to the regular series of twenty-four pairs of concerts, a series of five Monday night performance has been begun, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard have been increased from eight to nine. There have been nine concerts given in neighboring cities. A great desire on the part of colleges to hear the orchestra has been shown, and besides two concerts at Harvard there have been others at Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

Providence
R. I.
~~News~~
ISSUE OF Journal
Feb 26

When Children Hear Symphonies

Providence musicians have occasionally expressed the hope that some time arrangements might be made to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give one of its children's concerts in this city. A series of them is now an established feature of the Boston season, and their popularity is unquestioned. Yet they offer problems both of programme-making and the audience's responsiveness. Of the first one for the season, recently given, the Globe's reviewer wrote:

"A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience" as if that, too, were a type. It isn't so any longer.

"A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 3 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same programme will be repeated to-morrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

"Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children."

The reviewer reports also that "the Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters and more or less horseplay went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr. Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

"But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's L'Arlesienne, suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted."

But such a work is carefully chosen from the most timid and anaemic of contemporary production, leaving absolutely unheard the composers who represent the true spirit of our time.

"Dying is the privilege of the weary. The present day composers refuse to die. They have realized the necessity of banding together and fighting for the right of each individual to secure a fair and free presentation of his work. It is out of such a collective will that the International Composers' Guild was born.

"The aim of the International Composers' Guild is to centralize the works of the day, to group them in programmes intelligently and organically constructed, and, with the disinterested help of singers and instrumentalists, to present these works in such a way as to reveal their fundamental spirit.

"The International Composers' Guild disapproves of all 'isms,' denies the existence of schools, recognizes only the individual."

The guild gave its first concert in Greenwich Village last Sunday evening, but somehow or other the metropolitan critics were elsewhere.

Providence
R. I.
~~News~~
ISSUE OF Journal
Feb 26

Raymond Havens

FROM FEB 28 1922
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Monteux Re-Engaged For Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux having been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as showing his popularity in Boston, the increased demand for symphonic music is instanced. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts, a series of five Monday night performances has been begun, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard have been increased from eight to nine. There have been nine concerts given in neighboring cities. A great desire on the part of colleges to hear the orchestra has been shown, and besides two concerts at Harvard there have been others at Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

For the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 10, and Saturday evening, March 11, at which Mr. McCormack will assist and Mr. Loeffler's new pieces will be heard for the first time, Mr. Monteux sets the following programme:

Haffner Serenade .... Mozart
(Violin Solo by Mr. Burgin)
Air from the Cantata, "Mein Liebe Jesus ist Verloren"—Air from the Cantata, "Sie Werden aus Saba alle Kommen." .... Bach
Mr. McCormack
Irish Fantasias for Tenor Voice and Orchestra ("The Host of the Air"; "The Fiddler of Dooney"; "Caitilin ni Vallachain," after Poems by Yeats). .... Loeffler
Two Fragments ("Romeo Alone" and "Queen Mab") from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" .... Berlioz

Familiar pieces, clear, candid and stimulating to hear, fill, as they should, the programme for the fourth of the supplementary Symphony Concerts, on Monday evening, March 13, in Symphony Hall, viz.:

Symphony in E minor, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" .... Saint-Saëns
Concerto for Violoncello .... Lalo
Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti.
Overture "Leonore," No. 3 .... [illegible]

TRANS. MAR 1.

FROM MAR 2 1922
Evening Globe
New York

New music by American composers performed last week by orchestras in other cities included a concerto in three movements for organ with orchestra, No. 2, in A major, by Eric De Lamarter, given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the organ, and Waltzes for Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In view of the orchestras giving these works, their first performance, it is interesting to note that Mr. De Lamarter lives in Chicago and that Mr. Hill lives in Cambridge, across the Charles from Boston. Mr. De Lamarter, who at present is assistant conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, and organist and music director at the Fourth Presbyterian Church there, completed his concerto in September, 1921. The orchestration calls for two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bells, and strings.

Of the waltzes by Mr. Hill, which were composed for piano in 1920 and arranged for orchestra by December of the next year, Philip Hale wrote in part as follows in the Boston Herald: "A high compliment was paid them unwittingly by a young woman in the corrider after the concert: 'Why, there wasn't one I could dance to.' These fleeting melodies, often fragments, often mere suggestions of waltz measures, are harmonized and orchestrated with true French skill. While there is an avoidance of the obvious, this avoidance is not painfully achieved. The succession of moods, languor, alternating with gayety; these are as natural as speech."

Symphony Concert Tonight at 8

The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give the sixth of its series of nine concerts this evening at 8 o'clock in Sanders Theatre. Nina Koshetz, soprano, will be accompanied by the orchestra in a number of selections.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at Kent's University Bookstore.

The program is as follows:

Symphony in C major No. 7, Schubert
Waltzes for Orchestra, Hill
Song for Orchestra, Hill
Act from Opera "The Czar's Bride", Rimsky Korsakoff
Song without words, Prokofiev
Revery and Dance from the Opera "The Fair of Sorotchin", Moussorgsky
Overture "The Flying Dutchman", Wagner

CRIMSON. MAR 2

Out of Russia — Always Some One New

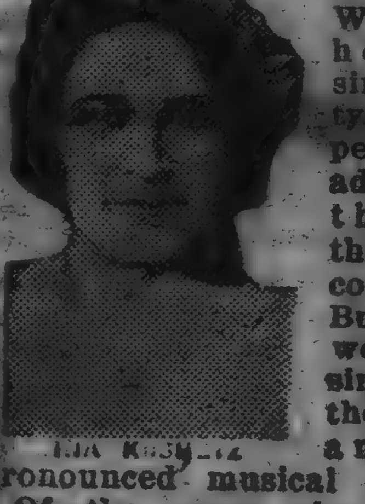
Nina Koshetz (Photograph by Elzin)
Singer This Week With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TRANS. MAR. 2

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Russian music, in part performed for the first time in the United States, takes this week's Symphony program out of the beaten path.

Mme. Nina Koshetz, a Russian opera singer, is also making her Boston debut at this 17th pair of concerts. She is a dramatic soprano, voluminous as any Wagnerian heroine; a singer of the type that appears to better advantage on the operatic than on the concert stage. But she is a well-schooled singer, nevertheless, and an artist of pronounced musical intelligence.



NINA KOSHETZ

Of the songs she chose, the revery and dance from Moussorgsky's "Fair of Sorotchinsk" was the most enjoyable. It suited her voice and manner best, and by the time she sang it she had recovered from the shock of facing the critical matinee audience, which is composed mostly of women. She was warmly applauded at the close, and she in turn applauded the orchestra.

Two fragments from Lazare Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," were given their first American hearing yesterday. Saminsky is a young Russian composer now living in New York. The ballet is typical new Russian music, enriched with Hebrew folk-songs and religious melodies. Another young Russian now over here, Serge Prokofiev, was represented on the program by a strange and melancholy song without words, performed by Mme. Koshetz. The effect was funereal. The robust soprano also sang an air from one of the Rimsky-Korsakoff operas, "The Czar's Bride."

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra shared one of the most spontaneous ovations of the season after the splendid performance of the Brahms Symphony in C minor, the first number on the program. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture is the final number.

ADVTSR. MAR. 4.

NINA KOSHETZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Gives Excellent Performance of Brahm's First Symphony

By FRED J. McISAAC.

A really excellent performance of Brahms' first symphony was the feature of yesterday's Symphony program. This great work had evidently been very carefully prepared, and Monteux distinguished himself by a powerful, clean cut and successful performance. I don't remember ever having heard the monumental finale with its thunderous climaxes better played.

The soloist was Nina Koshetz, a Russian mezzo soprano, who has been singing with the Chicago Opera. Monteux's flair for things Russian was evidently responsible for her appearance, and she sang three airs little known in this country.

The unfamiliarity of our audiences with Russian music has allowed quite a few singers to charge indifferent work to the exigencies of the score and text, but Mme. Koshetz could not conceal her mediocrity.

She has an unfortunate stage appearance. She was evidently scared to death, because she sang the Rimsky Korsakoff air from the "Tsar's Bride" almost entirely out of tune, and with a quality of tone which would have disgraced a novice. The very effective Moussorgsky song from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," which closed her portion of the entertainment, was her best contribution, as she had conquered her nervousness by that time. But even then the quality of tone produced was very indifferent.

Interesting Oriental music were fragments from the ballet, "Lament of Rachel," by a young Russian, Saminsky, now living in New York. He is a pupil of Rimsky Korsakoff and he captured a lot of his master's gift for Oriental coloring. An excellent performance of the Flying Dutchman Overture closed the program.

FOURTH EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the extra series of five newly instituted this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall a week from Monday evening, March 13, at 8:15 o'clock.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, will open the fine program on this occasion with Dvorak's Fifth Symphony "From the New World." Jean Bedetti, the celebrated 'cellist, who leads that section of the great orchestra, will appear as soloist in the concerto by Lalo.

McCORMACK SYMPHONY SOLOIST

John McCormack will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 10 and 11. He will take the voice part in Three Irish Fantasies, which Charles Martin Loeffler has recently written to the texts of the poet Yeats, using Gaelic folk tunes.

[illegible] MAR 4

RUSSIAN MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Nina Koshetz Sings First Time in Boston

Russian novelties were sandwiched on yesterday's Symphony concert program between the orthodox Brahms of the C minor Symphony and the rather crude early Wagner of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, producing a curiously assorted concert. Nina Koshetz, a Russian soprano, heard this season with the Chicago Opera, sang for the first time in Boston. Her numbers were all new to local concert goers, though the arias from Rimsky Korsakoy's opera, "The Czar's Bride," and from Musorgsky's "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" have doubtless become standard pieces in Russia. Prokofiev's wordless "Song," the first piece of his to be heard here, and two orchestral excerpts from a ballade, "The Lament of Rachel," by Lazare Saminsky, were more novel.

Mme Koshetz has a powerful voice, of musical quality when she sings softly, but shrill and unsteady on loud, high notes. Her interpretations are far less dramatic than those of Chaliapin and Vladimir Rosing, so that her use of Russian texts was more of an obstacle to those unfamiliar with that tongue than was felt at their recent recitals here. If she had an intermediate stage between soft and loud in her style of singing, a "mezzo voce," Mme Koshetz' performance would have been more enjoyable.

Saminsky and Prokofiev both studied under Rimsky Korsakov, from whom they may have picked up their trick of using folk song material and so-called oriental orchestral color. The former's orchestration is too thick, and he uses the percussion instruments much as a movie organist does the chimes, drums and other attachments, without trying for a blending of tone color such as Ravel or Rimsky Korsakov achieve. Their music is monotonous, and rather dull even to ears not yet fully accustomed to Russian musical idiom. The audience was not perceptibly stirred by it.

Musorgsky's "Revery" and "Dance," sung intelligently by Mme Koshetz except for a failure at one point to keep with the orchestra, is genuinely imaginative music, original, without straining for effect. The Rimsky Korsakov aria proved inferior to many better known specimens of his work. One was left by all this Russian music with a strong suspicion that the proverbial dullness of the third rate German music, that used so often to pervade concert programs, might be far surpassed by the vacuous ineptitudes of the third rate Russians.

Brahms' First Symphony was played with a commendably careful attention to nuances of phrasing and melody. The tempi and dynamics were less admirable. It was very warmly applauded, but if Mr Monteux had treated it as more dramatic and less lyric the applause might have been warmer still. Brahms' music is likely to seem too sluggish if not played with controlled, tireless rhythmic energy.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture is the least effective of all his music within the orchestral repertory. With the "Rienzi" overture it might well be left unperformed, since one can scarcely hope to hear the "Tristan" and "Meistersinger" too often at Symphony concerts. It bored yesterday's audience, which for the most part did not trouble to applaud.

John McCormack will sing two Bach arias and three new "Irish Fantasies" by Mr Loeffler at next week's concerts. The other numbers announced are Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" and part of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

GLOBE. MAR. 4.

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Brahms and Wagner Pieces Feature Afternoon Program

NINA KOSHETZ IS VOCALIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Seminsky, Two fragments from the ballet "Lament of Rachel"—Lament of Rachel and The Wedding Feast (first time in the United States); Rimsky-Korsakov, air from "The Tsar's Bride"; Prokofiev, Song (without words); Moussorgsky, Parasha's Revery and Dance, from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

This is an open season in Boston for the "skis" and "skys": Mr. Kochanski, Mr. Szymanovski, Mr. Saminsky, not to mention Rimsky and Moussorgsky. Mr. Krehbiel in New York is up in arms against "the Slavonic invasion." But let us hear what these invaders have to say. Their names, at least, are sonorous, mouth-filling, and the proper pronunciation affords an agreeable topic for conversation at afternoon teas.

Mr. Saminsky, born at Odessa in 1883, is now living in this country. Purposing at first to be a mathematician, he turned musician and studied with Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov and Tcherepnin. He has had experience for about a dozen years as conductor, lecturer, composer, director of the Tiflis Conservatory. The pieces played yesterday were written as incidental music for a Biblical tragedy, "The Lament of Rachel," which was to be performed at Moscow. The performance fell [illegible] per-ny of counerious

music
l harwhere.
rough
One
where,
in the art.

e time; that as a connot one great over-
It is the fate of which require much re-rformed, then put on seasons, usually longer aken down, if they are l and dusted. A work should be played again concert. This would mposer, audience, con-
estra.
ght add the earnest
Monteux will do the city when the Boston
here again next rk was also given last by the Chicago Sym-

vidence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
b 25

D HAVENS SOLOIST AT ONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony con-
ovidence season will Infantry Hall next
y, Feb. 28, at 8:15.
loist on this occasion
d Havens, the young
t, who was born and vidence, and who has name for himself by the cities of this rope. It so happens
e has heretofore not the orchestra in ough he has done so r cities. He will be concert in Liszt's
erto in E-flat, No. 1.
First Symphony in
the composer the hony, and especially who are fond of symill be the first numgramme.
to the Afternoon of a ay, one of the bests of the modern
f music, will also be e friend of the late collaborator in the
of his scores, Pierre sidered to be one of nost authoritative ins music. This num-ous solo passages fo
ich represents the interest by the varithe orchestra are n Rimsky-Korsakoff's nish Themes," which oncert. Constructed
e Spanish rhythms,
des Two Alboradas
e and Gypsy Song
f the Asturias.

rk City 1922
EB 2

ing been re-en-
the Boston Symshowing his popu-
increased demand is instanced. In ar series of twenty-ts, a series of five rmance has been series of concerts
e concerts at Har-ased from eight to en nine concerts
ities. A great de-lleges to hear the
own, and besides
d there have been
ll, Smith, Middle-ity of Vermont.

Providence
R. I.
~~News~~
ISSUE OF Journal
Feb 26

When Children Hear Symphonies

Providence musicians have occasionally expressed the hope that some time arrangements might be made to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give one of its children's concerts in this city. A series of them is now an established feature of the Boston season, and their popularity is unquestioned. Yet they offer problems both of programme-making and the audience's responsiveness. Of the first one for the season, recently given, the Globe's reviewer wrote:

"A symphony is always a symphony; the Symphony Orchestra is always more or less the Symphony Orchestra, depending somewhat on the temperament of the reigning conductor. And until recently, writers all over the land have mentioned a "symphony audience" as if that, too, were a type. It isn't so any longer.

"A symphony audience that chews gum, even to the technical perfection of making rhythmic poppings with it; a symphony audience whose feminine contingent wears red tam o'shanters for the most part; a symphony audience that comes shouting to the hall, and beguiles the tedium of waiting for trolley cars afterward by getting up wrestling and boxing matches on the sidewalk; a symphony audience for whose convenience the august traditional hour of 2 o'clock is set over to 4—this was the type of yesterday's audience at the first of this year's series of young people's concerts in Symphony Hall, opening the third season of these concerts. The same programme will be repeated to-morrow afternoon; a second pair of concerts will be given in April.

"Except for teachers and an occasional parent, the audience was wholly of school children."

The reviewer reports also that "the Beethoven number was a little too much for many of the youngsters, and more or less horseplay went on; the little heads were restless, and Mr. Monteux, who had all the air of a good-humored and patient schoolmaster, had some difficulty in getting silence.

"But the tearing unisons of the opening bars of Bizet's 'L'Arlesienne,' suite No. 1, caught the attention of the children again, and they listened with a peculiar quality of intentness—all except the inevitable few, who were incredibly insensible to the music and talked steadily all through the hour and 10 minutes during which the concert lasted."

But such a work is carefully chosen from the most timid and anaemic of contemporary production, leaving absolutely unheard the composers who represent the true spirit of our time.

"Dying is the privilege of the weary. The present day composers refuse to die. They have realized the necessity of banding together and fighting for the right of each individual to secure a fair and free presentation of his work. It is out of such a collective will that the International Composers' Guild was born.

"The aim of the International Composers' Guild is to centralize the works of the day, to group them in programmes intelligently and organically constructed, and, with the disinterested help of singers and instrumentalists, to present these works in such a way as to reveal their fundamental spirit.

"'The International Composers' Guild disapproves of all 'isms,' denies the existence of schools, recognizes only the individual."

The guild gave its first concert in Greenwich Village last Sunday evening, but somehow or other the metropolitan critics were elsewhere.

Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF Journal
Feb 26

Raymond Havens

Former Providence Pianist, Who Will B
With Boston Symphony Orches
Infantry Hall

FROM FEB 28 1922
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Monteux Re-Engaged For Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux having been re-engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as showing his popularity in Boston, the increased demand for symphonic music is instanced. In addition to the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts, a series of five Monday night performances has been begun, as well as a series of concerts for young people. The concerts at Harvard have been increased from eight to nine. There have been nine concerts given in neighboring cities. A great desire on the part of colleges to hear the orchestra has been shown, and besides two concerts at Harvard there have been others at Yale, Cornell, Smith, Middlebury and the University of Vermont.

For the Symphony Concerts of next week, on Friday afternoon, March 10, and Saturday evening, March 11, at which Mr. McCormack will assist and Mr. Loeffler's new pieces will be heard for the first time, Mr. Monteux sets the following programme:

Haffner Serenade..............................Mozart
(Violin Solo by Mr. Burgin)
Air from the Cantata, "Mein Liebe Jesus ist Verloren"—Air from the Cantata, "Sie Werden aus Saba alle Kommen," Bach
Mr. McCormack
Irish Fantasias for Tenor Voice and Orchestra ("The Host of the Air"; "The Fiddler of Fooney"; "Caitilin ni Vallachain," after Poems by Yeats), Loeffler
Two Fragments ((Romeo Alone" and "Queen Mab") from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" ....Berlioz

Familiar pieces, clear, candid and stimulating to hear, fill, as they should, the programme for the fourth of the supplementary Symphony Concerts on Monday evening, March 13, in Symphony Hall, viz.:

Symphony in E minor, "From the New World" .... Dvorak
Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" ....Saint-Saëns
Concerto for Violoncello..............................Lalo
Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti.
"Leonora," No. 3.........

TRANS. MAR 1.

FROM MAR 2 1922
Evening Globe
New York

New music by American composers performed last week by orchestras in other cities included a concerto in three movements for organ with orchestra, No. 2, in A major, by Eric De Lamarter, given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with the composer at the organ, and Waltzes for Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In view of the orchestras giving these works, their first performance, it is interesting to note that Mr. De Lamarter lives in Chicago and that Mr. Hill lives in Cambridge, across the Charles from Boston. Mr. De Lamarter, who at present is assistant conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, and organist and music director at the Fourth Presbyterian Church there, completed his concerto in September, 1921. The orchestration calls for two flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, kettledrums, side drum, bells, and strings.

Of the waltzes by Mr. Hill, which were composed for piano in 1920 and arranged for orchestra by December of the next year, Philip Hale wrote in part as follows in the Boston Herald: "A high compliment was paid them unwittingly by a young woman in the corridor after the concert: 'Why, there wasn't one I could dance to.' These fleeting melodies, often fragments, often mere suggestions of waltz measures, are harmonized and orchestrated with true French skill. While there is an avoidance of the obvious, this avoidance is not painfully achieved. The succession of moods, languor, alternating with gayety; these are as natural as speech."

Symphony Concert Tonight at 8

The Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conductor, will give the sixth of its series of nine concerts this evening at 8 o'clock in Sanders Theatre. Nina Koshetz, soprano, will be accompanied by the orchestra in a number of selections.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at Kent's University Bookstore.

The program is as follows:

Symphony in C major No. 7, Schubert
Waltzes for Orchestra, Hill
Song for Orchestra, Hill
Act from Opera "The Czar's Bride", Rimsky Korsakoff
Song without words, Prokofiev
Revery and Dance from the Opera "The Fair of Sorotchin", Moussorgsky
Overture "The Flying Dutchman", Wagner

GRIMSON- MAR. 2

Out of Russia Comes Always Some One New

Nina Koshetz

(Photograph by Elzin)

Singer This Week With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

TRANS. MAR. 2.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Russian music, in part performed for the first time in the United States, takes this week's Symphony program out of the beaten path.

Mme. Nina Koshetz, a Russian opera singer, is also making her Boston debut at this 17th pair of concerts. She is a dramatic soprano, voluminous as any Wagnerian heroine; a singer of the type that appears to better advantage on the operatic than on the concert stage. But she is a well-schooled singer, nevertheless, and an artist of pronounced musical intelligence.

NINA KOSHETZ

Of the songs she chose, the revery and dance from Moussorgsky's "Fair of Sorotchinsk" was the most enjoyable. It suited her voice and manner best, and by the time she sang it she had recovered from the shock of facing the critical matinee audience, which is composed mostly of women. She was warmly applauded at the close, and she in turn applauded the orchestra.

Two fragments from Lazare Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," were given their first American hearing yesterday. Saminsky is a young Russian composer now living in New York. The ballet is typical new Russian music, enriched with Hebrew folk-songs and religious melodies. Another young Russian now over here, Serge Prokofiev, was represented on the program by a strange and melancholy song without words, performed by Mme. Koshetz. The effect was funereal. The robust soprano also sang an air from one of the Rimsky-Korsakoff operas, "The Czar's Bride."

Mr. Monteux and the orchestra shared one of the most spontaneous ovations of the season after the splendid performance of the Brahms Symphony in C minor, the first number on the program. Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture is the final number.

ADVTSR- MAR. 4.

NINA KOSHETZ SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Gives Excellent Performance of Brahm's First Symphony

By FRED J. McISAAC.

A really excellent performance of Brahms' first symphony was the feature of yesterday's Symphony program. This great work had evidently been very carefully prepared, and Monteux distinguished himself by a powerful, clean cut and successful performance. I don't remember ever having heard the monumental finale with its thunderous climaxes better played.

The soloist was Nina Koshetz, a Russian mezzo soprano, who has been singing with the Chicago Opera. Monteux's flair for things Russian was evidently responsible for her appearance, and she sang three airs little known in this country.

The unfamiliarity of our audiences with Russian music has allowed quite a few singers to charge indifferent work to the exigencies of the score and text, but Mme. Koshetz could not conceal her mediocrity.

She has an unfortunate stage appearance. She was evidently scared to death, because she sang the Rimsky Korsakoff air from the "Tsar's Bride" almost entirely out of tune, and with a quality of tone which would have disgraced a novice. The very effective Moussorgsky song from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," which closed her portion of the entertainment, was her best contribution, as she had conquered her nervousness by that time. But even then the quality of tone produced was very indifferent.

Interesting Oriental music were fragments from the ballet, "Lament of Rachel," by a young Russian, Saminsky, now living in New York. He is a pupil of Rimsky Korsakoff and he captured a lot of his master's gift for Oriental coloring. An excellent performance of the Flying Dutchman Overture closed the program.

FOURTH EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the extra series of five newly instituted this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall a week from Monday evening, March 13, at 8:15 o'clock.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, will open the fine program on this occasion with Dvorak's Fifth Symphony "From the New World." Jean Bedetti, the celebrated 'cellist, who leads that section of the great orchestra, will appear as soloist in the concerto by Lalo.

McCORMACK SYMPHONY SOLOIST

John McCormack will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 10 and 11. He will take the voice part in Three Irish Fantasies, which Charles Martin Loeffler has recently written to the texts of the poet Yeats, using Gaelic folk tunes.

AMER. MAR. 4

RUSSIAN MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Nina Koshetz Sings First Time in Boston

Russian novelties were sandwiched on yesterday's Symphony concert program between the orthodox Brahms of the C minor Symphony and the rather crude early Wagner of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, producing a curiously assorted concert. Nina Koshetz, a Russian soprano, heard this season with the Chicago Opera, sang for the first time in Boston. Her numbers were all new to local concert goers, though the arias from Rimsky Korsakov's opera, "The Czar's Bride," and from Musorgsky's "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" have doubtless become standard pieces in Russia. Prokofiev's wordless "Song," the first piece of his to be heard here, and two orchestral excerpts from a ballade, "The Lament of Rachel," by Lazare Saminsky, were more novel.

Mme Koshetz has a powerful voice, of musical quality when she sings softly, but shrill and unsteady on loud, high notes. Her interpretations are far less dramatic than those of Chaliapin and Vladimir Rosing, so that her use of Russian texts was more of an obstacle to those unfamiliar with that tongue than was felt at their recent recitals here. If she had an intermediate stage between soft and loud in her style of singing, a "mezzo voce," Mme Koshetz' performance would have been more enjoyable.

Saminsky and Prokofiev both studied under Rimsky Korsakov, from whom they may have picked up their trick of using folk song material and so-called oriental orchestral color. The former's orchestration is too thick, and he uses the percussion instruments much as a movie organist does the chimes, drums and other attachments, without trying for a blending of tone color such as Ravel or Rimsky Korsakov achieve. Their music is monotonous, and rather dull even to ears not yet fully accustomed to Russian musical idiom. The audience was not perceptibly stirred by it.

Musorgsky's "Revery" and "Dance," sung intelligently by Mme Koshetz except for a failure at one point to keep with the orchestra, is genuinely imaginative music, original, without straining for effect. The Rimsky Korsakov aria proved inferior to many better known specimens of his work. One was left by all this Russian music with a strong suspicion that the proverbial dullness of the third rate German music, that used so often to pervade concert programs, might be far surpassed by the vacuous ineptitudes of the third rate Russians.

Brahms' First Symphony was played with a commendably careful attention to nuances of phrasing and melody. The tempi and dynamics were less admirable. It was very warmly applauded, but if Mr Monteux had treated it as more dramatic and less lyric the applause might have been warmer still. Brahms' music is likely to seem too sluggish if not played with controlled, tireless rhythmic energy.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture is the least effective of all his music within the orchestral repertory. With the "Rienzi" overture it might well be left unperformed, since one can scarcely hope to hear the "Tristan" and "Meistersinger" too often at Symphony concerts. It bored yesterday's audience, which for the most part did not trouble to applaud.

John McCormack will sing two Bach arias and three new "Irish Fantasies" by Mr Loeffler at next week's concerts. The other numbers announced are Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" and part of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

GLOBE. MAR. 4.

17TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Brahms and Wagner Pieces Feature Afternoon Program

NINA KOSHETZ IS VOCALIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1; Seminsky, Two fragments from the ballet "Lament of Rachel"—Lament of Rachel and The Wedding Feast (first time in the United States); Rimsky-Korsakov, air from "The Tsar's Bride"; Prokofiev, Song (without words); Moussorgsky, Parasha's Revery and Dance, from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk"; Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

This is an open season in Boston for the "skis" and "skys": Mr. Kochanski, Mr. Szymanovski, Mr. Saminsky, not to mention Rimsky and Moussorgsky. Mr. Krehbiel in New York is up in arms against "the Slavonic invasion." But let us hear what these invaders have to say. Their names, at least, are sonorous, mouth-filling, and the proper pronunciation affords an agreeable topic for conversation at afternoon teas.

Mr. Saminsky, born at Odessa in 1883, is now living in this country. Purposing at first to be a mathematician, he turned musician and studied with Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov and Tcherepnin. He has had experience for about a dozen years as conductor, lecturer, composer, director of the Tiflis Conservatory. The pieces played yesterday were written as incidental music for a Biblical tragedy, "The Lament of Rachel," which was to be performed at Moscow. The performance fell through; so Mr. Saminsky wrote a [illegible] for a ballet and used these excerpts in his score. The ballet has not been performed.

[78]

"The Lament of Rachel." One naturally thinks of the verse in the book of the Prophet Jeremiah: "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping: Rachel weeping for her children, refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not." Mr. Saminsky says that his music expresses "the desolation of the deceived Rachel, her lament, her cry to Jehovah, and her final resignation."

It may be remembered that Jacob, journeying, came to the land of Laban, his uncle. He saw Laban's daughter, Rachel, with her sheep, before he met her father. Jacob lost no time. Having watered the flock, he kissed Rachel and lifted up his voice, and wept. And so in "The Thousand Nights and a Night" the lover, kissing or unkissed, is inclined to burst into a passionate flood of tears, if he does not actually swoon with love-longing. Having kissed Rachel, Jacob introduced himself, which was the proper thing to do.

Then Laban played Jacob a contemptible trick. Rachel was "beautiful and well-favored"; her older sister, Leah, was blear-eyed. Jacob promised to serve seven years for Laban if he would give him Rachel for wife. He served seven years; "And they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her." Laban passed off Leah on Jacob and gave as an excuse that, according to custom, the elder daughter must be married first. Jacob obtained Rachel also by promising to serve another seven years, and he loved her more than Leah.

This old story is more interesting than Mr. Saminsky's music. It is said that the composer in his student days was influenced by Spinoza. As a musician, he has been influenced by Rimsky-Korsakov. He lacks the latter's remarkable skill in orchestration, but in his structural use of themes he follows in Rimsky-Korsakov's footsteps. These themes, we are told, are derived from folk songs and religious melodies of Hebrews in various eastern countries. The hearer of the first excerpt would think that Rachel lamented in liturgical tones; that her grief was moderate, discreet, not "a lament with a loud lamentation." As for "The Wedding Feast," joy is expressed by percussion instruments in lively agitation; joy, loud enough; but no orgy of sounds, no madding melodies and rhythms.

This music of Mr. Saminsky is mildly entertaining for the moment; it leaves no marked impression.

Mme. Nina Koshetz, we are informed, was suffering from a severe cold, or a touch of laryngitis. In view of these circumstances it would be unfair to speak of her voice or her vocal art. Of the three songs she chose, the air from "The Tsar's Bride," although it had no racial characteristics, was the most expressive of the text, the most melodically pleasing. The wordless song of Prokofiev seemed to us a waste of time on the part of the composer and the singer, unless one considers it to be merely a trying exercise in intervals and intonation, while the orchestral accompaniment seemed labored and ineffective. The "Revery" from Moussorgsky's opera, which was completed by Liadov, has much more to it than the second section, a hopak, far inferior to the more familiar one by the same composer. Mme. Koshetz was applauded warmly.

The feature of the concert was the eloquent performance of the symphony, of which the first movement and the Introduction to the Finale are enough to give Brahms a high seat among the masters. The performance of Wagner's overture was spirited, but the music itself is beginning to age, if it does not date already.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Orchestral pieces, Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade (first four movements), and the Love Scene and "Queen Mab" from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." John McCormack will sing two airs from cantatas by Bach, and three of Loeffler's Irish Fantaisies for voice and orchestra: The Host of the Air; The Fiddler of Dooney; and The Song of Caitlin Ni Uallachain.

HERALD MAR 4

Mme. Koshetz and Mr. Monteux

THE psychological twist causing the degree of interest—or boredom—to influence, often completely to befuddle, the sense of the passing of time is peculiarly in evidence in the hearing of music. To cite a specific and present instance, Schubert's Symphony in C major—played at the Symphony Concerts of last week and repeated last evening at the concert in Cambridge—is, as such pieces go, exceptionally long—much longer than any other of the classical symphonies. Yet in performance, even without cuts, the lengths are hardly discoverable, and the forty-seven minutes of Mr. Monteux's judiciously curtailed version pass with surprising quickness. Had Mozart, for example, written a symphony which filled the better part of an hour it would seem to any but an incorrigible classicist well nigh interminable. Yet Mozart was in many ways an abler, more interesting composer of symphonic music than Schubert. There seems, indeed, something almost magical in the way the latter's Symphony in C-major, now close to a hundred years old, still absorbs the hearer's attention. The reasons are not easy to discern, for Schubert's music may hardly grip as does that of certain later composers.

In part, surely, the spell of this Symphony is attributable to persistent tunefulness and in part to unflagging drive and impetus in the rhythms, even in the slow-paced Andante. Again, although the piece is planned on a vast scale, it is so perfectly proportioned that the ear is not aware of the huge dimensions. To Mr. Weingartner the hearing of the music suggests a "flight through bright ether," and it would seem that the dullest listener must feel a little of that strange exhilaration. Last evening, as on previous occasions, Mr. Monteux proved that this Symphony is one of the pieces in which he excels. He feels the occasional dramatic strokes; he is sensitive to the exhaustless play of instrumental timbres; he responds to the curve of the melodies and, above [illegible] rhythmically alive.

Also carried over to last evening's programme from the preceding concerts in Boston were Mr. Hill's Waltzes for orchestra, played appropriately in the city where the composer dwells and works. Here and there in these Waltzes Mr. Hill has geen tempted to pen a trivial measure, a phrase that is too plausible or that is over-ripe. But taken throughout, they are remarkable for the immediate pleasure that they give—of an almost superficial sort, yet without offending the canons of musical righteousness. Mr. Hill writes ingratiating melodies that seize upon the ear as they pass, yet it is their peculiar quality that they do not linger in the memory. Thus to combine the obvious and the recondite is no mean accomplishment; while the orchestration is a delight, resourceful and ingenious, the work not of an experimenter but of a master. In passing, it may be wondered whether Mr. Hill has noticed the resemblance which the melody of the Fifth Waltz bears to Mme. Butterfly's last song in Puccini's opera of like name.

Prophetic rather than reminiscent, the remainder of last evening's programme comprised music destined for performance in Boston today and tomorrow—Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and three songs from Russian composers, sung by Mme. Nina Koshetz, lately a member of the Chicago Opera Company. Mr. Monteux has already proved his mettle in Overture. There are times when his way with Wagner seems curiously uncertain and unrevealing, as though the inner fibre of the music, though not its outward form, eluded him. But at his hands this Overture gains a singular effectiveness. And what music to tempt a conductor's powers! Here are some of Wagner's freshest, most puissant pages—pages that overtop anything in "Tannhäuser" or "Lohengrin." True, there is dross mixed with the gold, but it is readily forgotten—the early Wagner was never a purist. And it concerns us more that here is music as tonic and bracing as salt spray blown across the face. Many composers have offered Nature the flattery of imitation. Wagner could write music almost as vital as Nature herself.

According to reliable report Mme. Koshetz has of late suffered from a severe attack of laryngitis, and it was not altogether certain that she would sing last evening. Yet only in her first song was she obviously hampered. Clearly she has a voice of full, rich vibrant quality, with a "personality" that mates well with it. We are fast learning to expect unusual and stimulating accomplishment from the singers of Russia. Mme. Koshetz's singing of the "Hopak" in "Parasha's Revery and Dance," from Musorgsky's opera "The Fair of Sorotchinsky," was vivid and exhilirating—veritable wine to the ears. As with Mr Rosing, there was little thought of the music itself, since singer and music were one. Because of Mme. Koshetz's difficulties with her first number, Martha's Air from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "The Betrothed of The Tsar," comment on it may well be deferred. Her other piece, a "Song Without Words" by Prokofiev proved curiously fascinating. Although Prokofiev is conspicuous among the Russian musicians of our generation, almost none of his music has heretofore been heard hereabouts. We are indebted then to Mme. Koshetz, not only for herself and her singing, but for the first real acquaintance with a new and interesting composer.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR. 3

MUSIC

Glorified Brahms on Boston Orchestra Program

The program of the seventeenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor......Brahms
Two fragments from the ballet, "Lament of Rachcel" ....Saminsky
Songs with orchestra
Air from "The Tzar's Bride," Rimsky-Korsakov
Reverie and dance from "The Fair of Sorotchinsk" ....Moussorgsky
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner

Brahms' symphony has never sounded more emotional, more dramatic, less dry and academic—one is almost tempted to add more musical—than it did on yesterday afternoon. For the last concert or two the orchestra had apparently lost somewhat of the youthful fire and enthusiasm to which Mr. Monteux has accustomed us, but yesterday it played as in the concerts of the season's earlier portion. The whole symphony was given with a warmth of tone, with a wealth of expressive detail, yet withal a due and just sense of proportion which was wholly commendable. The audience felt the stirring quality of the performance and rewarded the conductor and orchestra with generous, whole-hearted and enthusiastic applause.

The remaining pieces of the program, with the exception of Wagner's overture, were novel. Saminsky's ballet music was played for the first time in America, and the Russian songs, if not sung for the first time in this city, are unfamiliar. Saminsky's ballet musicis sadly disappointing. A pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov and Tcherepnin, one naturally expects at least glowing orchestral coloring. The orchestration of these two fragments is, however, conventional. The themes, of folk character, are repeated over and over again without attempt at development, and the second of the two pieces is noisy without brilliance. The work was coldly received, and justly so.

Nina Koshetz was the singer. The songs in which she chose to display her art are at least skillfully composed music. Rimsky's air, if monotonous in general scheme, is grateful music to both singer and orchestra and, as in all his music, there are many moments of real orginality and expressiveness. Prokofiev's song without words is a far cry from Mendelssohn and his imitators. It is imaginative, personal music and creates a desire to hear more of the composer's work. Moussorgsky, in his reverie and dance, is the familiar Moussorgsky, intensely Russian, crude in the manner of his expression, a composer of tremendous power, lacking in technic, yet triumphing in spite of his limitations. Madame Koshetz sang as a musician, a rare quality in a singer. For once, a singer seemed an integral part of a symphony program rather than a concession to convention.

S. M.

March 10 (Friday afternoon) and March 11 (Saturday evening) the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give its eighteenth concert. John McCormack will be the soloist and, in addition to two airs from cantatas by Bach, will assist in the first performance of three Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra, by Charles Martin Lœffler. The texts are by W. B. Yeats and the thematis material is drawn from Gaelic folk melodies. The orchestra will play a serenade by Mozart, with an incidental violin solo by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and two movements from Berlioz' Romeo and Juliet symphony.

MONITOR MAR 11

Symphony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONCE MORE THE GERMANS REPEL THE SLAVS

Russian Newcomers Fare None Too Well Beside Brahms and Wagner—The Dry, Bare, Empty Saminsky—Mme. Koshetz, Hampered Singer—The More, Then, the Day of the Symphony in C Minor and the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"

IN most companies the Russians hold their own in music: but at the Symphony Concert of yesterday they fared none too well with Brahms and Wagner beside them. True, they were not too representative Russians or, if they were, the chosen specimens of their work hardly praised them. Until Mr. Lazare Saminsky, for example, descended upon New York, a year and more ago, it is safe to say that in America only a student or two of eastern folk-music was aware of him. In subsequent months he has proved that the gentle art of pushful propaganda is not exclusively the heritage of the nephews of Uncle Sam. Here, there and everywhere. Mr. Saminsky in music or in lectures has landed; upon Mr. Monteux's table he laid the score of his mimodrama, "Lament of Rachel," and on Friday, conductor and orchestra played two fragments thereof.

According to the inquiring programme-book, the action of the piece embodies the legend of Laban's deceits upon his daughters, Rachel and Leah, and upon the amorous, calculating, Jacob, rather according to Jewish folk-tale than to Jewish scripture. In one of the pieces now heard Rachel bewails the paternal fate that gives Leah to the suitor; in the other the household, or the tribe, join in the wedding feast. Certainly in the voice of the music Rachel takes her woes tranquilly enough. It may be that Mr. Saminsky would invest her with tragic dignity; as it is, he leaves her monotonous and cold. With another label, the hearer could easily believe the piece a chant of a priestess mindful of Jewish liturgical modes. It is exceeding brief and spare and bare. It sets forth nothing but the composer's acquaintance with ancient Jewish music of the temple and with play of harmonies and timbres as Rimsky-Korsakov taught him to apply them. For imagination, individuality, illusion the piece is naught. No more salient is the music of the wedding feast. Again Mr. Saminsky takes hint—for use in his own way—from Jewish racial music; again he recalls the teachings in instrumental combinations, rhythmed, harmonized, of the valorous Rimsky. Only, however, as tools of trade can he use both and his music is as dry, barren and colorless as a book of accounts—and not by half so haunting to the memory. With a bow, rather to the kindly Monteux than to the chilly audience, Mr. Saminsky may well take leave to withdraw.

In not much better case was the other Russian newcomer, Prokofiev—he of the "Scythian Suite"; of a symphony "as Mozart might have written it in the twentieth century"; of piano-pieces from Concertos to "Sarcasms"; of an opera, which is extravaganza, "The Love of Three Oranges." We listeners might hear any or all these pieces, except the opera, from the Symphony Orchestra or from the composer bestowing recitals upon Boston as he does upon other cities. Mr. Monteux, indeed, has "considered" the "Scythian Suite." In fact, however, we listened yesterday to no more than a wordless song for soprano voice and orchestra sung by Mme. Koshetz of the Chicago Opera Company. Possibly, it is the "Jewish Cradle Song without Words" that the programme-book reports her as singing elsewhere. Certainly it has tang of such eastern folk-music; while Prokofiev spices it further with pungent intervals and acidulous harmonies. Evidently he made the music with thought and pains; but in it no warm or lively play of the imagination is discoverable. Far indeed and strangely may folk-song go, when composers of this day lay upon it nervous, strenuous hands. Behold it, in this piece of Prokofiev, as intricate vocal exercise.

Mme. Koshetz, singer of the opera house in her own country as well as in Chicago and New York, met these exactions valiantly, but in all her numbers was plainly handicapped by reluctant, undependable vocal chords, not yet fully recovered from recent disability. In lower tones, her voice is full, warm, opulent; in upper, it tends to thin body and shrill quality. Between, and indeed throughout, it lacks variety of color and accent. Mme. Koshetz sings the notes upon the music-paper; follows the composer's marks of expression and obvious shadings. There she stops, adding little from her own mind and spirit—when such physical difficulties as those of yesterday beset her. A routine singer she seemed while her numbers from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Betrothed of the Tsar" and from Musorgsky's opera, "The Fair of Sorotchinsk," invited much more than routine.

Rimsky puts his music into the mouth of the girl Martha recounting happy life lived with her lover. Almost throughout, it is a voluptuous music, soft, warm, thrilling to hear, like to the touch of flesh upon flesh. In the long spiral, dear to Rimsky's imagination and practice, the melody ascends, descends, in glowing, quivering circlets. The listener recalls the air of the longing Queen in "The Golden Cockerel" and one or another of Rimsky's songs. With them in this curve, this glamor, this imparting of voluptuous sensation, the fragment from "The Betrothed of the Tsar" may almost hold place. A more sensuous singer than was Mme. Koshetz yesterday might give it pile and glow, palpitating upon the ear. The fragment from an opera that the spent and dying Musorgsky left barely sketched, begins in amorous revery—a girl longing for the lover her stepmother denies her—proceeds in fancy of him and her in lively folk-dance. (The formula of the elder Italian opera, as it were, adapted to use upon Russian music of the people.) Liadov wrote in the orchestral part, suitably, neatly, but with more flavor of his routine self than of individual and incalculable Musorgsky. The revery is moody and melancholy, with not a little of Musorgsky's ability to make imagined emotion actuality in tones. The succeeding Hopak twirls, snaps, repeats itself, after the manner of Russian folk-dance. With it Musorgsky kept the faith of the "nationalist" composers; but sat by rather than joined with the dancers. Mme. Koshetz, moreover, was not exactly in the condition to give the piece rhythmic leap and verve. To produce her tones as such, she had need of all her pains.

So it was that Brahms of Vienna and Wagner of Dresden once more repelled the Slavic invasion—one with his Symphony in C minor, the other with the Overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," and both materially aided by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. It is quite true that "The Flying Dutchman" was produced almost eighty years ago; that, beyond any other of Wagner's operas, it has fallen, in these days, from the active repertory. No doubt there are long pages in it worn threadbare and antiquated by time and operatic fashions. Yet the Overture, as some of us hear it, still holds brave and firm, rich and eloquent. Here and only here has Wagner, intrinsically a landsman, once youthful wanderings were done, written sea-music. For the few measures of the moving ship in "Tristan" are momentary gloss upon other, more material, matters. Through the introduction, the sway and rush of the waters, the sweep past of sky and sea, the turbulence, the insistence the wildness of ocean fill the answering ear seize the imagining eye. Seldom in tones has operatic scene been more vividly and completely set.

The music passes to the tale of doom and devotion, of fate and faith that the action unfolds—the black romance of the Dutchman's endless voyaging through the storms, the golden strand of Senta's believing love, and ever in the background the white foam of the gray waters against the gray and riven sky. It is convention of reviewing to write of the illusion of romantic scene, action, air, that upsprings, a hundred years after, from the overtures Weber set to "Oberon," "Der Freischütz" and "Euryanthe." Does it spring the less, does it not more upleap, eighty years after, from this Overture of Wagner to "The Flying Dutchman?" Some of us—doubtless foolish folk—it still possesses and transports, even while our minds may be noting the tooth of time gnawing at Senta's melody in the horns. It was sweetish, cloying even when the forties first heard it. Not then had Wagner learned to exalt his saving women. Yet the sea, the romance, the haggard tumult, the final salvation achieved—and proclaimed! The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" is music of the theatre. Visualizing it, dramatizing it, feeling it yet guiding it, Mr. Monteux can make it triply vivid. It invites the graphic power that for the whole clothes his orchestra. Once more—and forever—the theatre is a good place.

Less expectedly, Mr. Monteux also fared well with the Symphony of Brahms—again a music inviting to power as often as to beauty. It was possible to wish a more propulsive pace, a sharper accent, when the motiv of rejoicing begins to move through the finale; to wish the proclamation by the trombones more solemn, stately, sonorous, in the manner of Mengelberg. Yet elsewhere, there was little reason to take issue with the conductor; while everywhere came reason to praise his answering voices. Not too often of late in a classic symphony, have the strings and the wood-winds played with such lambent loveliness of tone, such sensibility in accent and shading, such songful phrasing as they brought to the fancies and the graces of the little Allegretto. However Brahms may have scored his symphonies he had imagination with wind-choirs—and intuition. Their voices halo this Allegretto, pulse golden through the preceding Andante. A Latin conductor—Toscanini en tête—is sure to find the songfulness of Brahms and warm to it. So, yesterday, in pace and rhythm, Mr. Monteux maintained, enriched the melody of the slow movement, while within it he gained sensitive and diversified voice unwonted. Every modulation told. The ear caught the dusky harmonies of Brahms; the imagination answered to his musings. For once beauty came to him—and with no audible calculation and process for alloy.

More easily, more naturally went Mr. Monteux with Brahms's music of power. Possibly there was but one Nikisch with the suspensive preluding, the magnificent bursting upon the ear, the striding upon the imagination of the finale in this First Symphony. None the less much of these sensations, is intrinsic in the music, as yesterday Mr. Monteux released, if he did not sublimate, them. So also with the succeeding exuberance of rejoicing, tonal wave upon tonal wave. A little more passion and a world would have sung and danced; yet with Brahms strode almost equally Monteux. Similarly with the first movement. Brahms waited long before he wrote a Symphony, and seldom has music sprung into being more fully panoplied. (The beginning of Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero-Life," is the nearest, readiest, parallel.) Seldom, too, does music more resolutely and irresistibly bear the hearer along its course. Compulsive that rocking rhythm which Brahms seems to use so innocently. His song may be dusky, but there are returns of it to master the ear. And, when motiv clashes with motiv, and choir with choir, and the whole music seethes with a noble turbulence, Brahms much below the Beethoven of the symphony in the major C? (There are other analogies like the suspensive transition into the finale.) Bülow may have meant this, that or the other, when he called this music of Brahms "the Tenth Symphony." Yet at the hands of a conductor worth his salt—and Mr. Monteux is worth much more—it continues the everlasting chain.

H. T. PARKER

THREE Irish songs or—as the composer prefers to call them—three Irish Fantasias, written by Mr. Loeffler for tenor voice and orchestra, will be heard for the first times anywhere at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They are named: "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney," Caitilin ni Uallachain. Gaelic legend suggested them to Mr. Yeats as matter for poetry; his verses commended them to Mr. Loeffler as material for music. Mr. McCormack summoned to Symphony Hall especially for these pieces, will be the singer. He will also be heard in two airs from churchly cantatas of Bach. divisions of Mozart's Serenade for the wedding of the Haffners, prosperous bourgeois of Salzburg, will begin the concert. Two numbers from Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," will end. The whole programme stands:

Haffner Serenade..................
(Violin Solo by Mr. Burgin)
Air from the Cantata, "Mein Liebe Jesu ist Verloren"—Air from the Cantata "Sie Werden aus Saba alle Kommen"
Mr. McCormack
Irish Fantasias for Tenor Voice and Orchestra ("The Host of the Air"; "The Fiddler of Dooney"; "Caitilin ni Uallachain," after Poems by Yeats).
Two Fragments ("Romeo Alone" and "Queen Mab") from the Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" ....

Monday evening, March 13, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the "special" Symphony Concerts designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than usually frequents them. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct through Dvořák's Symphony "From the New World"; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonore, No. 3." Mr. Bedetti, first violoncellist of the band, will play the solo part in Lalo's Concerto.

McCORMACK AT SYMPHONY

John McCormack will be the soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will take the voice part in three Irish fantasies which Charles Martin Loeffler has recently written to the texts of the poet Yeats, using Gaelic folk tunes.

FOURTH EXTRA SYMPHONY

The fourth concert of the extra series of five newly instituted this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall a week from Monday evening, March 13, at 8:15 o'clock. Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, who leads that section of the orchestra, will play as soloist in the concerto by Lalo.

BALLET BY RUSSIAN BY SYMPHONY

Saminsky's "Lament of Rachel" Wins High Approbation

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Russian invasion, which some Americans have feared, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, then played for the first time in America two excerpts from the ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," by Lazare Saminsky.

79

RUSSIAN SOPRANO, SOLOIST

Mme. Nina Koshetz, the Russian soprano, made her first appearance in Boston, as soloist of the occasion, sang unfamiliar music by Russians: Martha's air from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "The Czar's Bride"; Prok

---

ng Without Words" for orchestra; the song and rev asha, from Moussorgsky's
d opera, "The Fair at Soroch innovating Slavs were bal sandwiched between two m es by Germans, Brahms' her or symphony and Wagner's to the "Flying Dutchman."
r. Saminsky, born in Odessa, i lives in New York. He was at the Petrograd Conser
he gave up mathematic ilosophy for music, becomin
a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff sic for the biblical tragedy, ment of Rachel," was intend formance in the Moscow Dr eatre in 1913. The producti king place Mr. Saminsky wr n scenario from incidents de the Book of Genesis and m score a ballet.
There are two excerpts. Thus t ser: "Jacob's uncle Laban . .
s Jacob that he will give h ughter, Rachel, in marriage, ceives his nephew and forc marry the elder daughter, L t excerpt describes the de the deceived Rachel, her lam Jehovah, and final resignati ond excerpt describes the tivities."
Aside from its original de
the stage, this is pictures
the first excerpt, emotion brew scales, tonalities an k airs are largely employe employed with an uncomm color, with a technic no ed from Rimsky-Korsakoff music of the despairin
s much, in a short time, a a racial manner. The we is less emotional and pe ginal. More intimate ac ght strengthen the impr nything there are too ma
ployed in these short ex
he ideas are eloquent. F ted more coherently and y would probably mak
ct in concert, if not wit
tacle.
the songs sung by Mm
two by Rimsky-Korsal
ssorgsky, songs of simp
an feeling, made a grea on one writer, at lea of Prokofiev. Mr. Pr
ns to us in this song to nuity and boldness, bu effort and with rat ming.

erformance of Brahm

e. Koshetz was suffe
e cold. At the rehea e the concert, it had for her to sing at all ble to expect that ton better voice, more m
quality and of pitch.
d the songs with spi
much pleasure, despi
to the audience.
r. Monteux's performanc phony showed that B sensuously beautiful a ell as strong and hero movement of the sy om had such pervading beauty. The same t
of the performance of
ement which follows.
om had such imag
rn. The finale of this of the tests of any c episode was never beautifully. Early W be, the "Flying Dutc continues to stir the proud music of the st
y when played with th dramatic accent that

POST

CORMACK SOL

les Martin Loeffler's of Irish fantasies for tra, will be conducted by Mr. Monteux at ony concerts in Sym
day afternoon and Sa
The last trip of the
New York will occupy the
The Irish fantasies ts by Yeats and Hef
rs are entitled: 1—
ir; 2—The Fiddler of Ni Vallachain. J will sing them and a ntatas by Bach.
Monteux will open Mozart's "Haffner Se
in which the solo
by Richard Burgin,
of the orchestra,
he Garden Scene an from Berlioz's
Ju

MPHONY CO

"New World's S will be conducted the fourth of the evening concerts Symphony Orche
tomorrow evening,
soloist will be Jea us leader of the the orchestra. H
the old world
and enhanced in nces as soloist
in Boston, New and by recitals o
which he wil
Mr. Monteux w
ens's symphoni
pinning Wheel, with the Overtu
Beethoven.

"Song Without Words" for soprano and orchestra; the song and revery of Parasha from Moussorgsky's unfinished opera, "The Fair at Sorochinsk." The innovating Slavs were balanced and sandwiched between two masterpieces by Germans, Brahms' heroic C minor symphony and Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Saminsky, born in Odessa in 1883, now lives in New York. He was a student at the Petrograd Conservatory when he gave up mathematics and philosophy for music, becoming, in 1906, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The music for the biblical tragedy, "The Lament of Rachel," was intended for performance in the Moscow Dramatic Theatre in 1913. The production not taking place Mr. Saminsky wrote his own scenario from incidents described in the Book of Genesis and made of his score a ballet.

There are two excerpts. Thus the composer: "Jacob's uncle Laban . . . promises Jacob that he will give him his daughter, Rachel, in marriage, but he deceives his nephew and forces him to marry the elder daughter, Lea. The first excerpt describes the desolation of the deceived Rachel, her lament, cry to Jehovah, and final resignation. The second excerpt describes the wedding festivities."

Aside from its original designation for the stage, this is picturesque and, in the first excerpt, emotional music. Hebrew scales, tonalities and ancient folk airs are largely employed. They are employed with an uncommon sense of color, with a technic no doubt derived from Rimsky-Korsakoff's school. The music of the despairing Rachel says much, in a short time, and says it in a racial manner. The wedding music is less emotional and perhaps less original. More intimate acquaintance might strengthen the impression that if anything there are too many themes employed in these short excerpts. All of the ideas are eloquent. Fewer ideas, treated more coherently and symphonically would probably make a better effect in concert, if not with the stage spectacle.

Of the songs sung by Mme. Koshetz, the two by Rimsky-Korsakoff and by Moussorgsky, songs of simple and true human feeling, made a greater impression on one writer, at least, than the song of Prokofiev. Mr. Prokofiev, who seems to us in this song to write with ingenuity and boldness, but not without effort and with rather obvious scheming.

Performance of Brahms Superb

Mme. Koshetz was suffering from a severe cold. At the rehearsal the day before the concert, it had been difficult for her to sing at all. It is reasonable to expect that tonight she will be in better voice, more master of her tone quality and of pitch. She interpreted the songs with spirit, and they gave much pleasure, despite her handicap, to the audience.

Mr. Monteux's performance of Brahms' symphony showed that Brahms may be sensuously beautiful and romantic as well as strong and heroic. The middle movement of the symphony has seldom had such pervading mood, such tonal beauty. The same thing may be said of the performance of the pastoral movement which follows, which has seldom had such imagination and charm. The finale of this symphony is one of the tests of any conductor. The horn episode was never played here more beautifully. Early Wagner as it may be, the "Flying Dutchman" overture continues to stir the hearer with its proud music of the storm, particularly when played with the sweep and the dramatic accent that it had yesterday.

POST MAR 4

McCORMACK SOLOIST

Charles Martin Loeffler's latest work, a set of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra, will be conducted from manuscript by Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The last trip of the orchestra to New York will occupy the succeeding week. The Irish fantasies are settings of texts by Yeats and Hefernan. The numbers are entitled: 1—The Host of the Air; 2—The Fiddler of Dooney; 3—Caitilin Ni Vallachain. John McCormack will sing them and also two airs from cantatas by Bach.

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" (K. 250), in which the solo part will be taken by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and close it with the Garden Scene and Queen Mab Scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The "New World's Symphony of Dvorak will be conducted by Mr. Monteux at the fourth of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra, a week from tomorrow evening, March 13, at 8:15.

The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the violoncello section of the orchestra. His high reputation in the old world has been confirmed and enhanced in the new, by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and by recitals of his own. The concerto which he will play will be Lalo's. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and close the concert with the Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, of Beethoven.

ALE - MAR 5

McCormack Symphony Soloist

Charles Martin Loeffler's latest work, a set of Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra, will be conducted from manuscript by Pierre Monteux at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 10th and 11th, this pair to be followed by the last trip of the orchestra to New York, which will occupy the succeeding week. The "Irish Fantasies" are settings of texts by the poet Yeats, in which Mr. Loeffler has used Gaelic folk tunes. The numbers are entitled: 1. The Host of the Air; 2. The Fiddler of Dooney; 3. Caitilin Ni Vallachain. John McCormack will sing them and will also be heard in two airs from cantatas by Bach.

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade," (K. 250), in which the solo part will be taken by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and close it with the Garden Scene and Queen Mab Scherzo from Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

Fourth Extra Symphony

The "New World" Symphony of Dvorak, which more than any other of his works has made the Bohemian composer beloved in this country, will be performed by Pierre Monteux at the fourth of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place a week from tomorrow evening, March 13, at 8:15.

The soloist at this concert will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, who came from Europe to take this post three seasons ago. His high reputation in the old world has been confirmed and enhanced in the new, both by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and by recitals of his own in this and other cities. He will play on this occasion the Lalo concerto.

Mr. Monteux will conduct Saint-Saons' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and close the concert with the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, of Beethoven, famous for the trumpet calls of deliverance which are heard behind the stage and for its joyous and triumphant close.

POST - MAR. 5

McCormack in Irish Fantasies With Symphony

John McCormack will sing the voice part in a set of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. Charles Martin Loeffler, the noted Boston composer, has written them around Gaelic tunes to words from W. B. Yeats' poems. This will be the first public performance. Mr McCormack, appearing for the second time as soloist with Boston orchestra, will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas.

The program for the next extra concert of the Symphony, Monday, March 13, includes Dvorak's popular symphony "From the New World," Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, the most admirable of the four he wrote at different times for his opera "Fidelio," and the 'cello concerto by Lalo, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra 18th program. "Haffner Serenade," Mozart; two arias, Bach; "Irish Fantaisies" for voice and orchestra, Loeffler (first performance); two movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz. Soloist, John McCormack.

GLOBE - MAR. 5

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The "New World" Symphony of Dvorak will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the extra concert a week from tomorrow. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section, who will play a concerto by Lalo. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

ADVTSR. MAR. 5

Nikisch as Composer

I have read a good deal about Nikisch as composer (writes Robin Legge in The London Telegraph) yet here again I have not read the simple truth as to why he destroyed practically the whole of his compositions. Incidentally, I have in my library a number of very beautiful songs by Nikisch, but these, I think, are the sole remainder of his creations. That he was gifted beyond the ordinary many will avow from the fact of his gaining, for a string quartet, the great gold medal of the Conservatorium at Vienna when a mere boy. I am one of the few still living who heard many of his compositions in private, five and thirty years ago, and it was my painful privilege to help Nikisch himself to destroy by fire a huge mass of his manuscripts in his garden—literally buckets full of them. Why? Because, as Arthur Nikisch averred, "My dear Robin, no man can serve two masters; I am a conductor"! He was plainly right. Every day we see this once famous pianist or that turning away from his true musical god to follow a strange idol; but never yet in contemporary history have we found a musician truly and historically great in one respect whose talent has not deteriorated on its being diluted. I suggest Paderewski, d'Albert, Busoni for a start. Indisputably Nikisch was right—no man can [illegible]

Seldom has Mr. Monteux been more heartily and sincerely applauded at the Symphony Concerts than he was by the audience of Saturday evening at the end of Brahms's Symphony in C minor. Of course the music itself contributed not a little to the ardor of the hearers; yet the performance had heightened and warmed it. Once, twice and thrice Mr. Monteux was recalled with clapping undiminished. Then he bade the orchestra share the plaudits, and the house rang with them.

In the course of the spring, Sibelius's new, drastic, brief and much debated Fifth Symphony will be played at the Symphony Concerts. Like Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux has finally decided [illegible] of the composer and the curiosity of a part of the public.

---

For the first times in America at the concerts of Mr. Stokowski's orchestra in Philadelphia last Friday and Saturday, Stravinsky's mimodrama, "The Rite of Spring" ("Le Sacré du Printemps"), was played in entirety as a concert-piece. Hitherto the experiment has been tried only in Paris by Mr. Monteux in 1914 and in London by Mr. Goossens last June. By all accounts, every audience that has so heard the music has been deeply stirred—even in Philadelphia. Mr. Monteux might well renew the venture in Boston, especially with such a minutely descriptive programme as Mr. Evans supplied in London and Mr. Gilman in Philadelphia. Unfortunately these scenes of ancient ritual in pagan Russia have never been set on the American stage.

TRANS - MAR. 6

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENTERTAINS

Boston Musicians Delight Large Audience Sunday Afternoon

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS THEM

Finely Rendered Program Is Warmly Applauded by Music Lovers

Occasionally Lawrence has musical entertainment of real merit. At the Colonial theater yesterday afternoon came one of those occasions, the attraction being the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. As was the case earlier in the season when Geraldine Farrar sang, the house was sold out, and the audience was most demonstrative in its appreciation.

It would be hard to explain any lack of demonstrativeness, to be sure, because the orchestra played in its best style, than which there is none better, and the program, which had been arranged by Mr. Monteux and Robert E. Sault, was an extremely well balanced one.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the program, and after the first part of this number had been finished there was a brief pause during which many tardy ones were seated. It was unfortunate that such an interruption had to occur, and seemed hardly necessary, inasmuch as the concert did not begin until a few minutes after the scheduled time, the start being delayed purposely that the audience might be seated first.

After the Tschaikowsky number came Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, the solo work being in the hands of the concert master, Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin, who is only 28 years old, proved himself an unusual violinist, and the audience was generous in its applause, between the different movements, and at the end of his playing. Undoubtedly they would have enjoyed an encore, but that was not to be.

Incidental music to "Rosamunde" by Schubert was the next number, and it was most delightful. The concluding piece was the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and, perhaps because it was the most familiar, it was listened to with more interest than had been the earlier pieces, and the applause that followed its conclusion was unmistakable evidence that it was liked. Although the number ended the program, Mr. Monteux was obliged to return to the stage three times to bow his acknowledgements.

During the past eight years the Boston Symphony has been heard here something like five times, but it was never, probably, heard to better advantage than was the case yesterday. In the audience were many who are frequent visitors to Symphony hall at the Friday afternoon concerts, as well as many others, of course, who hear such music only when it is brought here.

Already plans are being made for next season's concerts, but just how Lawrence will fare is not known as yet. Lawrence needs a larger place for such programs. An auditorium with a larger seating capacity would mean more worth while concerts, because the expense attached to such performances is very big. Under present conditions a capacity house little more than pays the expenses, and anything short of a capacity house means loss. And that is the chance that Messrs Sault and Donovan take in booking these concerts for Lawrence.

Lowell, with its new auditorium which will seat 2000 or so more than Lawrence's largest auditorium, is going to have some good concerts another season. And, with the added seating capacity, it will not be necessary to charge as high prices as is the case here. The success of a concert like that given yesterday, and like some of the who enjoy such things towards urging the building, in some way, of a suitable auditorium. It is one of Lawrence's greatest needs today.

In passing it may be remarked that two more concerts, or rather pairs of concerts, by the Symphony ensemble are still to be heard. One comes one week from today, and the other two weeks from today.

LAWRNCE TEL. MAR 6

HAVENS WELCOMED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pianist Makes Fine Impression at Appearance with Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season was played last evening in Infantry Hall, and was an occasion of special interest to Rhode Island people because of the selection of Raymond Havens as the soloist. Mr. Havens, formerly of Providence, with many friends in Pawtucket and vicinity, has steadily grown in his art, and has taken a prominent place among American pianists. His playing last evening was of high character, dignified and impressive, and the artist was warmly applauded by the large audience.

His selection was the Liszt concerto in E-flat major, and Mr. Havens showed ability to take full advantage of its opportunities. His technical powers, which are of notable order, were given full scope and he worked up to a splendid climax at the close. Repeated recalls registered the fine impression his playing made on the audience.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was the principal orchestra number of the evening. This is one of the most beautiful works played by the great orchestras of the present day, and it splendidly interpreted by Conductor Monteux. Undoubtedly it was one of the finest performances of the season, calling forth great applause at the close of each movement. It is difficult to imagine anything more beautiful than the orchestra's playing of the larghetto, one of the sweetest movements in the works of the great music masters.

Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a familiar number to symphony patrons, was splendidly given, and the concert was brought to a brilliant close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The flashing beauties of this striking piece were strikingly brought out, conductor and orchestra entering wholeheartedly into a work which apparently gave them as much pleasure as it did the hearers.

A review of this concert would be incomplete without reference to the reception given Mr. Monteux, whose recent re-engagement as director has been warmly approved by the friends of the orchestra. He was given a flattering reception on his first appearance, indicating the warm feeling which has grown up between this distinguished music master and the public of Providence.

PAWT TIMES - MAR. 1.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FOURTH CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth and next to the last concert of the present season last night in Infantry Hall before an audience of good size. Emerging from the pall of the mid-Victorian programme of the previous concert, the orchestra played, with a brilliance and freshness that it has not heretofore attained during the season.

It was good to hear again Schumann'c vernal Symphony, his first venture into the larger forms of music, and to observe the freshness and enduring charm that it keeps through the years. M. Monteux led his men through it with singular sympathy and the prolonged applause at the end testified the pleasure of the audience at the beauty of the performance.

Debussy's prelude seems already to have passed into a classic of the modern repertory. It is not hard to understand why, for it is replete with an eluding quality, a charm of melodic and harmonic beauty that frequent performance has not dulled. M. Monteux, always happy in music of theatre, and from his service with the Diaghileff Ballet thrice familiar with this prelude, read it with authority.

The orchestra's remaining number was the Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakov on Spanish Themes. Spanish, as a [illegible] adjective, to many immediately summons memory of La Paloma and the Habanera of Bizet's cigarette girl. It is not with such music that Rimcky has concerned himself here. Instead he has taken native themes, some of them dance rhythms, and has clothed them with a brilliance and blaze of orchestration that for adequate performance asks something of almost every choir of the orchestra. Last night it was played with unexampled verve and elan and brought a stirring close to a most enjoyable evening.

The assisting artist was Raymond Havens, pianist, who chose as his medium Liszt's E-flat Major Concerto. Mr. Havens's appearance last evening was not his first with the orchestra, as he has played with it in other cities. It was, however, his first in what may fairly be regarded his home city, and naturally it was an occasion of interest to his many friends here who have watched his career from its modest beginnings to the present and they must have felt a deal of pride in his work, for it is no small honor to be called, at his age, to the concerts of the Boston Orchestra. For long Mr. Havens has given proof of unusual technical proficiency, fleetness, accuracy, a knowledge of the "mechanics," so to speak, of his art. The more, then, it has been occasion for regret that in him the poetizing instinct has been so slight, that a certain coldness and lack of imagination have beset his playing. Still, these are qualities natural enough to all but the most unusual players in their youth; attributes which in most only the years may bring, and perhaps in Mr. Havens's case they have begun already to bloom, though of this last night's performance could serve as no criterion, for Liszt's music is inherently a bravura piece, the medium of a virtuoso, and as such the pianist brought to it unusual gifts. He was recalled warmly at its close.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

PROV. NEWS - MAR. 1.

HAVENS PLEASES AT SYMPHONY

Noted Soloist Makes His First Appearance with Orchestra Here.

The fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. A very large audience was present, drawn there doubtless in anticipation of a superb concert by the orchestra and the fact that Raymond Havens, the brilliant young American pianist, formerly of this city, was the soloist.

The program, as arranged by Mr. Monteux, the gifted conductor of the orchestra for this Providence concert, the last but one, of the series, was of special brilliance and impressive beauty.

It was given as follows: Schumann, "Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1," Op. 38; Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," ("Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme; Liszt, "Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1," for pianoforte and orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Op. 34.

The concert opened with Schumann's "Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38." There are some who rank this symphony as Schumann's greatest work for orchestra and truly the intrinsic beauty of the work entitles it to a place beside the earlier classical masterpieces. It was written in the first year of Schumann's marriage and abounds with the zest and romance of youth. The composer himself called it his "Spring Symphony" and certainly this was no misnomer, since the work abounds in orchestral coloring of great beauty and joyousness.

Throughout the four movements of the symphony the music is extremely inspiring, powerful and brilliant and, here and there, of exquisite delicacy. An atmosphere, truly of love, happiness and spring.

Mr. Monteux gave the work a magnificent reading, notably in the final movement in which the climax was compelling in its beauty and majesty of movement.

In the "Afternoon of a Fawn," by Debussy, which followed the symphony—Mr. Monteux revealed to the full his remarkable gifts as an interpreter. In this lovely tone poem, Debussy is at his best. Debussy, however, was after all a fine landscape painter. Although he never sounded great depths or touched the emotions powerfully, his imagination was of the finest texture. He is perhaps happiest in an idyllic mood as in this composition. Mr. Monteux gave a superb reading of the poem.

The "Liszt Concerto E Flat Major," a prodigious work, with Raymond Havens as the soloist, came midway in the concert. Mr. Havens, although well known in many other cities as soloist with the Boston Symphony, made his first appearance with the orchestra in Providence on this occasion. His performance of the Concerto created a sensation. He produces a tone of extraordinary beauty, his chords have a noble sonority even in the loudest passages; he has a sense of rythm that is striking and his interpretation was that of a master. It was distinguished playing. It would indeed be difficult to recall a finer performance of the work here. At the end of the concerto a wave of prolonged applause swept through the great audience and Mr. Havens modestly bowed his acknowledgements. Three more recalls came ere the applause ceased.

The concert closed with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "Caprice on Spanish Themes"—a brilliant ending to an unusually satisfying concert. It was played throughout without pause between the movements and played with superlatively lovely effect notably in the many fine solo passages and the thrillingly characteristic rythms among the violins, wood winds, horns and flutes.—N. B. P.

PROV. TRIBUNE MAR. 1.

in the music, a x released, if h
So also with the
of rejoicing, tonal
A little more pas-
would have sung and Brahms strode almost Similarly with the first waited long before symphony, and seldom has into being more fully pano-beginning of Strauss's tone-
-Life," is the nearest, read-) Seldom, too, does music ly and irresistibly bear the its course. Compulsive i rhythm which Brahms seem nocently. His song may b were are returns of it to mas and, when motiv clashes wit oir with choir, and the who with a noble turbulence, i h below the Beethoven o
y in the major C? (There alogies like the suspensive o the finale.) Bülow may his, that or the other, when is music of Brahms "th ony." Yet at the hands of rth his salt—and Mr. Mon much more—it continues th
ain.

H. T. PARKE

Irish songs or—as the com prefers to call them—thre antasias, written by M nor voice and orchestra, wi the first times anywhere a y Concerts of next Frida
d Saturday evening. The
"The Host of the Air;
of Dooney," Caitilin ni Val
lic legend suggested them
as matter for poetry; hi ended them to Mr. Loeffle or music. Mr. McCormack Symphony Hall especiall ces, will be the singer. H heard in two airs fro ntatas of Bach. For Mozart's Serenade for th
the Haffners, prosperou Salzburg, will begin th numbers from Berlio meo and Juliet," will end i ogramme stands:

Solo by Mr. Burgin) ....Mozart
ntata, "Mein Liebe Jesu
—Air from the Cantata
aus Saba, alle Kommen," Bach
r. McCormack for Tenor Voice and Or-Host of the Air"; "The ooney"; "Caitilin ni Val-Poems by Yeats).
Loeffler
Romeo Alone" and "Queen
e Symphony, "Romeo and ....................Berlioz

g, March 13, in Symph of the "special" Sympho
d to please a more m less regular public tha them. Eagerly and sired audience has com
a will play; Mr. Monteu
ugh Dvořák's Symphony, World"; Saint-Saëns's
hale's Spinning Wheel"; Overture, "Leonore, No.
first violoncellist of the e solo part in Lalo's Con-

K AT SYMPHONY

ck will be the soloist at Boston Symphony con-
ven in Symphony Hall
ternoon and Saturday ill take the voice part antasies which Charles has recently written poet Yeats, using Ga

XTRA SYMPHONY

ert of the extra serie stituted this year b
hony Orchestra will b
ny Hall a week fro
March 13, at 8:1
etti, 'cellist, who lead
he orchestra, will pla concerto by Lalo.

MAR. 4.

T BY AN BY PHONY

"Lament of Vins High bation

DOWNES

sion, which some ared, took place
n in Symphony
Symphony Or-
nteux conductor,
he first time in erpts from the of Rachel," by [79]

NO, SOLOIST

the Russian so appearance i is occasion. Sh by Russian
y-Kors

"Song Without Words" for soprano and orchestra; the song and revery of Parasha from Moussorgsky's unfinished opera, "The Fair at Sorochinsk." The innovating Slavs were balanced and sandwiched between two masterpieces by Germans, Brahms' heroic C minor symphony and Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Saminsky, born in Odessa in 1883, now lives in New York. He was a student at the Petrograd Conservatory when he gave up mathematics and philosophy for music, becoming, in 1906, a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The music for the biblical tragedy, "The Lament of Rachel," was intended for performance in the Moscow Dramatic Theatre in 1913. The production not taking place Mr. Saminsky wrote his own scenario from incidents described in the Book of Genesis and made of his score a ballet.

There are two excerpts. Thus the composer: "Jacob's uncle Laban . . . promises Jacob that he will give him his daughter, Rachel, in marriage, but he deceives his nephew and forces him to marry the elder daughter, Lea. The first excerpt describes the desolation of the deceived Rachel, her lament, cry to Jehovah, and final resignation. The second excerpt describes the wedding festivities."

Aside from its original designation for the stage, this is picturesque and, in the first excerpt, emotional music. Hebrew scales, tonalities and ancient folk airs are largely employed. They are employed with an uncommon sense of color, with a technic no doubt derived from Rimsky-Korsakoff's school. The music of the despairing Rachel says much, in a short time, and says it in a racial manner. The wedding music is less emotional and perhaps less original. More intimate acquaintance might strengthen the impression that if anything there are too many themes employed in these short excerpts. All of the ideas are eloquent. Fewer ideas, treated more coherently and symphonically would probably make a better effect in concert, if not with the stage spectacle.

Of the songs sung by Mme. Koshetz, the two by Rimsky-Korsakoff and by Moussorgsky, songs of simple and true human feeling, made a greater impression on one writer, at least, than the song of Prokofiev. Mr. Prokofiev, who seems to us in this song to write with ingenuity and boldness, but not without effort and with rather obvious scheming.

Performance of Brahms Superb

Mme. Koshetz was suffering from a severe cold. At the rehearsal the day before the concert, it had been difficult for her to sing at all. It is reasonable to expect that tonight she will be in better voice, more master of her tone quality and of pitch. She interpreted the songs with spirit, and they gave much pleasure, despite her handicap, to the audience.

Mr. Monteux's performance of Brahms' symphony showed that Brahms may be sensuously beautiful and romantic as well as strong and heroic. The middle movement of the symphony has seldom had such pervading mood, such tonal beauty. The same thing may be said of the performance of the pastoral movement which follows, which has seldom had such imagination and charm. The finale of this symphony is one of the tests of any conductor. The horn episode was never played here more beautifully. Early Wagner as it may be, the "Flying Dutchman" overture continues to stir the hearer with its proud music of the storm, particularly when played with the sweep and the dramatic accent that it had yesterday.

POST MAR 4

McCORMACK SOLOIST

Charles Martin Loeffler's latest work, a set of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra, will be conducted from manuscript by Mr. Monteux at the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The last trip of the orchestra to New York will occupy the succeeding week. The Irish fantasies are settings of texts by Yeats and Hefernan. The numbers are entitled: 1—The Host of the Air; 2—The Fiddler of Dooney; 3—Caitilin Ni Vallachain. John McCormack will sing them and also two airs from cantatas by Bach.

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" (K. 250), in which the solo part will be taken by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and close it with the Garden Scene and Queen Mab Scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The "New World's Symphony of Dvorak will be conducted by Mr. Monteux at the fourth of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra, a week from tomorrow evening, March 13, at 8:15.

The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the violoncello section of the orchestra. His high reputation in the old world has been confirmed and enhanced in the new, by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and by recitals of his own. The concerto which he will play will be Lalo's. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and close the concert with the Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, of Beethoven.

ERALD-MAR 5

[80]

McCormack Symphony Soloist

Charles Martin Loeffler's latest work, a set of Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra, will be conducted from manuscript by Pierre Monteux at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 10th and 11th, this pair to be followed by the last trip of the orchestra to New York, which will occupy the succeeding week. The "Irish Fantasies" are settings of texts by the poet Yeats, in which Mr. Loeffler has used Gaelic folk tunes. The numbers are entitled: 1. The Host of the Air; 2. The Fiddler of Dooney; 3. Caitilin Ni Vallachain. John McCormack will sing them and will also be heard in two airs from cantatas by Bach.

Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade," (K. 250), in which the solo part will be taken by Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, and close it with the Garden Scene and Queen Mab Scherzo from Berlioz' Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

Fourth Extra Symphony

The "New World" Symphony of Dvorak, which more than any other of his works has made the Bohemian composer beloved in this country, will be performed by Pierre Monteux at the fourth of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place a week from tomorrow evening, March 13, at 8:15.

The soloist at this concert will be Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, who came from Europe to take this post three seasons ago. His high reputation in the old world has been confirmed and enhanced in the new, both by his appearances as soloist with the orchestra in Boston, New York and elsewhere, and by recitals of his own in this and other cities. He will play on this occasion the Lalo concerto.

Mr. Monteux will conduct Saint-saons' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and close the concert with the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, of Beethoven, famous for the trumpet calls of deliverance which are heard behind the stage and for its joyous and triumphant close.

POST- MAR. 5.

McCormack in Irish Fantasies With Symphony

John McCormack will sing the voice part in a set of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. Charles Martin Loeffler, the noted Boston composer, has written them around Gaelic tunes to words from W. B. Yeats' poems. This will be the first public performance. Mr McCormack, appearing for the second time as soloist with Boston orchestra, will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas.

The program for the next extra concert of the Symphony, Monday, March 13, includes Dvorak's popular symphony "From the New World," Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, the most admirable of the four he wrote at different times for his opera "Fidelio," and the 'cello concerto by Lalo, with Jean Bedetti as soloist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra 18th program. "Haffner Serenade," Mozart; two arias, Bach; "Irish Fantaisies" for voice and orchestra, Loeffler (first performance); two movements from "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz. Soloist, John McCormack.

GLOBE-MAR. 5

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The "New World" Symphony of Dvorak will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the extra concert a week from tomorrow. The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section, who will play a concerto by Lalo. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.

ADVTSR. MAR. 5

Nikisch as Composer

I have read a good deal about Nikisch as composer (writes Robin Legge in The London Telegraph) yet here again I have not read the simple truth as to why he destroyed practically the whole of his compositions. Incidentally, I have in my library a number of very beautiful songs by Nikisch, but these, I think, are the sole remainder of his creations. That he was gifted beyond the ordinary many will avow from the fact of his gaining, for a string quartet, the great gold medal of the Conservatorium at Vienna when a mere boy. I am one of the few still living who heard many of his compositions in private, five and thirty years ago, and it was my painful privilege to help Nikisch himself to destroy by fire a huge mass of his manuscripts in his garden—literally buckets full of them. Why? Because, as Arthur Nikisch averred, "My dear Robin, no man can serve two masters; I am a conductor"! He was plainly right. Every day we see this once famous pianist or that turning away from his true musical god to follow a strange idol; but never yet in contemporary history have we found a musician truly and historically great in one respect whose talent has not deteriorated on its being diluted. I suggest Paderewski, d'Albert, Busoni for a start. Indisputably Nikisch was right—no man can serve two masters.

Seldom has Mr. Monteux been more heartily and sincerely applauded at the Symphony Concerts than he was by the audience of Saturday evening at the end of Brahms's Symphony in C minor. Of course the music itself contributed not a little to the ardor of the hearers; yet the performance had heightened and warmed it. Once, twice and thrice Mr. Monteux was recalled with clapping undiminished. Then he bade the orchestra share the plaudits, and the house rang with them.

In the course of the spring, Sibeluis's new, drastic, brief and much debated Fifth Symphony will be played at the Symphony Concerts. Like Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Stransky, Mr. Monteux has finally decided that he owes a performance to the prestige of the composer and the curiosity of a part of the public.

For the first times in America at the concerts of Mr. Stokowski's orchestra in Philadelphia last Friday and Saturday, Stravinsky's mimodrama, "The Rite of Spring" ("Le Sacré du Printemps"), was played in entirety as a concert-piece. Hitherto the experiment has been tried only in Paris by Mr. Monteux in 1914 and in London by Mr. Goossens last June. By all accounts, every audience that has so heard the music has been deeply stirred—even in Philadelphia. Mr. Monteux might well renew the venture in Boston, especially with such a minutely descriptive programme as Mr. Evans supplied in London and Mr. Gilman in Philadelphia. Unfortunately these scenes of ancient ritual in pagan Russia have never been set on the American stage.

TRANS-MAR. 6

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ENTERTAINS

Boston Musicians Delight Large Audience Sunday Afternoon

PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTS THEM

Finely Rendered Program Is Warmly Applauded by Music Lovers

Occasionally Lawrence has musical entertainment of real merit. At the Colonial theater yesterday afternoon came one of those occasions, the attraction being the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. As was the case earlier in the season when Geraldine Farrar sang, the house was sold out, and the audience was most demonstrative in its appreciation.

It would be hard to explain any lack of demonstrativeness, to be sure, because the orchestra played in its best style, than which there is none better, and the program, which had been arranged by Mr. Monteux and Robert E. Sault, was an extremely well balanced one.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony opened the program, and after the first part of this number had been finished there was a brief pause during which many tardy ones were seated. It was unfortunate that such an interruption had to occur, and seemed hardly necessary, inasmuch as the concert did not begin until a few minutes after the scheduled time, the start being delayed purposely that the audience might be seated first.

After the Tschaikowsky number came Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, the solo work being in the hands of the concert master, Richard Burgin. Mr. Burgin, who is only 28 years old, proved himself an unusual violinist, and the audience was generous in its applause, between the different movements, and at the end of his playing. Undoubtedly they would have enjoyed an encore, but that was not to be.

Incidental music to "Rosamunde" by Schubert was the next number, and it was most delightful. The concluding piece was the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and, perhaps because it was the most familiar, it was listened to with more interest than had been the earlier pieces, and the applause that followed its conclusion was unmistakable evidence that it was liked. Although the number ended the program, Mr. Monteux was obliged to return to the stage three times to bow his acknowledgements.

During the past eight years the Boston Symphony has been heard here something like five times, but it was never, probably, heard to better advantage than was the case yesterday. In the audience were many who are frequent visitors to Symphony hall at the Friday afternoon concerts, as well as many others, of course, who hear such music only when it is brought here.

Already plans are being made for next season's concerts, but just how Lawrence will fare is not known as yet. Lawrence needs a larger place for such programs. An auditorium with a larger seating capacity would mean more worth while concerts, because the expense attached to such performances is very big. Under present conditions a capacity house little more than pays the expenses, and anything short of a capacity house means loss. And that is the chance that Messrs Sault and Donovan take in booking these concerts for Lawrence.

Lowell, with its new auditorium which will seat 2000 or so more than Lawrence's largest auditorium, is going to have some good concerts another season. And, with the added seating capacity, it will not be necessary to charge as high prices as is the case here. The success of a concert like that given yesterday, and like some of the others, should have a tendency to stir up those who enjoy such things towards urging the building, in some way, of a suitable auditorium. It is one of Lawrence's greatest needs today.

In passing it may be remarked that two more concerts, or rather pairs of concerts, by the Symphony ensemble are still to be heard. One comes one week from today, and the other two weeks from today.

LAWRNCE TEL. MAR. 6

HAVENS WELCOMED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pianist Makes Fine Impression at Appearance with Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence this season was played last evening in Infantry Hall, and was an occasion of special interest to Rhode Island people because of the selection of Raymond Havens as the soloist. Mr. Havens, formerly of Providence, with many friends in Pawtucket and vicinity, has steadily grown in his art, and has taken a prominent place among American pianists. His playing last evening was of high character, dignified and impressive, and the artist was warmly applauded by the large audience.

His selection was the Liszt concerto in E-flat major, and Mr. Havens showed ability to take full advantage of its opportunities. His technical powers, which are of notable order, were given full scope and he worked up to a splendid climax at the close. Repeated recalls registered the fine impression his playing made on the audience.

Schumann's "Spring Symphony" was the principal orchestra number of the evening. This is one of the most beautiful works played by the great orchestras of the present day, and it splendidly interpreted by Conductor Monteux. Undoubtedly it was one of the finest performances of the season, calling forth great applause at the close of each movement. It is difficult to imagine anything more beautiful than the orchestra's playing of the larghetto, one of the sweetest movements in the works of the great music masters.

Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," a familiar number to symphony patrons, was splendidly given, and the concert was brought to a brilliant close with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." The flashing beauties of this striking piece were strikingly brought out, conductor and orchestra entering wholeheartedly into a work which apparently gave them as much pleasure as it did the hearers.

A review of this concert would be incomplete without reference to the reception given Mr. Monteux, whose recent re-engagement as director has been warmly approved by the friends of the orchestra. He was given a flattering reception on his first appearance, indicating the warm feeling which has grown up between this distinguished music master and the public of Providence.

PAWT TIMES MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FOURTH CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth and next to the last concert of the present season last night in Infantry Hall before an audience of good size. Emerging from the pall of the mid-Victorian programme of the previous concert, the orchestra played, with a brilliance and freshness that it has not heretofore attained during the season.

It was good to hear again Schumann'c vernal Symphony, his first venture into the larger forms of music, and to observe the freshness and enduring charm that it keeps through the years. M. Monteux led his men through it with singular sympathy and the prolonged applause at the end testified the pleasure of the audience at the beauty of the performance.

Debussy's prelude seems already to have passed into a classic of the modern repertory. It is not hard to understand why, for it is replete with an eluding quality, a charm of melodic and harmonic beauty that frequent performance has not dulled. M. Monteux, always happy in music of theatre, and from his service with the Diaghileff Ballet thrice familiar with this prelude, read it with authority.

The orchestra's remaining number was the Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff on Spanish Themes. Spanish, as a musical adjective, to many immediately summons memory of La Paloma and the Habanera of Bizet's cigarette girl. It is not with such music that Rimcky has concerned himself here. Instead he has taken native themes, some of them dance rhythms, and has clothed them with a brilliance and blaze of orchestration that for adequate performance asks something of almost every choir of the orchestra. Last night it was played with unexampled verve and elan and brought a stirring close to a most enjoyable evening.

The assisting artist was Raymond Havens, pianist, who chose as his medium Liszt's E-flat Major Concerto. Mr. Havens's appearance last evening was not his first with the orchestra, as he has played with it in other cities. It was, however, his first in what may fairly be regarded his home city, and naturally it was an occasion of interest to his many friends here who have watched his career from its modest beginnings to the present and they must have felt a deal of pride in his work, for it is no small honor to be called, at his age, to the concerts of the Boston Orchestra. For long Mr. Havens has given proof of unusual technical proficiency, fleetness, accuracy, a knowledge of the "mechanics," so to speak, of his art. The more, then, it has been occasion for regret that in him the poetizing instinct has been so slight, that a certain coldness and lack of imagination have beset his playing. Still, these are qualities natural enough to all but the most unusual players in their youth; attributes which in most only the years may bring, and perhaps in Mr. Havens's case they have begun already to bloom, though of this last night's performance could serve as no criterion, for Liszt's music is inherently a bravura piece, the medium of a virtuoso, and as such the pianist brought to it unusual gifts. He was recalled warmly at its close.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

PROV. NEWS-MAR. 1.

HAVENS PLEASES AT SYMPHONY

Noted Soloist Makes His First Appearance with Orchestra Here.

The fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. A very large audience was present, drawn there doubtless in anticipation of a superb concert by the orchestra and the fact that Raymond Havens, the brilliant young American pianist, formerly of this city, was the soloist.

The program, as arranged by Mr. Monteux, the gifted conductor of the orchestra for this Providence concert, the last but one, of the series, was of special brilliance and impressive beauty.

It was given as follows: Schumann, "Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1," Op. 38; Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," ("Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme; Liszt, "Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1," for pianoforte and orchestra; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Caprice on Spanish Themes," Op. 34.

The concert opened with Schumann's "Symphony in B-flat, No. 1, Op. 38." There are some who rank this symphony as Schumann's greatest work for orchestra and truly the intrinsic beauty of the work entitles it to a place beside the earlier classical masterpieces. It was written in the first year of Schumann's marriage and abounds with the zest and romance of youth. The composer himself called it his "Spring Symphony" and certainly this was no misnomer, since the work abounds in orchestral coloring of great beauty and joyousness.

Throughout the four movements of the symphony the music is extremely inspiring, powerful and brilliant and, here and there, of exquisite delicacy. An atmosphere, truly of love, happiness and spring.

Mr. Monteux gave the work a magnificent reading, notably in the final movement in which the climax was compelling in its beauty and majesty of movement.

In the "Afternoon of a Fawn," by Debussy, which followed the symphony—Mr. Monteux revealed to the full his remarkable gifts as an interpreter. In this lovely tone poem, Debussy is at his best. Debussy, however, was after all a fine landscape painter. Although he never sounded great depths or touched the emotions powerfully, his imagination was of the finest texture. He is perhaps happiest in an idyllic mood as in this composition. Mr. Monteux gave a superb reading of the poem.

The "Liszt Concerto E Flat Major," a prodigious work, with Raymond Havens as the soloist, came midway in the concert. Mr. Havens, although well known in many other cities as soloist with the Boston Symphony, made his first appearance with the orchestra in Providence on this occasion. His performance of the Concerto created a sensation. He produces a tone of extraordinary beauty, his chords have a noble sonority even in the loudest passages; he has a sense of rythm that is striking and his interpretation was that of a master. It was distinguished playing. It would indeed be difficult to recall a finer performance of the work here. At the end of the concerto a wave of prolonged applause swept through the great audience and Mr. Havens modestly bowed his acknowledgements. Three more recalls came ere the applause ceased.

The concert closed with Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful "Caprice on Spanish Themes"—a brilliant ending to an unusually satisfying concert. It was played throughout without pause between the movements and played with superlatively lovely effect notably in the many fine solo passages and the thrillingly characteristic rythms among the violins, wood winds, horns and flutes.—N. B. P.

PROV. TRIBUNE
MAR. 1.

RAYMOND HAVENS HERE AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Raymond Havens, formerly a resident of this city, as soloist, played here for the fourth time this season at Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance.

There was much interest shown in the appearance of Mr. Havens. His many friends had reason to be pleased over his showing and gave him a big reception at the conclusion of his brilliant performance of the Liszt concerto. Conductor Monteux was given a hearty welcome as he came out for the opening number, partly inspired, perhaps, by the recent announcement of his re-engagement as the orchestra's leader.

M. Monteux again showed his ability as a programme builder by providing finely contrasted and interesting numbers. The list follows:

Schumann..........Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38
Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo: Molto vivace, Trio I: Molto piu vivace Trio II.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt....Concerto, E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra
Rimsky-Korsakov....Saprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
Alborada.
Variations.
Alborada.
Scene and Gypsy Song.
Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)

That M. Monteux will continue to lead the Boston orchestra should be a source of satisfaction to Providence patrons of these concerts. Since his connection with the orchestra there has been provided programmes of delightful interest, and his wide musical knowledge, sound musicianship and ability as interpreter of all schools of symphonic writing have made him a favorite here.

Gives "Spring Symphony"

Last evening the ever-welcome and beautiful Schumann "Spring Symphony" was given a sympathetic reading—one in which the hearer's interest was not allowed to waver for a moment. It is not a work which sounds the depths of human feeling, but rather one that makes strong appeal by reason of sustained beauty of melody, richness of coloring and joyous atmosphere. Schumann never wrote anything more beautifully expressive of his optimistic outlook of life than this symphony.

In most symphonic works there is room for many guesses on the part of the listener, in the absence of any definite statement of the composer's intent regarding their sources of inspiration. One requires little imagination, however, to follow the thought which so sweetly guides the course of this happily conceived work. There was spring in Schumann's heart when he wrote it, and it creates the spirit of optimism in the mind of the hearer. M. Monteux invested the first movement with a becoming simplicity of style and brought out many effects of color by delicate prominence, at proper times, of the different instrumental voices.

The Larghetto sang of a soft, balmy evening when the soothing sounds of nature are a symphony to the spiritual ear. In this movement M. Monteux produced some lovely effects of nuance. Delicacy was characteristic of the Scherzo and the finale was brilliantly played.

In contrast to the style of the symphony, the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," took the audience to the modernist field where grow exotic musical flowers. The prelude has been played here before under M. Monteux's baton. Its peculiar beauty and imaginative character are grateful to M. Monteux whose liking for the compositions of the modern French school is well known. The music, inspired by the poem of S. Mallarme, is interesting both for the manner in which it suggests the thought of the text and its qualities of striking originality in melodic invention and harmonic dress.

The faun is represented by the flute and Mr. Laurent played his prominent part in the piece with delightful expression and style.

First Appearance Here

Although Mr. Havens has played on other occasions as soloist with the Boston orchestra, it was his first appearance with that organization in this city. As a boy Mr. Havens showed great talent for his instrument. Always a hard and conscientious student, his progress was steady and success was the natural result. For several seasons Mr. Havens has held a prominent place among the young American pianists.

The Liszt concerto, No. 1, is not a work which might be called ideal for the display of all-round pianistic ability. But it gives the player occasional opportunity to show other qualities than brilliance. There are moments when a singing tone and legato passages are in order. On these occasions Mr. Havens showed his sense of tonal values and gave conclusive evidence of his musicianship. His technical ability is equal to any demand. His runs and difficult passage work were given with splendid ease and certainty. His tone is full and musical and does not lose its attractive quality in the midst of technical display or when power is necessary.

The latter portion of the concerto is the more interesting. The musical development brings stirring passages for both solo instrument and orchestra. The piano effects were brought out with compelling fire and the work was concluded with tremendous power and spirit.

Mr. Havens returned several times to acknowledge the applause accorded him.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakov, is a series of characteristic movements rich in striking effects of instrumental color and strong rhythm. The orchestra played it with stirring effect.

A. F. P.

MR. LOEFFLER'S FANTASIAS

His Settings of Irish Poems for Orchestra and Tenor Voice to Be Heard for the First Time at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—The Chosen Poems and the Composer's Way with Them

In 1908 the house of G. Schirmer published, under the general title, "The Wind Among the Reeds," two songs by Charles Martin Loeffler, written to poems by William Butler Yeats. For long these and the preceding set of four songs—to texts by Rossetti, Poe and G. C. Lodge—comprise Mr. Loeffler's sole ventures in the supplying of music to English verse. During the summer and autumn of 1920, however, he composed a set of Five Irish Fantasias for tenor voice and orchestra, and three of these will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of this week with Mr. McCormack as the singer. For the first two Fantasias the composer has taken his early settings of the poems of Yeats—"The Hosting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air"—elaborating, amplifying, and here and there altering them. For the third and the fourth—"The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Ballad of the Fox-Hunter"—he has again utilized poems by Yeats; the text of the fifth, "The Song of Caitilin Ni Uallachian" is the work of W. Heffernan, otherwise unknown. For tomorrow and Saturday, the second, the third and the fifth Fantasias have been chosen.

In the version for voice and piano the following foreword by the poet accompanies "The Host of the Air."

> Dr. Joyce says: "Of all the different kinds of goblins . . . air demons were most dreaded by the people. They lived among clouds, and mists, and rocks, and hated the human race with the utmost malignity." A very old Arann charm, which contains the words "Send God, by his strength, between us and the host of Sidhe, between us and the host of the air," seems also to distinguish among them. They are said to steal brides just after their marriage, and sometimes in a blast of wind.

The poem follows:

O'Driscoll drove with a song
The wild duck and the drake
From the tall and tufted reeds
Of the drear Hart Lake.

And he saw how the reeds grew dark
At the coming of night-tide
And dreamed of the long dim hair
Of Bridget, his bride.

He heard, while he sang and dreamed,
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

And he saw young men and young girls
Who danced on a level place,
And Bridget his bride among them,
With a sad and a gay face.

The dancers crowded about him,
And many a sweet thing said,
And a young man brought him red wine,
And a young girl white bread.

But Bridget drew him by the sleeve
Away from the merry bands,
To old men playing at cards
With a twinkling of ancient hands.

The bread and the wine had a doom,
For these were the host of the air;
He sat and played in a dream
Of her long, dim hair.

He played with the merry old men
And thought not of evil chance,
Until one bore Bridget his bride
Away from the merry dance.

He bore her away in his arms,
The handsomest young man there,
And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long dim hair.

O'Driscoll scattered the cards
And out of his dream awoke:
Old men and young men and young girls
Were gone like a drifting smoke.

But he heard high up in the air
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

Mr. Loeffler has not in this song striven too assiduously to give his music a Celtic flavor, though here and there appears a hint of Irish folk-song. Originally in A-flat major, the music has been transposed to B major that it might better meet the requirements of a tenor voice. The accompaniment is scored for the customary "full orchestra," with the addition of a celesta.

In "the Fiddler of Dooney" the Celtic idiom is more in evidence. At the beginning a dance-tune of modal character is announced by the first violins, and in one form or another this melody is heard through most of the song. With the addition of a xylophone the instrumentation is the same as that of the previous piece. The poem runs thus:

When I play on my fiddle in Dooney
Folks dance like a wave on the sea;
My cousin is priest in Kilvarnet
My brother in Moharabuiee.

I passed my brother and cousin
They read in their books of prayer;
I read in my book of songs
I bought at the Sligo fair.

When we come at the end of time
To Peter sitting in state,
He will smile on the three old spirits
But call me first through the gate;

For the good are always the merry,
Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love to fiddle
And the merry love to dance.

And when the young folks there spy me
They will always come up to me
With, "Here is the fiddler of Dooney!"
And dance like a wave of the sea.

The text of the last piece, "The Song of Caitilin Ni Uallachian" (more familiarly known as Kathleen Ni Houlihan) is in Gaelic but written above it in the score is the English translation in which it will be sung.

How tossed, how lost with all hopes crossed we have been!
Our gold is gone; gear have we none, as all have seen.
But ships shall brave the ocean's wave, and morn shall dawn,
On Eire green, on Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

Let none believe this lovely Eve outworn or old.
Fair is her form: her blood is warm, her heart is bold;
Her songful voice that makes rejoice hearts grief hath gnawn.
Prove her our Queen, our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heaven will make us strong.
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on,
Will aid our Queen, our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

O, Virgin pure! Our true and sure defence Thou art!
Pray Thou Thy Son to help us on in hand and heart.
Our Prince, our Light shall banish Night, then beameth Dawn,
Then shall be seen our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

Our priests are as one man imploring Christ,
Our bards are songful and their gloom dispelled,
Our souls are hopeful, know no fear,
When we think of our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

For this song, the largest-scaled and to all appearances the most effective of the five, the composer has employed a huge orchestra; in detail, two flutes, two piccolos, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bas clarinet, two basoons, contrabassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, three kettledrums, two snare-drums, bass-drum, cymbals, celesta, two harps and the usual strings. He stipulates that the harps should be stationed on opposite sides of the stage. The music begins stormily (G minor, three-two time) with an incisive theme for wind instruments against rapidly reiterated chords in the strings. The second stanza brings appropriate softening of the mood. By way of interlude comes a merry theme of folk-song character, played by piccolo and celesta, while through the last division of the song much use is made of a march-like theme that has likewise a Celtic tinge. Those familiar with Mr. Loeffler's ways need hardly be told that these Fantasias are written in the complex modern manner; that the rhythms are free; the harmonies anything but orthodox; the instrumentation highly original and replete with all manner of dramatic and poetic touches. Yet the songs should not prove formidable in the hearing. Both for the voice and in the orchestra there is melody a-plenty, and when the Celtic element predominates it is melody that should seize the ear and quicken the pulse.

W. S. S.

TRANS MAR 9

LOEFFLER'S "IRISH FANTAISIES" SUNG

Composer Shares Applause With McCormack

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Irish Fantaisies" for voice and orchestra, sung for the first time in public yesterday afternoon at the Symphony concert, were very cordially received by the audience. Mr Loeffler came out on the stage to share the applause with John McCormack, who sang the voice part with his usual skill and imaginative sympathy, though hampered by a heavy cold. These settings of poems by Yeats and Hefernan are skilfully wrought music, pleasant to hear, but lacking compelling emotional power.

Mr McCormack's art was more severely tested by two arias from unfamiliar cantatas of Bach, composed in the early years of his sojourn in Leipsic. He sang them with the requisite dignity and sublety, in English. The lack of cohesion between the organ accompaniment based on Bach's figured bass and the orchestra may have had something to do with the apathy of the audience toward these two numbers. Possibly some of those present still fail to observe what their ears should have told them yesterday; the fact that McCormack is a very great singer, not to be judged by the type of encore song by which he delights popular audiences.

Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," composed when he was a boy of 20, is music to make the most world-weary of pessimists feel young, calm and hopeful as he listens. Richard Burgin's exquisite playing of the violin solo part helped notably in lifting the performance out of the routine atmosphere now too prevalent at these concerts and making it something to be remembered for years to come. The audience applauded with an enthusiasm it does not often vouchsafe nowadays to Mozart or to those who perform his works. Mr Monteux took unusual pains to make the music effective and succeeded in giving a much better interpretation than he has yet offered of any Mozart piece.

Berlioz' favorite among his own works, the music illustrating the balcony scene in "Romeo and Juliet" from his symphony with that title, was also very well played and received with more favor than usual. The "Queen Mab" scherzo from the same piece, though hitherto better liked, seemed yesterday less imaginative.

There are no regular Symphony concerts next week. March 24 and 25 Emilio de Gogorza will sing "Where E'er You Walk" from Handel's "Semele" and a song by Alvarez. The other numbers announced are d'Indy's "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Goldmark's overture "Im Fruehling."

GLOBE MAR. 11

[8]

Wagner Program for Pension Fund

A program, consisting entirely of excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner, will be played at the forty-first Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the proceeds to be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert is to be in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30.

Pierre Monteux will conduct on this occasion the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Meistersingers." The second portion will consist of numbers from each of the four music dramas of the "Ring" Cycle.

Extra Symphony Concert.

Next Monday evening, March 13, at Symphony Hall at 8:15, the fourth concert of the newly instituted series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of this great orchestra, has compiled for this occasion a program of especial brilliance and interest.

The symphony will be the fifth of Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, inspired by his visit to this country and called "From the New World."

AMER. MAR. 11.

McCormack Sings with Symphony

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony Orchestra proved to be one of those rare occasions when sheer enjoyment marked each of the numbers on the program. Pierre Monteux conducted.

The opening work was Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade. This is in four parts, into which violin solos are interpolated. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, played these parts. This "Serenade" was composed for a wedding and is therefore bright in idea and musical effect. The solo parts are freely written and give opportunity for display of versatility as well as musical feeling. Mr. Burgin scored greatly by his work yesterday and was rewarded by sincere applause from the audience.

John McCormack was soloist with the orchestra. He sang two Bach cantata "airs." One was from "Lost Is My Dear Jesus" and the other from "All They from Sheba Shall Come." Mr. McCormack sings Bach with understanding and reserve. He is therefore successful in his interpretations. The second number seemed just a little hurried, but both of the airs were done with the emotion and certain sincerity which they demand.

Mr. McCormack also sang Charles Leoffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra." These were "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan." The first is an Irish fairy tale and therefore fanciful to the extreme. In his presentation of the voice part and in its accompaniment Mr. Leoffler has given biazarre effects which are intricate and full of detail. The second and last took their accompaniment from the nature of the piece. In "The Fiddler of Dooney" a fiddling accompaniment weaves its way around the song, while in the last martial notes, stirring fife and drum effects and sober prayerful moments make keen contrasts. Mr. McCormack was in tune to the atmosphere of the work and sang accordingly.

Mr. Leoffler attended the concert and received his share of the applause.

The last number on the program consisted of two excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet."

M. J. W.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Monday evening, March 13, at Symphony Hall at 8:15, the fourth concert of the newly instituted series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given. The symphony will be the fifth of Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, called "From the New World." Other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture. The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti.

WAGNER PROGRAM

A program consisting entirely of excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner will be played at the 41st Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the proceeds to be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert is to be in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3.30.

TRAV. MAR. 11

M'CORMACK SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Songs Provoke Extraordinary Enthusiasm

BY OLIN DOWNES

We are not propagandists. We are not discussing the freedom or Home Rule for Ireland. We are speaking of Irish poems, set by Charles Martin Loeffler, and John McCormack, in a perform long to be remembered, at the cert given by the Boston Sympho Orchestra, Pierre Monteux condu tor, yesterday afternoon in Sym phony Hall.

PROVOKES ENTHUSIASM

It was an extraordinary experien for any hearer. It provoked a demo stration of unqualified enthusiasm, from an audience of partisans, bu from musicians and everybody els capable of response to music of extra ordinary color and evocative power.

Mr. McCormack, despite a throat i poor condition, sang like a poet and prophet, until, with the old Irish tune "Colleen dhas crutha na mo," ("The pretty girl milking the cow") s skirling by Dr. Loeffler in the orches tra, you would have said that ever Celt in the universe was a-marching!

Mr. McCormack sang two airs from Bach, the air "Lost is my Jesus" from the cantata of that name, and the air "Take from Thy very own" from the cantata "All they from Sheba sha come," and then the three songs by Mr Loeffler.

The Loeffler Songs

These are "The Hosts of the Sidhe" and "The Fiddler of Dooney", th poems by William Butler Yeats, an "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Hoilihan, after the verse of Heferan the Blind The song "The Hosts of the Sidhe narrating the dream of Heferan th Blind. The two first songs were sun in Boston with piano accompanime in 1900 by the late David Bispham.

The song of Caitalin-ni-Hoilhan is o recent origin. All the songs benefit b the orchestra, the piano being a poo substitute for the colors of the instru ments when it comes to painting t vague sorrow that oppressed t hunter, who lay in the reeds, hear the piping in the air, "piping never sad, and piping never so gay," and his own dream, drank the cursed bread and wine of those who wishe evil on him and his bride.

One a Rollicking Jig

The Celtic quality of this song is mor rarefied—and it is in this sense th most beautiful of the three. But th accompaniment of the song of th "Fiddler of Dooney" is a not unfamilia Irish jig. Mr. McCormack has heard i himself in Ireland, and it is the accom panyment of the reckless merriment the adventurous spirit, and the strange longing which echoes at the end of the song and still haunts the memory.

But the third song is an Irish chan of glory, when Mr. Loeffler employ not only the rare color, but the mos superb sonorities of his instrument The archaic tune of "The Pretty Gir Milking the Cow," which is much olde we should say, than the verse, inas much as it existed in Ireland long be fore the Christian religion was know there, gives an amazing atmosphere t the whole. And when the word "Ca talin ni Holihan," as Ireland, th Queen, is called by Heferan the Blind occurs at the end of certain lines, it is taken from the mouth of the tenor by the trumpets and proclaimed with a power and a pomp that no voice could ever equal. And when, with the sweeping of harps and the tread of the great march, Mr. McCormack comes to the verse:

"We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heav'n will make us strong.
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on
Will aid our queen, our Caitalin-ni-Hollhan–"

When he sings this, you may be a crustacean, a crocodile, or a member of the Loyal Coalition, but you will think the hair is rising on your head, and the gooseflesh will course up and down your spine!

No wonder that there was enthusiasm, with Messrs. Loeffler, McCormack and Monteux bowing from the stage, to each other, to the orchestra, to the audience.

At the opening of the concert nearly as much applause was bestowed on a composer named Mozart and on Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, for his solo violin playing in the "Haffner" Serenade. This music is heard too seldom.

Melody of Purest Kind

The gayety of the first and last movement is Mozart in a jesting vain, but the whole Serenade would be worth while if only for the second movement. It is melody of the purest kind. It is workmanship of the period antedating the symphonic practices of Haydn and Beethoven, and it shows that even in an extended instrumental form it is not necessary to play battle-door and shuttle-cock with melodies, in the symphonic manner now classic and practised by everybody from Beethoven to Richard Strauss. No! Here is a simplicity, a marvelous line, and melodies that exfoliate the one from the other in a manner a universe away from the work bench on which our symphonic forefathers labored so earnestly.

Berlioz music, the "Garden Scene" and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from the Romeo and Juliet symphony brought the programme to an end. Perhaps because of the excitement which preceded it, it seemed of inordinate length.

POS

RAYMOND HAVENS HERE AS SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Raymond Havens, formerly a resident of this city, as soloist, played here for the fourth time this season at Infantry Hall last evening. There was the usual large attendance.

There was much interest shown in the appearance of Mr. Havens. His many friends had reason to be pleased over his showing and gave him a big reception at the conclusion of his brilliant performance of the Liszt concerto. Conductor Monteux was given a hearty welcome as he came out for the opening number, partly inspired, perhaps, by the recent announcement of his re-engagement as the orchestra's leader.

M. Monteux again showed his ability as a programme builder by providing finely contrasted and interesting numbers. The list follows:

Schumann..........Symphony in B-flat major. No. 1, Op. 38
Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo: Molto vivace, Trio I: Molto piu vivace Trio II.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Debussy..''Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune'' (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun''), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Liszt....Concerto, E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra
Rimsky-Korsakov....Saprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
Alborada.
Variations.
Alborada.
Scene and Gypsy Song.
Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause.)

That M. Monteux will continue to lead the Boston orchestra should be a source of satisfaction to Providence patrons of these concerts. Since his connection with the orchestra there has been provided programmes of delightful interest, and his wide musical knowledge, sound musicianship and ability as interpreter of all schools of symphonic writing have made him a favorite here.

Gives "Spring Symphony"

Last evening the ever-welcome and beautiful Schumann "Spring Symphony" was given a sympathetic reading—one in which the hearer's interest was not allowed to waver for a moment. It is not a work which sounds the depths of human feeling, but rather one that makes strong appeal by reason of sustained beauty of melody, richness of coloring and joyous atmosphere. Schumann never wrote anything more beautifully expressive of his optimistic outlook of life than this symphony.

In most symphonic works there is room for many guesses on the part of the listener, in the absence of any definite statement of the composer's intent regarding their sources of inspiration. One requires little imagination, however, to follow the thought which so sweetly guides the course of this happily conceived work. There was spring in Schumann's heart when he wrote it, and it creates the spirit of optimism in the mind of the hearer. M. Monteux invested the first movement with a becoming simplicity of style and brought out many effects of color by delicate prominence, at proper times, of the different instrumental voices.

The Larghetto sang of a soft, balmy evening when the soothing sounds of nature are a symphony to the spiritual ear. In this movement M. Monteux produced some lovely effects of nuance. Delicacy was characteristic of the Scherzo and the finale was brilliantly played.

In contrast to the style of the symphony, the Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," took the audience to the modernist field where grow exotic musical flowers. The prelude has been played here before under M. Monteux's baton. Its peculiar beauty and imaginative character are grateful to M. Monteux whose liking for the compositions of the modern French school is well known. The music, inspired by the poem of S. Mallarme, is interesting both for the manner in which it suggests the thought of the text and its qualities of striking originality in melodic invention and harmonic dress.

The faun is represented by the flute and Mr. Laurent played his prominent part in the piece with delightful expression and style.

First Appearance Here

Although Mr. Havens has played on other occasions as soloist with the Boston orchestra, it was his first appearance with that organization in this city. As a boy Mr. Havens showed great talent for his instrument. Always a hard and conscientious student, his progress was steady and success was the natural result. For several seasons Mr. Havens has held a prominent place among the young American pianists.

The Liszt concerto, No. 1, is not a work which might be called ideal for the display of all-round pianistic ability. But it gives the player occasional opportunity to show other qualities than brilliance. There are moments when a singing tone and legato passages are in order. On these occasions Mr. Havens showed his sense of tonal values and gave conclusive evidence of his musicianship. His technical ability is equal to any demand. His runs and difficult passage work were given with splendid ease and certainty. His tone is full and musical and does not lose its attractive quality in the midst of technical display or when power is necessary.

The latter portion of the concerto is the more interesting. The musical development brings stirring passages for both solo instrument and orchestra. The piano effects were brought out with compelling fire and the work was concluded with tremendous power and spirit.

Mr. Havens returned several times to acknowledge the applause accorded him.

The "Caprice on Spanish Themes" by the Russian, Rimsky-Korsakov, is a series of characteristic movements rich in striking effects of instrumental color and strong rhythm. The orchestra played it with stirring effect. A. E. P.

JOURN. MAR. 1

MR. LOEFFLER'S FANTASIAS

His Settings of Irish Poems for Orchestra and Tenor Voice to Be Heard for the First Time at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—The Chosen Poems and the Composer's Way with Them

In 1908 the house of G. Schirmer published, under the general title, "The Wind Among the Reeds," two songs by Charles Martin Loeffler, written to poems by William Butler Yeats. For long these and the preceding set of four songs—to texts by Rossetti, Poe and G. C. Lodge—comprise Mr. Loeffler's sole ventures in the supplying of music to English verse. During the summer and autumn of 1920, however, he composed a set of Five Irish Fantasias for tenor voice and orchestra, and three of these will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of this week with Mr. McCormack as the singer. For the first two Fantasias the composer has taken his early settings of the poems of Yeats—"The Hosting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air"—elaborating, amplifying, and here and there altering them. For the third and the fourth—"The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Ballad of the Fox-Hunter"—he has again utilized poems by Yeats; the text of the fifth, "The Song of Caitilin Ni Uallachian" is the work of W. Heffernan, otherwise unknown. For tomorrow and Saturday, the second, the third and the fifth Fantasias have been chosen.

In the version for voice and piano the following foreword by the poet accompanies "The Host of the Air."

> Dr. Joyce says: "Of all the different kinds of goblins . . . air demons were most dreaded by the people. They lived among clouds, and mists, and rocks, and hated the human race with the utmost malignity." A very old Arann charm, which contains the words "Send God, by his strength, between us and the host of Sidhe, between us and the host of the air," seems also to distinguish among them. They are said to steal brides just after their marriage, and sometimes in a blast of wind.

The poem follows:

O'Driscoll drove with a song
The wild duck and the drake
From the tall and tufted reeds
Of the drear Hart Lake.

And he saw how the reeds grew dark
At the coming of night-tide
And dreamed of the long dim hair
Of Bridget, his bride.

He heard, while he sang and dreamed,
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

And he saw young men and young girls
Who danced on a level place,
And Bridget his bride among them,
With a sad and a gay face.

The dancers crowded about him,
And many a sweet thing said,
And a young man brought him red wine,
And a young girl white bread.

But Bridget drew him by the sleeve
Away from the merry bands,
To old men playing at cards
With a twinkling of ancient hands.

The bread and the wine had a doom,
For these were the host of the air;
He sat and played in a dream
Of her long, dim hair.

He played with the merry old men
And thought not of evil chance,
Until one bore Bridget his bride
Away from the merry dance.

He bore her away in his arms,
The handsomest young man there,
And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long dim hair.

O'Driscoll scattered the cards
And out of his dream awoke:
Old men and young men and young girls
Were gone like a drifting smoke.

But he heard high up in the air
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

Mr. Loeffler has not in this song striven too assiduously to give his music a Celtic flavor, though here and there appears a hint of Irish folk-song. Originally in A-flat major, the music has been transposed to B major that it might better meet the requirements of a tenor voice. The accompaniment is scored for the customary "full orchestra," with the addition of a celesta.

In "the Fiddler of Dooney" the Celtic idiom is more in evidence. At the beginning a dance-tune of modal character is announced by the first violins, and in one form or another this melody is heard through most of the song. With the addition of a xylophone the instrumentation is the same as that of the previous piece. The poem runs thus:

When I play on my fiddle in Dooney
Folks dance like a wave on the sea;
My cousin is priest in Kilvarnet
My brother in Moharabuiee.

I passed my brother and cousin
They read in their books of prayer;
I read in my book of songs
I bought at the Sligo fair.

When we come at the end of time
To Peter sitting in state,
He will smile on the three old spirits
But call me first through the gate;

For the good are always the merry,
Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love to fiddle
And the merry love to dance.

And when the young folks there spy me
They will always come up to me
With, "Here is the fiddler of Dooney!"
And dance like a wave of the sea.

The text of the last piece, "The Song of Caitilin Ni Uallachian" (more familiarly known as Kathleen Ni Houlihan) is in Gaelic but written above it in the score is the English translation in which it [illegible] the program.

FEB 10

will be sung.

How tossed, how lost with all hopes crossed we have been!
Our gold is gone; gear have we none, as all have seen.
But ships shall brave the ocean's wave, and morn shall dawn,
On Eire green, on Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

Let none believe this lovely Eve outworn or old.
Fair is her form; her blood is warm, her heart is bold;
Her songful voice that makes rejoice hearts grief hath gnawn.
Prove her our Queen, our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heaven will make us strong.
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on,
Will aid our Queen, our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

O, Virgin pure! Our true and sure defence Thou art!
Pray Thou Thy Son to help us on in hand and heart.
Our Prince, our Light shall banish Night, then beameth Dawn,
Then shall be seen our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

Our priests are as one man imploring Christ,
Our bards are songful and their gloom dispelled,
Our souls are hopeful, know no fear,
When we think of our Caitilin-Ni-Holahan.

For this song, the largest-scaled and to all appearances the most effective of the five, the composer has employed a huge orchestra; in detail, two flutes, two piccolos, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bas clarinet, two basoons, contrabassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, three kettledrums, two snare-drums, bass-drum, cymbals, celesta, two harps and the usual strings. He stipulates that the harps should be stationed on opposite sides of the stage. The music begins stormily (G minor, three-two time) with an incisive theme for wind instruments against rapidly reiterated chords in the strings. The second stanza brings appropriate softening of the mood. By way of interlude comes a merry theme of folk-song character, played by piccolo and celesta, while through the last division of the song much use is made of a march-like theme that has likewise a Celtic tinge. Those familiar with Mr. Loeffler's ways need hardly be told that these Fantasias are written in the complex modern manner; that the rhythms are free; the harmonies anything but orthodox; the instrumentation highly original and replete with all manner of dramatic and poetic touches. Yet the songs should not prove formidable in the hearing. Both for the voice and in the orchestra there is melody a-plenty, and when the Celtic element predominates it is melody that should seize the ear and quicken the pulse. W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR. 9

LOEFFLER'S "IRISH FANTAISIES" SUNG

Composer Shares Applause With McCormack

Charles Martin Loeffler's "Irish Fantaisies" for voice and orchestra, sung for the first time in public yesterday afternoon at the Symphony concert, were very cordially received by the audience. Mr Loeffler came out on the stage to share the applause with John McCormack, who sang the voice part with his usual skill and imaginative sympathy, though hampered by a heavy cold. These settings of poems by Yeats and Hefernan are skilfully wrought music, pleasant to hear, but lacking compelling emotional power.

Mr McCormack's art was more severely tested by two arias from unfamiliar cantatas of Bach, composed in the early years of his sojourn in Leipsic. He sang them with the requisite dignity and sublety, in English. The lack of cohesion between the organ accompaniment based on Bach's figured bass and the orchestra may have had something to do with the apathy of the audience toward these two numbers. Possibly some of those present still fail to observe what their ears should have told them yesterday; the fact that McCormack is a very great singer, not to be judged by the type of encore song by which he delights popular audiences.

Mozart's "Haffner Serenade," composed when he was a boy of 20, is music to make the most world-weary of pessimists feel young, calm and hopeful as he listens. Richard Burgin's exquisite playing of the violin solo part helped notably in lifting the performance out of the routine atmosphere now too prevalent at these concerts and making it something to be remembered for years to come. The audience applauded with an enthusiasm it does not often vouchsafe nowadays to Mozart or to those who perform his works. Mr Monteux took unusual pains to make the music effective and succeeded in giving a much better interpretation than he has yet offered of any Mozart piece.

Berlioz' favorite among his own works, the music illustrating the balcony scene in "Romeo and Juliet" from his symphony with that title, was also very well played and received with more favor than usual. The "Queen Mab" scherzo from the same piece, though hitherto better liked, seemed yesterday less imaginative.

There are no regular Symphony concerts next week. March 24 and 25 Emilio de Gogorza will sing "Where E'er You Walk" from Handel's "Semele" and a song by Alvarez. The other numbers announced are d'Indy's "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Goldmark's overture "Im Fruehling."

GLOBE MAR. 11.

Wagner Program for Pension Fund

A program, consisting entirely of excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner, will be played at the forty-first Pension Fund Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the proceeds to be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert is to be in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30.

Pierre Monteux will conduct on this occasion the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Meistersingers." The second portion will consist of numbers from each of the four music dramas of the "Ring" Cycle.

Extra Symphony Concert.

Next Monday evening, March 13, at Symphony Hall at 8:15, the fourth concert of the newly instituted series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of this great orchestra, has compiled for this occasion a program of especial brilliance and interest.

The symphony will be the fifth of Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, inspired by his visit to this country, and called "From the New World."

AMER. MAR. 11.

McCormack Sings with Symphony

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Symphony Orchestra proved to be one of those rare occasions when sheer enjoyment marked each of the numbers on the program. Pierre Monteux conducted.

The opening work was Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade. This is in four parts, into which violin solos are interpolated. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, played these parts. This "Serenade" was composed for a wedding and is therefore bright in idea and musical effect. The solo parts are freely written and give opportunity for display of versatility as well as musical feeling. Mr. Burgin scored greatly by his work yesterday and was rewarded by sincere applause from the audience.

John McCormack was soloist with the orchestra. He sang two Bach cantata "airs." One was from "Lost Is My Dear Jesus" and the other from "All They from Sheba Shall Come." Mr. McCormack sings Bach with understanding and reserve. He is therefore successful in his interpretations. The second number seemed just a little hurried, but both of the airs were done with the emotion and certain sincerity which they demand.

Mr. McCormack also sang Charles Leoffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra." These were "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan." The first is an Irish fairy tale and therefore fanciful to the extreme. In his presentation of the voice part and in its accompaniment Mr. Leoffler has given biazarre effects which are intricate and full of detail. The second and last took their accompaniment from the nature of the piece. In "The Fiddler of Dooney" a fiddling accompaniment weaves its way around the song, while in the last martial notes, stirring fife and drum effects and sober prayerful moments make keen contrasts. Mr. McCormack was in tune to the atmosphere of the work and sang accordingly. Mr. Leoffler attended the concert and received his share of the applause.

The last number on the program consisted of two excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet." M. J. W.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

Next Monday evening, March 13, at Symphony Hall at 8:15, the fourth concert of the newly instituted series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given. The symphony will be the fifth of Dvorak, the Bohemian composer, called "From the New World." Other numbers will be Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture. The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti.

WAGNER PROGRAM

A program consisting entirely of excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner will be played at the 41st Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the proceeds to be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert is to be in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3.30.

TRAV. MAR. 11

M'CORMACK SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Loeffler's Songs Provoke Extraordinary Enthusiasm

BY OLIN DOWNES

We are not propagandists. We are not discussing the freedom or Home Rule for Ireland. We are speaking of Irish poems, set by Charles Martin Loeffler, and sung by John McCormack, in a performance long to be remembered, at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

PROVOKES ENTHUSIASM

It was an extraordinary experience for any hearer. It provoked a demonstration of unqualified enthusiasm, not from an audience of partisans, but from musicians and everybody else capable of response to music of extraordinary color and evocative power.

Mr. McCormack, despite a throat in poor condition, sang like a poet and a prophet, until, with the old Irish tune "Colleen dhas crutha na mo." ("The pretty girl milking the cow") set skirling by Dr. Loeffler in the orchestra, you would have said that every Celt in the universe was a-marching!

Mr. McCormack sang two airs from Bach, the air "Lost is my Jesus" from the cantata of that name, and the air "Take from Thy very own" from the cantata "All they from Sheba shall come," and then the three songs by Mr. Loeffler.

The Loeffler Songs

These are "The Hosts of the Sidhe" and "The Fiddler of Dooney"; the poems by William Butler Yeats, and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Hollhan," after the verse of Heferan the Blind. The song "The Hosts of the Sidhe," narrating the dream of Heferan the Blind. The two first songs were sung in Boston with piano accompaniment in 1909 by the late David Bispham.

The song of Caitalin-ni-Hollhan is of recent origin. All the songs benefit by the orchestra, the piano being a poor substitute for the colors of the instruments when it comes to painting the vague sorrow that oppressed the hunter, who lay in the reeds, heard the piping in the air, "piping never so sad, and piping never so gay," and in his own dream, drank the cursed bread and wine of those who wished evil on him and his bride.

One a Rollicking Jig

The Celtic quality of this song is more rarefied—and it is in this sense the most beautiful of the three. But the accompaniment of the song of the "Fiddler of Dooney" is a not unfamiliar Irish jig. Mr. McCormack has heard it himself in Ireland, and it is the accompaniment of the reckless merriment, the adventurous spirit, and the strange longing which echoes at the end of the song and still haunts the memory.

But the third song is an Irish chant of glory, when Mr. Loeffler employs not only the rare color, but the most superb sonorities of his instrument. The archaic tune of "The Pretty Girl Milking the Cow," which is much older, we should say, than the verse, inasmuch as it existed in Ireland long before the Christian religion was known there, gives an amazing atmosphere to the whole. And when the word "Caitalin ni Holihan," as Ireland, the Queen, is called by Heferan the Blind, occurs at the end of certain lines, it is taken from the mouth of the tenor by the trumpets and proclaimed with a power and a pomp that no voice could ever equal. And when, with the sweeping of harps and the tread of the great march, Mr. McCormack comes to the verse:

"We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heav'n will make us strong.
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on
Will aid our queen, our Caitalin-ni-Holihan—"

When he sings this, you may be a crustacean, a crocodile, or a member of the Loyal Coalition, but you will think the hair is rising on your head, and the gooseflesh will course up and down your spine!

No wonder that there was enthusiasm, with Messrs. Loeffler, McCormack and Monteux bowing from the stage, to each other, to the orchestra, to the audience.

At the opening of the concert nearly as much applause was bestowed on a composer named Mozart and on Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, for his solo violin playing in the "Haffner" Serenade. This music is heard too seldom.

Melody of Purest Kind

The gayety of the first and last movement is Mozart in a jesting vain, but the whole Serenade would be worth while if only for the second movement. It is melody of the purest kind. It is workmanship of the period antedating the symphonic practices of Haydn and Beethoven, and it shows that even in an extended instrumental form it is not necessary to play battle-door and shuttle-cock with melodies, in the symphonic manner now classic and practised by everybody from Beethoven to Richard Strauss. No! Here is a simplicity, a marvelous line, and melodies that exfoliate the one from the other, in a manner a universe away from the work bench on which our symphonic forefathers labored so earnestly.

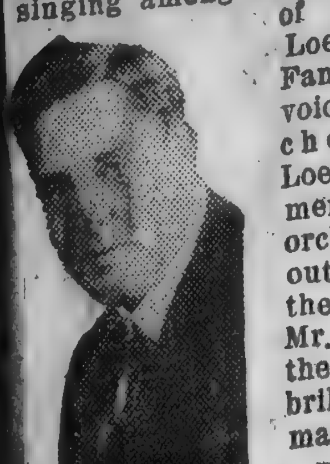
Berlioz music, the "Garden Scene" and the "Queen Mab" scherzo from the Romeo and Juliet symphony brought the programme to an end. Perhaps because of the excitement which preceded it, it seemed of inordinate length.

POST

JOHN McCORMACK

IRISH FANTASIES AT SYMPHONY

John McCormack, foremost lyric tenor of the day, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, singing among other things, three of Charles M. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies," for voice and orchestra. Mr. Loeffler, former member of the orchestra, came out to bow with the soloist and Mr. Monteux at the close of the brilliant performance.



JOHN McCORMACK

The Loeffler fantasies are settings of three Irish ballads, "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-ni-Holahan." The composer has treated each poem in dramatic fashion rather than in the traditional ballad style. The music for the most part is original. Only in the fiddler number are familiar Gaelic themes utilized. The demand made upon the singer is prodigious, yet Mr. McCormack met it splendidly. The orchestra also played its part admirably. Certainly the composer had every reason to be enthusiastic over the interpretation of his works, and he took pains to show his enthusiasm.

The famous tenor also sang two Bach airs from cantatas written for St. Thomas' Church in Leipsic 200 years ago; and in these numbers he gave a beautiful demonstration of his command of the classic style. His voice yesterday was in excellent condition.

Richard Burgin, the popular concertmaster, won much applause for his performance of the elaborate solo passages in Mozart's "Haffner" serenade. The program ends with the garden scene and Queen Mab music from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

ADVER. MAR. 11.

For the New Public

There are no regular Symphony Concerts next week, since through three days Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will pay final visit for the season to New York. On Monday evening, however, at Symphony Hall, they will be heard in the fourth of the new series of concerts that are winning them a fresh, eager, numerous public. A part of this desirable audience is making its way, so to say, into symphonic music; another part wishes the pleasures thereof, but more lightly and at longer intervals than the established concerts accord them. The conductor makes programmes accordingly and for next Monday names these pieces:

Symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World" .... Dvořák
Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" .... Saint-Saëns
Concerto for Violoncello with Orchestra .... Lalo
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3 .... Beethoven

In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncellist of the orchestra, the peer—and often more—of many a wandering virtuoso—will play the solo-part. The melodies of Dvořák give unfailing pleasure; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem is both artful and fanciful; Beethoven's Overture is music-drama in little.

Thursday evening, March 23, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the sixth of the current series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will play the solo-part in a concerto.

Friday afternoon, March 24, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions"—Korean, Siamese, Japanese and Chinese—are the novel items of the programme—a music of suggestion teeming with ingenious and fanciful play of harmonies and timbres. The other orchestral numbers are Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring," and d'Indy's symphonic pieces, "Wallenstein," drawn from Schiller's like-named plays. Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, will sing an air of Händel and a graphic Spanish song.

NS. MAR. 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LOEFFLER, McCORMACK, IRISH FANTASIAS

Music and Singing That Carried All Before Them—A Folk-Tale of Spirits of the Air, a Fiddler's Ditty, and a Song of Freedom—The Composer in New Directness of Means and Impression—The Singer's Fine Fervors—An Adventure Also with Bach

TALL, spare and austere is Mr. Loeffler to the eye; tall, stout and beaming is Mr. McCormack; short, cherubic and modestly self-deprecating before applauding hands is Mr. Monteux. Twice and thrice, after the performance of Mr. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasias" at the Symphony Concert yesterday, the three came together upon the stage, bowing to each other, bowing to the audience, bowing to the orchestra. The [illegible] was unusual; the sight was amusing, but nearly every one overlooked such [illegible] entertainment in the fine excitement of the moment. For once new [illegible] had carried all before them [illegible] had [illegible] not because he was a composer of high repute, not because his usually recondite music might thereby be the more remarkable; but because he had immediately and sincerely stirred them. Mr. McCormack's singing had heightened these sensations. No doubt Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had also contributed to them. Hence the contrasting trinity of the stage; hence the clapping renewed again and again. For once the discreet, not to say the timid audience of Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, forgot "to play safe." Moved, it had taken chances; pieces and performances had broken sub-conscious moorings. The thing does happen—even in Boston.

The particular cause of this exulting was the last of the three Fantasias heard yesterday, the last also of the whole series of five. Possibly in Irish anthologies of the end of the eighteenth or the beginning of the nineteenth century, Mr. Loeffler found verses by "Hefernan the Blind," celebrating Irish loyalty, affirming Irish faith in the cause of national freedom. The bard—for he is nearer to ancient minstrels in the king's hall than to modern poet at his writing table—evokes Ireland in the legendary figure of Kathleen in Houlihan. In vision he sees her comforting and heartening her sons in sore stress and barren. Around her he beholds the powers of heaven—in the end to give the victory. Far yet bright, it gleams in hope fulfilled.

Mr. Loeffler has set the verse in the fashion that he follows in all three Fantasias. Seemingly, he has been studious of Irish folk-pieces. Out of this background, he invents and conducts a clear melody of his own, yet with savor of its source. So doing, he writes unmistakable song, well defined and well considered for the singing tenor voice, from moment to moment clearly audible in the orchestra. He impregnates this melody with the changing mood or passion of the verse; now and then he makes it incisive when he mates a vivid emphasis in both music and words; but never does he torture it by endless and broken inflection into a minute following of the text. Occasionally, the orchestral voices point some detail by an impinging modulation, by a flash of color, by other momentary play of harmonies or timbres. Much oftener, they seize upon the imagery of the poet, and, in the imagery of the composer, expand and intensify it in brief interludes. So, for example in this song, do the trumpets and other choirs proclaim the beauty, the glory, the power of Kathleen ni Houlihan; or the harps and the strings sweep through the ecstasies of celestial vision; or drums and flutes and all the wind-choir sound with the quick march of conquering and exultant feet.

Doing these things in this way, Mr. Loeffler, according to his custom, is exceedingly choice and exceedingly economical of means. He holds his imaginative purpose in suspension, as it were, until he finds for it the exact, the assured expression. Without the waste of a note, with an equal directness and clarity, he sets the expression to music-paper. The instrumental or the singing voice—when it is Mr. McCormack's—as precisely and graphically conveys it. The outcome is a music in which the tones become as one with the passion or the vision evoked, quickening it into living imagination, into beauty and power of illusion. Many a time in the past, Mr. Loeffler has written music recondite and subtle. In these Irish Fantasias he has hidden research, rejections, refinings. More truly, he has made them the roots whence flower a directness, a fullness, a vitality of immediate impression rare in his music. At the moment yesterday the audience with one accord knew and felt the song of Kathleen ni Houlihan. Mr. McCormack's fervors, as large of spirit as they were finely directed, did but swell and deepen the sum of illusion. The response—inevitably—was as instant as the music.

The mood alters in the other two Fantasais; the imaginative design and the revealing procedure remain the same. In the second, "The Fiddler of Dooney," Mr. Loeffler clothes with music one of Mr. Yeats's folk-ballads in little. There was none to play the dances as did this soliloquizing fiddler. To hear was "to dance like the waves of the sea." Yet the good fellow was priest-ridden. Two brothers of the black coat had he, busy with their breviaries as he with his songs. A comforting sense of the next world sustained him. St. Peter was sure to be on the side of the merry; the fiddler's heaven, like the heaven of most folk-rhymes and folk-songs, was bound to be a dancing-place. How far from human nature does the whole brood of reformers stray with endless moralities and prohibitions!

To these rhymes Mr. Loeffler has set neither more nor less than an Irish jig. True, he quickens or stays the rhythm and diversifies the tune—more, probably, than did even the valiant fiddler who inspired it. True also, he decorates it for the flying moment with a modicum of instrumental or harmonic ornament modernwise. A sophisticated composer, he knows the ways and means of incisive modulation. Yet to the end the jig remains a jig and a merry one, infusing itself into the whole music and the whole audience. With it, however, flows a counter-current. This Fiddler of Dooney was also a man of fancy. He saw heaven according to his excellent lights. Jigging, being also Irish and a poet, he had wistful moments. For the instant, likewise, in some swift turn or passing detail, Mr. Loeffler catches such mood. Yet there is no dimming of the merry candors.

The first Fantasia of yesterday came nearer to Mr. Loeffler's remembered vein. A weary hunter sleeps among the reeds where he has been birding. He dreams a dream of the malign hosts of the air—the Sidhe of Irish folk-tale and Mr. Yeats's verse. They feast him; they bid him to cards with the old men, to dances with the young maidens—and they bear away his bride "of the long dim hair." The hunter awakes—"like a drifting smoke"; gone are the folk of the dream, but high and faint still echo the aerial pipers. Readjusted to new matter, mood, suggestion, Mr. Loeffler resumes the imaginative processes, the expressive procedure of the Fantasia of Kathleen ni Houlihan. Again [illegible] bears the musical narrative; but the composer imparts to it his own eerie voice when the supernatural, the fantastic, glimmers before his eyes. The hunter is indeed telling his tale to the folk; but, in the setting of these latter days, the sights and the sounds of dream drift once and again through harmonic mists; or across them flashes the fitful gleam of a modulation or an instrumental voice.

In the melody goes the remoteness of the dream; in the harmony, the vagueness and the shifting; in the other touches the sudden exactness of such sleep-chasings. Yet the instant impression of the whole remains. It is heightened, not by tortuous details of mated music; but by the swift, short, clear picturing of the orchestral interludes. There "the ancient hands" of the card-players, "twinkle"; there sways and twines "the long dim hair." In them like smoke the dream drifts away and clears, to the aerial piping sad and gay. Of old Mr. Loeffler has done such works of the imagination—subtly. Now, in his sixties, he renews them but with the simplifying, the clarifying faculty that often in the arts is the guerdon of advancing years. With such beginning, the step is easier to the frank gayeties of the fiddler, to the luminous visioning and the deep human fires of Kathleen ni Houlihan.

Until his zeal for the Irish Fantasias burned vocal reluctance and disability away, Mr. McCormack sang under handicap. In the days of rehearsal a cold threatened him; by Thursday, it settled on him; until nearly noon on Friday, he was uncertain of his powers. Through two airs from Church Cantatas of Bach, they manifestly labored. The music ran mercilessly high; as usual Bach was writing it as though a tenor voice was some glorified instrument of the wood-wind family, shaping phrases, setting in intervals accordingly. For once even Mr. McCormack's tones sounded thin and wiry. Yet there was reason to admire his sustaining of Bach's relentless line, the skill with which he made instrumental phrases sound vocal; the directness, the simplicity with which he bore the pious sentiment. The first air laments a lost Saviour; the second speaks an humble, whole-hearted devotion. Mr. McCormack made both sound as the voice suddenly uplifted from depth of feeling crying for release in a silent congregation. Handel writes churchly music and the listening imagination drifts away to the Royal Opera of a Georgian London. Bach writes it, and the like imagination stays fast in a Protestant meeting-house.

The Fantasias, as will may do, set Mr. McCormack free. In the dream of "The Host of the Air," his tones gained the eerie colorings, bore the misty suggestion of the tale. In the fiddler's ditty, he was master once more of the candors, the gayeties, the swift, sure touches that animate such glorified music of the folk. In the music of Ireland set free by her devoted sons, he ascended from the fervors to the splendors of impassioned song. So may he range from the musical scholarship of his beginnings with Bach; so may his skill in song burn white with a dream of the Sidhe and glow red with the vision of Kathleen ni Houlihan. A blessed thing—in the arts—is an Irish temperament.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 11.

MUSIC

Loeffler's Irish Fantasies at Boston Symphony Concert

Three "Irish Fantasies" from a series of five written for voice and full orchestra were performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, with John McCormack as soloist. Of these the first "The Host of the Air," together with "The Hosting of the Sidhe," not performed yesterday, are amplifications of an earlier form of voice and piano which the composer wrote in 1907. The orchestral versions were written in 1920, and had their first performance yesterday. The numbers named are settings of the texts of the poet Yeats, together with "The Fidler of Dooney," the second to be played by Mr. Monteux. The third was a setting of the old ballad by the blind bard Hefernan on the patriotic subject "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan." The program also included Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade (the first four movements; the air "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from Bach's Cantata of the same title, and the air "Take Thou for Thy very own" from his Cantata, "All They from Sheba Shall Come"; The Garden Scene and "Queen Mab" Scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

One does not associate songs of the simple-natured Irish folk with the full modern orchestra and the modern harmonic style, nor yet with the musical paths which Loeffler has lately trod. Doubts were soon set aside, however. Although technically elaborate, Loeffler's settings were true to the subject, and corrrespondingly simple in spirit. The voice parts were straightforward verse couplets with more than a tinge of characteristic Irish melody. These were never obscured but always intensified by the orchestral portions, however largely and boldly planned. There were no "individual" harmonies and intervals to obtrude. It is evident that the composer of "Hora Mistica" can be thoroughly objective, and yet never hampered nor tradition bound. He used freely, colorfully and creatively the resources of a huge modern orchestra. His music was a lesson in itself in piquant and unprecedented effects from the whole array of percussive instruments.

"The Host of the Air" was the most graphic of the three. The song tells of the "Little People" who will trouble one's dreams and carry off one's bride. The dream-piper is delicately described in the [illegible] and the climax of the fancied abduction dramatically set forth in the declamatory manner which must have pleased and suited David Bispham, who sang this song, in 1907, as set for piano. "The Fiddler of Dooney" is based on a common jig tune. A mistakenly fastidious composer might have tried to make it distinctive and failed flatly. Lœffler met his jig squarely and glorified it with cumulative rhythmic point and dash, glittering and wholly fascinating. "Caililin-Ni-Holahan" showed a quick and subtile response to the changing moods of the lines about the maid who is fair Ireland—trodden, undaunted, tender, confident. This was the most largely schemed of the three, and full of exciting moments. It finally rose to a blood-stirring, martial fury of drums and fifes.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra acquitted themselves with impeccable brilliance in this difficult score. Mr. McCormack was, of course, ideal for the songs, and he sang them eloquently and stirringly. His soft touch of brogue lent further illusion. He seemed the more fully at home after the less congenial and not too inspired airs of Bach. The "Haffner" Serenade is an instance of Mozart's readiness to pay off an obligation or supply an occasion by plying his facile pen. It is far too good for a wedding of merchants, Haffner by name, and falls somewhat short of adding to the name of Mozart as a symphonic piece. Too often it rings hollow, while invention now and then strikes glowing sparks along the way, such as in the lovely minuet. The concert master, Richard Burgin, played the numerous solo parts with a purity of tone and delicacy of shading which justly brought him a large share of the afternoon's applause. Mr. Monteux gave a rather robust reading of the score, but responded to the nobly conceived and finely graven melody of Berlioz's Garden Scene, and the fitting fancy of his scherzo.

MONITOR - MAR. 11.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts will take place March 24 and 25. D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," and Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture will be the orchestral numbers. Emilio de Gogarza will sing two solos.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of Wagner music will be played at the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 26.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The fourth extra Monday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place tomorrow. Pierre Monteux will open a brilliant program with Dvorak's fifth symphony in E minor, entitled "From the New World." Jean Bedetti will be heard in the concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Lalo. Saint-Saens will be represented by his symphonic poem, "Omphals' Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven by his third "Leenore" Overture.

ADVISR - MAR. 12

Musical Comment by Olin Downes

Here was Mr. Loeffler, an intellectual if there ever was one, writing music about the Sidhe and a mad Irish fiddler and a glorious red triumph of "Catilin-ni-Holahan"-Loeffler, the recondite, the mystic, the ultra-modernist, and here was John McCormack, whose audiences concert halls cannot hold and whom millions of men on the street know and love who have never in all their lives heard of Martin the Sage, and an audience descended of the most sanctified in the State of the Cod, all gathered together, and this delighted audience applauding like mad McCormack's singing and Loeffler's wild Irish songs.

This was so utterly delightful, fantastical, and incredible that the man who listened nearly jumped out of his chair for delight in the sheer Irishness of it all, and the man who writes about it can find no proper words in which to express his sensations. The spectacle that followed was as delightfully mixed up as everything had been that went before: the plump and well-nourished McCormack, who has something of a frame on him, and Charles Martin Loeffler, as long and as absolutely straight as any beanpole you ever saw, with that quizzical eye behind that inscrutable, observant eye-glass, as erect as if an electrical current were galvanizing him all the time—which, in fact, is the case, for there was never a man with a brain so constantly on the jump, so extremely alive—and then there was Mr. Monteux, shorter by more than a head than the shortest of the odd pair whom he was facing and applauding, all together on the stage in Symphony Hall, and everybody wondering how the devil a man of the years of Charles Martin Loeffler ever produced Irish songs with such perfectly gorgeous kick to them, from his inner consciousness. It was too exhilarating to be true.

Whether the jig Mr. Loeffler has used for the song, "The Fiddler of Dooney," had gotten into his blood so that his very soul couldn't help a-dancing, or whether the old archaic tune of "The Pretty Girl Milking the Cow" had enabled him, musically speaking, to upset the whole universe in the cause of Ireland the Queen, may be left to the psychoanalyst, but there was a youth, a joyousness, a many colored splendor about this music that fair carried one away and made him think all the impossible he thought never could happen—could. If you know what we mean. We cannot find the proper words at all!

It was really a wonder that John McCormack's heels did not fly up in the air while he was singing about the Fiddler of Dooney.

Again one asks, how should a composer use a folksong? In these three songs to poems of Yeats and Heferan the Blind, heard at the Symphony concerts of last night and of Friday afternoon, Mr. Loeffler has in at least two songs helped himself to Irish folk music as the poets whose words he set had helped themselves to Irish lore. They, however, were Irishmen. Mr. Loeffler hails from Alsace-Lorraine. Musically speaking, he is a cosmopolitan. His culture is cosmopolitan, with a leaning, racial and temperamental, toward the thought and the beauty created by modern France. He has never believed in folk-music as a basis for a composer's art. He is not at all of that camp which says, "Go to the people. Go to the soil!"

In these songs he has simply and inevitably turned to folk-music as an inevitable corollary of the poetic thought. He has treated his thematic material, of course, with the acme of technical skill and of past mastery of the modern orchestra. But he uses it rather as part of a picture as a mixture of colors, than as the actual basis of his composition. We say this, nothwithstanding the persistent accompaniment of the jig in the "Fiddler of Dooney" and the aboundant presence of Irish folk melody in the song of "Caitilin-ni-Holahan." It is not a symphonic development of germinal motives taken from folk song. It is the matching by a veritable connoisieur of two arts, literature and music, of materials which he finds harmonious, essential to each other, and which he then arranges or transforms to make a form of his own. This is particularly true of the strange beauty of the first song, "The Hosts of the Sidhe."

"The music of the people?" Anything but Mr. Loeffler is not one of the people, but a special brain and a special temperament far removed from the crowd. As an artist he is fastidious. Even in the epic nature music of Sibelius he finds the unattractive odor of cod liver oil.

Nevertheless when he does turn to folk-song he does so with the keenest and most sympathetic feeling. In the sense that original crudeness and courseness of this material is concerned, he re-fashions it in accordance with his needs, and his process is not necessarily one of refinement. Consider not only the piping in the air, "never so sad, and never so gay" in the song, the "Hosts of the Sidhe," the jig in the Fiddler of Dooney, the archaic tune which skirls among the instruments in "Caitlin-ni-Holahan," but the dramatic use made elsewhere of tunes far more vulgar, far more of the street, of the mob. We refer to "La Carmagnole" and "Caira" in "The Devil's Villanelle" for orchestra—a work, by the way, which has lain too long on the shelves at Symphony Hall. Here is satire, mordant, savage, with more than an echo of the cynicism of the gutter.

It is not with the purpose of giving a more complete and coherent expression to the spirit of the folk that Mr. Loeffler turns to folk-music. It is because he discovers in a mass of folklore certain materials which he will use either in entirety or in part, and disembody and purify, if need be, until they have become an expression of his own curious, singular self. He treats these tunes with consummate deliberate, self-conscious art, and the result is intoxicating and a thing to treasure among one's possessions of beauty. After all, the temple of art is a very great one, and its niches are without number. For the artist there is no rule, no formula. Only he must pursue beauty and in that pursuit reveal himself.

POST - MAR. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Philip Hale in his review quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

PROV. JOURNAL - MAR. 13.

WAGNER PROGRAM

A program consisting entirely of excerpts from music dramas of Wagner has been arranged for the 41st pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30. Mr. Monteux will conduct on this occasion the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Meistersingers." The second portion will consist of numbers from each of the four music dramas of "The Ring" cycle.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday and Saturday, March 24 and 25, following the last New York trip of the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct at this pair of concerts d'Indy's Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein," which includes (1) Wallenstein's Camp, (2) Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini), (3) The Death of Wallenstein. Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will sing "Where'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," and "Canto del Presidiario," by Alvarez. Eichheim's oriental impressions will have their first performance in full orchestral form. These consist of (1) Korean Sketch, (2) Siamese Sketch, (3) Japanese Nocturne, (4) Chinese Sketch. The concert will close with Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so successfully inaugurated this season, will take place tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux will open a brilliant program with Dvorak's Fifth Symphony in E minor, inspired by the Bohemian composer's visit to this country and entitled "From the New World." The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the celebrated first violin [illegible]

oeffler, and sung in a performanc
ered, at the con
the Boston Symphon
Pierre Monteux conduc day afternoon in Sym

OKES ENTHUSIASM

extraordinary experience
rer. It provoked a demonunqualified enthusiasm, not udience of partisans, but cians and everybody else response to music of extra-or and evocative power.
rmack, despite a throat in on, sang like a poet and a with the old Irish tune, as crutha na mo." ("The milking the cow") set
Dr. Loeffler in the orches-ould have said that every universe was a-marching!
rmack sang two airs from r "Lost is my Jesus" from of that name, and the air, Thy very own" from the l they from Sheba shall hen the three songs by Mr.

e Loeffler Songs

"The Hosts of the Sidhe"
Fiddler of Dooney"; the William Butler Yeats, and of Caitilin-ni-Holihan," rse of Heferan the Blind.
The Hosts of the Sidhe," e dream of Heferan the wo first songs were sung with piano accompaniment
e late David Bispham.
f Caitalin-ni-Holihan is of
All the songs benefit by the piano being a poor
the colors of the instru-it comes to painting the w that oppressed the lay in the reeds, heard the air, "piping never so ng never so gay," and in am, drank the cursed ine of those who wished nd his bride.

a Rollicking Jig

uality of this song is more it is in this sense the l of the three. But the t of the song of the oney" is a not unfamiliar McCormack has heard it and, and it is the accom-
the reckless merriment,
s spirit, and the strange echoes at the end of still haunts the memory.
song is an Irish chant n Mr. Loeffler employs are color, but the most ties of his instrument.
une of "The Pretty Girl
w," which is much older,
, than the verse, inas-sted in Ireland long be-ian religion was known amazing atmosphere to d when the word "Ca-an," as Ireland, the
by Heferan the Blind, end of certain lines, it
the mouth of the tenor s and proclaimed with a pomp that no voice
. And when, with the
arps and the tread of rch, Mr. McCormack
erse:

the chains we wear, not but mighty Heav'n will through Ocean Red all our Caitalin-ni-Holihan—"

this, you may be a codile, or a member of on, but you will think g on your head, and ll course up and down

t there was enthusi-
. Loeffler, McCormack
ing from the stage, to he orchestra, to the

of the concert nearly was bestowed on a Mozart and on Mr.
ster of the orchestra,
playing in the "Haff-
This music is heard

Purest Kind

e first and last move-a jesting vain, but de would be worth
he second movement.
e purest kind. It is he period antedating
ractices of Haydn
it shows that even trumental form it is lay battle-door and elodies, in the symclassic and pracfrom Beethoven to
ol. Here is a sim-line, and melodies
ne from the other,
erse away from the
hich our symphonic
so earnestly.
e "Garden Scene" ab" scherzo from Juliet symphony
mme to an end.
the excitement
seemed of inordi-

IRISH FANTASIES AT SYMPHONY

John McCormack, foremost lyric tenor of the day, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, singing among other things, three of Charles M. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies," for voice and orchestra. Mr. Loeffler, former member of the orchestra, came out to bow with the soloist and Mr. Monteux at the close of the brilliant performance.

JOHN McCORMACK

The Loeffler fantasies are settings of three Irish ballads, "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-ni-Holahan." The composer has treated each poem in dramatic fashion rather than in the traditional ballad style. The music for the most part is original. Only in the fiddler number are familiar Gaelic themes utilized. The demand made upon the singer is prodigious, yet Mr. McCormack met it splendidly. The orchestra also played its part admirably. Certainly the composer had every reason to be enthusiastic over the interpretation of his works, and he took pains to show his enthusiasm.

The famous tenor also sang two Bach airs from cantatas written for St. Thomas' Church in Leipsic 200 years ago; and in these numbers he gave a beautiful demonstration of his command of the classic style. His voice yesterday was in excellent condition.

Richard Burgin, the popular concertmaster, won much applause for his performance of the elaborate solo passages in Mozart's "Haffner" serenade. The program ends with the garden scene and Queen Mab music from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

[illegible] MAR. 11.

For the New Public

There are no regular Symphony Concerts next week, since through three days Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will pay final visit for the season to New York. On Monday evening, however, at Symphony Hall, they will be heard in the fourth of the new series of concerts that are winning them a fresh, eager, numerous public. A part of this desirable audience is making its way, so to say, into symphonic music; another part wishes the pleasures thereof, but more lightly and at longer intervals than the established concerts accord them. The conductor makes programmes accordingly and for next Monday names these pieces:

Symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World" ....Dvořák
Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" ....Saint-Säens
Concerto for Violoncello with Orchestra....Lalo
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3........Beethoven

In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, the first violoncellist of the orchestra, the peer—and often more—of many a wandering virtuoso—will play the solo-part. The melodies of Dvořák give unfailing pleasure; Saint-Saëns's tone-poem is both artful and fanciful; Beethoven's Overture is music-drama in little.

Thursday evening, March 23, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the sixth of the current series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will play the solo-part in a concerto.

Friday afternoon, March 24, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions"—Korean, Siamese, Japanese and Chinese—are the novel items of the programme—a music of suggestion teeming with ingenious and fanciful play of harmonies and timbres. The other orchestral numbers are Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring," and d'Indy's symphonic pieces, "Wallenstein," drawn from Schiller's like-named plays. Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, will sing an air of Händel and a graphic Spanish song.

[illegible] S. MAR. 11.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LOEFFLER, McCORMACK, IRISH FANTASIAS

Music and Singing That Carried All Before Them—A Folk-Tale of Spirits of the Air, a Fiddler's Ditty, and a Song of Freedom—The Composer in New Directness of Means and Impression—The Singer's Fine Fervors—An Adventure Also with Bach

TALL, spare and austere is Mr. Loeffler to the eye; tall, stout and beaming is Mr. McCormack; short, cherubic and modestly self-deprecating before applauding hands is Mr. Monteux. Twice and thrice, after the performance of Mr. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasias" at the Symphony Concert yesterday, the three came together upon the stage, bowing to each other, bowing to the audience, bowing to the orchestra. The sight was unusual; the sight was amusing; but nearly every one overlooked such incidental entertainment in the fine excitement of the moment. For once new songs by Mr. Loeffler had carried all before them. The listeners had applauded not because he was a composer of high repute, not because his usually recondite music might thereby be the more remarkable; but because he had immediately and sincerely stirred them. Mr. McCormack's singing had heightened these sensations. No doubt Mr. Monteux and the orchestra had also contributed to them. Hence the contrasting trinity of the stage; hence the clapping renewed again and again. For once the discreet, not to say the timid audience of Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, forgot "to play safe." Moved, it had taken chances; pieces and performance had broken sub-conscious moorings. The thing does happen—even in Boston.

The particular cause of this exulting was the last of the three Fantasias heard yesterday, the last also of the whole series of five. Possibly in Irish anthologies of the end of the eighteenth or the beginning of the nineteenth century, Mr. Loeffler found verses by "Hefernan the Blind," celebrating Irish loyalty, affirming Irish faith in the cause of national freedom. The bard—for he is nearer to ancient minstrels in the king's hall than to modern poet at his writing table—evokes Ireland in the legendary figure of Kathleen in Houlihan. In vision he sees her comforting and heartening her sons in sore stress and barren. Around her he beholds the powers of heaven—in the end to give the victory. Far yet bright, it gleams in hope fulfilled.

Mr. Loeffler has set the verse in the fashion that he follows in all three Fantasias. Seemingly, he has been studious of Irish folk-pieces. Out of this background, he invents and conducts a clear melody of his own, yet with savor of its source. So doing, he writes unmistakable song, well defined and well considered for the singing tenor voice, from moment to moment clearly audible in the orchestra. He impregnates this melody with the changing mood or passion of the verse; now and then he makes it incisive when he mates a vivid emphasis in both music and words; but never does he torture it by endless and broken inflection into a minute following of the text. Occasionally, the orchestral voices point some detail by an impinging modulation, by a flash of color, by other momentary play of harmonies or timbres. Much oftener, they seize upon the imagery of the poet, and, in the imagery of the composer, expand and intensify it in brief interludes. So, for example in this song, do the trumpets and other choirs proclaim the beauty, the glory, the power of Kathleen ni Houlihan; or the harps and the strings sweep through the ecstasies of celestial vision; or drums and flutes and all the wind-choir sound with the quick march of conquering and exultant feet.

Doing these things in this way, Mr. Loeffler, according to his custom, is exceedingly choice and exceedingly economical of means. He holds his imaginative purpose in suspension, as it were, until he finds for it the exact, the assured expression. Without the waste of a note, with an equal directness and clarity, he sets the expression to music-paper. The instrumental or the singing voice—when it is Mr. McCormack's—as precisely and graphically conveys it. The outcome is a music in which the tones become as one with the passion or the vision evoked, quickening it into living imagination, into beauty and power of illusion. Many a time in the past, Mr. Loeffler has written music recondite and subtle. In these Irish Fantasias he has hidden research, rejections, refinings. More truly, he has made them the roots whence flower a directness, a fullness, a vitality of immediate impression rare in his music. At the moment yesterday the audience with one accord knew and felt the song of Kathleen ni Houlihan. Mr. McCormack's fervors, as large of spirit as they were finely directed, did but swell and deepen the sum of illusion. The response—inevitably—was as instant as the music.

The mood alters in the other two Fantasais; the imaginative design and the revealing procedure remain the same. In the second, "The Fiddler of Dooney," Mr. Loeffler clothes with music one of Mr. Yeats's folk-ballads in little. There was none to play the dances as did this soliloquizing fiddler. To hear was "to dance like the waves of the sea." Yet the good fellow was priest-ridden. Two brothers of the black coat had he, busy with their breviaries as he with his songs. A comforting sense of the next world sustained him. St. Peter was sure to be on the side of the merry; the fiddler's heaven, like the heaven of most folk-rhymes and folk-songs, was bound to be a dancing-place. How far from human nature does the whole brood of reformers stray with endless moralities and prohibitions!

To these rhymes Mr. Loeffler has set neither more nor less than an Irish jig. True, he quickens or stays the rhythm and diversifies the tune—more, probably, than did even the valiant fiddler who inspired it. True also, he decorates it for the flying moment with a modicum of instrumental or harmonic ornament modernwise. A sophisticated composer, he knows the ways and means of incisive modulation. Yet to the end the jig remains a jig and a merry one, infusing itself into the whole music and the whole audience. With it, however, flows a counter-current. This Fiddler of Dooney was also a man of fancy. He saw heaven according to his excellent lights. Jigging, being also Irish and a poet, he had wistful moments. For the instant, likewise, in some swift turn or passing detail, Mr. Loeffler catches such mood. Yet there is no dimming of the merry candors.

The first Fantasia of yesterday came nearer to Mr. Loeffler's remembered vein. A weary hunter sleeps among the reeds where he has been birding. He dreams a dream of the malign hosts of the air—the Sidhe of Irish folk-tale and Mr. Yeats's verse. They feast him; they bid him to cards with the old men, to dances with the young maidens—and they bear away his bride "of the long dim hair." The hunter awakes—"like a drifting smoke"; gone are the folk of the dream, but high and faint still echo the aerial pipers. Readjusted to new matter, mood, suggestion, Mr. Loeffler resumes the imaginative processes, the expressive procedure of the Fantasia of Kathleen ni Houlihan. Again melody, seemingly of Irish folk-flavor, bears the musical narrative; but the composer imparts to it his own eerie voice when the supernatural, the fantastic, glimmers before his eyes. The hunter is indeed telling his tale to the folk; but, in the setting of these latter days, the sights and the sounds of dream drift once and again through harmonic mists; or across them flashes the fitful gleam of a modulation or an instrumental voice.

In the melody goes the remoteness of the dream; in the harmony, the vagueness and the shifting; in the other touches the sudden exactness of such sleep-chasings. Yet the instant impression of the whole remains. It is heightened, not by tortuous details of mated music; but by the swift, short, clear picturing of the orchestral interludes. There "the ancient hands" of the card-players, "twinkle"; there sways and twines "the long dim hair." In them like smoke the dream drifts away and clears, to the aerial piping sad and gay. Of old Mr. Loeffler has done such works of the imagination—subtly. Now, in his sixties, he renews them but with the simplifying, the clarifying faculty that often in the arts is the guerdon of advancing years. With such beginning, the step is easier to the frank gayeties of the fiddler, to the luminous visioning and the deep human fires of Kathleen ni Houlihan.

Until his zeal for the Irish Fantasias burned vocal reluctance and disability away, Mr. McCormack sang under handicap. In the days of rehearsal a cold threatened him; by Thursday, it settled on him; until nearly noon on Friday, he was uncertain of his powers. Through two airs from Church Cantatas of Bach, they manifestly labored. The music ran mercilessly high; as usual Bach was writing it as though a tenor voice was some glorified instrument of the wood-wind family, shaping phrases, setting in intervals accordingly. For once even Mr. McCormack's tones sounded thin and wiry. Yet there was reason to admire his sustaining of Bach's relentless line, the skill with which he made instrumental phrases sound vocal; the directness, the simplicity with which he bore the pious sentiment. The first air laments a lost Saviour; the second speaks an humble, whole-hearted devotion. Mr. McCormack made both sound as the voice suddenly uplifted from depth of feeling crying for release in a silent congregation. Handel writes churchly music and the listening imagination drifts away to the Royal Opera of a Georgian London. Bach writes it, and the like imagination stays fast in a Protestant meeting-house.

The Fantasias, as will may do, set Mr. McCormack free. In the dream of "The Host of the Air," his tones gained the eerie colorings, bore the misty suggestion of the tale. In the fiddler's ditty, he was master once more of the candors, the gayeties, the swift, sure touches that animate such glorified music of the folk. In the music of Ireland set free by her devoted sons, he ascended from the fervors to the splendors of impassioned song. So may he range from the musical scholarship of his beginnings with Bach; so may his skill in song burn white with a dream of the Sidhe and glow red with the vision of Kathleen ni Houlihan. A blessed thing—in the arts—is an Irish temperament.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 11.

MUSIC

Loeffler's Irish Fantasies at Boston Symphony Concert

Three "Irish Fantasies" from a series of five written for voice and full orchestra were performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, with John McCormack as soloist. Of these the first "The Host of the Air," together with "The Hosting of the Sidhe," not performed yesterday, are amplifications of an earlier form of voice and piano which the composer wrote in 1907. The orchestral versions were written in 1920, and had their first performance yesterday. The numbers named are settings of the texts of the poet Yeats, together with "The Fiddler of Dooney," the second to be played by Mr. Monteux. The third was a setting of the old ballad by the blind bard Hefernan on the patriotic subject "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan." The program also included Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade (the first four movements; the air "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from Bach's Cantata of the same title, and the air "Take Thou for Thy very own" from his Cantata, "All They from Sheba Shall Come"; The Garden Scene and "Queen Mab" Scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

One does not associate songs of the simple-natured Irish folk with the full modern orchestra and the modern harmonic style, nor yet with the musical paths which Loeffler has lately trod. Doubts were soon set aside, however. Although technically elaborate, Loeffler's settings were true to the subject, and corrspondingly simple in spirit. The voice parts were straightforward verse couplets with more than a tinge of characteristic Irish melody. These were never obscured but always intensified by the orchestral portions, however largely and boldly planned. There were no "individual" harmonies and intervals to obtrude. It is evident that the composer of "Hora Mistica" can be thoroughly objective, and yet never hampered nor tradition bound. He used freely, colorfully and creatively the resources of a huge modern orchestra. His music was a lesson in itself in piquant and unprecedented effects from the whole array of percussive instruments.

"The Host of the Air" was the most graphic of the three. The song tells of the "Little People" who will trouble one's dreams and carry off one's bride. The dream-piper is delicately described in the wood-wind, and the climax of the fancied abduction dramatically set forth in the declamatory manner which must have pleased and suited David Bispham, who sang this song, in 1907, as set for piano. "The Fiddler of Dooney" is based on a common jig tune. A mistakenly fastidious composer might have tried to make it distinctive and failed flatly. Loeffler met his jig squarely and glorified it with cumulative rhythmic point and dash, glittering and wholly fascinating. "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" showed a quick and subtile response to the changing moods of the lines about the maid who is fair Ireland—trodden, undaunted, tender, confident. This was the most largely schemed of the three, and full of exciting moments. It finally rose to a blood-stirring, martial fury of drums and fifes.

Mr. Monteux and his orchestra acquitted themselves with impeccable brilliance in this difficult score. Mr. McCormack was, of course, ideal for the songs, and he sang them eloquently and stirringly. His soft touch of brogue lent further illusion. He seemed the more fully at home after the less congenial and not too inspired airs of Bach. The "Haffner" Serenade is an instance of Mozart's readiness to pay off an obligation or supply an occasion by plying his facile pen. It is far too good for a wedding of merchants, Haffner by name, and falls somewhat short of adding to the name of Mozart as a symphonic piece. Too often it rings hollow, while invention now and then strikes glowing sparks along the way, such as in the lovely minuet. The concert master, Richard Burgin, played the numerous solo parts with a purity of tone and delicacy of shading which justly brought him a large share of the afternoon's applause. Mr. Monteux gave a rather robust reading of the score, but responded to the nobly conceived and finely graven melody of Berlioz's Garden Scene, and the fitting fancy of his scherzo.

MONITOR - MAR. 11.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Symphony concerts will take place March 24 and 25. D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," and Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture will be the orchestral numbers. Emilio de Gogarza will sing two solos.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of Wagner music will be played at the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 26.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The fourth extra Monday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place tomorrow. Pierre Monteux will open a brilliant program with Dvorak's fifth symphony in E minor, entitled "From the New World." Jean Bedetti will be heard in the concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Lalo. Saint-Saens will be represented by his symphonic poem, "Omphals' Spinning Wheel," and Beethoven by his third "Leenore" Overture.

ADVISR - MAR. 12

Musical Comment by Olin Downes

Here was Mr. Loeffler, an intellectual if there ever was one, writing music about the Sidhe and a mad Irish fiddler and a glorious red triumph of "Catilin-ni-Holahan"-Loeffler, the recondite, the mystic, the ultra-modernist, and here was John McCormack, whose audiences concert halls cannot hold and whom millions of men on the street know and love who have never in all their lives heard of Martin the Sage, and an audience descended of the most sanctified in the State of the Cod, all gathered together, and this delighted audience applauding like mad McCormack's singing and Loeffler's wild Irish songs.

This was so utterly delightful, fantastical, and incredible that the man who listened nearly jumped out of his chair for delight in the sheer Irishness of it all, and the man who writes about it can find no proper words in which to express his sensations. The spectacle that followed was as delightfully mixed up as everything had been that went before: the plump and well-nourished McCormack, who has something of a frame on him, and Charles Martin Loeffler, as long and as absolutely straight as any beanpole you ever saw, with that quizzical eye behind that inscrutable, observant eye-glass, as erect as if an electrical current were galvanizing him all the time—which, in fact, is the case, for there was never a man with a brain so constantly on the jump, so extremely alive—and then there was Mr. Monteux, shorter by more than a head than the shortest of the odd pair whom he was facing and applauding, all together on the stage in Symphony Hall, and everybody wondering how the devil a man of the years of Charles Martin Loeffler ever produced Irish songs with such perfectly gorgeous kick to them, from his inner consciousness. It was too exhilarating to be true.

Whether the jig Mr. Loeffler has used for the song, "The Fiddler of Dooney," had gotten into his blood so that his very soul couldn't help a-dancing, or whether the old archaic tune of "The Pretty Girl Milking the Cow" had enabled him, musically speaking, to upset the whole universe in the cause of Ireland the Queen, may be left to the psychoanalyst, but there was a youth, a joyousness, a many colored splendor about this music that fair carried one away and made him think all the impossible he thought never could happen—could. If you know what we mean. We cannot find the proper words at all!

It was really a wonder that John McCormack's heels did not fly up in the air while he was singing about the Fiddler of Dooney.

Again one asks, how should a composer use a folksong? In these three songs to poems of Yeats and Heferan the Blind, heard at the Symphony concerts of last night and of Friday afternoon, Mr. Loeffler has in at least two songs helped himself to Irish folk music as the poets whose words he set had helped themselves to Irish lore. They, however, were Irishmen. Mr. Loeffler hails from Alsace-Lorraine. Musically speaking, he is a cosmopolitan. His culture is cosmopolitan, with a leaning, racial and temperamental, toward the thought and the beauty created by modern France. He has never believed in folk-music as a basis for a composer's art. He is not at all of that camp which says, "Go to the people. Go to the soil!"

In these songs he has simply and inevitably turned to folk-music as an inevitable corollary of the poetic thought. He has treated his thematic material, of course, with the acme of technical skill and of past mastery of the modern orchestra. But he uses it rather as part of a picture as a mixture of colors, than as the actual basis of his composition. We say this, nothwithstanding the persistent accompaniment of the jig in the "Fiddler of Dooney" and the aboundant presence of Irish folk melody in the song of "Caitilin-ni-Holahan." It is not a symphonic development of germinal motives taken from folk song. It is the matching by a veritable connoisieur of two arts, literature and music, of materials which he finds harmonious, essential to each other, and which he then arranges or transforms to make a form of his own. This is particularly true of the strange beauty of the first song, "The Hosts of the Sidhe."

"The music of the people?" Anything but Mr. Loeffler is not one of the people, but a special brain and a special temperament far removed from the crowd. As an artist he is fastidious. Even in the epic nature music of Sibelius he finds the unattractive odor of cod liver oil.

Nevertheless when he does turn to folk-song he does so with the keenest and most sympathetic feeling. In the sense that original crudeness and courseness of this material is concerned, he re-fashions it in accordance with his needs, and his process is not necessarily one of refinement. Consider not only the piping in the air, "never so sad, and never so gay" in the song, the "Hosts of the Sidhe," the jig in the Fiddler of Dooney, the archaic tune which skirls among the instruments in "Caitlin-ni-Holahan," but the dramatic use made elsewhere of tunes far more vulgar, far more of the street, of the mob. We refer to "La Carmagnole" and "Caira" in "The Devil's Villanelle" for orchestra—a work, by the way, which has lain too long on the shelves at Symphony Hall. Here is satire, mordant, savage, with more than an echo of the cynicism of the gutter.

It is not with the purpose of giving a more complete and coherent expression to the spirit of the folk that Mr. Loeffler turns to folk-music. It is because he discovers in a mass of folklore certain materials which he will use either in entirety or in part, and disembody and purify, if need be, until they have become an expression of his own curious, singular self. He treats these tunes with consummate deliberate, self-conscious art, and the result is intoxicating and a thing to treasure among one's possessions of beauty. After all, the temple of art is a very great one, and its niches are without number. For the artist there is no rule, no formula. Only he must pursue beauty and in that pursuit reveal himself.

POST - MAR. 12

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Philip Hale in his review quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

PROV. JOURNAL - MAR. 12.

WAGNER PROGRAM

A program consisting entirely of excerpts from music dramas of Wagner has been arranged for the 41st pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The proceeds will be devoted to the fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The concert will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30. Mr. Monteux will conduct on this occasion the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Meistersingers." The second portion will consist of numbers from each of the four music dramas of "The Ring" cycle.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday and Saturday, March 24 and 25, following the last New York trip of the orchestra. Mr. Monteux will conduct at this pair of concerts d'Indy's Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein," which includes (1) Wallenstein's Camp, (2) Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini), (3) The Death of Wallenstein. Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will sing "Where'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," and "Canto del Presidiario," by Alvarez. Eichheim's oriental impressions will have their first performance in full orchestral form. These consist of (1) Korean Sketch, (2) Siamese Sketch, (3) Japanese Nocturne, (4) Chinese Sketch. The concert will close with Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fourth concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so successfully inaugurated this season, will take place tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux will open a brilliant program with Dvorak's Fifth Symphony in E minor, inspired by the Bohemian composer's visit to this country and entitled "From the New World." The soloist will be Jean Bedetti, the celebrated first violin cellist of Boston Symphony Orchestra who both in Europe and America, is named as one of the finest living masters of this instrument. He will play Lalo's concerto. Saint-Saens, who died last December, will be represented by his symphonic poem. "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," a charming piece of descriptive music, one of this master's most popular works. The concert will close with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, in which the jubilant close is introduced by a trumpet call, according to the episode in the opera from which it was taken.

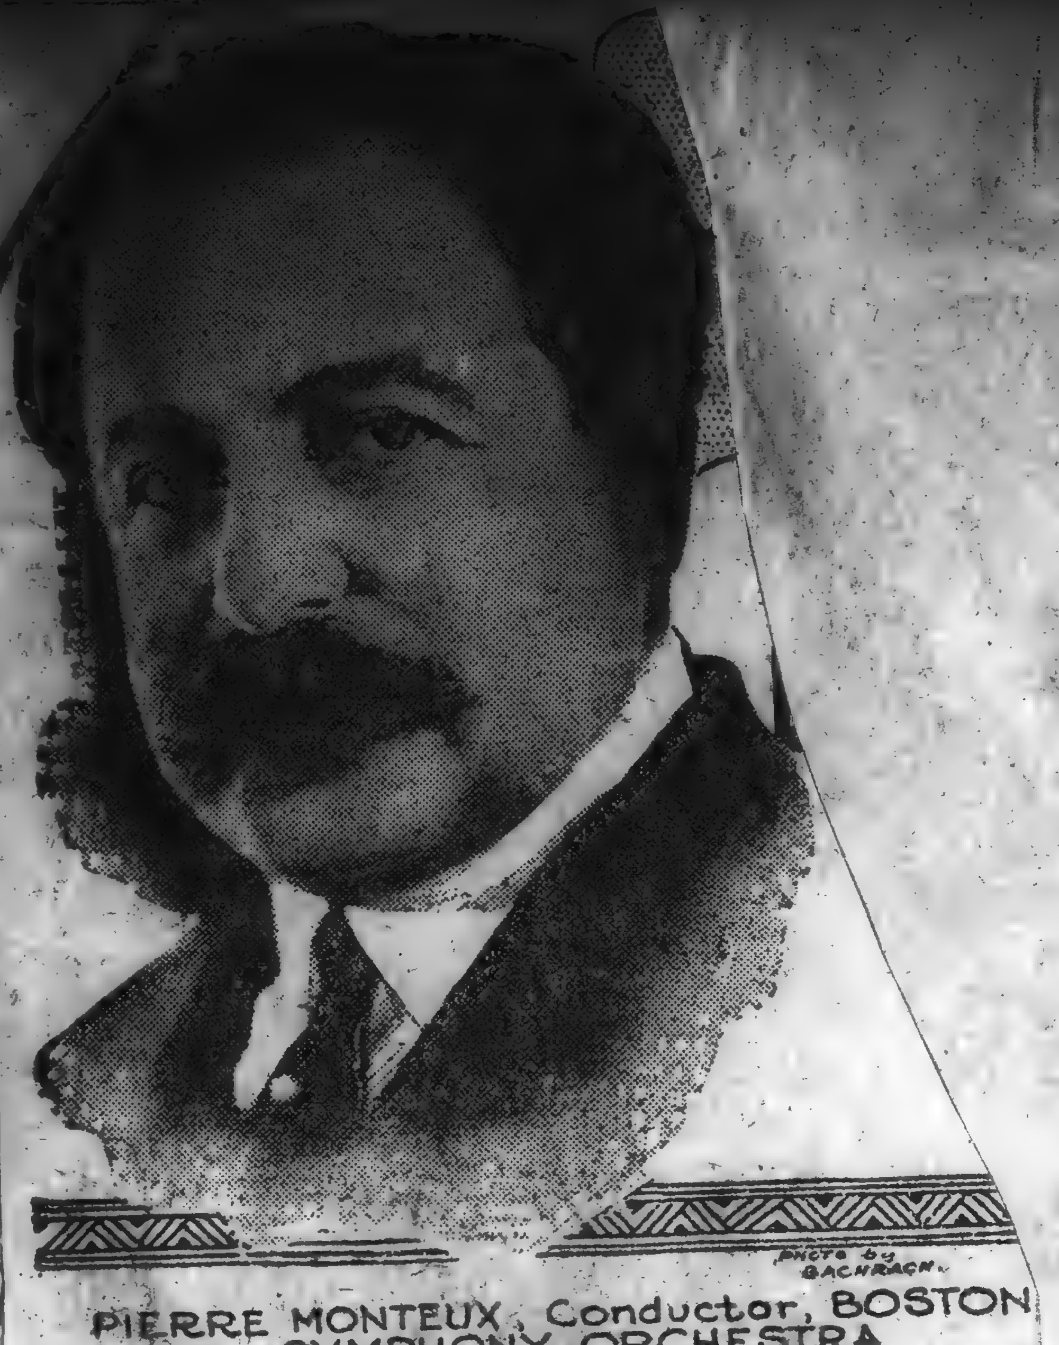
HERALD-MAR. 12.

THURSDAY evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, will play a new set of Irish fantasies written by Charles Martin Loeffler, for voice and orchestra, utilizing Gaelic tunes, and with texts by William Butler Yeats. They are entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan." The Irish tenor, John McCormack, will sing the voice parts. He will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas. The orchestral programme in addition will consist of Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture of the "Russian Easter."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, at its last New York concert this season, will play Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" for the first time in New York. Debussy's "Iberia" and Brahms's First Symphony.



PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

N.Y. WORLD MAR. 12.

MUSIC

ORCHESTRA MUSIC OF THE FUTURE

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

EVERYBODY who was present at the concert of the three united orchestras in Carnegie Hall the other evening was duly impressed with the immensity of the combined forces, the sonority of the results and, indeed, especially considering the small opportunity for rehearsal, the excellence of the performances.

But such an orchestra is not by any means unprecedented. In fact, it was only last Autumn that there were several concerts given in the Lexington Avenue Opera House for the benefit of the striking orchestral players by an orchestra considerably larger. In some of the great musical festivals that have been given in New York and elsewhere there have been orchestras as large, or larger. At the festival conducted by Theodore Thomas in 1882 he had an orchestra of 300 in the Seventh Regiment Armory. The year before, Dr. Leopold Damrosch in the same place had in his orchestra 250 players. At the first of the Handel Festivals in London in 1857 the orchestra is said to have numbered [illegible]. In 1865 it was augmented for the festival to 495.

These orchestras were small, however, in comparison with what a val- [illegible] American accomplished in Boston. The first of the "Peace Jubilees" given in that city in 1869 by Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore had an orchestra of 1,000, supporting a chorus of 10,000. At the second of these monstrosities in 1872 he had an orchestra of 2,000 and a chorus of 20,000. Of course, the physical properties of sound made it quite impossible for anything like a precise and finished performance to reach any individual ear. And as the festivals and jubilees were held in places nearly as large as all outdoors, some discount is naturally to be put on the numbers in relation to the effect, in trying to imagine what the effect must have been.

Here, if ever, had Hector Berlioz only been alive, he would have realized the fullness of his imaginings of concerts "Babylonian, Ninevitish" in their proportions and effects; of an audience to be described as "Apocalyptic."

But all these stupendous occasions were in the nature of extravagances: great efforts for special occasions. The truth is that there has been a steady increase for the last century and a half or so in what is looked upon by the average lover of music as the normal size of orchestras, engaged in regular series.

Did any one at the Carnegie Hall stop to wonder whether the time would come when all first-class concert orchestras would be expected to number as many men as this mass formation of 212? We are and have been for some time headed in that direction. If the tendency that has been steadily operative for, say, 150 years, continues to operate, that time will come; and it will not be in the very far distant future.

The first-class orchestra of today is expected to number at least 95 to 100 men; and even more at its fullest strength. The conditions and circumstances are so different that perhaps a comparison is of no great value; but it is well known that Johann Sebastian Bach, about 200 years ago, never had at his command an orchestra of more than 15 or 16 men. The orchestra for which Haydn wrote so many of his symphonies in Esterház was made up on an average of from 16 to 22 men. When he went on his famous visit to London and excited the musical amateurs of the town by his orchestral concerts in 1791, he had an orchestra of about 40. In France they had rather larger ideas. The orchestra of the Concerts Spirituels in 1775 numbered 58 players; but in 1777 it was thought to have been a tasteful thing to do to reduce these numbers somewhat.

When the Conservatoire orchestra was founded in Paris in 1828, there were 85 members: a large number for the time. A curious detail of the composition of this orchestra is that there were 15 first violins and 16 seconds. In 1876 the strength of the orchestra had hardly increased; in 1898 it had grown to 99. Significant of this tendency toward larger bodies of orchestral players is the record of the Vienna Philharmonic. At its first concerts in 1842 it numbered 70 players. C. F. Pohl, in his historical account of the society, remarks that this was twice as many as the membership of orchestras in Vienna in, say, 1796. In 1864 it had grown only to 78. By 1885 it was 100, and in 1910, 114.

When the New York Philharmonic Society was founded, in 1842, the membership was about sixty; the exact number is unknown, because the membership list of the first year is lost. The number was sixty in 1843. When the society celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, in 1892, it numbered eighty-four "performing members"; but the actual strength of the orchestra in its concerts was considerably greater than that, because of the addition of players who were not members of the society. The actual playing strength for some years before the amalgamation with the National Orchestra was about ninety men.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra was first established, forty-two years ago, it numbered sixty players, and was thought then to be a fair-sized orchestra for Boston; but it was increased to seventy within the three years of Mr. Henschel's term as conductor, and grew steadily thereafter.

In his autobiography Theodore Thomas says that he began his "symphony soirées" in New York in 1864 with an orchestra of about sixty men. By 1867 he had increased it to eighty: a large orchestra. When he began the last stage of his career, as head of the Chicago Orchestra in 1891, he took sixty men with him from New York; he had thirty Chicago men who played with them in Chicago; but in traveling he used only the smaller number. The Chicago Orchestra today numbers 100.

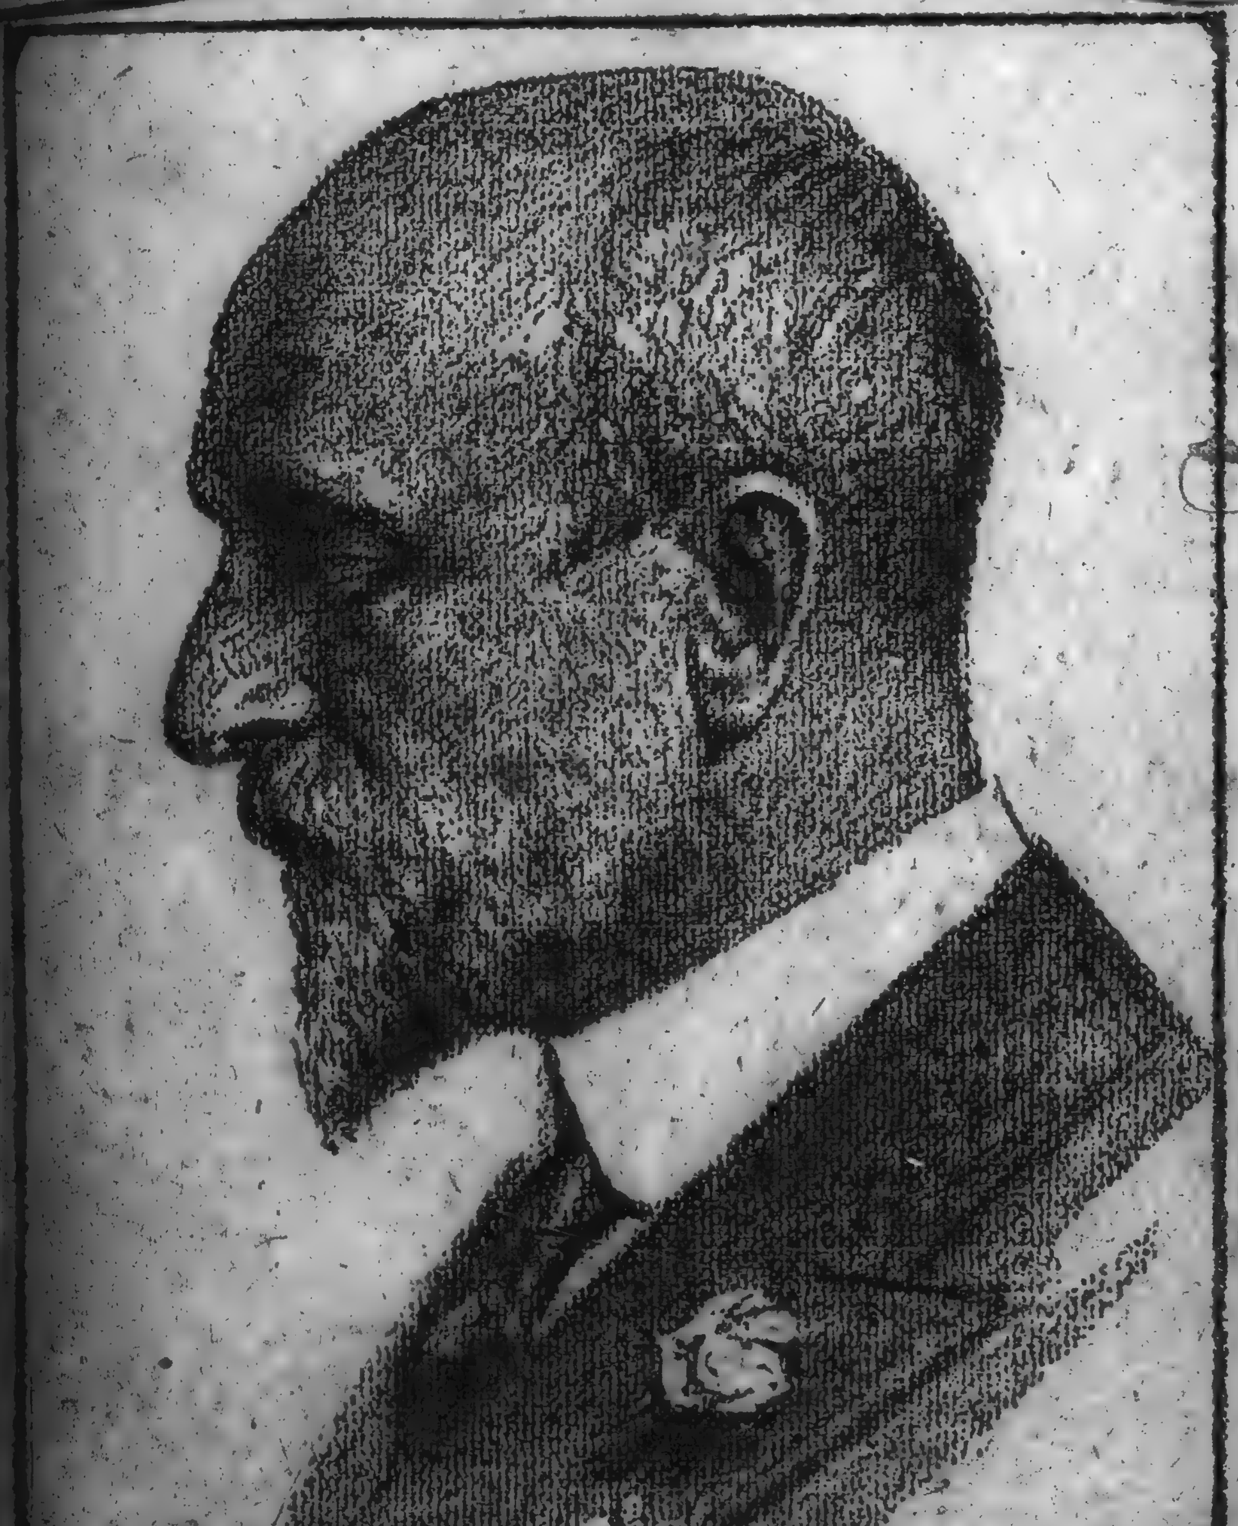
At the present time the active strength of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra is 100 men. It was somewhat increased in numbers as a result of the amalgamation with the National Orchestra, though not so much as some were given to understand, for when the amalgamation was announced it was said that the Philharmonic would then [illegible]ber 120 men. The Philadelphia Orchestra exceeds it in numbers. Its list comprises 118 names. But it must be remembered that this includes some who are not always, or often, called to the colors: the seventh and eighth horns, the fourth to the seventh trombones, the four saxophones, the euphonium, the extra tuba, the E-flat clarinet, the heckelphone. Without these the orchestra might be reckoned at 104. The Boston Symphony and the Chicago Orchestra are both now maintained at a strength of about 100 men. The New York Symphony numbers 97.

The point about these statistics is the steady tendency they show toward an increase in what is considered at any given time to be the normal constitution of a symphony orchestra. This development is due in part to the ever-increasing demand of composers for increased sonority and for a greater variety of orchestral timbres and colors. From Berlioz and Wagner to Strauss and Mahler they have never had the least backwardness about prescribing in their scores how many instruments they wanted. From Berlioz and Wagner to Strauss and Mahler and the others of their school the tendency has been uninterrupted. Occasionally a cry is raised of "back to Mozart"; but nobody has ever successfully gone back to Mozart or seriously made any attempt to. And the public, no doubt, has followed the masters closely in its relish of the increased orchestral sonority and variety of orchestral colors, bathing and plunging into them as into a rising tide.

And so, as was said in the beginning, if there is no check, if no reaction sets in, the time is not far distant when an orchestra of 200 will be regarded as of the normal size; when scores will be so long that conductors' stands must be lengthened to hold them. Platforms must be built out to accommodate the increased number of players, and hence the number of seats for the audiences must be reduced, as was done in Carnegie Hall the other evening.

When this happens the deficits that the orchestra backers must pay will be increased, both because of the increase in the number of men who must be paid and the decrease in the number of people paying for seats who can be accommodated in the halls. Then the time will come when new and larger concert halls must be built. In fact, the imagination, once let loose, can see only a dismaying future.

Some think there will be a reaction; that the tide that has been rising for more than a century will ebb: that composers will seek for effects other than great sonorities. But there are as yet few signs that it is coming.



C. M. Loeffler, Composer of New "Irish Fantasies."

John McCormack sings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, when Monteux will produce for the first time in New York a new set of "Irish Fantasies" by C. M. Loeffler, after texts by W. B. Yeats. In the same program are Schubert's symphony in C and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

Pierre Monteux closes the Boston Symphony's thirty-sixth season in New York next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, presenting Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in this city, and together with Debussy's "Iberia" and the first symphony of Brahms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fragments of Lazare Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," for the first time in America. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies," for voice and orchestra, were performed last week, John McCormack singing the vocal parts. They will be given by the orchestra in New York.

N.Y. TIMES. MAR. 12.

John McCormack will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last pair of concerts this week on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The tenor will be heard in three numbers from Charles Martin Loeffler's new set of "Irish Fantasies" for voice and orchestra, first time here. The numbers are: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," settings of verses by Yeats, and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan," a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. Gaelic folk tunes are utilized in the score. The other works will be Schubert's symphony in C, Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "The Russian Easter," and, for Mr. McCormack, two airs from cantatas by Bach. At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close his season in New York with Debussy's "Iberia," Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," new here, and Brahms's symphony, No. 1.

N.Y. HERALD MAR. 12.

Fourth Extra Symphony Concert Tomorrow Night

The fourth concert in the extra series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes tomorrow night. Dvorak's popular "New World Symphony," based chiefly on Czechish folk tunes and the style of various German composers, but composed as a result of a visit to the United States, is the chief item on a program in which Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3 Overture" is the only first-rank masterpiece. Saint-Saens' pretty tone poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Lalo's cello concerto, with Jean Beditti, first cellist of the orchestra, playing the solo part, are the other numbers.

The program of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, March 24 and 25, includes d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." Emilio de Gogorza will sing with the orchestra "Where E'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," and a Spanish song by Alvarez.

◆ ◆ ◆

Mr Monteux is planning a Wagner program for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony, Sunday, March 26, which will include excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," and each of the four "Ring" operas.

GLOBE - MAR 12.

REPEATED at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday evening, Mr. Loeffler's new Irish Fantasias and Mr. McCormack's singing therein stirred hearers hardly less than on Friday afternoon. The second audience, however, came semi-prepared, since over-night print and tongues had said much. Warmly expectant, it lost, none the less, the fine zest of surprise that ran up and down Symphony Hall through the first hearing. The compensation was the freer singing of Mr. McCormack, again master of all his powers and outpouring both upon the music. Yet Bach more than Loeffler was the gainer by this ampler and finer grained tone. Next Thursday, composer and singer, conductor and orchestra bear the Fantasias to New York. There seems little doubt of their fortunes there.

Mozart preceded Bach in the ordering of the concert and Berlioz followed Loeffler. From Mozart Mr. Monteux assembled four movements of the "Haffner Serenade"—the festal pieces written for a wedding in the house of that burgomaster and patron of music in Salzburg. Through an Allegro, an Andante, a Minuet and a Rondo, they make a bright, decorative, changeful music—all suppleness, spontaneity and elegance, with light sentiment here and there to soften it, with light ardor once and again to grace and speed it. Mr. Monteux kept the full choir of the strings, balanced it skilfully with wind instruments. Yet nowhere did he stiffen or thicken tone or stay the flowing pattern. Seldom has Mozart sounded so Mozartean in Symphony Hall—the more for the fineness of tone and the adept sense of melody and arabesque that Mr. Burgin brought to the many measures for solo-violin. On Friday, in particular, Kreisler-like he played them.

Out of Berlioz came the music for the scene of the lovers in Capulet's garden and the scherzo of "Queen Mab" from his symphony "Romeo and Juliet." The voice of Berlioz's melodies is like no other. There are those who can hear in them neither beauty nor passion. Possibly the very intensity of the composer stiffens and strips them. Yet so drenched are they in his ardors of eye, ear and spirit that to this day they prevail. Yet it is easy to prefer the Berlioz of fantasy in the music of "Queen Mab," discovering how rhythm and modulation, harmonies and timbres may serve it to the height of his romantical bent. The Monteux of the theatre warmed and sustained the music of the garden; with a light hand he and the orchestra carried Berlioz's fitful, flickering Scherzo.

H. T. P.

From seven of Wagner's operas Mr. Monteux has chosen the numbers to be played by the Symphony Orchestra at the concert for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, March 26, in Symphony Hall, viz.:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Procession to the Minster and Introduction to Act III. from "Lohengrin."
Introduction to Act III., Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger."
Scene of the Rhine Maidens and the Entrance of the Gods Into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold."
Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre."
Forest Scene from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung."

In the fragments from "Das Rheingold," Mmes. Ferrabini, Littlefield and Tingley and Messrs. Bennett and Simonds will sing the parts for voices.

TRANS. MAR 13.

BEDETTI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of its extra Monday series last night to an appreciative audience that practically filled Symphony Hall. Mr Monteux again chose familiar pieces from the repertory of the regular Symphony concerts, and led them with his accustomed degree of energy and intelligence. The soloist was Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who played Lalo's concerto with a skill and taste that won him hearty applause. This piece is more interesting than most 'cello concertos, tuneful without vulgarity; brilliant without degenerating into mere soulless fireworks.

The symphony was Dvorak's popular "From the New World," which does not seem to lose its hold upon audiences, however much the fastidious may find fault with its facile shallow prettiness. The largo, in which the composer's gift for writing attractive and new melodies in pleasing imitation of any musical style that happened to interest him is well displayed, won, as always, especial favor by its assimilation of American negro tunes and Czechish folk music.

Mr Monteux made "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" turn crisply and fluently. Beethoven's third "Leoneore" overture, the only first rank masterpiece on the program, was well played. The final concert in this series will be given April 10, with Richard Burgin as soloist.

GLOBE [illegible] 13

ETTI IS MPHONY OLOIST

xtra Concert Is De uccess and Pleases Audience

eux presented the fourth the Monday night series y concerts last night with i, celist, as soloist. The pened with the Dvorak i" symphony and was fol e symphonic poem, "Om nning Wheel," the Lalo or violoncello, and th the Boston Symphony Orchestra who both in Europe and America, is named as one of the finest living masters of this instrument. He will play Lalo's concerto. Saint-Saens, who died last December, will be represented by his symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," a charming piece of descriptive music, one of this master's most popular works. The concert will close with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, in which the jubilant close is introduced by a trumpet call, according to the episode in the opera from which it was taken.

HERALD-MAR. 12.

THURSDAY evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, will play a new set of Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler, written for voice and orchestra, utilizing Gaelic tunes, and with texts by William Butler Yeats. They are entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan." The Irish tenor, John McCormack, will sing the voice parts. He will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas. The orchestral programme in addition will consist of Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture of the "Russian Easter."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, at its last New York concert this season, will play Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" for the first time in New York. Debussy's "Iberia" and Brahms's First Symphony.

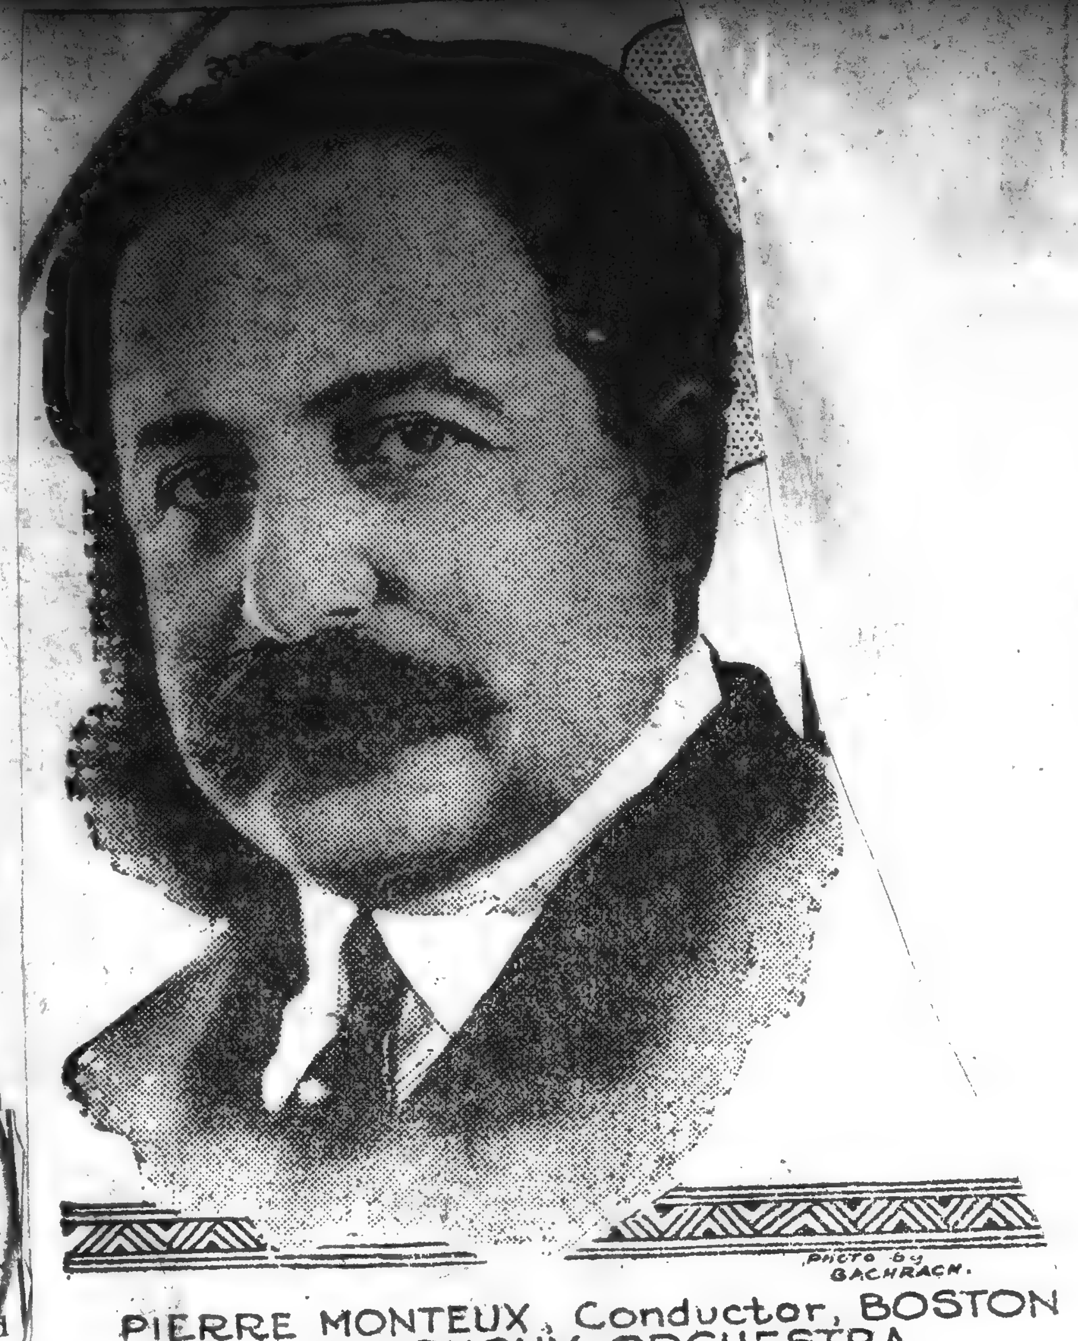


PHOTO BY BACHRACH.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

N.Y. WORLD MAR. 12.

MUSIC
ORCHESTRA MUSIC OF THE FUTURE

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

EVERYBODY who was present at the concert of the three united orchestras in Carnegie Hall the other evening was duly impressed with the immensity of the combined forces, the sonority of the results and, indeed, especially considering the small opportunity for rehearsal, the excellence of the performances.

But such an orchestra is not by any means unprecedented. In fact, it was only last Autumn that there were several concerts given in the Lexington Avenue Opera House for the benefit of the striking orchestral players by an orchestra considerably larger. In some of the great musical festivals that have been given in New York and elsewhere there have been orchestras as large, or larger. At the festival conducted by Theodore Thomas in 1882 he had an orchestra of 300 in the Seventh Regiment Armory. The year before, Dr. Leopold Damrosch in the same place had in his orchestra 250 players. At the first of the Handel Festivals in London in 1857 the orchestra is said to have numbered 396. In 1865 it was augmented for the festival to 495.

These orchestras were small, however, in comparison with what a val[illegible] Irish-American accomplished in Boston. The first of the "Peace Jubilees" given in that city in 1869 by Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore had an orchestra of 1,000, supporting a chorus of 10,000. At the second of these monstrosities in 1872 he had an orchestra of 2,000 and a chorus of 20,000. Of course, the physical properties of sound made it quite impossible for anything like a precise and finished performance to reach any individual ear. And as the festivals and jubilees were held in places nearly as large as all outdoors, some discount is naturally to be put on the numbers in relation to the effect, in trying to imagine what the effect must have been.

Here, if ever, had Hector Berlioz only been alive, he would have realized the fullness of his imaginings of concerts "Babylonian, Ninevitish" in their proportions and effects; of an audience to be described as "Apocalyptic."

But all these stupendous occasions were in the nature of extravagances: great efforts for special occasions. The truth is that there has been a steady increase for the last century and a half or so in what is looked upon by the average lover of music as the normal size of orchestras, engaged in regular series.

Did any one at the Carnegie Hall stop to wonder whether the time would come when all first-class concert orchestras would be expected to number as many men as this mass formation of 212? We are and have been for some time headed in that direction. If the tendency that has been steadily operative for, say, 150 years, continues to operate, that time will come; and it will not be in the very far distant future.

The first-class orchestra of today is expected to number at least 95 to 100 men; and even more at its fullest strength. The conditions and circumstances are so different that perhaps a comparison is of no great value; but it is well known that Johann Sebastian Bach, about 200 years ago, never had at his command an orchestra of more than 15 or 16 men. The orchestra for which Haydn wrote so many of his symphonies in Esterház was made up on an average of from 16 to 22 men. When he went on his famous visit to London and excited the musical amateurs of the town by his orchestral concerts in 1791, he had an orchestra of about 40. In France they had rather larger ideas. The orchestra of the Concerts Spirituels in 1775 numbered 58 players; but in 1777 it was thought to have been a tasteful thing to do to reduce these numbers somewhat.

When the Conservatoire orchestra was founded in Paris in 1828, there were 85 members: a large number for the time. A curious detail of the composition of this orchestra is that there were 15 first violins and 16 seconds. In 1876 the strength of the orchestra had hardly increased; in 1898 it had grown to 99. Significant of this tendency toward larger bodies of orchestral players is the record of the Vienna Philharmonic. At its first concerts in 1842 it numbered 70 players. C. F. Pohl, in his historical account of the society, remarks that this was twice as many as the membership of orchestras in Vienna in, say, 1796. In 1864 it had grown only to 78. By 1885 it was 100, and in 1910, 114.

When the New York Philharmonic Society was founded, in 1842, the membership was about sixty; the exact number is unknown, because the membership list of the first year is lost. The number was sixty in 1843. When the society celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, in 1892, it numbered eighty-four "performing members"; but the actual strength of the orchestra in its concerts was considerably greater than that, because of the addition of players who were not members of the society. The actual playing strength for some years before the amalgamation with the National Orchestra was about ninety men.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra was first established, forty-two years ago, it numbered sixty players, and was thought then to be a fair-sized orchestra for Boston; but it was increased to seventy within the three years of Mr. Henschel's term as conductor, and grew steadily thereafter.

In his autobiography Theodore Thomas says that he began his "symphony soirées" in New York in 1864 with an orchestra of about sixty men. By 1867 he had increased it to eighty: a large orchestra. When he began the last stage of his career, as head of the Chicago Orchestra in 1891, he took sixty men with him from New York; he had thirty Chicago men who played with them in Chicago; but in traveling he used only the smaller number. The Chicago Orchestra today numbers 100.

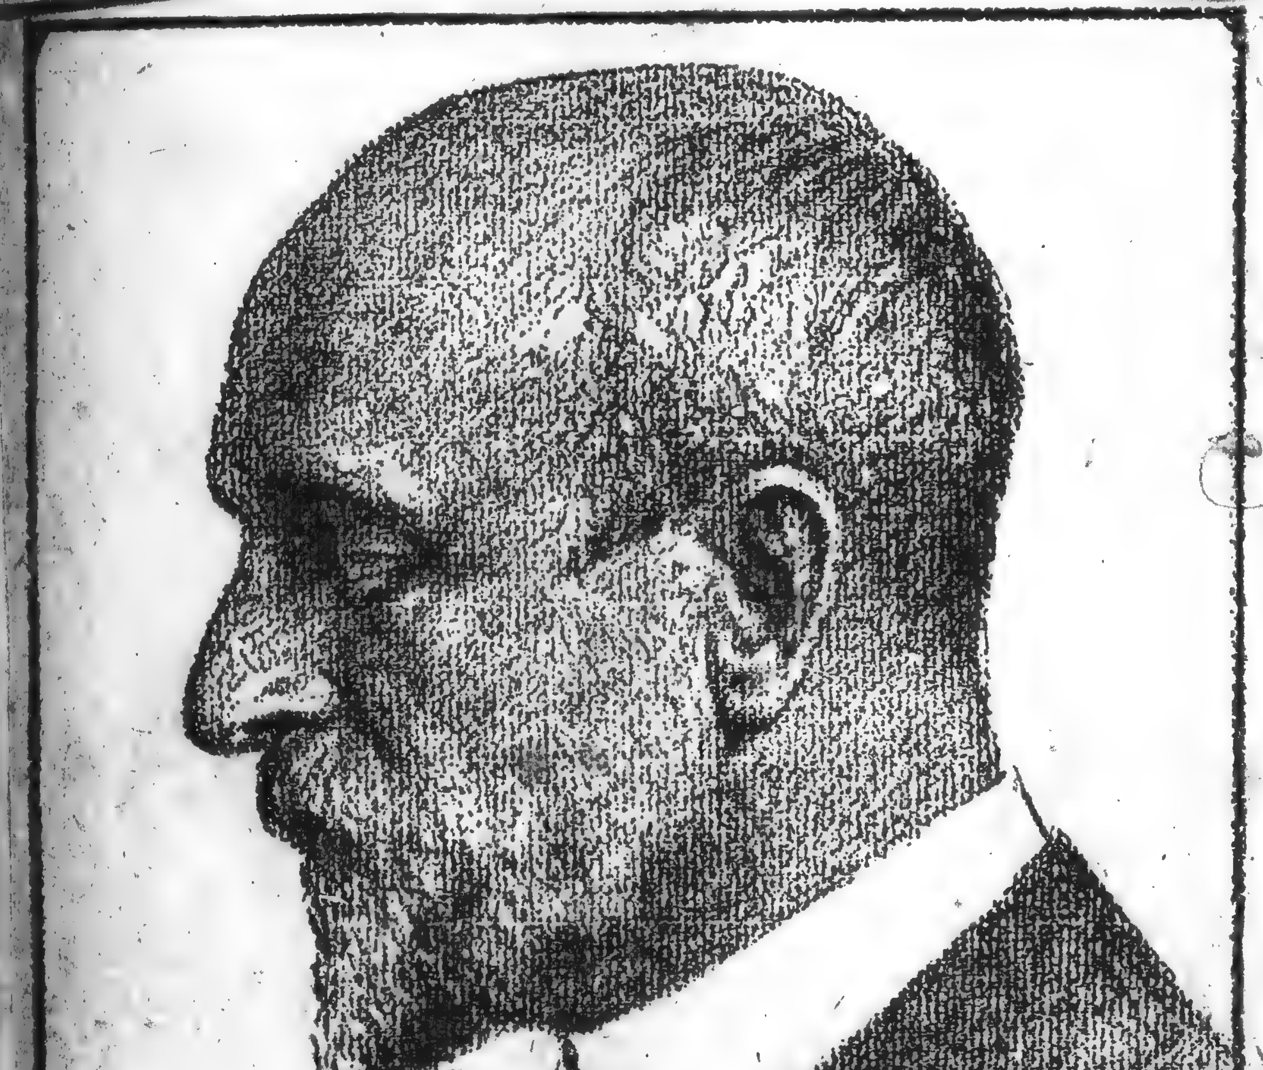
At the present time the active strength of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra is 100 men. It was somewhat increased in numbers as a result of the amalgamation with the National Orchestra, though not so much as some were given to understand, for when the amalgamation was announced it was said that the Philharmonic would thenceforward number 120 men. The Philadelphia Orchestra exceeds it in numbers. Its list comprises 118 names. But it must be remembered that this includes some who are not always, or often, called to the colors: the seventh and eighth horns, the fourth to the seventh trombones, the four saxophones, the euphonium, the extra tuba, the E-flat clarinet, the heckelphone. Without these the orchestra might be reckoned at 104. The Boston Symphony and the Chicago Orchestra are both now maintained at a strength of about 100 men. The New York Symphony numbers 97.

The point about these statistics is the steady tendency they show toward an increase in what is considered at any given time to be the normal constitution of a symphony orchestra. This development is due in part to the ever-increasing demand of composers for increased sonority and for a greater variety of orchestral timbres and colors. From Berlioz and Wagner to Strauss and Mahler they have never had the least backwardness about prescribing in their scores how many instruments they wanted. From Berlioz and Wagner to Strauss and Mahler and the others of their school the tendency has been uninterrupted. Occasionally a cry is raised of "back to Mozart"; but nobody has ever successfully gone back to Mozart or seriously made any attempt to. And the public, no doubt, has followed the masters closely in its relish of the increased orchestral sonority and variety of orchestral colors, bathing and plunging into them as into a rising tide.

And so, as was said in the beginning, if there is no check, if no reaction sets in, the time is not far distant when an orchestra of 200 will be regarded as of the normal size; when scores will be so long that conductors' stands must be lengthened to hold them. Platforms must be built out to accommodate the increased number of players, and hence the number of seats for the audiences must be reduced, as was done in Carnegie Hall the other evening.

When this happens the deficits that the orchestra backers must pay will be increased, both because of the increase in the number of men who must be paid and the decrease in the number of people paying for seats who can be accommodated in the halls. Then the time will come when new and larger concert halls must be built. In fact, the imagination, once let loose, can see only a dismaying future.

Some think there will be a reaction; that the tide that has been rising for more than a century will ebb: that composers will seek for effects other than great sonorities. But there are as yet few signs that it is coming.



C. M. Loeffler, Composer of New "Irish Fantasies."

John McCormack sings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, when Monteux will produce for the first time in New York a new set of "Irish Fantasies" by C. M. Loeffler, after texts by W. B. Yeats. In the same program are Schubert's symphony in C and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

Pierre Monteux closes the Boston Symphony's thirty-sixth season in New York next Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, presenting Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in this city, together with Debussy's "Iberia" and the first symphony of Brahms.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fragments of Lazare Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," for the first time in America. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies," for voice and orchestra, were performed last week, John McCormack singing the vocal parts. They will be given by the orchestra in New York.

N.Y. TIMES. MAR. 12.

John McCormack will be the soloist at the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last pair of concerts this week on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. The tenor will be heard in three numbers from Charles Martin Loeffler's new set of "Irish Fantasies" for voice and orchestra, first time here. The numbers are: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," settings of verses by Yeats, and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan," a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. Gaelic folk tunes are utilized in the score. The other works will be Schubert's symphony in C, Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "The Russian Easter," and, for Mr. McCormack, two airs from cantatas by Bach. At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close his season in New York with Debussy's "Iberia," Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," new here, and Brahms's symphony, No. 1.

NY HERALD MAR. 12.

Fourth Extra Symphony Concert Tomorrow Night

The fourth concert in the extra series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes tomorrow night. Dvorak's popular "New World Symphony," based chiefly on Czechish folk tunes and the style of various German composers, but composed as a result of a visit to the United States, is the chief item on a program in which Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3 Overture" is the only first-rank masterpiece. Saint-Saens' pretty tone poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and Lalo's cello concerto, with Jean Beditti, first cellist of the orchestra, playing the solo part, are the other numbers.

The program of the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, March 24 and 25, includes d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Eicheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring." Emilio de Gogorza will sing with the orchestra "Where E'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," and a Spanish song by Alvarez.

◆◆◆

Mr Monteux is planning a Wagner program for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony, Sunday, March 26, which will include excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," and each of the four "Ring" operas.

GLOBE MAR. 12

REPEATED at the Symphony Concerts of Saturday evening, Mr. Loeffler's new Irish Fantasias and Mr. McCormack's singing therein stirred hearers hardly less than on Friday afternoon. The second audience, however, came semi-prepared, since over-night print and tongues had said much. Warmly expectant, it lost, none the less, the fine zest of surprise that ran up and down Symphony Hall through the first hearing. The compensation was the freer singing of Mr. McCormack, again master of all his powers and outpouring both upon the music. Yet Bach more than Loeffler was the gainer by this ampler and finer grained tone. Next Thursday, composer and singer, conductor and orchestra bear the Fantasias to New York. There seems little doubt of their fortunes there.

Mozart preceded Bach in the ordering of the concert and Berlioz followed Loeffler. From Mozart Mr. Monteux assembled four movements of the "Haffner Serenade"—the festal pieces written for a wedding in the house of that burgomaster and patron of music in Salzburg. Through an Allegro, an Andante, a Minuet and a Rondo, they make a bright, decorative, changeful music—all suppleness, spontaneity and elegance, with light sentiment here and there to soften it, with light ardor once and again to grace and speed it. Mr. Monteux kept the full choir of the strings, balanced it skilfully with wind instruments. Yet nowhere did he stiffen or thicken tone or stay the flowing pattern. Seldom has Mozart sounded so Mozartean in Symphony Hall—the more for the fineness of tone and the adept sense of melody and arabesque that Mr. Burgin brought to the many measures for solo-violin. On Friday, in particular, Kreisler-like he played them.

Out of Berlioz came the music for the scene of the lovers in Capulet's garden and the scherzo of "Queen Mab" from his symphony "Romeo and Juliet." The voice of Berlioz's melodies is like no other. There are those who can hear in them neither beauty nor passion. Possibly the very intensity of the composer stiffens and strips them. Yet so drenched are they in his ardors of eye, ear and spirit that to this day they prevail. Yet it is easy to prefer the Berlioz of fantasy in the music of "Queen Mab," discovering how rhythm and modulation, harmonies and timbres may serve it to the height of his romantical bent. The Monteux of the theatre warmed and sustained the music of the garden; with a light hand he and the orchestra carried Berlioz's fitful, flickering Scherzo.

H. T. P.

From seven of Wagner's operas Mr. Monteux has chosen the numbers to be played by the Symphony Orchestra at the concert for its Pension Fund on Sunday afternoon, March 26, in Symphony Hall, viz.:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Procession to the Minster and Introduction to Act III. from "Lohengrin."
Introduction to Act III., Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger."
Scene of the Rhine Maidens and the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold."
Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre."
Forest Scene from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung."

In the fragments from "Das Rheingold," Mmes. Ferrarini, Littlefield and Tingley and Messrs. Bennett and Simonds will sing the parts for voices.

TRA[illegible] MAR 13.

BEDETTI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert of its extra Monday series last night to an appreciative audience that practically filled Symphony Hall. Mr Monteux again chose familiar pieces from the repertory of the regular Symphony concerts, and led them with his accustomed degree of energy and intelligence. The soloist was Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, who played Lalo's concerto with a skill and taste that won him hearty applause. This piece is more interesting than most 'cello concertos, tuneful without vulgarity; brilliant without degenerating into mere soulless fireworks.

The symphony was Dvorak's popular "From the New World," which does not seem to lose its hold upon audiences, however much the fastidious may find fault with its facile shallow prettiness. The largo, in which the composer's gift for writing attractive and new melodies, in pleasing imitation of any musical style that happened to interest him is well displayed, won, as always, especial favor by its assimilation of American negro tunes and Czechish folk music.

Mr Monteux made "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" turn crisply and fluently. Beethoven's third "Leoneore" overture, the only first rank masterpiece on the program, was well played. The final concert in this series will be given April 10, with Richard Burgin as soloist.

GLO[illegible]

ETTI IS MPHONY
OLOIST

xtra Concert Is De-uccess and Pleases Audience

eux presented the fourth the Monday night series
y concerts last night) with ti, celist, as soloist. The pened with the Dvorak
l" symphony and was fol-e symphonic poem, "Om-nning Wheel," the Lalo or violoncello, and the evening, Mr.

h Fantasias and
singing there.
less than on Fri-
nd audience, how-
, since over-night said much. Warm-
e the less, the fine up and down Symfirst hearing. The freer singing of Mr.
aster of all his pow-
both upon the music.
Loeffler was the gainer
nd finer grained tone.
poser and singer, con-bear the Fantasias to e seems little doubt of

Bach in the ordering
Berlioz followed Loef-
Mr. Monteux assembled the "Haffner Serenade" written for a wedding
that burgomaster and Salzburg. Through an nte, a Minuet and a
a bright, decorative,
all suppleness, sponta-
e, with light sentiment
soften it, with light ar-
n to grace and speed it.
the full choir of the
it skilfully with wind
nowhere did he stiffen
stay the flowing pat-Mozart sounded so Mo-ny Hall—the more for e and the adept sense besque that Mr. Burgin
any measures for solo-
n particular, Kreisler-

me the music for the Capulet's garden and n Mab" from his sym-Juliet." The voice of
is like no other. There hear in them neither Possibly the very inoser stiffens and strips nched" are they in his
and spirit that to this
Yet it is easy to prefer asy in the music of vering how rhythm and
nies and timbres may ight of his romantical
the theatre warmed
usic of the garden;
and the orchestra
ful flickering Scherzo.

H. T. P.

agner's operas Mr.
en the numbers to be ony Orchestra at the ion Fund on Sunday at-
in Symphony Hall, viz.:
lying Dutchman."
Minster and Introduc-
from "Lohengrin."
Act III., Apprentices'
to Sachs from "Die

Maidens and the Entrance
to Valhalla from "Das

s from "Die Walküre."
"Siegfried."
Music from "Götter-

from "Das Rheingold," Littlefield and Tingley
t and Simonds will sing

MAR 13

OLOIST AT Y CONCERT

hony Orchestra gave of its extra Monday
n appreciative auully filled Symphony
again chose familiar rtory of the regular and led them with e of energy and in-
was Jean Bedetti, hestra, who played a skill and taste
y applause. This ting than most ul without vulgar-degenerating into

Dvorak's popular
," which does not upon audiences.
stidious may find
shallow prettiness.
the composer's ractive and new imitation of any appened to interyed, won, as al-
y its assimilation
mes and Czechish

'Omphale's Spin-
ply and fluently.
eonore" overture,
asterpiece on the layed. The final will be given
Burgin as solo-

TI IS ONY
ST

ncert Is De-
and Pleases nce

nted the fourth
ay night series
e last night with

---

overture to "Leonore" by Beethoven.

From the start to finish, it was a program that pleased the audience and they showed their appreciation by very long-continued applause. Mr. Monteux must have been gratified at the success which met his men on this occasion. The symphony was very beautifully done—far more so than is usually the case when this symphony is given. Other conductors seem to have a tendency to overdo some of the effects.

Mr. Bedetti's appearance as soloist from the ranks of the orchestra was nothing short of a triumph. He played extremely well and was recalled time after time and applauded to the echo both by the audience and the orchestra. They were obviously very proud of him and had every right to be.

The Saint-Saens "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was very charming in the delicacy which was through it like a thread. In a word, one of the most enjoyable concerts heard in some time.

[illegible] MAR 14.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 4TH EXTRA CONCERT

'Cellist Bedetti Given an Ovation by Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave the fourth in the series of extra concerts last evening, in Symphony Hall. The program: Dvorak, symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72. Mr. Jean Bedetti, first violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Edouard Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra.

Those who sat last evening 'neath the spell of Dr. Dvorak's composition evidently cared little whether this gifted Bohemian made use in it of "American," "Indian" or Czechish themes. It is faintly suggestive of one, now of another. To those of open mind it remains a symphony of wonderful tonal coloring, a narrative skilfully told in musical terms. Mr. Monteux followed faithfully the composer's admonition to Nedbal, conducting the work in Berlin 22 years ago: "Take the introduction to the symphony as slowly as possible." It was doubly impressive so. The second movement, largo, was given highly sensitized translation by the strings, not too soon to be forgotten. The entire work was splendidly played.

"Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens's first symphonic poem, written originally a rondo for piano and then for orchestra, again revealed the absolute hold of a brilliant conductor on a band of skilled players. Mr. Monteux read his score with a surety and fluency which found voice in every instrument, from harp to horn. Through all these voices the rhythmic whir of the spinning wheel found its way. It was Omphale purring, while Hercules vainly roared and writhed.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, played like No. 2, as the overture to his ill-starred opera, "Fidelio," has as its high mark the trumpet signal which in the opera preludes the salvation of Florestan and Leonore and the discomfiture of Pizaro. As the tag of an exceptionally enjoyable program it gave pleasure to the audience. Doubtless to most it was a musical novelty.

Mr. Bedetti chose a piece fully calculated to reveal his virtuosity. The three movements, prelude, intermezzo and rondo, of Lalo's concerto, conspire to test the bravest and hardiest of 'cellists. Mr. Bedetti emerged triumphant, was thrice recalled, and in deep agitation returned the hand-clasp of Mr. Monteux. It was a performance marked by flawless technique, though many possibly would have taken more delight in a briefer, more melodic, offering.

HERALD MAR 14

The Symphony Orchestra departs today on its final journey, for the season, to New York. There, tomorrow evening, with Mr. McCormack again assisting, it will repeat Mr. Loeffler's three "Irish Fantasias" first heard here last week. They bid fair to be as well received in the one city as in the other. Schubert's Symphony in C major is the other major item of the programme. For the concert of Saturday afternoon in New York, Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's Symphony in C minor are the

[illegible] MAR 15

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A new work by Charles Martin Loeffler and the appearance of John McCormack as soloist gave an unusual distinction to the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York. Three of Mr. Loeffler's "Five Irish Fantasies" for tenor and orchestra, his latest composition, were given, Mr. McCormack singing the solo part. He was also heard in two airs from cantatas by Bach, "My Dear Jesus Is Lost," from the cantata of the same title, and "Take Thou From Me," from "All They From Sheba Shall Come." The orchestra played Schubert's C major symphony and Rimsky Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

Mr. Loeffler's settings are of Yeats's "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," and W. Hefernan's "Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan." It was not surprising that he has submitted to the lure of the new Irish poets who have interpreted old Irish feelings, and to the enchantment of Irish folk song. Nor was it to be anticipated that in making use of both he would fall into any of the easy formulas that have done so much service to musicians for so many years.

His settings have the individuality, the subtlety, the fine musicianship that belongs to all his work; he touches the musical idiom with fine discrim-

---

Boston Symphony Gives Final Concert

John McCormack as Soloist Sings Irish Fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season was that given in Carnegie Hall last night. The program comprised Schubert's symphony in C major, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" and several vocal numbers. These were two airs from cantatas of Bach, namely, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus" and "Take Thou for Thy Very Own," and three of the five settings of Irish songs by Charles Martin Loeffler which he calls "Irish Fantasias for Voice and Orchestra." The singer was John McCormack.

The lyrics of Mr. Loeffler heard last evening are Nos. 2, 3 and 5 from the set. The poems are Yeats's "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan" by W. Hefferman. These are good texts, poetic in content, rich in character and inviting musical treatment. Mr. Loeffler yielded quite readily to the temptation to compose this music. His is a mind that revels in fairy fantasies and the treasures of folk lore. That he has imagination and humor is known to all who have heard his "Villanelle du Diable" and his grimly tragic "Death of Tintagiles." Perhaps most of his admirers did not know how delightfully and jovially Irish he could be till they heard his "Fiddler of Dooney" last night.

The songs are all good, though they are not constructed with a view to vocal exhibition. They are literally fantasies for voice and orchestra, in which the instrumental background is descriptive and illustrative and also plays the chief part in creating the mood. Folk tunes play their part in the web of melody and excellent instrumental characterization is conspicuous. Mr. McCormack sang the songs admirably and at no time this season had the orchestra been heard to better advantage than in these numbers.

Mr. McCormack's delivery of the Bach airs was noteworthy for its fine dignity, its sincerity and its artistic conviction. Those who hear this tenor only in his recitals do not know his highest achievements. The Boston Symphony musicians played Schubert in a solid and opulent manner which seemed to give the audience great satisfaction.

N.Y. HERALD MAR. 17.

---

a piper and saw dancers with Bridget his bride, till one of them bore her away; and he awoke and they were gone like a drifting smoke.

The fiddler of Dooney is he who plays so that folks dance like a wave in the sea, and who expects Peter to call him first in through the gate. "Caitilin-ni-Holahan" is the allegorical name of Ireland on whom morn shall dawn; in song in an impassioned prophecy of Ireland's freedom.

Mr. Seeffler has found a richly expressive and characteristic musical investment for each of these poems. He has been peculiarly successful in evoking the mood of each in music that shows a strong individual character and fecundity of invention, music that is unmistakably his own; that has picturesque and graphic touches, but is chiefly concerned with the spirit rather than with the descriptive letter; and that is developed with a consummate musicianship.

He has never written for orchestra with more consummate skill, flexibility and precision of touch, with more clarity or glowing beauty of color. He has not been so "modern" as to neglect the voice for the orchestra. His vocal line is truly vocal and offers something that so great an artist as Mr. McCormack can lift to a plane of sustained interest, can make characteristically expressive, and in the prophetic song raise to a pitch of noble and passionate eloquence.

Mr. McCormack was in splendid voice and sang these pieces, difficult and in some ways exacting for the singer, with the skill of a consummate artist, with intense conviction, with great beauty of phrasing and clearness of diction. Mr. Loeffler was fortunate in having an interpreter who so completely assimilated the spirit of his music and gave it so inspiring an utterance.

Equally fine was Mr. McCormack's singing of the two airs by Bach. The first is of an especially poignant beauty and individual character, and to both Mr. McCormack's artistic mastery and fervid delivery gave a profound impressiveness. He sang them as one who thoroughly believed in them. And in the orchestral accompaniments to Bach's airs and Mr. Loeffler's "Fantasies" Mr. Monteux achieved beautiful results. Mr. Loeffler's orchestral writing is complex and difficult.

Mr. McCormack aroused much enthusiasm by his singing and was called back many times. Mr. Loeffler appeared to take the master's share of the applause for his composition and had, likewise, to appear many times.

The symphony of Schubert was well played. Perhaps the scherzo might have had somewhat more elasticity of rhythm; but it was on the whole a straightforward presentation of the spirit of Schubert's music, fine and glowing in orchestral tone and balance of parts.

TIMES MAR. 17.

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

At Carnegie Hall the last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts for the season broke with precedent last night by invoking the aid of a soloist —a rare procedure for the Boston band. Evidently Mr. Monteux decided that so long as he must have a singer he might as well have a good one, for he offered no less a personage than John McCormack.

in Charles Martin Loeffler's settings of three Irish poems.

The Loeffler songs are from a group of "Five Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra," of which the first two were written in 1907 (David Bispham sang them in Boston in 1909) and the last was finished two years ago. The texts of four of them are by William Butler Yeats, the last being the work of a blind Irish poet, otherwise unknown, named Heferman. The titles are "The Hosting of the Sidhe," "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney," and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan"—or, if you prefer, "Cathleen Ni Hoolihan," which as all Gaelic-speaking persons know, means Ireland. The last three were done last night, their first hearing in New York.

Announcement of a new work by Charles Martin Loeffler is always good news, for Loeffler, even at his lowest ebb, is always a sensitive, fastidious artist, and one who can do miraculous things with an orchestra. These songs are not great. Something that is in the poems is wanting in the music. Loeffler has overset them, for one thing. He is happiest when he is conveying subtleties, and these poems are simple. No word in them has escaped his sophisticated scrutiny, yet in the very act of catching every syllable and sentence that is characteristically Celtic he has lost the overtones, the mood that is implicit in every one of the poems, yet is never expressed in them —the immense, melancholy humor of the Irish soul.

It is not the words of "The Fiddler of Dooney" that are Celtic. There is not a sentence in Yeats's verses that is not good, clean English. But the idea, the fiddler's bland conviction that when he gets to the gates of Heaven he will be let in ahead of his two priest brothers——

For the good are always the merry,
  Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle
  And the merry love to dance.

only an Irishman could be as cheeky about Heaven as that! Here is the mood that, to this listener, Loeffler has missed. His music is Irish enough; but it is too Irish. It is all the Ireland of reels and bagpipes, never the Ireland of "Would God I were the Tender Apple-blossom." His three songs lack the big simplicity of greatness.

For this his orchestration is partly responsible. It is too colorful, too kaleidoscopic, too infernally clever. It lets nothing go by implification, stepping in officiously to imitate everything that the hearer would rather imagine for himself. When, in "The Host of the Air," the poet says, "old men and young men and young girls were gone like drifting smoke," one is mournfully certain that smoke is about to be imitated, no doubt excellently. And sure enough, high-placed divided strings, assisted by two harps and the flutes, do their best to show one's ears how smoke sounds when it drifts.

This sort of thing is fascinating, but it is not creative imagination, and it is not music. The thoughts of the poems are peasant's thoughts, simple, humble, and beautiful; but the orchestra is that of Baudelaire.

It is beautiful music, nevertheless, however far it may fall short of perfection. "The Host of the Air" is haunted by the ghosts of a wistful bagpipe that is not only a tour de force of orchestration, but a stroke of art as well. "The Fiddler of Dooney" has a real Irish jig for its theme, which flits impartially among the strings until it evaporates on the xylophone with enchanting effect.

"The Song of Cathleen-Ni-Hoolihan" is the best. It has a real tragic sweep, but does not disdain an abrupt reversal of mood that is the best piece of Irish characterization Mr. Loeffler has achieved. Just before the last verse, two piccolos, the snare drum and the harps collaborate on a march tune that is like a smile on a tragic mask. It aroused unbounded enthusiasm in the young person in the next seat—her nose was not Roman. "You see?" she whispered, excitedly, "It's a military march. They're an army —but they're not gettin' killed, particularly!"

Mr. McCormack sang gloriously, of course. It was quite a privilege to sit in Carnegie Hall, where the English language has so often gone down in defeat, and hear every slightest word and syllable, clear as crystal and perfectly phrased. The audience received the singer and the music enthusiastically. After several recalls Mr. McCormack went back and returned with the composer, who was forced to bow repeated acknowledgments. It is a long time since new music has had such a cordial reception here.

Mr. Monteux conducted the new enthusiastically and well. Otherwise the concert was not particularly Schubert's Seventh Symphony, long enough, in all con- it is played superbly, nd endless. The Bach d and hard in color. bowing of the rehearsal. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" ended the programme. It is Rimsky at his worst—rather uninspired and tuneless, but none the less confident and voluble.

WORLD - MAR. 17.

Monteux Gives Strings Play in Schubert Piece

Performance of the C Major Symphony Laudable in Contrast to Others With Preponderance of Brass

John McCormack Sings

Presents Five Irish Poems With Beautiful Settings Composed by Loeffler

By H. E. Krehbiel

In nowise distinguished was the performance of Schubert's great symphony in C major by Mr. Monteux and the men from Boston in Carnegie Hall last night. Its best feature was that which was laudable because it was in marked contrast with other performances of the work which distressfully vex our memory; performances in which the composer's lyricism, especially in the last movement, was crushed by the noise of the augmented brass contingent, and a plug was thrust into the throat of the trumpet to consort a second ghostly visitor, but an unbeautiful one, with the celestial being that Schumann found haunting the Andante. For permitting his strings to assert their privilege of being heard as they ought to be, Mr. Monteux deserved well at the hands of the audience; but he did not invite the music to exhale all of its beautiful poesy. It was, in sooth, a rather prosaic reading.

McCormack in Better Estate

The thousands who crowd into the Hippodrome of Sunday evenings to hear John McCormack do so to enjoy the sentimental balladist. Their hearts are more responsive to "Pal o' Mine" and his Irish songs than to the beautiful performances of airs by Handel and Mozart, which he gives them occasionally as if to keep himself conscious of the fact that he is an artist of fine type. The hundreds who heard him last night heard him in his better estate, as an interpreter of Bach (he sang two airs from two of the church cantatas) and also as a laudator of Ireland and an exponent of a new phase in Irish song—song which was Irish in spirit, but uttered in the idiom which has recently reached our ears from Italy, France and even, though less effectively on the whole, from England. For Mr. McCormack, who sang them, but more for such a band as played them, Mr. Loeffler has made five settings of Irish poems—two of them, by W. B. Yeats, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," and a loftier poetic utterance by W. Heferman, "The Blind" (visions of an old harper rise before our fancy), entitled "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan."

Loeffler's Fantasies

Mr. Loeffler's native tongue is neither Gaelic nor Erse, for he is an Alsatian, but he is a modern musician, with a fancy which can penetrate to the heart of any subject and a capacity for uttering the modern orchestral idiom second to that of no composer alive. He calls his settings of these songs fantasies by a greater right than the late Gustav Mahler called his settings of six German paraphrases of Chinese poems a symphony. Their essence lies in the instrumental part of them; the singer's voice does little more than provide a guide to the orchestra's exposition of the contents of the poems. Debussy makes use of Spanish rhythms to evoke pictures of Iberia; Mr. Loeffler goes to Irish folk tunes to illustrate the sentiments of the words of his poets. He quotes, he paraphrases and he imitates, but always with a fecund individual fancy in his melodic contours and an exquisite sense of euphony in his application of colors. His music for the song of the blind minstrel is big with eloquence, a beautiful preachment and a persuasive plea.

Delightful humor dominates "The Fiddler of Dooney" (at its foundation lies a rollicking jig capitally worked up) and the sound of the pipes in "The Host of the Air" melts away mysteriously, vanishes in thin air, drifts away like a wisp of smoke. Mr. Loeffler has disclosed himself in a new mood in these fantasies, one that is as amiable as it is admirable. Mr. McCormack put his heart into the songs, and in the few instances in which the words were not clearly conveyed to the ears of the listeners the fault was not that of his voice or diction, but of a few obstreperous passages in the orchestration. Singer and composer were repeatedly called to the platform.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "La Grande Paque Russe," ended the concert.

TRIBUNE MAR. 17

[84]

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

John McCormack Sings Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies" With the Boston Symphony.

Three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Charles Martin Loeffler were the feature of the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Loeffler is the author of a set of "Five Irish Fantasies" from which the three songs sung on this occasion are taken. The text of two of these songs, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are by W. B. Yeats. The third song is composed to a poem by W. Hefernan, the Blind, entitled "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan."

In the two songs with words by Mr. Yeats, Mr. Loeffler has worked a spell that is truly magical. The Alsatian-American composer has matched in fancy, in caprice, in eeriness the imaginings of the Irish poet. It is music marked by the quick sensitiveness of mood and the exquisite feeling for instrumental color that have always characterized Mr. Loeffler as a composer. Especially memorable is the song of O'Driscoll's strange adventure, and haunting indeed is the music set to the lines,

And never was piping so sad
  And never was piping so gay,

and again to these:

And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long, dim hair.

"The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" seems at a first hearing less inspired. There is here the suspicion of effort of the master-workman deliberately fabricating something.

Mr. Monteux conducted the elaborate accompaniments to the songs most sympathetically, and Mr. McCormack sang the songs as probably not another singer could. His clear enunciation and his emotional fervor combined with the native beauty of his voice to carry all before them. The large audience received the songs with enthusiasm. After Messrs. McCormack and Monteux had bowed several times, Mr. Loeffler himself appeared on the stage. For him there was an ovation.

Earlier in the concert Mr. McCormack sang two Bach airs, both from church cantatas. The first, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from the cantata of the same name, is only second best Bach, like unto scores of other Bach airs, but the second, "Take for Your Very Own," from the cantata "All They From Sheba Shall Come," is a piece possessed of singular charm, with even a curious pre-echo in it of "Boris Godounoff." Mr. McCormack sang them both most admirably.

There were two instrumental numbers on the programme—Schubert's C major symphony, which opened it, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which closed it. The most salient quality of Schubert's great C major symphony is its persistent, inevitable rhythm, as of a gigantic mechanism. Each section ought to move relentlessly, without change or modification, at the tempo chosen. But human conductors have of late years taken to tampering with the pace and indulging in nuances that detract from the character of the music. One would like to hear the work conducted by a metronome. Mr. Monteux in his reading yesterday deferred to the prevailing fashion. But, still, his reading was painstaking, the orchestral performance was a fine one, and the audience applauded with seeming approval, so why bother about Schubert and his inevitable and relentless rhythm?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's rich-hued and sonorous overture was played superbly.

GLOBE - MAR. 17.

Again Mr. Monteux is dispensing with a symphony in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Instead his programme begins with d'Indy's three pieces, "Wallenstein," suggested by the three plays, similarly named and mated, of Schiller. The music was written in the composer's earlier and semi-Wagnerian days. It begins with the inevitable tone-picturing of Wallenstein's turbulent camp; continues with a more intimate episode drawn from the loves of Max and Thekla in "Die Piccolomini," ends gravely and loftily with "Wallenstein's Death." Mr. Rabaud and Dr. Muck in their day similarly revived the piece. To the active repertory likewise returns Goldmark's songful and fanciful overture, "In the Spring." For the "assisting artist's" share, Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, in equal prime of voice, skill and characterizing and imparting faculties will sing an air of Handel and a vivid Spanish piece. For novel number the conductor proffers Mr. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," fruit of the composer's recent journey to the East, teeming with ingenious and fanciful play of harmonies and timbres as his ear and imagination there received them. One is Korear; an other Siamese; a third Japanese; the fourth Chinese. A further word about these engaging pieces will be here printed next week.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra will play again at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, with Mr. Monteux conducting and with Mr. Burgin, the first violinist, to take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other numbers of the programme come from the current repertory of the orchestra.

TRANS. MAR. 18

ymphony Con-
lay evening, Mr.
rish Fantasias and
k's singing there.
y less than on Fri-second audience, how-pared, since over-night had said much. Warm-
, none the less, the fine ran up and down Sym-h the first hearing. The
the freer singing of Mr.
master of all his pow-
g both upon the music.
n Loeffler was the gainer
and finer grained tone.
omposer and singer, con-rs bear the Fantasias to e seems little doubt of e.

t Bach in the ordering
d Berlioz followed Loef-t Mr. Monteux assembled f the "Haffner Serenade"
s written for a wedding
that burgomaster and n Salzburg. Through an nte, a Minuet and a
e a bright, decorative,
all suppleness, sponta-
e, with light sentiment
soften it, with light ar-
n to grace and speed it.
t the full choir of the
it skilfully with wind
nowhere did he stiffen
r stay the flowing pat-Mozart sounded so Mo-ony Hall—the more for ne and the adept sense
besque that Mr. Burgin
any measures for solo-
in particular, Kreisler-m.

came the music for the
in Capulet's garden and eep Mab" from his sym-Juliet." The voice of
is like no other. There n hear in them neither
. Possibly the very inposer stiffens and strips enched are they in his
and spirit that to this
Yet it is easy to prefer tasy in the music of vering how rhythm and
nies and timbres may eight of his romantical
of the theatre warmed
music of the garden;
he and the orchestra
tful, flickering Scherzo.

H. T. P.

Wagner's operas Mr.
en the numbers to be phony Orchestra at the on Fund on Sunday af-
in Symphony Hall, viz.:
Flying Dutchman."
Minster and Introduc-
from "Lohengrin."
Act III., Apprentices'
to Sachs from "Die
Maidens and the Entrance
to Valhalla from "Das
s from "Die Walküre."
"Siegfried."
l Music from "Götter-
from "Das Rheingold," Littlefield and Tingley tt and Simonds will sing
s.

MAR 13.

OLOIST AT NY CONCERT

phony Orchestra gave
of its extra Monday
o an appreciative au-ally filled Symphony
again chose familiar pertory of the regular s, and led them with ree of energy and in-oist was Jean Bedetti, orchestra, who played
th a skill and taste rty applause. This eresting than most eful without vulgar-ut degenerating into orks.

ns Dvorak's popular
orld," which does not
ld upon audiences.
fastidious may find
shallow prettiness.
ich the composer's ttractive and new g imitation of any happened to inter-played, won, as al-
by its assimilation
tunes and Czechish

"Omphale's Spin-
isply and fluently.
"Leonore" overture,
masterpiece on the played. The final es will be given
Burgin as solo-

MAR 10.

TI IS ONY
IST

ncert Is De-
and Pleases
nce

nted the fourth day night series
s last night with as soloist. The
th the Dvorak
ony and was folonic poem, "Om-heel," the Lalo

---

overture to "Lenore" by Beethoven.

From the start to finish, it was a program that pleased the audience and they showed their appreciation by very long-continued applause. Mr. Monteux must have been gratified at the success which met his men on this ocasion. The symphony was very beautifully done—far more so than is usually the case when this symphony is given. Other conductors seem to have a tendency to overdo some of the effects.

Mr. Bedetti's appearance as soloist from the ranks of the orchestra was nothing short of a triumph. He played extremely well and was recalled time after time and applauded to the echo both by the audience and the orchestra. They were obviously very proud of him and had every right to be.

The Saint-Saens "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was very charming in the delicacy which was through it like a thread. In a word, one of the most enjoyable concerts heard in some time.

ER MAR

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 4TH EXTRA CONCERT

'Cellist Bedetti Given an Ovation by Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, gave the fourth in the series of extra concerts last evening, in Symphony Hall. The program: Dvorak, symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Op. 31; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72. Mr. Jean Bedetti, first violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Edouard Lalo's concerto for violoncello and orchestra.

Those who sat last evening 'neath the spell of Dr. Dvorak's composition evidently cared little whether this gifted Bohemian made use in it of "American," "Indian" or Czechish themes. It is faintly suggestive of one, now of another. To those of open mind it remains a symphony of wonderful tonal coloring, a narrative skilfully told in musical terms. Mr. Monteux followed faithfully the composer's admonition to Nedbal, conducting the work in Berlin 22 years ago: "Take the introduction to the symphony as slowly as possible." It was doubly impressive so. The second movement, largo, was given highly sensitized translation by the strings, not too soon to be forgotten. The entire work was splendidly played.

"Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens's first symphonic poem, written originally a rondo for piano and then for orchestra, again revealed the absolute hold of a brilliant conductor on a band of skilled players. Mr. Monteux read his score with a surety and fluency which found voice in every instrument, from harp to horn. Through all these voices the rhythmic whir of the spinning wheel found its way. It was Omphale purring, while Hercules vainly roared and writhed.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, played like No. 2, as the overture to his ill-starred opera, "Fidelio," has as its high mark the trumpet signal which in the opera preludes the salvation of Florestan and Leonore and the discomfiture of Pizaro. As the tag of an exceptionally enjoyable program it gave pleasure to the audience. Doubtless to most it was a musical novelty.

Mr. Bedetti chose a piece fully calculated to reveal his virtuosity. The three movements, prelude, intermezzo and rondo, of Lalo's concerto, conspire to test the bravest and hardiest of 'cellists. Mr. Bedetti emerged triumphant, was thrice recalled, and in deep agitation returned the hand-clasp of Mr. Monteux. It was a performance marked by flawless technique, though many possibly would have taken more delight in a briefer, more melodic, offering.

D-MAR

The Symphony Orchestra departs today on its final journey, for the season, to New York. There, tomorrow evening, with Mr. McCormack again assisting, it will repeat Mr. Loeffler's three "Irish Fantasias" first heard here last week. They bid fair to be as well received in the one city as in the other. Schubert's Symphony in C major is the other major item of the programme. For the concert of Saturday afternoon in New York, Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's Symphony in C minor are the chosen pieces.

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A new work by Charles Martin Loeffler and the appearance of John McCormack as soloist gave an unusual distinction to the last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York. Three of Mr. Loeffler's "Five Irish Fantasies" for tenor and orchestra, his latest composition, were given, Mr. McCormack singing the solo part. He was also heard in two airs from cantatas by Bach, "My Dear Jesus Is Lost," from the cantata of the same title, and "Take Thou From Me," from "All They From Sheba Shall Come." The orchestra played Schubert's C major symphony and Rimsky Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

Mr. Loeffler's settings are of Yeats's "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," and W. Hefernan's "Song of Caitlin-ni-Holahan." It was not surprising that he has submitted to the lure of the new Irish poets who have interpreted old Irish feelings, and to the enchantment of Irish folk song. Nor was it to be anticipated that in making use of both he would fall into any of the easy formulas that have done so much service to musicians for so many years.

His settings have the individuality, the subtlety, the fine musicianship that belong to all his work; he touches the Irish musical idiom with fine discrimination and reserve and assimilates it with masterly skill to give the character and to summon the mood of the verses. "The Hosts of the Air" relates how [illegible]

Boston Symphony Gives Final Concert

John McCormack as Soloist Sings Irish Fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The final evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season was that given in Carnegie Hall last night. The program comprised Schubert's symphony in C major, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" and several vocal numbers. These were two airs from cantatas of Bach, namely, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus" and "Take Thou for Thy Very Own," and three of the five settings of Irish songs by Charles Martin Loeffler which he calls "Irish Fantasias for Voice and Orchestra." The singer was John McCormack.

The lyrics of Mr. Loeffler heard last evening are Nos. 2, 3 and 5 from the set. The poems are Yeats's "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan" by W. Hefferman. These are good texts, poetic in content, rich in character and inviting musical treatment. Mr. Loeffler yielded quite readily to the temptation to compose this music. His is a mind that revels in fairy fantasies and the treasures of folk lore. That he has imagination and humor is known to all who have heard his "Villanelle du Diable" and his grimly tragic "Death of Tintagiles." Perhaps most of his admirers did not know how delightfully and jovially Irish he could be till they heard his "Fiddler of Dooney" last night.

The songs are all good, though they are not constructed with a view to vocal exhibition. They are literally fantasies for voice and orchestra, in which the instrumental background is descriptive and illustrative and also plays the chief part in creating the mood. Folk tunes play their part in the web of melody and excellent instrumental characterization is conspicuous. Mr. McCormack sang the songs admirably and at no time this season had the orchestra been heard to better advantage than in these numbers.

Mr. McCormack's delivery of the Bach airs was noteworthy for its fine dignity, its sincerity and its artistic conviction. Those who hear this tenor only in his recitals do not know his highest achievements. The Boston Symphony musicians played Schubert in a solid and opulent manner which seemed to give the audience great satisfaction.

N.Y. HERALD-MAR. 17.

---

a piper and saw dancers with Bridget his bride, till one of them bore her away; and he awoke and they were gone like a drifting smoke.

The fiddler of Dooney is he who plays so that folks dance like a wave in the sea, and who expects Peter to call him first in through the gate. "Catilin-ni-Holahan" is the allegorical name of Ireland on whom morn shall dawn; in song in an impassioned prophecy of Ireland's freedom.

Mr. Loeffler has found a richly expressive and characteristic musical investment for each of these poems. He has been peculiarly successful in evoking the mood of each in music that shows a strong individual character and fecundity of invention, music that is unmistakably his own; that has picturesque and graphic touches, but is chiefly concerned with the spirit rather than with the descriptive letter; and that is developed with a consummate musicianship.

He has never written for orchestra with more consummate skill, flexibility and precision of touch, with more clarity or glowing beauty of color. He has not been so "modern" as to neglect the voice for the orchestra. His vocal line is truly vocal and offers something that so great an artist as Mr. McCormack can lift to a plane of sustained interest, can make characteristically expressive, and in the prophetic song raise to a pitch of noble and passionate eloquence.

Mr. McCormack was in splendid voice and sang these pieces, difficult and in some ways exacting for the singer, with the skill of a consummate artist, with intense conviction, with great beauty of phrasing and clearness of diction. Mr. Loeffler was fortunate in having an interpreter who so completely assimilated the spirit of his music and gave it so inspiring an utterance.

Equally fine was Mr. McCormack's singing of the two airs by Bach. The first is of an especially poignant beauty and individual character, and to both Mr. McCormack's artistic mastery and fervid delivery gave a profound impressiveness. He sang them as one who thoroughly believed in them. And in the orchestral accompaniments to Bach's airs and Mr. Loeffler's "Fantasies" Mr. Monteux achieved beautiful results. Mr. Loeffler's orchestral writing is complex and difficult.

Mr. McCormack aroused much enthusiasm by his singing and was called back many times. Mr. Loeffler appeared to take the master's share of the applause for his composition and had, likewise, to appear many times.

The symphony of Schubert was well played. Perhaps the scherzo might have had somewhat more elasticity of rhythm; but it was on the whole a straightforward presentation of the spirit of Schubert's music, fine and glowing in orchestral tone and balance of parts.

TIMES - MAR. 17.

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

At Carnegie Hall the last but one of the Boston Symphony concerts for the season broke with precedent last night by invoking the aid of a soloist—a rare procedure for the Boston band. Evidently Mr. Monteux decided that so long as he must have a singer he might as well have a good one, for he offered no less a personage than John McCormack. The great Irish tenor sang twice, once in two Bach arias and again in Charles Martin Loeffler's settings of three Irish poems.

The Loeffler songs are from a group of "Five Irish Fantasies for Voice and Orchestra," of which the first two were written in 1907 (David Bispham sang them in Boston in 1909) and the last was finished two years ago. The texts of four of them are by William Butler Yeats, the last being the work of a blind Irish poet, otherwise unknown, named Heferman. The titles are "The Hosting of the Sidhe," "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney," and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan"—or, if you prefer, "Cathleen Ni Hoolihan," which as all Gaelic-speaking persons know, means Ireland. The last three were done last night, their first hearing in New York.

Announcement of a new work by Charles Martin Loeffler is always good news, for Loeffler, even at his lowest ebb, is always a sensitive, fastidious artist, and one who can do miraculous things with an orchestra. These songs are not great. Something that is in the poems is wanting in the music. Loeffler has overset them, for one thing. He is happiest when he is conveying subtleties, and these poems are simple. No word in them has escaped his sophisticated scrutiny, yet in the very act of catching every syllable and sentence that is characteristically Celtic he has lost the overtones, the mood that is implicit in every one of the poems, yet is never expressed in them—the immense, melancholy humor of the Irish soul.

It is not the words of "The Fiddler of Dooney" that are Celtic. There is not a sentence in Yeats's verses that is not good, clean English. But the idea, the fiddler's bland conviction that when he gets to the gates of Heaven he will be let in ahead of his two priest brothers——

For the good are always the merry,
  Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle
  And the merry love to dance.

only an Irishman could be as cheeky about Heaven as that! Here is the mood that, to this listener, Loeffler has missed. His music is Irish enough; but it is too Irish. It is all the Ireland of reels and bagpipes, never the Ireland of "Would God I were the Tender Apple-blossom." His three songs lack the big simplicity of greatness.

For this his orchestration is partly responsible. It is too colorful, too kaleidoscopic, too infernally clever. It lets nothing go by implification, stepping in officiously to imitate everything that the hearer would rather imagine for himself. When, in "The Host of the Air," the poet says, "old men and young men and young girls were gone like drifting smoke," one is mournfully certain that smoke is about to be imitated, no doubt excellently. And sure enough, high-placed divided strings, assisted by two harps and the flutes, do their best to show one's ears how smoke sounds when it drifts.

This sort of thing is fascinating, but it is not creative imagination, and it is not music. The thoughts of the poems are peasant's thoughts, simple, humble, and beautiful; but the orchestra is that of Baudelaire.

It is beautiful music, nevertheless, however far it may fall short of perfection. "The Host of the Air" is haunted by the ghosts of a wistful bagpipe that is not only a tour de force of orchestration, but a stroke of art as well. "The Fiddler of Dooney" has a real Irish jig for its theme, which flits impartially among the strings until it evaporates on the xylophone with enchanting effect.

"The Song of Cathleen-Ni-Hoolihan" is the best. It has a real tragic sweep, but does not disdain an abrupt reversal of mood that is the best piece of Irish characterization Mr. Loeffler has achieved. Just before the last verse, two piccolos, the snare drum and the harps collaborate on a march tune that is like a smile on a tragic mask. It aroused unbounded enthusiasm in the young person in the next seat—her nose was not Roman. "You see?" she whispered, excitedly, "It's a military march. They're an army—but they're not gettin' killed, particularly!"

Mr. McCormack sang gloriously, of course. It was quite a privilege to sit in Carnegie Hall, where the English language has so often gone down in defeat, and hear every slightest word and syllable, clear as crystal and perfectly phrased. The audience received the singer and the music enthusiastically. After several recalls Mr. McCormack went back and returned with the composer, who was forced to bow repeated acknowledgments. It is a long time since new music has had such a cordial reception here.

Mr. Monteux conducted the new enthusiastically and well. Otherhe concert was not particularly chubert's Seventh Symphony, long enough, in all con- it is played superbly, nd endless. The Bach d and hard in color. bowing of the point to under- rehearsal. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" ended the programme. It is Rimsky at his worst—rather uninspired and tuneless, but none the less confident and voluble.

WORLD - MAR. 17.

Monteux Gives Strings Play in Schubert Piece

Performance of the C Major Symphony Laudable in Contrast to Others With Preponderance of Brass

John McCormack Sings

Presents Five Irish Poems With Beautiful Settings Composed by Loeffler

By H. E. Krehbiel

In nowise distinguished was the performance of Schubert's great symphony in C major by Mr. Monteux and the men from Boston in Carnegie Hall last night. Its best feature was that which was laudable because it was in marked contrast with other performances of the work which distressfully vex our memory; performances in which the composer's lyricism, especially in the last movement, was crushed by the noise of the augmented brass contingent, and a plug was thrust into the throat of the trumpet to consort a second ghostly visitor, but an unbeautiful one, with the celestial being that Schumann found haunting the Andante. For permitting his strings to assert their privilege of being heard as they ought to be, Mr. Monteux deserved well at the hands of the audience; but he did not invite the music to exhale all of its beautiful poesy. It was, in sooth, a rather prosaic reading.

McCormack in Better Estate

The thousands who crowd into the Hippodrome of Sunday evenings to hear John McCormack do so to enjoy the sentimental balladist. Their hearts are more responsive to "Pal o' Mine" and his Irish songs than to the beautiful performances of airs by Handel and Mozart, which he gives them occasionally as if to keep himself conscious of the fact that he is an artist of fine type. The hundreds who heard him last night heard him in his better estate, as an interpreter of Bach (he sang two airs from two of the church cantatas) and also as a laudator of Ireland and an exponent of a new phase in Irish song—song which was Irish in spirit, but uttered in the idiom which has recently reached our ears from Italy, France and even, though less effectively on the whole, from England. For Mr. McCormack, who sang them, but more for such a band as played them, Mr. Loeffler has made five settings of Irish poems—two of them, by W. B. Yeats, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney," and a loftier poetic utterance by W. Heferman, "The Blind" (visions of an old harper rise before our fancy), entitled "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan."

Loeffler's Fantasies

Mr. Loeffler's native tongue is neither Gaelic nor Erse, for he is an Alsatian, but he is a modern musician, with a fancy which can penetrate to the heart of any subject and a capacity for uttering the modern orchestral idiom second to that of no composer alive. He calls his settings of these songs fantasies by a greater right than the late Gustav Mahler called his settings of six German paraphrases of Chinese poems a symphony. Their essence lies in the instrumental part of them; the singer's voice does little more than provide a guide to the orchestra's exposition of the contents of the poems. Debussy makes use of Spanish rhythms to evoke pictures of Iberia; Mr. Loeffler goes to Irish folk tunes to illustrate the sentiments of the words of his poets. He quotes, he paraphrases and he imitates, but always with a fecund individual fancy in his melodic contours and an exquisite sense of euphony in his application of colors. His music for the song of the blind minstrel is big with eloquence, a beautiful preachment and a persuasive plea.

Delightful humor dominates "The Fiddler of Dooney" (at its foundation lies a rollicking jig capitally worked up) and the sound of the pipes in "The Host of the Air" melts away mysteriously, vanishes in thin air, drifts away like a wisp of smoke. Mr. Loeffler has disclosed himself in a new mood in these fantasies, one that is as amiable as it is admirable. Mr. McCormack put his heart into the songs, and in the few instances in which the words were not clearly conveyed to the ears of the listeners the fault was not that of his voice or diction, but of a few obstreperous passages in the orchestration. Singer and composer were repeatedly called to the platform.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "La Grande Paque Russe," ended the concert.

TRIBUNE - MAR. 17

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

John McCormack Sings Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies" With the Boston Symphony.

Three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Charles Martin Loeffler were the feature of the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Loeffler is the author of a set of "Five Irish Fantasies" from which the three songs sung on this occasion are taken. The text of two of these songs, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are by W. B. Yeats. The third song is composed to a poem by W. Hefernan, the Blind, entitled "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan."

In the two songs with words by Mr. Yeats, Mr. Loeffler has worked a spell that is truly magical. The Alsatian-American composer has matched in fancy, in caprice, in eeriness the imaginings of the Irish poet. It is music marked by the quick sensitiveness of mood and the exquisite feeling for instrumental color that have always characterized Mr. Loeffler as a composer. Especially memorable is the song of O'Driscoll's strange adventure, and haunting indeed is the music set to the lines,

And never was piping so sad
And never was piping so gay,

and again to these:

And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long, dim hair.

"The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" seems at a first hearing less inspired. There is here the suspicion of effort, of the master-workman deliberately fabricating something.

Mr. Monteux conducted the elaborate accompaniments to the songs most sympathetically, and Mr. McCormack sang the songs as probably not another singer could. His clear enunciation and his emotional fervor combined with the native beauty of his voice to carry all before them. The large audience received the songs with enthusiasm. After Messrs. McCormack and Monteux had bowed several times, Mr. Loeffler himself appeared on the stage. For him there was an ovation.

Earlier in the concert Mr. McCormack sang two Bach airs, both from church cantatas. The first, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from the cantata of the same name, is only second best Bach, like unto scores of other Bach airs, but the second, "Take for Your Very Own," from the cantata "All They From Sheba Shall Come," is a piece possessed of singular charm, with even a curious pre-echo in it of "Boris Godounoff." Mr. McCormack sang them both most admirably.

There were two instrumental numbers on the programme—Schubert's C major symphony, which opened it, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which closed it. The most salient quality of Schubert's great C major symphony is its persistent, inevitable rhythm, as of a gigantic mechanism. Each section ought to move relentlessly, without change or modification, at the tempo chosen. But human conductors have of late years taken to tampering with the pace and indulging in nuances that detract from the character of the music. One would like to hear the work conducted by a metronome. Mr. Monteux in his reading yesterday deferred to the prevailing fashion. But, still, his reading was painstaking, the orchestral performance was a fine one, and the audience applauded with seeming approval, so why bother about Schubert and his inevitable and relentless rhythm?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's rich-hued and sonorous overture was played superbly.

GLOBE - MAR. 17.

AGAIN Mr. Monteux is dispensing with a symphony in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Instead his programme begins with d'Indy's three pieces, "Wallenstein," suggested by the three plays, similarly named and mated, of Schiller. The music was written in the composer's earlier and semi-Wagnerian days. It begins with the inevitable tone-picturing of Wallenstein's turbulent camp; continues with a more intimate episode drawn from the loves of Max and Thekla in "Die Piccolomini," ends gravely and loftily with "Wallenstein's Death." Mr. Rabaud and Dr. Muck in their day similarly revived the piece. To the active repertory likewise returns Goldmark's songful and fanciful overture, "In the Spring." For the "assisting artist's" share, Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, in equal prime of voice, skill and characterizing and imparting faculties will sing an air of Handel and a vivid Spanish piece. For novel number the conductor proffers Mr. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," fruit of the composer's recent journey to the East, teeming with ingenious and fanciful play of harmonies and timbres as his ear and imagination there received them. One is Korear; an other Siamese; a third Japanese; the fourth Chinese. A further word about these engaging pieces will be here printed next week.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra will play again at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge, with Mr. Monteux conducting and with Mr. Burgin, the first violinist, to take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other numbers of the programme come from the current repertory of the orchestra.

TRANS. MAR. 18

McCormack Sings With Boston Band

New Loeffler Composition Is Heard for First Time Opera in Brooklyn Next Week

By Henry T. Finck

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra always had prominent soloists at its home concerts, it dispensed with them in its Carnegie Hall series, and the audiences were nevertheless large. They are not so large now that M. Monteux is the conductor, and it seems probable that in the future a bid for larger audiences will be made by having soloists here as well as in Boston. Last night, at any rate, there was a soloist, McCormack, who never fails to draw large audiences, usually at the spacious Hippodrome. He seemed somewhat out of his element when he sang "Mein liebster Jesus ist verloren" and "Nimm mich Du zu eigen hin" from two of Bach's cantatas, but gave more pleasure in Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Piano," which were the evening's novelty, and the third of which, "Caitilin Ni Vallachain," approximated his specialty. Here he could let out the full force of his voice, although one wonders how he can have any voice at all with his chin up high in the air, which is bad for the throat and gives an appearance of effort that is not agreeable.

In this third number Loeffler's music, both vocal and orchestral, is far more original and interesting than in the two songs which precede it: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney." Here singer and players do little more than intensify the spirit of Yeats's poems. That Mr. Loeffler knows how to write for orchestra has been demonstrated heretofore. It was pleasant to note the absence of all Debussyan influences, although there are signs of a struggle in the last two stanzas of "The Host of the Air."

The orchestra, under M. Monteux, was heard to great advantage in this work by Mr. Loeffler, who was once a member of it. The conductor's interpretation, on the other hand, of the opening number of the programme, Schubert's C major symphony, was perfunctory. There is a world of poetry in this work of "heavenly length" which M. Monteux's conducting did not reveal.

NY. POST MAR. 17

Nineteenth Symphony Program.

Emilio de Gogorza, the famous baritone, will be soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will sing with the orchestra Handel's arias, "Where 'er You Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," and the Spanish song of Alvarez, "Canto del Presidiario."

In place of a symphony Mr. Monteux will conduct d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," which is based on the drama of Schiller and includes—Wallenstein's Camp—Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini), the Death of Wallenstein. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," which, in their smaller form, were performed at the Berkshire festival last year.

Wagner Program at Pension Concert

Portions of each of the four music dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs," Richard Wagner's great cycle, which has not been heard in Boston for many years, will be performed by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux at the forty-first Pension Fund concert of the orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 26.

From "The Valkyries," "The Ride of the Valkyries" will be played, and from "Siegfried," "Forest Murmurs" from the second act; from "The Dusk of the Gods" the funeral music of Siegfried from the last act; from "The Rhine Gold" the introduction and first scene. The solo parts of the three Rhine Daughters will be taken by Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia and Gertrude Tingley. Charles H. Bennett will sing the part of Alberich and also take the baritone part in the last scene, while the tenor parts will be taken by Raymond Simonds.

AMER-MAR 18

If there is anything in the world that experiences of the past six years should have shown music lovers of Boston, it is that great conductors are not of one nationality. Yet there are people among us who have not outlived the tradition that Frenchmen and Italians are musicians for the theatre but not great conductors of symphonic music, and that only musicians of Germany or of the German school can really give great orchestral performances.

These people, in particular, were prepared to give the warmest welcome to Willem Mengelberg, the celebrated Dutch conductor, and the orchestra he brought with him from New York for the concert given last Thursday night in Symphony Hall. And Mr. Mengelberg did receive a tumultuous greeting. He had arranged a programme of music of proven popular appeal, and at the end of the programme came the Strauss symphonic poem, "Heldenleben," a tone poem of mammoth sonorities.

The material was there, for display, for shocks and crashes of orchestral tone, and of these opportunities Mr. Mengelberg availed himself [illegible]. His men blew and fiddled and smote, and in the ballte scene of "Heldenleben" we had an example of Hunnish frightfulness in music which is never less than strange and awful to hear. This was the only composition that did not bring uproarious applause, perhaps for the reason that it was the last thing on the programme—the umbrella and galoshes piece, so to speak. The rest of the music, not unnaturally, excited the audience by its dash and its din. It was conducted with one end in view—the end of sensational effect and in this the conductor was completely successful.

Saying which, let us utter a few reflections. In the audience on that occasion sat a man who places Dr. Carl Muck high above most conductors and above both of the French conductors who have followed him in this city. He had heard Dr. Muck conduct the "Oberon" overture which was the first number on Mengelberg's programme. Muck conducted this music, as he conducted all other music, with at least the finest feeling for its form, its instrumentation, its romantic feeling. Muck was at times cold, but he was very seldom heavy footed or noisy in the circus manner. The finale of this "Oberon" overture, at the hands of Mengelberg, was like a circus—a performance for the Hippodrome, certainly not for Symphony Hall. And yet this same man who admired Muck could find it in him, that night, to exalt Mr. Mengelberg's interpretation.

Now, a piece of music may be interpreted in different ways. It may be logical and legitimate and artistic to interpret it from several different angles. But the difference between Muck and Mengelberg, as noted on this occasion, was almost the difference between black and white, between force and fire, between emotion and melodrama, between good taste and bad. And while very differing opinions about art abound, even between near and dear friends, it is almost inconceivable that an unprejudiced person, not convinced in advance that Muck and Mengelberg were great musicians, and that most other conductors were small ones, could have commended the interpretation of the "Oberon" overture last Thursday evening.

"This inconsistency impressed us. We are not a partisan of Mr. Monteux or of French music either. We do not mix our political prejudices, we trust and believe, with our estimates, for what they are worth, of the musical art. We hold no brief for any conductor. But if one excepts a single performance given by Mr. Mengelberg—the performance of Liszt's theatrical tone-poem, which was played with a theatrical exaggeration appropriate to the nature of the music and therefore legitimately effective as demanded by the music—it is rather apparent that the poorest concert given here by Mr. Monteux was superior in artistic quality to the concert given after much press agenting by Mr. Mengelberg.

We do not see how anyone with substantial musical knowledge, experience and reasonably unbiased mind, could sincerely deny this. The New York orchestra could not reasonably be expected to equal the Boston Symphony, and no one finds fault with it on that account. The good-wind section is particularly weak, weak as individual players, weak in ensemble. There are a few good solo players, exceptions which proved the rule, as the concert-rooster, the first born, the first clarinet. But this orchestra, like the Boston Symphony in its earlier days, has had its ups and downs and reorganizations. Furthermore, it plays under more than one conductor a season, and Mr. Mengelberg has only conducted it a few weeks thus far. A tribute to the authority of Mr. Mengelberg, and he has plenty of authority and driving power over men and instruments, is the manner in which the players obey his wishes implicitly. He can get whatever he wants from them.

Anticipating greatly, we were disappointed in Mr. Mengelberg. We had expected so much, and received so very little musical manna on this occasion. He is a man who palpably conducts first and last for the gallery, for effect usually of a sensational and meretricious kind. His climaxes are disproportionate. He seems happiest when posturing wildly, when riding the whirlwind and directing the storm. Of the finer values of orchestral playing there was seldom evidence, except that the first pages of the "Lohengrin Prelude" showed what Mr. Mengelberg could do in the way of restraint and reserve of force if he chose to, while the climax indicated clearly how irresistible, to him, is the opportunity to make a circus noise.

In New York, which has often disparaged the conducting of Mr. Monteux, Mr. Mengelberg seems to be greatly admired. If that is what the New York public admire, let them have it. As for us, we may be academic, the blood of the codfish may have gotten into our veins, but we must confess to a back-sliding conservatism so acute that we long, fairly long, for the B. S. O. to strike up on its return to Boston, and let us hear its tone again. We are obliged to say, to our own great regret, that we do not consider Mr. Mengelberg a great conductor.

POST-MAR. 19

John McCormack Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Last Evening Concert of Season Enlists Irish Tenor in Irish Songs of Loeffler.

With St. Patrick's Day a few short hours away, John McCormack, the Irish tenor, celebrated the new state of affairs by appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Bach did he sing, and then more Bach; but then, on the wings of the occasion, he launched into three Irish fantasies, composed by Charles Martin Loeffler for voice and orchestra from poems of Yeats and W. Heffernan, the blind. So these shamrocks out of Massachusetts and Alsatia were ribboned with particularly timely applause.

Now that Mr. McCormack is out of opera and his local duties reduced to Sunday evenings at the Hippodrome, it is rare to hear him as the assisting artist of an orchestral evening. Unforgettable, of course, is the evening of the baptism of the Beethoven Association, when he sang "Adelaide," but that was two seasons ago. So his presence on the program was a good green feather in the highly proper hat of the Boston Symphony's last evening concert here of the year. Besides which, it was a drawing card. Many came to hear Bach and Loeffler who can hum "Mother Machree" backwards. For these, above all, the magnificent jumble of fervor, mysticism, battle cry, roadside balladry and mediæval patriotism of "The Sons of Caitlin-ni-Holahan" must have had an extra message.

For musicians and poets, on the other hand, the chief appeal seemed to lie in the first of the Loeffler songs, "The Host in the Air"—a poem from that volume of "The Wind Among the Reeds" with which Yeats has inspired his very clever admirer from Muelhausen and Medfield. Here was an echo, exquisitely and fantastically sounded, of Mr. Loeffler's own "Devil's Vilanelle," the vocal thread laid wistfully over a field of orchestration as elaborate and ingenious as that of a young Erich Korngold. Smoother than Korngold, though, and far more bitten with subjectiveness. Then, again, that other Yeats poem, "The Fiddler of Doon," swept on a frothy and fanciful rhythm to the edge of celestial humor. It was immensely fine, and Mr. McCormack sang it as finely. Mr. Loeffler, though no longer a young man, remains among the most inventive composers we have. If Wagner could write the love tragedy of an Irish princess, it remains for Mr. Loeffler, equally foreign to Caitlin-ni-Holahan to orchestrate its fairy tales. These three songs were Nos. 2, 3 and 5 of a series of five, and this was their first hearing in New York. It could not have been a happier one.

Mr. McCormack's singing of two Bach arias was in English, and was not as successful. He gave out fine and sweet notes, but his words were queerly clipped and misaccentuated. And, as a loyal henchman informed us, "That guy Bach was no good composer. He let the orchestra drown some of John's singing!" Yet it was singing of style and lyric loveliness, and Mr. McCormack took the evening's chief plaudits away with him.

The orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, played Schubert's Seventh Symphony. It played it stoutly but joylessly. Good and big sound there was, but it mounted to no clear, climactic meaning. Far more colorful was Mr. Monteux's conducting of Reinsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Paque Russe" overture, which poured orthodox happiness over the Bostonians' whole season of symphony and service to New York.

NY. SUN MAR 17

ESTHER FERRABINI JACCHIA

HERALD-MAR 19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Two Concerts Given at Aeolian Hall—Opera Bills by the Metropolitan.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York concert of this season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's "First Symphony," all magnificently played, and the audience applauded the conductor and the musicians in detail at the end.

WORLD-MAR. 19.

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert of Its Season Here

Plays Schreker's 'Overture to Drama' as if It Were Important Music.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its New York season to an end with yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Franz Schreker's "Overture to a Drama" and the C minor symphony of Brahms. The last named work has had a hard winter. For that reason it is entitled to immunity from discussion this morning. One may enjoy the spectacle of M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Bostonians, battling with the emotions he feels but cannot wholly express when he is in the society of Brahms, but there is always the comforting assurance that the orchestra will perform the music commendably.

The Herr Professor Schreker is the latest star in the beclouded firmament of German music. He was born in Monaco; he was some time a professor in Vienna, and he is high priest of the Hoch Schule in Charlottenburg, which, as every one knows, is the Brooklyn of Berlin. His overture was published in [illegible] and first performed in that year by the Vienna Philharmonic under Felix Weingartner. The score is dedicated to the producers and, as Mr. Gericke remarked of a similar honor, it served them right.

The Herr Professor Schreker's music is not "schrecklich." It is "langweilich." Which is to say it is not bad, but just long winded. It is a long and remarkably pointless series of purposeless pipings and pantings, bombastic bleatings and tumultuous thunderings. Sometimes it sounds as if it were going to be a clever imitation of Debussy, but before rashly invading Gaul the composer faces the other way, goes over the Semmering Pass and lands for a brief respite in the sunny land of Malipiero.

That, too, is foreign to his soul, and back he goes to Austria and thence into Bavaria, where he foregathers with Wagner and carries away much valuable advice as to the manufacture of overtures to dramas. By this time the reader must understand that the Herr Professor is a man of wide view and catholicity of taste. He does not follow any one slavishly, nor does he adventure into unknown and untried paths of originality. He just meanders comfortably along by the side of first one friend and then another till he thinks it is time to ring up the curtain on the drama, and then he politely gives over preluding and we may imagine that the play—necessarily a short one—begins. The orchestra performed this prefacory vacuity as if it were important music.

As for the "Iberia" of Debussy, one feels that the Frenchman's castles in Spain become more visionary every season, and that some day, like the Holy Roman Empire, they will go up in smoke. Mr. Monteux conducted this composition with honorable intentions and a measurable degree of success.

NY. HERALD MAR. 19

Shreker Piece Well Rendered By Boston Band

"Overture to a Play" Less Terrifying Than Anticipated; Chief Fault Is It Is Too Long by Half

Euphony One of Factors

Unlike Some Other Modern Compositions, It Possesses Deep-Breathed Ideas

By H. E. Krehbiel

The novelty which Mr. Monteux introduced at the last concert for this season of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon was less terrifying in the hearing than in the anticipation. The name of Franz Shreker had a foreboding sound not only in itself but in report. Before he left Vienna, where he was professor at the Conservatory, to take a similar post at what used to be called the Royal High School of Music in Berlin, he had placed himself at the head of the progressive party and fallen under the displeasure of the conservatives, now led by Hans Pfitzner. Pfitzner has written at least one opera which met with popular approval, and he may have had Shreker in mind with others when he published a book entitled "The Aesthetic of Impotency," whose pages are full of condemnation of the composers who labor much without disclosing inventiveness in subject-matter—in themes.

The work which New York heard yesterday was Shreker's "Overture to a Play." Whether tragedy, comedy, history or pastoral was not specified. Nor do we know after hearing the music. We suspect that it was a love-play, but are, like Biron in "Love's Labor's Lost," sure of one thing, which is that it was too long for a play. Too long by a half, for it lasted twenty minutes, and ten minutes would have sufficed to publish all its contents.

It is modern music, but, unlike that which sounds like it that is come to us lately from Italy, it has some deep-breathed ideas, and is not all color and counterpoint, all dalliance with quirks and gasps. It is tremendously learned and so becoming to a professor of composition, and noise is not one of its factors, while euphony is. Boston and Chicago heard it on the same day just a month ago, and now it has enriched the experience of New York. If it were not so long we fancy that we might learn to like it on a second hearing. Indeed, the promise of a repetition would rather invite than repel us, which is a more amiable sentiment than we have uttered for some time after hearing the music of an extreme modernist. Herr Shreker indeed seems to mean well by our ears as well as our fancy and emotions. We wish we might be able to compare his ballet made out of Oscar Wilde's "The Birthday of the Infanta" with Mr. John Alden Carpenter's.

In this music and in Debussy's "Iberia" Mr. Monteux and his men appeared to excellent advantage. With all their technical difficulties it seems easier to make pieces of this character sound well than did Schubert's C major symphony on Thursday evening. Yesterday's concert closed with Brahms's first symphony, which has been heard from all the orchestras that have played for us this season.

N.Y. TRIBUNE MAR. 19

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Wagner music dramas will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the pension fund concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Excerpts from each of the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs" make the program remarkable. Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia, Gertrude Tingley, Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will be the singers. The first part of the program will include "The Flying Dutchman" overture and excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Emilio de Gogorza will be soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. He will sing Handel's aria, "Wher'er You Walk," and a Spanish song by Alvarez, "Canto del Presidiario." Mr. Monteux will conduct d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

ADTISR. MAR. 17

McCormack Sings With Boston Band

New Loeffler Composition Is Heard for First Tim Opera in Brooklyn Next Week

By Henry T. Finck

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra always had prominent soloists a its home concerts, it dispensed wit them in its Carnegie Hall series, an the audiences were nevertheless large They are not so large now that M Monteux is the conductor, and it seems probable that in the future a bid for larger audiences will be made by having soloists here as well as in Boston Last night, at any rate, there was a soloist, McCormack, who never fails to draw large audiences, usually at the spacious Hippodrome. He seemed somewhat out of his element when he sang "Mein liebster Jesus ist verloren" and "Nimm mich Du zu eigen hin" from two of Bach's cantatas, but gave more pleasure in Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Piano," which were the evening's novelty, and the third of which, "Caitilin Ni Vallachain," approximated his specialty Here he could let out the full force of his voice, although one wonders how he can have any voice at all with his chin up high in the air, which is bad for the throat and gives an appearance of effort that is not agreeable.

In this third number Loeffler's music both vocal and orchestral, is far more original and interesting than in the two songs which precede it: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler o Dooney." Here singer and players d little more than intensify the spiri of Yeats's poems. That Mr. Loeffle knows how to write for orchestra ha been demonstrated heretofore. It wa pleasant to note the absence of al Debussyan influences, although ther are signs of a struggle in the last tw stanzas of "The Host of the Air."

The orchestra, under M. Monteux was heard to great advantage in thi work by Mr. Loeffler, who was once member of it. The conductor's interpretation, on the other hand, of th opening number of the programme Schubert's C major symphony, wa perfunctory. There is a world of poetry in this work of "heavenly length which M. Monteux's conducting di not reveal.

NY. POST MAR

Nineteenth Symphony Program.

Emilio de Gogorza, the famous baritone, will be soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will sing with the orchestra Handel's arias, "Where 'er You Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," and the Spanish song of Alvarez, "Canto del Presidiario."

In place of a symphony Mr. Monteux will conduct d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein" which is based on the drama of Schiller and includes—Wallenstein's Camp—Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini), the Death of Wallenstein. Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions," which, in their smaller form, were performed at the Berkshire festival last year.

Wagner Program at Pension Concert

Portions of each of the four music dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs," Richard Wagner's great cycle, which has not been heard in Boston for many years, will be performed by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux at the forty-first Pension Fund concert of the orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, March 26.

From "The Valkyries," "The Ride of the Valkyries" will be played, and from "Siegfried," "Forest Murmurs" from the second act; from "The Dusk of the Gods" the funeral music of Siegfried from the last act; from "The Rhine Gold" the introduction and first scene. The solo parts of the three Rhine Daughters will be taken by Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia and Gertrude Tingley. Charles H. Bennett will sing the part of Alberich and also take the baritone parts in the last scene, while the tenor parts will be taken by Raymond Simonds.

AMER-MAR 18

If there is anything in the world that experiences of the past six years should have shown music lovers of Boston, it is that great conductors are not of one nationality. Yet there are people among us who have not outlived the tradition that Frenchmen and Italians are musicians for the theatre but not great conductors of symphonic music, and that only musicians of Germany or of the German school can really give great orchestral performances.

These people, in particular, were prepared to give the warmest welcome to Willem Mengelberg, the celebrated Dutch conductor, and the orchestra he brought with him from New York for the concert given last Thursday night in Symphony Hall. And Mr. Mengelberg did receive a tumultuous greeting. He had arranged a programme of music of proven popular appeal, and at the end of the programme came the Strauss symphonic poem, "Heldenleben," a tone poem of mammoth sonorities.

The material was there, for display, for shocks and crashes of orchestral tone, and of these opportunities Mr. Mengelberg availed himself to the utmost. His men blew and fiddled and smote, and in the ballte scene of "Heldenleben" we had an example of Hunnish frightfulness in music which is never less than strange and awful to hear. This was the only composition that did not bring uproarious applause, perhaps for the reason that it was the last thing on the programme—the umbrella and galoshes piece, so to speak. The rest of the music, not unnaturally, excited the audience by its dash and its din. It was conducted with one end in view—the end of sensational effect and in this the conductor was completely successful.

Saying which, let us utter a few reflections. In the audience on that occasion sat a man who places Dr. Carl Muck high above most conductors and above both of the French conductors who have followed him in this city. He had heard Dr. Muck conduct the "Oberon" overture which was the first number on Mengelberg's programme. Muck conducted this music, as he conducted all other music, with at least the finest feeling for its form, its instrumentation, its romantic feeling. Muck was at times cold, but he was very seldom heavy footed or noisy in the circus manner. The finale of this "Oberon" overture, at the hands of Mengelberg, was like a circus—a performance for the Hippodrome, certainly not for Symphony Hall. And yet this same man who admired Muck could find it in him, that night, to exalt Mr. Mengelberg's interpretation.

Now, a piece of music may be interpreted in different ways. It may be logical and legitimate and artistic to interpret it from several different angles. But the difference between Muck and Mengelberg, as noted on this occasion, was almost the difference between black and white, between force and fire, between emotion and melodrama, between good taste and bad. And while very differing opinions about art abound, even between near and dear friends, it is almost inconceivable that an unprejudiced person, not convinced in advance that Muck and Mengelberg were great musicians, and that most other conductors were small ones, could have commended the interpretation of the "Oberon" overture last Thursday evening.

"This inconsistency impressd us. We are not a partisan of Mr. Monteux or of French music either. We do not mix our political prejudices, we trust and believe, with our estimates, for what they are worth, of the musical art. We hold no brief for any conductor. But if one excepts a single performance given by Mr. Mengelberg—the performance of Liszt's theatrical tone-poem, which was played with a theatrical exaggeration appropriate to the nature of the music and therefore legitimately effective as demanded by the music—it is rather apparent that the poorest concert given here by Mr. Monteux was superior in artistic quality to the concert given after much press agenting by Mr. Mengelberg.

We do not see how anyone with substantial musical knowledge, experience and reasonably unbiased mind, could sincerely deny this. The New York orchestra could not reasonably be expected to equal the Boston Symphony, and no one finds fault with it on that account. The good-wind section is particularly weak, weak as individual players, weak in ensemble. There are a few good solo players, exceptions which proved the rule, as the concert-rooster, the first born, the first clarinet. But this orchestra, like the Boston Symphony in its earlier days, has had its ups and downs and reorganizations. Furthermore, it plays under more than one conductor a season, and Mr. Mengelberg has only conducted it a few weeks thus far. A tribute to the authority of Mr. Mengelberg, and he has plenty of authority and driving power over men and instruments, is the manner in which the players obey his wishes implicitly. He can get whatever he wants from them.

Anticipating greatly, we were disappointed in Mr. Mengelberg. We had expected so much, and received so very little musical manna on this occasion. He is a man who palpably conducts first and last for the gallery, for effect usually of a sensational and meretricious kind. His climaxes are disproportionate. He seems happiest when posturing wildly, when riding the whirlwind and directing the storm. Of the finer values of orchestral playing there was seldom evidence, except that the first pages of the "Lohengrin Prelude" showed what Mr. Mengelberg could do in the way of restraint and reserve of force if he chose to, while the climax indicated clearly how irresistible, to him, is the opportunity to make a circus noise.

In New York, which has often disparaged the conducting of Mr. Monteux, Mr. Mengelberg seems to be greatly admired. If that is what the New York public admire, let them have it. As for us, we may be academic, the blood of the codfish may have gotten into our veins, but we must confess to a back-sliding conservatism so acute that we long, fairly long, for the B. S. O. to strike up on its return to Boston, and let us hear its tone again. We are obliged to say, to our own great regret, that we do not consider Mr. Mengelberg a great conductor.

POST-MAR. 19

John McCormack Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Last Evening Concert of Season Enlists Irish Tenor in Irish Songs of Loeffler.

With St. Patrick's Day a few short hours away, John McCormack, the Irish tenor, celebrated the new state of affairs by appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. Bach did he sing, and then more Bach; but then, on the wings of the occasion, he launched into three Irish fantasies, composed by Charles Martin Loeffler for voice and orchestra from poems of Yeats and W. Hefernan, the blind. So these shamrocks out of Massachusetts and Alsatia were ribboned with particularly timely applause.

Now that Mr. McCormack is out of opera and his local duties reduced to Sunday evenings at the Hippodrome, it is rare to hear him as the assisting artist of an orchestral evening. Unforgettable, of course, is the evening of the baptism of the Beethoven Association, when he sang "Adelaide," but that was two seasons ago. So his presence on the program was a good green feather in the highly proper hat of the Boston Symphony's last evening concert here of the year. Besides which, it was a drawing card. Many came to hear Bach and Loeffler who can hum "Mother Machree" backwards. For these, above all, the magnificent jumble of fervor, mysticism, battle cry, roadside balladry and mediæval patriotism of "The Sons of Caitlin-ni-Holahan" must have had an extra message.

For musicians and poets, on the other hand, the chief appeal seemed to lie in the first of the Loeffler songs, "The Host in the Air"—a poem from that volume of "The Wind Among the Reeds" with which Yeats has inspired his very clever admirer from Muelhausen and Medfield. Here was an echo, exquisitely and fantastically sounded, of Mr. Loeffler's own "Devil's Vilanelle," the vocal thread laid wistfully over a field of orchestration as elaborate and ingenious as that of a young Erich Korngold. Smoother than Korngold, though, and far more bitten with subjectiveness. Then, again, that other Yeats poem, "The Fiddler of Doon," swept on a frothy and fanciful rhythm to the edge of celestial humor. It was immensely fine, and Mr. McCormack sang it as finely. Mr. Loeffler, though no longer a young man, remains among the most inventive composers we have. If Wagner could write the love tragedy of an Irish princess, it remains for Mr. Loeffler, equally foreign to Caitlin-ni-Holahan to orchestrate its fairy tales. These three songs were Nos. 2, 3 and 5 of a series of five, and this was their first hearing in New York. It could not have been a happier one.

Mr. McCormack's singing of two Bach arias was in English, and was not as successful. He gave out fine and sweet notes, but his words were queerly clipped and misaccentuated. And, as a loyal henchman informed us, "That guy Bach was no good composer. He let the orchestra drown some of John's singing!" Yet it was singing of style and lyric loveliness, and Mr. McCormack took the evening's chief plaudits away with him.

The orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, played Schubert's Seventh Symphony. It played it stoutly but joylessly. Good and big sound there was, but it mounted to no clear, climactic meaning. Far more colorful was Mr. Monteux's conducting of Reinsky-Korsakoff's "La Grande Paque Russe" overture, which poured orthodox happiness over the Bostonians' whole season of symphony and service to New York.

NY. SUN MAR 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Two Concerts Given at Aeolian Hall—Opera Bills by the Metropolitan.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York concert of this season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's "First Symphony," all magnificently played, and the audience applauded the conductor and the musicians in detail at the end.

WORLD-MAR. 19.

ESTHER FERRABINI JACCHIA

HERALD-MAR. 19.

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert of Its Season Here

Plays Schreker's 'Overture to Drama' as if It Were Important Music.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its New York season to an end with yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Franz Schreker's "Overture to a Drama" and the C minor symphony of Brahms. The last named work has had a hard winter. For that reason it is entitled to immunity from discussion this morning. One may enjoy the spectacle of M. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Bostonians, battling with the emotions he feels but cannot wholly express when he is in the society of Brahms, but there is always the comforting assurance that the orchestra will perform the music commendably.

The Herr Professor Schreker is the latest star in the beclouded firmament of German music. He was born in Monaco; he was some time a professor in Vienna, and he is high priest of the Hoch Schule in Charlottenburg, which, as every one knows, is the Brooklyn of Berlin. His overture was published in 1914 and first performed in that year by the Vienna Philharmonic under Felix Weingartner. The score is dedicated to the producers and, as Mr. Gericke remarked of a similar honor, it served them right.

The Herr Professor Schreker's music is not "schrecklich." It is "langweilich." Which is to say it is not bad, but just long winded. It is a long and remarkably pointless series of purposeless pipings and pantings, bombastic bleatings and tumultuous thunderings. Sometimes it sounds as if it were going to be a clever imitation of Debussy, but before rashly invading Gaul the composer faces the other way, goes over the Semmering Pass and lands for a brief respite in the sunny land of Malipiero.

That, too, is foreign to his soul, and back he goes to Austria and thence into Bavaria, where he foregathers with Wagner and carries away much valuable advice as to the manufacture of overtures to dramas. By this time the reader must understand that the Herr Professor is a man of wide view and catholicity of taste. He does not follow any one slavishly, nor does he adventure into unknown and untried paths of originality. He just meanders comfortably along by the side of first one friend and then another till he thinks it is time to ring up the curtain on the drama, and then he politely gives over preluding and we may imagine that the play—necessarily a short one—begins. The orchestra performed this prefacory vacuity as if it were important music.

As for the "Iberia" of Debussy, one feels that the Frenchman's castles in Spain become more visionary every season, and that some day, like the Holy Roman Empire, they will go up in smoke. Mr. Monteux conducted this composition with honorable intentions and a measurable degree of success.

NY. HERALD MAR. 19

Shreker Piece Well Rendered By Boston Band

"Overture to a Play" Less Terrifying Than Anticipated; Chief Fault Is It Is Too Long by Half

Euphony One of Factors

Unlike Some Other Modern Compositions, It Possesses Deep - Breathed Ideas

By H. E. Krehbiel

The novelty which Mr. Monteux introduced at the last concert for this season of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon was less terrifying in the hearing than in the anticipation. The name of Franz Shreker had a foreboding sound not only in itself but in report. Before he left Vienna, where he was professor at the Conservatory, to take a similar post at what used to be called the Royal High School of Music in Berlin, he had placed himself at the head of the progressive party and fallen under the displeasure of the conservatives, now led by Hans Pfitzner. Pfitzner has written at least one opera which met with popular approval, and he may have had Shreker in mind with others when he published a book entitled "The Aesthetic of Impotency," whose pages are full of condemnation of the composers who labor much without disclosing inventiveness in subject-matter—in themes.

The work which New York heard yesterday was Shreker's "Overture to a Play." Whether tragedy, comedy, history or pastoral was not specified. Nor do we know after hearing the music. We suspect that it was a love-play, but are, like Biron in "Love's Labor's Lost," sure of one thing, which is that it was too long for a play. Too long by a half, for it lasted twenty minutes, and ten minutes would have sufficed to publish all its contents.

It is modern music, but, unlike that which sounds like it that is come to us lately from Italy, it has some deep-breathed ideas, and is not all color and counterpoint, all dalliance with quirks and gasps. It is tremendously learned and so becoming to a professor of composition, and noise is not one of its factors, while euphony is. Boston and Chicago heard it on the same day just a month ago, and now it has enriched the experience of New York. If it were not so long we fancy that we might learn to like it on a second hearing. Indeed, the promise of a repetition would rather invite than repel us, which is a more amiable sentiment than we have uttered for some time after hearing the music of an extreme modernist. Herr Shreker indeed seems to mean well by our ears as well as our fancy and emotions. We wish we might be able to compare his ballet made out of Oscar Wilde's "The Birthday of the Infanta" with Mr. John Alden Carpenter's.

In this music and in Debussy's "Iberia" Mr. Monteux and his men appeared to excellent advantage. With all their technical difficulties it seems easier to make pieces of this character sound well than did Schubert's C major symphony on Thursday evening. Yesterday's concert closed with Brahms's first symphony, which has been heard from all the orchestras that have played for us this season.

N.Y. TRIB MAR 19

WAGNER PROGRAM AT PENSION CONCERT

A program consisting entirely of selections from Wagner music dramas will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the pension fund concert next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Excerpts from each of the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs" make the program remarkable. Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia, Gertrude Tingley, Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will be the singers.

The first part of the program will include "The Flying Dutchman" overture and excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Emilio de Gogorza will be soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. He will sing Handel's aria, "Wher'er You Walk," and a Spanish song by Alvarez, "Canto del Presidiario." Mr. Monteux will conduct d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

ADVTSR. MAR

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this season was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Debussy's "Iberia," the second of his "Images" for orchestra, Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," and Brahms's first symphony.

The piece by Schreker gave an opportunity of hearing music of a contemporary German composer who is hardly known in New York except by name. He has been enthusiastically admired and bitterly attacked in Germany; but this composition seemed to show no very urgent reasons for either. He is more favorably disposed toward recognisable and sustained thematic material than many modern composers; and he shows that he has not entirely forgotten Wagner or Strauss or even Puccini in his invention of it. He writes with the modern skill for orchestra and demands a very large one—twenty-first and twenty-second violins, other strings and wind instruments in proportion, and a great array of percussion instruments. Their presence in the orchestra, however, is not made overpoweringly evident.

There is richness of tone and of color in the work and there are passages that are effective and even impressive. And if the whole does not give the impression of great originality, it is the product of one who has something today and who has not abandoned all feeling for beauty and expressiveness as they have hitherto been conceived. His development of the overtuee is elaborate and the composition is very long—it would seem that the drama must be a short one, or is postponed till the following evening. It is, in fact, too long and its development begins to seem labored and to pall before it is completed. Nevertheless the composition gave the impression of power and dramatic expression.

The performance was of great beauty of tone and careful finish. So was that of Debussy's "Iberia." This piece scarcely seems to be holding its interest and importance. Its minor ingenuities and picturesque touches, its pleasant little originalities and use of what were once Debrussy's new formulas give an agreeable sensation, but no very stirring one. There was a great contrast in Brahms's first symphony, of which Mr. Monteux gave careful and sympathetic and intelligent performance.

NY.TIMES-MAR 19.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW WORK

Offer Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" at Carnegie Hall Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

Pierre Monteux and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall introduced a novelty to New York in Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." The work is conceived on broad and noble lines, placing itself somewhere between nineteenth century music and the later modern forms. One hears a bit of Ravel, then Wagner; and most clearly one of the main themes belongs to the Puccini Italian school. The combination makes an interesting and colorful piece of writing, albeit Schreker's themes are not particularly tuneful, and in view of the fact that he has chosen to develop his themes this is rather disappointing.

The orchestra gave an enlightening performance of Debussy's "Iberia" suite, and ended the afternoon with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

NY TELEGRAPH MAR 19

Wagner Program at Symphony Sunday Next

A program consisting entirely of selections from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second and last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be give next Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30 at Symphony Hall, the proceeds to be devoted to the standing fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. This program will be particularly notable in that excerpts from each of the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs" are to be played.

From "The Rhine Gold," Mr Monteux will conduct the introduction, opening scene and closing scene. In the first scene the three "Rhine Daughters" will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia and Gertrude Tingley. In the last scene, the baritone parts will be taken by Charles H. Bennett and the tenor parts by Raymond Simonds.

From "The Valkyries," "The Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," "The Forest Murmurs," and from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Funeral March of Siegfried."

The first act of the program will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "The Procession to the Cathedral" from "Lohengrin," the introduction to the third act of the same drama, and excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

GLOBE-MAR. 19.

MUSIC

By J. O. L.

The Boston Symphony.

It was an inestimable privilege last evening to hear once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave one of the most satisfying performances that any orchestra has presented in the Lyric for many a season. There are certain features—qualities, one might better say—about the Boston orchestra that set it apart from the other great symphonic oganizations which visit us from time to time, and its return, after so long an absence, serves to accentuate these things. For mellowness of tone and round, suave beauty the string choir of this band stands alone. It has a timbre that is quite unique, and there is a certain mellowness about the entire group of instruments, an exquisiteness about the wood wind and a richness of tone where the brasses are concerned that makes the student of these things again sense "the perfect instrument" of past years.

It is interesting to note, however, that the Boston orchestra in its present development is inherently a French orchestra, imbued with the Gallic spirit of its French conductor. It plays with an extraordinary delicacy and finesse, a graceful sweetness that is very fascinating. As a result of this an even, perfectly balanced musical fabric is produced in which no special choirs are obtruded. Mr. Monteux does not "pick out" certain phrases, accentuate certain instruments, as so many of his contemporaries do. He is not a modern conductor, as this phrase is understood to mean a leader who introduces great splashes of tonal color, and if the organization under his baton does not always plumb the profound emotional depths that the bands of some of his contemporaries do, his orchestra does achieve an entirely different goal than the others, for it has a spiritual quality, a kind of ecstatic fineness, that is a thing apart. One has, perhaps, heard a more stirring reading of the glorious Tschaikowsky Fourth symphony, because Mr. Monteux's reaction to Russian music is possibly less emotional than spiritual, but it is doubtful if one will ever hear a more exalted one.

The conductor and his men were given an ovation that was prolonged for many minutes after its performance. Following the symphony the mystic "Istar" variations of d'Indy were played with the most subtle understanding, and then the picturesque Casella "Le Couvent sur l'eau" suite, an imaginative and vivid work replete with Latin coloring, in which the voice part was most beautifully sung by Laura Littlefield. The concert closed with a fine rhythmic interpretation of the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." In many respects the occasion was a memorable one. It is to be hoped that, now the ice has been broken, the Boston orchestra will visit us more frequently.

BALTIMORE-SUN FEB 2

Wisdom and Merit

For the Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the "extra series," Mr. Monteux prepared a programme lighter, more "popular" in character than any one of its three predecessors. Within obvious limits this is a step in the right direction—and these limits Mr. Monteux may be counted upon to respect. Dvorák's Symphony "From the New World" is surely more suited to the likings and capacities of those unaccustomed to the severer forms of orchestral music than is Franck's in D minor, Beethoven's Fifth or even the "Unfinished" of Schubert. The symphonic repertory contains few pieces more easily grasped and more readily enjoyed than Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," and revered and respected classic though it is, Beethoven's Third Overture to "Leonore" is music that must stir any hearer. Unresponsive indeed is the one who does not quicken at the sound of the trumpet call "off-stage," whose blood does not tingle at the headlong triumphant coda, who does not sense the stately majesty of the opening.

One piece on last night's programme was inert and of slight value as music—Lalo's Concerto for the violoncello. But it served as pretext for an "assisting artist," in this case Mr. Jean Bedetti, so all was well. The average listener readily puts the interest in performance, or in the performer, ahead of interest in the thing performed—provided always that this performance bear the alluring designation of "solo." No doubt the majority of those who were in Symphony Hall last evening were better satisfied in the hearing of a soloist than they would have been had an orchestral piece of greater intrinsic appeal—and there must be scores if not hundreds of them—replaced Lalo's faded Concerto. Only the Intermezzo which, by reason of its two contrasting themes does double duty as slow movement and Scherzo, is still fresh enough to give pleasure of itself. For the rest the chief enjoyment lay, not in the music, but in the now familiar artistry and virtuosity of Mr. Bedetti. A thankless task at best, is that of the solo 'cellist in any concerted piece, for he must appear as a frail cockle threading its way amidst heavy and towering seas that threaten at any moment to engulf it.

It is easy to prate of the slenderness, the obviousness, the triviality, if you will, of Dvorák's "New World" Symphony. And yet give the piece such performance as it received last evening and the most sceptical must pause and ponder. Grant that Dvorák's pseudo-African themes are simple, unsophisticated, naive, unworthy of the sacerdotal seriousness of a symphony, it were yet rash to dismiss them too contemptuously, with a too great show of finality. So close are these tunes to the folk-song that they partake not a little of the folk-song's imperishability. Much music of a more pretentious character, of a "profounder" nature, written during the [illegible]

[illegible] the symphony was [illegible] withered away. Dvorák's Symphony holds its place, withstanding both the plaudits of the many and the taunts of the superior. However much they may offend a detached critical sense, a cool æsthetic judgment, Dvorák's tunes still arrest and stir—in performance there is no escaping them. Both in their sharpness of interval and in their rhythmic life is to be found the appeal of Dvokák's ingenuous melodies. And this quality of rhythmic energy is responsible for not a little of the symphony's continued youthfulness. Add to the appeal of melody and rhythm the deft and discerning, exquisitely euphonious, often brilliant instrumentation with which this Symphony is clothed, and its vitality need cause no wonderment.

After all the chief menace to the survival of a given piece of music lies less in its tendency to triteness than in its potentiality for dullness. For this reason many things live that seemingly deserve to perish; many things die that appear to have a juster claim on life. Time and again the trifling outlasts the tremendous, the superficial prevails over that which has once seemed sublime. Will "Péleas and Mélisande" know the years already known by "Lucia" or "Il Trovatore"? "Tannhäuser" is today less fresh than "The Barber of Seville." Mahler's symphonies have a less certain claim on life than Haydn's—than even the "Poet and Peasant" Overture. It is not at all unlikely that a future generation will know this Symphony of Dvorák better than it knows certain pieces now held in far greater regard.

Mention has already been made of the excellence of last evening's performance of this music. Like Schubert, whom he in so many ways resembles, Dvorák wrote with special affection and sympathy for the individual instruments, particularly in the wood-wind family. Even when their compass and general technique would permit, the melodies that he assigns to one instrument would, in most cases, go ill if played by another. This "New World" Symphony abounds in solo passages both telling and taxing, and last night each and every one of these was adroitly handled. Deservingly was Mr. Mueller of the English horn obliged to acknowledge the applause at the conclusion of the Largo. Seldom has the orchestra seemed so truly a group of individual virtuosi, yet rarely has it achieved a more finished, more flowing ensemble.

Beside the Bohemian's ardors Saint-Saëns's orchestral spinning-song seemed cold, colorless and contrived. It is not without significance that this music was first contrived for the pianoforte. It is essentially unsymphonic; there are too few voices and the sonority, gained by massing several instruments on a single part is seldom convincing. Yet in its way the piece is charming, even though it smacks more of the drawing-room than of the symphony concert. The principal melody has a captivating prettiness and the episode of Hercules striving to burst his bonds is a singularly happy example of artistic realism. There was here less opportunity for either individual or combined excellence, yet the performance of the symphonic poem worthily companioned that of the Symphony. And the difficulties which at one time seemingly beset Mr. Monteux in Beethoven's Overture were last night swept aside. From the slow unfolding of the Introduction to the exultant frenzy of the end, the performance was Beethoven released. And in this Overture Beethoen released becomes perforce Beethoven transfigured. No conductor may justly he said to add anything to the eloquence of this Overture. Not to every conductor is it given fully to apprehend is possibilities.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR. 14.

Henry Eichheim Gathers Tunes and Cries and Weaves Them Into an Orchestral Composition

Henry Eichheim, Composer of "Oriental Impressions" for Orchestra

THE "Oriental Impressions" of Henry Eichheim, which were played at the Berkshire Festival at Pittsfield, Mass., last spring by a small ensemble, are about to be performed by full orchestra for the first time. Mr. Eichheim, who is a resident of Boston and a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct these sketches at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall this Friday and Saturday, and will also conduct them at the pair of symphony concerts by the Chicago orchestra in that city on April 14 and 15.

Mr. Eichheim explains that no theme in his "Impressions" is his own—each comes from the overflowing notebooks which were never long out of hand during his two trips to the east of Asia. His setting is fairly simple—a background of his own making, which is intended to summon the atmosphere, the shimmer of the rich-hued and age-old art of the Far East. He wishes his suite to be looked upon simply as a communication from an American musician in the Orient to his Western friends. He calls himself an enthusiast, an ardent lover of an art remote to us, and he hastens to record with delight and as best he may the manifold beauties which he has discovered.

The Refined Music of the East

The musical arts of Japan, China, Korea and Siam, in the opinion of Mr. Eichheim, are as far apart as the arts of different nations can be. The Japanese is the acme of taste and refinement, of ceremony, of emotional continence. It is now looking to the West, and changing correspondingly. The art of China is far richer in color, pungent and acrid. It has more depth of beauty and breathes a tradition which reaches back before the Christian era. The music of 700 A. D., survives intact in the twentieth century, apparently immutable. [illegible] are sometimes repelled by the music and idiom of Japan and China because it is too subtle and refined for us. We think they are singing out of tune, when they are singing graduated notes which in our crude, tempered scale do not exist. The ancient music of China, for instance, had a a scale of 365 notes, each symbolized. The music of China has no harmony, but a many-voiced counterpart—a counterpoint baffling to us because it is as ad libitum. Their achievement in tone color is far more advanced than ours. In short, there lies ready for the western explorer an almost boundless field for discovery—provided he is sympathetic to this widely divergent style.

Themes From the Streets

Mr. Eichheim simply walked about with ears alert. Music was always in the air. Laborers sang at their work, priests went about singing and begging alms for the poor, venders of food or flowers played on various instruments; miserable creatures piped exquisite strains with apparently no other motive in life, to all appearances; disgraced priests who had broken their austere vows would go about, shamed, in an inverted basket to hide their countenances, playing the shakuhachi—a species of flute. In the temples, which are shrines of art as well as religion, scores 1000 years old or more were preserved and played, and here the inquisitor found his most poignant musical experiences. Of the theaters, the orchestra and chorus is an established and important part, and often dramatically expressive in the highest degree.

The first number, the "Korean Sketch," is an exposition of three themes. One Mr. Eichheim caught from a laborer singing as he dug his ditch; another from a flute player who squatted on the corner of a platform, watching four men playing at dice. His melody and the game were alike endless. The last theme is a Korean love song which a young girl sang for the composer. She belonged to the Geisha school at Seoul.

Peddlers and Priests

The "Siamese Sketch" starts with four broad-tongued wind bells such as hang at the corners of the Royal Temple of the Realm. A familiar peddler's song is given to the oboe, English horn and viola, this leading to the song of a Buddhist priest and the piping of a street musician upon the ekeh—a bamboo instrument which is as old as time and is said to have been handed from Mongol to Slav and thence to have given origin to the pipe organ of Christendom.

In the "Japanese Nocturne," the theme of the flute and piccolo came from the masseurs, who wander about at dusk, piping for a job. A food vender of Tokyo gave the alternating theme of the oboe. This "Impression" seeks to transmit the unique spectacle of Japan spread forth under the stars.

The last, the "Chinese Sketch," utilizes a large number of native percussion instruments which the composer brought with him for the purpose. There are three sets of small bells, a pair of four-inch cymbals, a hollow wooden block, a brass bell and tam tams, one of these having a peculiar fluctuating tone. The themes come from temple, street and theater

MONITOR MAR 23

the over the king.
ory
music.
one in every like the go up in nducted this intentions success.

MAR. 19

Piece
dered Band

Play" Less an Antici-Fault Is ng by Half of Factors

her Modern
It Possesses hed Ideas

rehbiel

Mr. Monteux in-concert for this Orchestra yes-
less terrifying
in the anticipaanz Shreker had ot only in itself
he left Vienna,
sor at the Con-
similar post at the Royal High Berlin, he had head of the pro-allen under the nservatives, now Pfitzner has pera which met
l, and he may nind with others
ook entitled "The y," whose pages
tion of the com-
ich without dis-
in subject-matter

New York heard r's "Overture to tragedy, comedy,
was not specified.
fter hearing the
at it was a love-Biron in "Love's
one thing, which for a play. Too it lasted twenty nutes would have its contents.
but, unlike that hat is come to us has some deep-
not all color and iance with quirks
mendously learned professor of comis not one of its
is. Boston and the same day just
w it has enriched York. If it were y that we might
a second hearing.
of a repetition
than repel us,
miable sentiment
d for some time
sic of an extreme cker indeed seems ars as well as our
We wish we mpare his ballet lide's "The Birth-
with Mr. John

in Debussy's and his men ap-advantage. With nalities it seems this character hubert's C major evening. Yes-with Brahms's which has been heard that have

MAR-1

AM CONCERT

entirely of gner music
ed by Pierre on Symphony
sion fund con-afternoon at cerpts from dramas of the lungs" make kable. Laura rrabini-Jac-
ley, Charles H. ond Simonds

the program
Flying Dutch-excerpts from
The Mastersing-

ROGRAM

will be soloist concerts here
day. He will
"Where'er You
anish song by Presidiario," conduct d'Indy's in," Eichheim's and Goldin the Spring."

MAR 19

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this season was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program comprised Debussy's "Iberia," the second of his "Images" for orchestra, Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," and Brahms's first symphony.

The piece by Schreker gave an opportunity of hearing music of a contemporary German composer who is hardly known in New York except by name. He has been enthusiastically admired and bitterly attacked in Germany; but this composition seemed to show no very urgent reasons for either. He is more favorably disposed toward recognizable and sustained thematic material than many modern composers; and he shows that he has not entirely forgotten Wagner or Strauss or even Puccini in his invention of it. He writes with the modern skill for orchestra and demands a very large one—twenty-first and twenty-second violins, other strings and wind instruments in proportion, and a great array of percussion instruments. Their presence in the orchestra, however, is not made overpoweringly evident.

There is richness of tone and of color in the work and there are passages that are effective and even impressive. And if the whole does not give the impression of great originality, it is the product of one who has something today and who has not abandoned all feeling for beauty and expressiveness as they have hitherto been conceived. His development of the overtuee is elaborate and the composition is very long—it would seem that the drama must be a short one, or is postponed till the following evening. It is, in fact, too long and its development begins to seem labored and to pall before it is completed. Nevertheless the composition gave the impression of power and dramatic expression.

The performance was of great beauty of tone and careful finish. So was that of Debussy's "Iberia." This piece scarcely seems to be holding its interest and importance. Its minor ingenuities and picturesque touches, its pleasant little originalities and use of what were once Debrussy's new formulas give an agreeable sensation, but no very stirring one. There was a great contrast in Brahms's first symphony, of which Mr. Monteux gave careful and sympathetic and intelligent performance.

N. Y. [illegible] MAR

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW WORK

Offer Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" at Carnegie Hall Concert Yesterday Afternoon.

Pierre Monteux and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall introduced a novelty to New York in Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." The work is conceived on broad and noble lines, placing itself somewhere between nineteenth century music and the later modern forms. One hears a bit of Ravel, then Wagner; and most clearly one of the main themes belongs to the Puccini Italian school. The combination makes an interesting and colorful piece of writing, albeit Schreker's themes are not particularly tuneful, and in view of the fact that he has chosen to develop his themes this is rather disappointing.

The orchestra gave an enlightening performance of Debussy's "Iberia" suite, and ended the afternoon with the Brahms Symphony No. 1.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH MAR 1

Wagner Program at Symphony Sunday Next

A program consisting entirely of selections from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second and last Pension Fund concert of the season, to be give next Sunday afternoon, March 26, at 3:30 at Symphony Hall, the proceeds to be devoted to the standing fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. This program will be particularly notable in that excerpts from each of the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs" are to be played.

From "The Rhine Gold," Mr Monteux will conduct the introduction, opening scene and closing scene. In the first scene the three "Rhine Daughters" will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia and Gertrude Tingley. In the last scene, the baritone parts will be taken by Charles H. Bennett and the tenor parts by Raymond Simonds.

From "The Valkyries," "The Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," "The Forest Murmurs," and from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Funeral March of Siegfried."

The first act of the program will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "The Procession to the Cathedral" from "Lohengrin," the introduction to the third act of the same drama, and excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

GLOBE - MAR. 19.

[8.]

MUSIC

By J. O. L.

The Boston Symphony.

It was an inestimable privilege last evening to hear once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, gave one of the most satisfying performances that any orchestra has presented in the Lyric for many a season. There are certain features—qualities, one might better say—about the Boston orchestra that set it apart from the other great symphonic oganizations which visit us from time to time, and its return, after so long an absence, serves to accentuate these things. For mellowness of tone and round, suave beauty the string choir of this band stands alone. It has a timbre that is quite unique, and there is a certain mellowness about the entire group of instruments, an exquisiteness about the wood wind and a richness of tone where the brasses are concerned that makes the student of these things again sense "the perfect instrument" of past years.

It is interesting to note, however, that the Boston orchestra in its present development is inherently a French orchestra, imbued with the Gallic spirit of its French conductor. It plays with an extraordinary delicacy and finesse, a graceful sweetness that is very fascinating. As a result of this an even, perfectly balanced musical fabric is produced in which no special choirs are obtruded. Mr. Monteux does not "pick out" certain phrases, accentuate certain instruments, as so many of his contemporaries do. He is not a modern conductor, as this phrase is understood to mean a leader who introduces great splashes of tonal color, and if the organization under his baton does not always plumb the profound emotional depths that the bands of some of his contemporaries do, his orchestra does achieve an entirely different goal than the others, for it has a spiritual quality, a kind of ecstatic fineness, that is a thing apart. One has, perhaps, heard a more stirring reading of the glorious Tschaikowsky Fourth symphony, because Mr. Monteux's reaction to Russian music is possibly less emotional than spiritual, but it is doubtful if one will ever hear a more exalted one.

The conductor and his men were given an ovation that was prolonged for many minutes after its performance. Following the symphony the mystic "Istar" variations of d'Indy were played with the most subtle understanding, and then the picturesque Casella "Le Couvent sur l'eau" suite, an imaginative and vivid work replete with Latin coloring, in which the voice part was most beautifully sung by Laura Littlefield. The concert closed with a fine rhythmic interpretation of the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes." In many respects the occasion was a memorable one. It is to be hoped that, now the ice has been broken, the Boston orchestra will visit us more frequently.

BALTIMORE - SUN FEB 2

Wisdom and Merit

For the Symphony Concert of last evening, the fourth of the "extra series," Mr. Monteux prepared a programme lighter, more "popular" in character than any one of its three predecessors. Within obvious limits this is a step in the right direction—and these limits Mr. Monteux may be counted upon to respect. Dvořák's Symphony "From the New World" is surely more suited to the likings and capacities of those unaccustomed to the severer forms of orchestral music than is Franck's in D minor, Beethoven's Fifth or even the "Unfinished" of Schubert. The symphonic repertory contains few pieces more easily grasped and more readily enjoyed than Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale," and revered and respected classic though it is, Beethoven's Third Overture to "Leonore" is music that must stir any hearer. Unresponsive indeed is the one who does not quicken at the sound of the trumpet call "off-stage," whose blood does not tingle at the headlong triumphant coda, who does not sense the stately majesty of the opening.

One piece on last night's programme was inert and of slight value as music—Lalo's Concerto for the violoncello. But it served as pretext for an "assisting artist," in this case Mr. Jean Bedetti, so all was well. The average listener readily puts the interest in performance, or in the performer, ahead of interest in the thing performed—provided always that this performance bear the alluring designation of "solo." No doubt the majority of those who were in Symphony Hall last evening were better satisfied in the hearing of a soloist than they would have been had an orchestral piece of greater intrinsic appeal—and there must be scores if not hundreds of them—replaced Lalo's faded Concerto. Only the Intermezzo which, by reason of its two contrasting themes does double duty as slow movement and Scherzo, is still fresh enough to give pleasure of itself. For the rest the chief enjoyment lay, not in the music, but in the now familiar artistry and virtuosity of Mr. Bedetti. A thankless task at best, is that of the solo 'cellist in any concerted piece, for he must appear as a frail cockle threading its way amidst heavy and towering seas that threaten at any moment to engulf it.

It is easy to prate of the slenderness, the obviousness, the triviality, if you will, of Dvořák's "New World" Symphony. And yet give the piece such performance as it received last evening and the most sceptical must pause and ponder. Grant that Dvořák's pseudo-African themes are simple, unsophisticated, naive, unworthy of the sacerdotal seriousness of a symphony, it were yet rash to dismiss them too contemptuously, with a too great show of finality. So close are these tunes to the folk-song that they partake not a little of the folk-song's imperishability. Much music of a more pretentious character, of a "profounder" nature, written during the twenty-nine years that have elapsed since this Symphony was first heard, [illegible] withered away. Dvořák's Symphony holds its place, withstanding both the plaudits of the many and the taunts of the superior. However much they may offend a detached critical sense, a cool æsthetic judgment, Dvořák's tunes still arrest and stir—in performance there is no escaping them. Both in their sharpness of interval and in their rhythmic life is to be found the appeal of Dvokák's ingenuous melodies. And this quality of rhythmic energy is responsible for not a little of the symphony's continued youthfulness. Add to the appeal of melody and rhythm the deft and discerning, exquisitely euphonious, often brilliant instrumentation with which this Symphony is clothed, and its vitality need cause no wonderment.

After all the chief menace to the survival of a given piece of music lies less in its tendency to triteness than in its potentiality for dullness. For this reason many things live that seemingly deserve to perish; many things die that appear to have a juster claim on life. Time and again the trifling outlasts the tremendous, the superficial prevails over that which has once seemed sublime. Will "Pélleas and Mélisande" know the years already known by "Lucia" or "Il Trovatore"? "Tannhäuser" is today less fresh than "The Barber of Seville." Mahler's symphonies have a less certain claim on life than Haydn's—than even the "Poet and Peasant" Overture. It is not at all unlikely that a future generation will know this Symphony of Dvořák better than it knows certain pieces now held in far greater regard.

Mention has already been made of the excellence of last evening's performance of this music Like Schubert, whom he in so many ways resembles, Dvořák wrote with special affection and sympathy for the individual instruments, particularly in the wood-wind family. Even when their compass and general technique would permit, the melodies that he assigns to one instrument would, in most cases, go ill if played by another. This "New World" Symphony abounds in solo passages both telling and taxing, and last night each and every one of these was adroitly handled. Deservingly was Mr. Mueller of the English horn obliged to acknowledge the applause at the conclusion of the Largo. Seldom has the orchestra seemed so truly a group of individual virtuosi, yet rarely has it achieved a more finished, more flowing ensemble.

Beside the Bohemian's ardors Saint-Saëns's orchestral spinning-song seemed cold, colorless and contrived. It is not without significance that this music was first contrived for the pianoforte. It is essentially unsymphonic; there are too few voices and the sonority, gained by massing several instruments on a single part is seldom convincing. Yet in its way the piece is charming, even though it smacks more of the drawing-room than of the symphony concert. The principal melody has a captivating prettiness and the episode of Hercules striving to burst his bonds is a singularly happy example of artistic realism. There was here less opportunity for either individual or combined excellence, yet the performance of the symphonic poem worthily companioned that of the Symphony. And the difficulties which at one time seemingly beset Mr. Monteux in Beethoven's Overture were last night swept aside. From the slow unfolding of the Introduction to the exultant frenzy of the end, the performance was Beethoven released. And in this Overture Beethoen released becomes perforce Beethoven transfigured. No conductor may justly he said to add anything to the eloquence of this Overture. Not to every conductor is it given fully to apprehend is possibilities.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR 14.

Henry Eichheim Gathers Tunes and Cries and Weaves Them Into an Orchestral Composition

Henry Eichheim, Composer of "Oriental Impressions" for Orchestra

THE "Oriental Impressions" of Henry Eichheim, which were played at the Berkshire Festival at Pittsfield, Mass., last spring by a small ensemble, are about to be performed by full orchestra for the first time. Mr. Eichheim, who is a resident of Boston and a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct these sketches at the pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall this Friday and Saturday, and will also conduct them at the pair of symphony concerts by the Chicago orchestra in that city on April 14 and 15.

Mr. Eichheim explains that no theme in his "Impressions" is his own—each comes from the overflowing notebooks which were never long out of hand during his two trips to the east of Asia. His setting is fairly simple—a background of his own making, which is intended to summon the atmosphere, the shimmer of the rich-hued and age-old art of the Far East. He wishes his suite to be looked upon simply as a communication from an American musician in the Orient to his Western friends. He calls himself an enthusiast, an ardent lover of an art remote to us, and he hastens to record with delight and as best he may the manifold beauties which he has discovered.

The Refined Music of the East

The musical arts of Japan, China, Korea and Siam, in the opinion of Mr. Eichheim, are as far apart as the arts of different nations can be. The Japanese is the acme of taste and refinement, of ceremony, of emotional continence. It is now looking to the West, and changing correspondingly. The art of China is far richer in color, pungent and acrid. It has more depth of beauty and breathes a tradition which reaches back before the Christian era. The music of 700 A. D., survives intact in the twentieth century, apparently immutable.

[illegible] composer holds that the whites are sometimes repelled by the music and idiom of Japan and China because it is too subtle and refined for us. We think they are singing out of tune, when they are singing graduated notes which in our crude, tempered scale do not exist. The ancient music of China, for instance, had a a scale of 365 notes, each symbolized. The music of China has no harmony, but a many-voiced counterpart—a counterpoint baffling to us because it is as ad libitum. Their achievement in tone color is far more advanced than ours. In short, there lies ready for the western explorer an almost boundless field for discovery—provided he is sympathetic to this widely divergent style.

Themes From the Streets

Mr. Eichheim simply walked about with ears alert. Music was always in the air. Laborers sang at their work, priests went about singing and begging alms for the poor, venders of food or flowers played on various instruments; miserable creatures piped exquisite strains with apparently no other motive in life, to all appearances; disgraced priests who had broken their austere vows would go about, shamed, in an inverted basket to hide their countenances, playing the shakuhachi—a species of flute. In the temples, which are shrines of art as well as religion, scores 1000 years old or more were preserved and played, and here the inquisitor found his most poignant musical experiences. Of the theaters, the orchestra and chorus is an established and important part, and often dramatically expressive in the highest degree.

The first number, the "Korean Sketch," is an exposition of three themes. One Mr. Eichheim caught from a laborer singing as he dug his ditch; another from a flute player who squatted on the corner of a platform, watching four men playing at dice. His melody and the game were alike endless. The last theme is a Korean love song which a young girl sang for the composer. She belonged to the Geisha school at Seoul.

Peddlers and Priests

The "Siamese Sketch" starts with four broad-tongued wind bells such as hang at the corners of the Royal Temple of the Realm. A familiar peddler's song is given to the oboe, English horn and viola, this leading to the song of a Buddhist priest and the piping of a street musician upon the ekeh—a bamboo instrument which is as old as time and is said to have been handed from Mongol to Slav and thence to have given origin to the pipe organ of Christendom.

In the "Japanese Nocturne," the theme of the flute and piccolo came from the masseurs, who wander about at dusk, piping for a job. A food vender of Tokyo gave the alternating theme of the oboe. This "Impression" seeks to transmit the unique spectacle of Japan spread forth under the stars.

The last, the "Chinese Sketch," utilizes a large number of native percussion instruments which the composer brought with him for the purpose. There are three sets of small bells, a pair of four-inch cymbals, a hollow wooden block, a brass bell and tam tams, one of these having a peculiar fluctuating tone. The themes come from temple, street and theater.

MONITOR MAR. 23.

NEXT Sunday afternoon, for the first time since the end of the war, the Symphony Orchestra returns to a full-fledged "Wagner Concert"—that is to a concert of fragments from his operas and music dramas. Of course, such a procession of excerpts from "The Flying Dutchman" through "Götterdämmerung" mocks the composer's purpose. He wrote his music—a few symphonic pieces aside—for the theatre and for no other place. There and there only is it full and free voiced. Yet for it—in Boston—there is no other place, no other way than the concert-hall. Thirty-three years ago this spring, the company of the Metropolitan Opera House (as it then was) migrated to the Boston Theatre and there twice sung and acted the music-dramas of "The Ring." Since that distant day, this town has not heard the four operas in sequence—a record for a "capital of music" at which any petty city of Central Europe would smile and sneer. Through a whole generation, "Das Rheingold" has never come to Bostonian stage. No wonder that Mr. Monteux has set two scenes from it—the first and the last—upon his programme for next Sunday. If we may not see the Rhine Maidens guarding their gold from Alberich, at least we shall hear them. In the music—the more important place—if not on the stage, the Rainbow Bridge will span the sky and the Gods cross into the new-reared Valhalla.

"Die Walküre" has fared better in Boston; visiting opera companies have kept it occasional piece. Once and again, twenty years back, the visitors also hazarded "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung"; but either would be as strange nowadays upon Bostonian stage as "Das Rheingold" itself. "Tristan," "Parsifal," "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," if not Tannhäuser," home-keeping Bostonians may still recall as actual operas of the theatre and not in "symphonic fragments" of the concert-hall. None the less, probably no city in Europe or in America, of the size and the pretension of Boston, has so seldom heard Wagner's operas as such. With Shakspeare, he shares the indifference of our public of the theatre.

With reason, in such circumstance, do the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra arrange an annual "Wagner Concert," however much they may know, out of experience in the theatre, that such playing of his music—overtures and preludes aside—is Wagner attenuated. With reason, also, does a sustaining public give sign at the box-office in Symphony Hall of its wakening anticipation. The elders in it may supplement the music with their memories of the stage; the youngsters, if they have a bit of imagination and background may frame their own visions of the theatre. Fortunately for both, conductors like Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux, are men of music-drama as well as of symphonic pieces. Their instinct and experience of the opera house pulses through their orchestra, stirs through the tunnel of tone that is Symphony Hall. And the power and the beauty of Wagner's music rest dimless, though no lights of the stage shine upon it. If enough Bostonians keep appetite for the barmecide feasts (relatively) of "Wagner Concerts," why should not enough more, added to them, somehow, some day restore Wagner to the Opera House that month after month and year after year mocks its own empty existence? For no reason at all, except human inertia and the like content with things as they are. Suppose the Metropolitan Company should bring the four "Ring Operas" thither, as it may in some fortunate future. A penny then for Mr. Monteux's fragments—Valkyrs' Ride, Forest Scene, Funeral Music Rhinegold and Rainbow Bridge. Meanwhile the more eager the audience next Sunday the better for that forlorn hope—and for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. H. T. P.

Mr. Eichheim's Orient

In general when the Occidental composer turns his face towards the East—and of late he has done so with increasing frequency—he has the choice of two procedures. Either he may, out of his fertile fancy, invent themes and harmonies of Oriental flavor, or he may avail himself of actual Eastern melodies, transcribed by some scholar or adventurer. More fortunate is Mr. Henry Eichheim, whose "Oriental Impressions" will be heard for the first time in his "home-city" at the Symphony Concerts of this week. Twice a traveller in the countries of Asia, Mr. Eichheim has gone, note-book in hand, into temples, tea-houses and theatres, along city squares and country byways, jotting down snatches of song, or instrumental melody, or again the haunting tones of temple-bells. From these themes, now pungently characteristic, now of rare and distinguished beauty, he has fashioned music at once literal and suggestive. To him the Orient has been less an exotic and curious panorama, a medley of strange sights and sounds, than a land rich in meaning, charged with poetry. A musician of learning and resource, a composer of indisputable skill, he has contrived through the medium of tones so to record his impressions that they may be shared and enjoyed by any who may hear his curious music with open ears and answering imagination.

First written for piano, and afterwards scored for small orchestra, four of these pieces were played with notable success at the Berkshire Festival of last autumn. Since that time Mr. Eichheim has composed two more, one based on Korean, the other on Siamese, themes. In November four of the six were heard at Æolian Hall in New York, with Mme. Gautier as auxiliary singer. Three of the set have since come to performance in Philadelphia, and last month Mr. Barrère's "Little Symphony" Orchestra played all but one of them at a concert at the Hotel Ambassador in New York.

The four numbers of tomorrow and Saturday in Boston have been re-scored for an ampler orchestra and in this form they will now be heard for the first time. In making the new instrumentation Mr. Eichheim has displayed commendable temperance and restraint. He has avoided, first of all, any instrument or group of instruments at odds with his coloristic and atmospheric scheme. In one number—"Japanese Nocturne"—some use is made of a bass clarinet; otherwise the clarinets, too warm and [illegible] to suit the composer's purpose, are omitted entirely. The remaining wood-wind instruments are employed singly or in pairs. The four horns are used sparingly; the trumpets, trombones and tuba are altogether banished. There is a large array of Orientally suggestive pulsatile instruments—large and small bells, cymbals ancient and modern, Chinese drums and wooden block, tam-tams, xylophone and marimba—but no tympani. Two harps, piano and the full string band complete the list.

Besides the "Japanese Nocturne" the pieces to be played are three sketches entitled respectively "Chinese," "Siamese" and "Korean." The motivs upon which the Nocturne is based were heard in various cities of Japan, and in the order of appearance consist of a tune played by blind masseurs, the piping of food-vendors, the playing of a Koto, and a prayer chanted by an old man who beat the while upon a small wooden bell. In Bangkok, in the Emerald-Buddha Temple of the King of Siam, hang four bells, sounded by the swaying breeze. Mr. Eichheim's "Siamese Sketch" begins with these tones (C, F, G, B); and after this motiv comes the song of a female peddlar. Then is heard the melody chanted by a Buddhist priest of the Temple—a theme of five whole tones. The racket of a native theatre follows, and in succession come the music of a street-musician playing upon the Ekeh and the melody of a street-singer. A reference to the temple-bells brings the end.

The curious din of percussion instruments heard in a theatre begins the "Chinese Sketch." This clamor gives way to the tune of a tea-house fiddler, followed in turn by the music of a street procession in Shanghai. The scene changes to a Buddhist temple; bells sound, cymbals clash and a priest mumbles his prayers. To conclude, comes street music from Peking, gradually dying away until only a single instrument is heard. A phrase of strange beauty, sung by a street laborer in Seoul, forms the basis of the Korean memories. This melody is first played by the English horn, and against it the flute plays the tune of a native musician. Motivs from a Korean theatre are woven into the tonal fabric, and this impression ends with the love-song of a Geisha girl. The curious may find in the February issue of the magazine "Asia" Mr. Eichheim's photograph of the little girl—she was but fourteen—from whose lips he heard this melody.

W. S. S.

Loeffler—for Praise and Blame

A week ago today, the Boston Orchestra and Mr. McCormack carried to New York Mr. Loeffler's three Irish Fantasias. In Carnegie Hall, as in Symphony Hall, the new pieces were heard with lively interest and loud applause. The reviewers, no less expectant than the audience, similarly departed to praise. For example of them, Mr. Aldrich writing in The Times, notes "the discrimination and reserve" with which the composer has assimilated "the Irish musical idiom" to his purposes, and proceeds:

> Mr. Loeffler has found a richly expressive and characteristic musical investment for each of these poems. He has been peculiarly successful in evoking the mood of each in music that shows a strong individual character and fecundity of invention, music that is unmistakably his own; that has picturesque and graphic touches, but is chiefly concerned with the spirit rather than with the descriptive letter; and that is developed with a consummate musicianship. He has never written for orchestra with more consummate skill, flexibility and precision of touch, with more clarity of glowing beauty of color. He has not been so "modern" as to neglect the voice for the orchestra. His vocal line is truly vocal and offers something that so great an artist as Mr. McCormack can lift to a plane of sustained interest, can make characteristically expressive, and in the prophetic song raise to a pitch of noble and passionate eloquence.

The dissenting voice is Mr. Taylor's lifted in The World; yet the dissent is in measure, qualified. Says he:

> Something that is in the poems is wanting in the music. Loeffler has overset them, for one thing. He is happiest when he is conveying subtleties, and these poems are simple. No word in them has escaped his sophisticated scrutiny, yet in the very act of catching every syllable and sentence that is characteristically Celtic, he has lost the overtones, the mood that is implicit in every one of the poems, yet is never expressed in them—the immense, melancholy humor of the Irish soul. . . . His music is Irish enough; but it is too Irish. It is all the Ireland of reels and bagpipes, never the Ireland of "Would God I were the Tender Apple Blossom." The three songs lack the big simplicity of greatness.
>
> For this Mr. Loeffler's orchestration is partly responsible. It is too colorful, too kaleidoscopic, too infernally clever. It lets nothing go by implication, stepping in officiously to imitate everything that the hearer would rather imagine for himself. . . . This sort of thing is fascinating, but it is not creative imagination, and it is not music. The thoughts of the poems are peasants' thoughts, simple, humble, and beautiful; but the orchestra is that of Baudelaire. It is beautiful music, nevertheless, however far it may fall short of perfection.

TRANS. MAR. 23

Mr. Monteux has finally made ready the chorus for his projected performances, "in entirety," of Franck's "Psyche." Accordingly, they will make the major part of the Symphony Concerts of next week. The composer styled the piece a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Chorus"; but hitherto only orchestral fragments of it have been heard in Boston—not always in the prescribed succession. Now it will run in the seven divisions shaped by Franck, viz: "Psyche Asleep"; "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; "The Garden of Eros"; "Psyche and Eros"; "The Punishment"; "Lament of Psyche"; "Apotheosis." Another novel piece also stands on the programme—the Suite drawn by Mr. Henry Gilbert from his music to the "Pageant of Plymouth" last summer. It comprises: a Prelude and Norse Scene; French and Indian Pantomime; Indian Dance; Pestilence. For the classics, Händel's Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind-Choirs will be played.

TRANS. MAR 24

[87]

DE GORGOZA IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Nineteenth Concert of Season One of Most Interesting Programs of Winter

The nineteenth program of the Symphony season yesterday was one of the most interesting of the Winter. There were many points of interest because of the fact that the program offered both a splendid soloist and a number conducted by the composer.

In the absence of a symphony, Mr. Monteux chose the Vincent D'Indy "Wallenstein" trilogy (after the dramatic poem by Schiller). It is big and compelling in theme and treatment and was so thoroughly enjoyed by the audience that after several recalls, Mr. Monteux finally called on the entire orchestra to acknowledge the unusually spontaneous burst of applause.

Mr. Eichheim, composer of "Oriental Impressions for Orchestra," was on the spot to conduct his work and by so doing, assured the hearers that not the slightest detail was lost. The impressions consisted of four sketches of which the Siamese was by far the most attractive. The things are light in touch, but present a vivid picture of the night sounds of that corner of the world.

The peak of the program, however, was the appearance of Emilio de Gorgoza, who is too thoroughly established in the affections of Boston to need further comment. Of his two numbers, the Handel "Where'er You Walk" was captivating in its old-fashioned simplicity. A more dramatic note entered in when he sang the "Canto del Presidiario," a splendid song by Alvarez.

ALL WAGNER PROGRAM TOMORROW

At the second and last pension fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in selections from the principal music dramas of Richard Wagner. From the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs," selections of considerable importance will be played. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried" the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung" the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene, and the principal portion of the closing scene will be played.

AMER. MAR. 25.

WAGNER CONCERT

At the second and last pension fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in selections from the principal music dramas of Richard Wagner. The parts of the three Rhine daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. The baritone parts of Alberich and others will be taken by Charles H. Bennett, and the tenor parts of Loge and Froh by Raymond Simonds.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

Cesar Franck's symphony poem, "Psyche," written for orchestra and mixed chorus, will be performed for the first time here in its entirety when Pierre Monteux conducts it at the 20th pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 31 and April 1. The chorus to be heard in this work has been especially trained for the purpose by Mr. Monteux.

TRAV MAR 25

Symphony Plays Oriental Music

Oriental music written by Henry Eicheim, Boston composer, is the striking novelty on this week's Symphony program. Mr. Eicheim, who formerly played among the violinists in the Symphony Orchestra, conducted the work yesterday. He was roundly applauded.

Korean, Siamese and Chinese sketches, together with a Japanese nocturne, make up these piquant impressions of the Far East. The themes were collected by the composer during his two visits to the Orient. In the new realm of tone pictures music these "Oriental Impressions" will rank high.

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular baritone, is this week's soloist. The symphonic feature of the program is D'Indy's impressive "Wallenstein" trilogy.

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS HIS ORIENTAL PIECES

Boston Composer's Work Played by Symphony

Four "Oriental Impressions," by Henry Eichheim of Boston, were the only novelties on yesterday's Symphony concert program. These pieces have been played in public in versions for piano and for small orchestra, but yesterday's was the first performance of the music in its present form. Mr Eichheim, who conducted his own pieces, was cordially applauded, both by the audience and by the orchestra, in which he formerly played for over 20 years.

These sketches are based on musical and other noises heard and noted down by the composer in the Orient. They are carefully scored, especially in the percussion section of the orchestra, so as to reproduce faithfully the timber of temple gongs and so forth. All that painstaking intelligence, backed by a subtle imagination, can do in reproducing the atmosphere of an Oriental city in Occidental music Mr Eichheim has done. The result is original, thoroughly entertaining music, infinitely above the sort of Chinese pieces produced by composers who have never been nearer to China than Niagara Falls or Monte Carlo.

The soloist was Emilio de Gogorza, who sang two sharply contrasted numbers, Handel's "Where'er You Walk," and a rather cheaply operatic "Prisoner's Song" by Alvarez, with his familiar suavely emotional manner. He gave a competent performance of Handel's aria, one of his finest; and seemed more thoroughly at home in the Spanish piece with its hints of "Pagliacci" disguised by Castilian rhythms. The applause was enthusiastic.

The concert began with d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, an early work which now seems outmoded and rather dull. To "play the sedulous ape" may be good for the apprentice composer, as d'Indy still was when these pieces were written. But to go on doing it all one's life, as he has done, shows more industry than genius. His music always suggests something from another composer. Wagner, Franck, Ravel, Brahms and many others have been victims of his unconscious borrowings. He is not the unscrupulous master taking his own where he finds it, as Handel did. He is the man of talent trying on the second-hand mantles of many geniuses while waiting for his own to come to him.

Goldmark's "Im Fruehling," the closing piece, was not played with the attention to detail Mr Monteux and his men showed in most of the rest of the concert. It is certainly not among the greatest masterpieces, nor even the best work of its composer. But that is all the more reason for giving it special attention, since only a first-rate performance can bring out its qualities.

Next week Franck's "Psyche," with an assisting chorus trained by Mr Monteux, will be the main item on a program which also includes a new piece by Mr Gilbert, a suite drawn from his music for the Pilgrim Tercentenary, and the twice-postponed Handel double concerto in F major. There will be no soloist.

GLOBE-MAR. 25-

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has made ready the chorus in his projected performances, "in entirety," of Franck's "Psyche." The composer styled the piece a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Chorus"; but hitherto only orchestral fragments of it have been heard in Boston—not always in the prescribed succession. Now it will run in the seven divisions shaped by Franck, viz: "Psyche Asleep"; "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; "The Garden of Eros"; "Psyche and Eros"; "The Punishment"; "Lament of Psyche"; "Apotheosis." Another novel piece also stands on the programme—the Suite drawn by Mr. Henry Gilbert from his music to the "Pageant of Plymouth" last summer. It comprises: a Prelude and Norse Scene; French and Indian Pantomime; Indian Dance; Pestilence. For the classics, Händel's Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind-Choirs will be played.

From seven of Wagner's operas, Mr. Monteux has chosen the numbers to be played by the Symphony Orchestra at the concert for its Pension Fund tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall viz.:

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
Procession to the Minster and Introduction to Act III. from "Lohengrin."
Introduction to Act III., Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger."
Scene of the Rhine Maidens and the Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold."
Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre."
Forest Scene from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung."

In the fragments from "Das Rheingold" Mmes. Ferrabini, Littlefield and Tingley and Messrs. Bennett and Simonds will sing the parts

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM WALLENSTEIN'S CAMP, TO THE ORIENT

Mr. d'Indy's Triology Revived for Pleasure and Moral—Mr. Eichheim's "Impressions" from the Far East for Rare and Deep Sensation—Mr. de Gogorza Sings—Spring, Goldmark and Debussy

WHATEVER the ultra-moderns may have done or left undone upon music, they have made it a more economical and direct speech than it was in the generation immediately preceding theirs. Composers not a few, whose working life spans both, have felt this impulse, followed such practice. Recall Mr. d'Indy's "Poem of Sea and Shore" as played at the Symphony Concerts last December. So far as the hearer might infer, the piece achieved fully the composer's design, conveyed the subjective moods and the objective pictures kindling [illegible] him. Yet formally, he wrote a spare manner, by no means draining his motivs dry or filling measure after measure with prolix and semi-repetitious development. Directly Mr. d'Indy spoke his musical thoughts, set in his tonal imagery. Similarly with the harmonic vesture, the instrumental color. Nowhere was the one lush, the other merely decorative. Mr. d'Indy made his play of timbres vivid, significant; wasting not one. His harmonies spun background, carried imaginative implication, gave clear and instant reason for being. A like economy of means sufficed for modulations, transitions, the whole process, the whole expression of the music. Unlike our august Senate, Mr. d'Indy spoke his mind tersely and then was done. He neither surfeited nor wearied his hearers. Yet seemingly he fulfilled upon them his entire purpose.

Contrast this "Poem of Sea and Shore," dated 1921, with the Trilogy, "Wallenstein," written in the seventies and heard anew at the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon. Again Mr. d'Indy's design stood clear, since to be so was, from his earliest years and in many sorts of music, a quality intrinsic in his mind and workmanship. In the first division of the piece, he would suggest the many-sided turbulence of Wallenstein's Camp—the merry-making of the dance, the din of exuberant tumult, the mocking sport of the monk's sermon. Finally he would summon the grave and puissant presence of Wallenstein himself. In the second division, Mr. d'Indy would sing, out of "Die Piccolomini," the loves and fates of Max and Thekla—their high-hearted wills, their piteous end, the shadow of Wallenstein darkling upon them. In the final division, the might, almost the majesty, of death overtakes Wallenstein as well. He dies sombrely, portentiously in an heroic twilight of doom and mourning.

No less at the end of his twenties with "Wallenstein" as at the end of his sixties with "The Poem of Sea and Shore," Mr. d'Indy fulfills his aim. The tone-picturing of the camp characterizes graphically, animatedly, yet holds firm and keeps pace as fabric of music. Max and Thekla were young—and "cared." They dreamed dreams, they saw visions; they strove to overtake them. And Fate relentless tripped them and overcame. A music, now of tender, again of piteous, beauty sings and halloes them. Ominously begins the music of Wallenstein's death; tumult agitates it; doom haunts it; there is hint of awesome figure come to mournful end. Already Mr. d'Indy can write a pictorial, a poignant, a lofty music as will and need may bid. Yet what are his means and process? Often, as in the music of the camp, an excess of developed motiv and interwoven strand, coming perilously near delineative prolixity. Now and again, as in the music of Wallenstein's end, a thickness of harmony, stifling rather than deepening the composer's voice. Or, as in the music of Max and Thekla, a will to give many an instrumental voice a turn at the developing motivs.

Such over-laboring and exhaustive procedure is by no means Wagnerian imitation or Schumannesque exuberance such as recurs incidentally through "Wallenstein." Rather, it is the unquestioned method and manner of symphonic music forty years ago, in which every composer might exercise himself according to his ability and desire. A succeeding generation or two has made the speech of tones more direct, terse, lean, economical, and thereby—as often as not—more penetrating and illuminating. The present moderns strip—and write. Their immediate predecessors donned silks and velvets, like Wagner, and then took pen in hand. And Mr. d'Indy, as the comparison hints between his "Wallenstein" of 1880 and his "Poem" of 1921, has been one of many leaders in the good deed.

In this ultra-modern fashion, within the prescriptions of his purpose, Mr. Eichheim made the other engrossing and significant music of the afternoon—four "Oriental Impressions," Korean, Siamese, Japanese, Chinese. Since fortunate circumstance gained him freedom from daily routine and fixed abode, he has visited, revisited and yet again will return to the Orient, becoming at each sojourn more sensitive to the actual voice, the underlying suggestion of its music, perhaps more fascinated by them. Mr. Eichheim has been studious as well. Hearing the song of street-laborers in Seoul—happy city, as he notes, "where they work when it occurs to them to do so"—he jots it to paper. Listening to the sound of bells, as the wind waves them on a temple in Bangkok, his imagination stirs to a new, strange, almost wondrous sound; while gradually his mind fixes it. He can recall the mixed, muted, murmurous music of Japanese night. He has felt the titillating, nerve-stretching fascination of Chinese dins. Around such record circled a haze of impressions similarly received, retained and by sub-conscious process, gradually assorted. So stocked and stimulated, Mr. Eichheim, being both executive and composing musician, able to work at leisure and in thoroughness, was finally minded to make tonal sketches of the Orient, possible of performance by Occidental orchestras in Occidental concert-halls.

Of such were the four "Impressions" Friday, as the composer himself conducted them, with the Symphony Orchestra his instrument. Sometimes, he amplified the band, especially in the percussive quarter, with the voices that other composers of the hour occasionally summon—Mr. Grainger's Marimba, for example; Debussy's antique cymbals; the [illegible]ful xylophone; the obliging piano; as well but two tam-tams, waving as [illegible] smitten. Again, out of his own store as collector, Mr. Eichheim set in the orchestra, oriental drums, blocks, discs and the like—of a sort to turn Mahler, hearing suspiciously in the Elysian Fields, green with envy. Yet again he attenuated the orchestra, dismissing violoncellos and double basses, prescribing minutely the number of strings, yet keeping his music fine-textured withal.

In his procedure, Mr. Eichheim [illegible] now and then to transfer to his Occidental voices as exact a transcript as he could of the Oriental music recorded or remembered. As often, he would achieve by the Bostonian orchestra the blend of musical and unmusical, that drifted on the night in Tokio; that jangled in villages; that th

---

TRANS. MAR 25

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

His Oriental Sketches Create Profound Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

NEXT Sunday afternoon, for the first time since the end of the war, the Symphony Orchestra returns to a full-fledged "Wagner Concert"—that is to a concert of fragments from his operas and music dramas. Of course, such a procession of excerpts from "The Flying Dutchman" through "Götterdämmerung" mocks the composer's purpose. He wrote his music—a few symphonic pieces aside—for the theatre and for no other place. There and there only is it full and free voiced. Yet for it—in Boston—there is no other place, no other way than the concert-hall. Thirty-three years ago this spring, the company of the Metropolitan Opera House (as it then was) migrated to the Boston Theatre and there twice sung and acted the music-dramas of "The Ring." Since that distant day, this town has not heard the four operas in sequence—a record for a "capital of music" at which any petty city of Central Europe would smile and sneer. Through a whole generation, "Das Rheingold" has never come to Bostonian stage. No wonder that Mr. Monteux has set two scenes from it—the first and the last—upon his programme for next Sunday. If we may not see the Rhine Maidens guarding their gold from Alberich, at least we shall hear them. In the music—the more important place—if not on the stage, the Rainbow Bridge will span the sky and the Gods cross into the new-reared Valhalla.

"Die Walküre" has fared better in Boston; visiting opera companies have kept it occasional piece. Once and again, twenty years back, the visitors also hazarded "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung"; but either would be as strange nowadays upon Bostonian stage as "Das Rheingold" itself. "Tristan," "Parsifal," "Die Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," if not Tannhäuser," home-keeping Bostonians may still recall as actual operas of the theatre and not in "symphonic fragments" of the concert-hall. None the less, probably no city in Europe or in America, of the size and the pretension of Boston, has so seldom heard Wagner's operas as such. With Shakspeare, he shares the indifference of our public of the theatre.

With reason, in such circumstance, do the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra arrange an annual "Wagner Concert," however much they may know, out of experience in the theatre, that such playing of his music—overtures and preludes aside—is Wagner attenuated. With reason, also, does a sustaining public give sign at the box-office in Symphony Hall of its wakening anticipation. The elders in it may supplement the music with their memories of the stage; the youngsters, if they have a bit of imagination and background may frame their own visions of the theatre. Fortunately for both, conductors like Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux, are men of music-drama as well as of symphonic pieces. Their instinct and experience of the opera house pulses through their orchestra, stirs through the tunnel of tone that is Symphony Hall. And the power and the beauty of Wagner's music rest dimless, though no lights of the stage shine upon it. If enough Bostonians keep appetite for the barmecide feasts (relatively) of "Wagner Concerts," why should not enough more, added to them, somehow, some day restore Wagner to the Opera House that month after month and year after year mocks its own empty existence? For no reason at all, except human inertia and the like content with things as they are. Suppose the Metropolitan Company should bring the four "Ring Operas" thither, as it may in some fortunate future. A penny then for Mr. Monteux's fragments—Valkyrs' Ride, Forest Scene, Funeral Music Rhinegold and Rainbow Bridge. Meanwhile the more eager the audience next Sunday the better for that forlorn hope—and for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

Mr. Eichheim's Orient

In general when the Occidental composer turns his face towards the East—and of late he has done so with increasing frequency—he has the choice of two procedures. Either he may, out of his fertile fancy, invent themes and harmonies of Oriental flavor, or he may avail himself of actual Eastern melodies, transcribed by some scholar or adventurer. More fortunate is Mr. Henry Eichheim, whose "Oriental Impressions" will be heard for the first time in his "home-city" at the Symphony Concerts of this week. Twice a traveller in the countries of Asia, Mr. Eichheim has gone, note-book in hand, into temples, tea-houses and theatres, along city squares and country byways, jotting down snatches of song, of instrumental melody, or again the haunting tones of temple-bells. From these themes, now pungently characteristic, now of rare and distinguished beauty, he has fashioned music at once literal and suggestive. To him the Orient has been less an exotic and curious panorama, a medley of strange sights and sounds, than a land rich in meaning, charged with poetry. A musician of learning and resource, a composer of indisputable skill, he has contrived through the medium of tones so to record his impressions that they may be shared and enjoyed by any who may hear his curious music with open ears and answering imagination.

First written for piano, and afterwards scored for small orchestra, four of these pieces were played with notable success at the Berkshire Festival of last autumn. Since that time Mr. Eichheim has composed two more, one based on Korean, the other on Siamese, themes. In November four of the six were heard at Æolian Hall in New York, with Mme. Gautier as auxiliary singer. Three of the set have since come to performance in Philadelphia, and last month Mr. Barrère's "Little Symphony" Orchestra played all but one of them at a concert at the Hotel Ambassador in New York.

The four numbers of tomorrow and Saturday in Boston have been re-scored for an ampler orchestra and in this form they will now be heard for the first time. In making the new instrumentation Mr. Eichheim has displayed commendable temperance and restraint. He has avoided, first of all, any instrument or group of instruments at odds with his coloristic and atmospheric scheme. In one number—"Japanese Nocturne"—some use is made of a bass clarinet; otherwise the clarinets, too warm and [illegible] tone to suit the composer's purpose, are omitted entirely. The remaining wood-wind instruments are employed singly or in pairs. The four horns are used sparingly; the trumpets, trombones and tuba are altogether banished. There is a large array of Orientally suggestive pulsatile instruments—large and small bells, cymbals ancient and modern, Chinese drums and wooden block, tam-tams, xylophone and marimba—but no tympani. Two harps, piano and the full string band complete the list.

Besides the "Japanese Nocturne" the pieces to be played are three sketches entitled respectively "Chinese," "Siamese" and "Korean." The motivs upon which the Nocturne is based were heard in various cities of Japan, and in the order of appearance consist of a tune played by blind masseurs, the piping of food-vendors, the playing of a Koto, and a prayer chanted by an old man who beat the while upon a small wooden bell. In Bangkok, in the Emerald-Buddha Temple of the King of Siam, hang four bells, sounded by the swaying breeze. Mr. Eichheim's "Siamese Sketch" begins with these tones (C, F, G, B); and after this motiv comes the song of a female peddlar. Then is heard the melody chanted by a Buddhist priest of the Temple—a theme of five whole tones. The racket of a native theatre follows, and in succession come the music of a street-musician playing upon the Ekeh and the melody of a street-singer. A reference to the temple-bells brings the end.

The curious din of percussion instruments heard in a theatre begins the "Chinese Sketch." This clamor gives way to the tune of a tea-house fiddler, followed in turn by the music of a street procession in Shanghai. The scene changes to a Buddhist temple; bells sound, cymbals clash and a priest mumbles his prayers. To conclude, comes street music from Peking, gradually dying away until only a single instrument is heard. A phrase of strange beauty, sung by a street laborer in Seoul, forms the basis of the Korean memories. This melody is first played by the English horn, and against it the flute plays the tune of a native musician. Motivs from a Korean theatre are woven into the tonal fabric, and this impression ends with the love-song of a Geisha girl. The curious may find in the February issue of the magazine "Asia" Mr. Eichheim's photograph of the little girl—she was but fourteen—from whose lips he heard this melody.

W. S. S.

Loeffler—for Praise and Blame

A week ago today, the Boston Orchestra and Mr. McCormack carried to New York Mr. Loeffler's three Irish Fantasias. In Carnegie Hall, as in Symphony Hall, the new pieces were heard with lively interest and loud applause. The reviewers, no less expectant than the audience, similarly departed to praise. For example of them, Mr. Aldrich writing in The Times, notes "the discrimination and reserve" with which the composer has assimilated "the Irish musical idiom" to his purposes, and proceeds:

> Mr. Loeffler has found a richly expressive and characteristic musical investment for each of these poems. He has been peculiarly successful in evoking the mood of each in music that shows a strong individual character and fecundity of invention, music that is unmistakably his own; that has picturesque and graphic touches, but is chiefly concerned with the spirit rather than with the descriptive letter; and that is developed with a consummate musicianship. He has never written for orchestra with more consummate skill, flexibility and precision of touch, with more clarity of glowing beauty of color. He has not been so "modern" as to neglect the voice for the orchestra. His vocal line is truly vocal and offers something that so great an artist as Mr. McCormack can lift to a plane of sustained interest, can make characteristically expressive, and in the prophetic song raise to a pitch of noble and passionate eloquence.

The dissenting voice is Mr. Taylor's lifted in The World; yet the dissent is in measure, qualified. Says he:

> Something that is in the poems is wanting in the music. Loeffler has overset them, for one thing. He is happiest when he is conveying subtleties, and these poems are simple. No word in them has escaped his sophisticated scrutiny, yet in the very act of catching every syllable and sentence that is characteristically Celtic, he has lost the overtones, the mood that is implicit in every one of the poems, yet is never expressed in them—the immense, melancholy humor of the Irish soul. . . . His music is Irish enough; but it is too Irish. It is all the Ireland of reels and bagpipes, never the Ireland of "Would God I were the Tender Apple Blossom." The three songs lack the big simplicity of greatness.
>
> For this Mr. Loeffler's orchestration is partly responsible. It is too colorful, too kaleidoscopic, too infernally clever. It lets nothing go by implication, stepping in officiously to imitate everything that the hearer would rather imagine for himself. . . . This sort of thing is fascinating, but it is not creative imagination, and it is not music. The thoughts of the poems are peasants' thoughts, simple, humble, and beautiful; but the orchestra is that of Baudelaire. It is beautiful music, nevertheless, however far it may fall short of perfection.

TRANS. MAR. 23.

Mr. Monteux has finally made ready the chorus for his projected performances, "in entirety," of Franck's "Psyche." Accordingly, they will make the major part of the Symphony Concerts of next week. The composer styled the piece a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Chorus"; but hitherto only orchestral fragments of it have been heard in Boston—not always in the prescribed succession. Now it will run in the seven divisions shaped by Franck, viz: "Psyche Asleep"; "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; "The Garden of Eros"; "Psyche and Eros"; "The Punishment"; "Lament of Psyche"; "Apotheosis." Another novel piece also stands on the programme—the Suite drawn by Mr. Henry Gilbert from his music to the "Pageant of Plymouth" last summer. It comprises: a Prelude and Norse Scene; French and Indian Pantomime; Indian Dance; Pestilence. For the classics, Händel's Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind-Choirs will be played.

TRANS. MAR 24

[87]

DE GORGOZA IS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY

Nineteenth Concert of Season One of Most Interesting Programs of Winter

The nineteenth program of the Symphony season yesterday was one of the most interesting of the Winter. There were many points of interest because of the fact that the program offered both a splendid soloist and a number conducted by the composer.

In the absence of a symphony, Mr. Monteux chose the Vincent D'Indy "Wallenstein" trilogy (after the dramatic poem by Schiller). It is big and compelling in theme and treatment and was so thoroughly enjoyed by the audience that after several recalls, Mr. Monteux finally called on the entire orchestra to acknowledge the unusually spontaneous burst of applause.

Mr. Eichheim, composer of "Oriental Impressions for Orchestra," was on the spot to conduct his work and by so doing, assured the hearers that not the slightest detail was lost. The impressions consisted of four sketches of which the Siamese was by far the most attractive. The things are light in touch, but present a vivid picture of the night sounds of that corner of the world.

The peak of the program, however, was the appearance of Emilio de Gorgoza, who is too thoroughly established in the affections of Boston to need further comment. Of his two numbers, the Handel "Where'er You Walk" was captivating in its old-fashioned simplicity. A more dramatic note entered in when he sang the "Canto del Presidiario," a splendid song by Alvarez.

ALL WAGNER PROGRAM TOMORROW

At the second and last pension fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in selections from the principal music dramas of Richard Wagner. From the four dramas of the "Ring of the Nibelungs," selections of considerable importance will be played. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried" the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung" the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene, and the principal portion of the closing scene will be played.

AMER. MAR. 25.

WAGNER CONCERT

At the second and last pension fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30, Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in selections from the principal music dramas of Richard Wagner. The parts of the three Rhine daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. The baritone parts of Alberich and others will be taken by Charles H. Bennett, and the tenor parts of Loge and Froh by Raymond Simonds.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

Cesar Franck's symphony poem, "Psyche," written for orchestra and mixed chorus, will be performed for the first time here in its entirety when Pierre Monteux conducts it at the 20th pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 31 and April 1. The chorus to be heard in this work has been especially trained for the purpose by Mr. Monteux.

TRAV MAR 25

Symphony Plays Oriental Music

Oriental music written by Henry Eicheim, Boston composer, is the striking novelty on this week's Symphony program. Mr. Eicheim, who formerly played among the violinists in the Symphony Orchestra, conducted the work yesterday. He was roundly applauded.

Korean, Siamese and Chinese sketches, together with a Japanese nocturne, make up these piquant impressions of the Far East. The themes were collected by the composer during his two visits to the Orient. In the new realm of tone pictures music these "Oriental Impressions" will rank high.

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular baritone, is this week's soloist. The symphonic feature of the program is D'Indy's impressive "Wallenstein" trilogy.

ADVT. MAR. 25

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS HIS ORIENTAL PIECES

Boston Composer's Work Played by Symphony

Four "Oriental Impressions," by Henry Eichheim of Boston, were the only novelties on yesterday's Symphony concert program. These pieces have been played in public in versions for piano and for small orchestra, but yesterday's was the first performance of the music in its present form. Mr Eichheim, who conducted his own pieces, was cordially applauded, both by the audience and by the orchestra, in which he formerly played for over 20 years.

These sketches are based on musical and other noises heard and noted down by the composer in the Orient. They are carefully scored, especially in the percussion section of the orchestra, so as to reproduce faithfully the timber of temple gongs and so forth. All that painstaking intelligence, backed by a subtle imagination, can do in reproducing the atmosphere of an Oriental city in Occidental music Mr Eichheim has done. The result is original, thoroughly entertaining music, infinitely above the sort of Chinese pieces produced by composers who have never been nearer to China than Niagara Falls or Monte Carlo.

The soloist was Emilio de Gogorza, who sang two sharply contrasted numbers, Handel's "Where'er You Walk," and a rather cheaply operatic "Prisoner's Song" by Alvarez, with his familiar suavely emotional manner. He gave a competent performance of Handel's aria, one of his finest; and seemed more thoroughly at home in the Spanish piece with its hints of "Pagliacci" disguised by Castilian rhythms. The applause was enthusiastic.

The concert began with d'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, an early work which now seems outmoded and rather dull. To "play the sedulous ape" may be good for the apprentice composer, as d'Indy still was when these pieces were written. But to go on doing it all one's life, as he has done, shows more industry than genius. His music always suggests something from another composer. Wagner, Franck, Ravel, Brahms and many others have been victims of his unconscious borrowings. He is not the unscrupulous master taking his own where he finds it, as Handel did. He is the man of talent trying on the second-hand mantles of many geniuses while waiting for his own to come to him.

Goldmark's "Im Fruehling," the closing piece, was not played with the attention to detail Mr Monteux and his men showed in most of the rest of the concert. It is certainly not among the greatest masterpieces, nor even the best work of its composer. But that is all the more reason for giving it special attention, since only a first-rate performance can bring out its qualities.

Next week Franck's "Psyche," with an assisting chorus trained by Mr Monteux, will be the main item on a program which also includes a new piece by Mr Gilbert, a suite drawn from his music for the Pilgrim Tercentenary, and the twice-postponed Handel double concerto in F major. There will be no soloist.

GLOBE-MAR. 25-

FOR the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has made ready the chorus in his projected performances, "in entirety," of Franck's "Psyche." The composer styled the piece a "Symphonic Poem for Orchestra and Chorus"; but hitherto only orchestral fragments of it have been heard in Boston—not always in the prescribed succession. Now it will run in the seven divisions shaped by Franck, viz: "Psyche Asleep"; "Psyche Borne Away by the Zephyrs"; "The Garden of Eros"; "Psyche and Eros"; "The Punishment"; "Lament of Psyche"; "Apotheosis." Another novel piece also stands on the programme—the Suite drawn by Mr. Henry Gilbert from his music to the "Pageant of Plymouth" last summer. It comprises: a Prelude and Norse Scene; French and Indian Pantomime; Indian Dance; Pestilence. For the classics, Händel's Concerto in F major for Strings and two Wind-Choirs will be played.

From seven of Wagner's operas, Mr. Monteux has chosen the numbers to be played by the Symphony Orchestra at the concert for its Pension Fund tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall viz.:

- Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."
- Procession to the Minster and Introduction to Act III. from "Lohengrin."
- Introduction to Act III., Apprentices' Dance, Homage to Sachs from "Die Meistersinger."
- Scene of the Rhine Maidens and the Entrance of the Gods Into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold."
- Ride of the Valkyrs from "Die Walküre."
- Forest Scene from "Siegfried."
- Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Götterdämmerung."

In the fragments from "Das Rheingold Mmes. Ferrabini, Littlefield and Tingle and Messrs. Bennett and Simonds wi sing the parts

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM WALLENSTEIN'S CAMP, TO THE ORIENT

Mr. d'Indy's Triology Revived for Pleasure and Moral—Mr. Eichheim's "Impressions" from the Far East for Rare and Deep Sensation—Mr. de Gogorza Sings—Spring, Goldmark and Debussy

WHATEVER the ultra-moderns may have done or left undone upon music, they have made it a more economical and direct speech than it was in the generation immediately preceding theirs. Composers not a few, whose working life spans both, have felt this impulse, followed such practice. Recall Mr. d'Indy's "Poem of Sea and Shore" as played at the Symphony Concerts last December. So far as the hearer might infer, the piece achieved fully the composer's design, conveyed the subjective moods and the objective picturings kindling him. Yet formally, he wrote a spare music, by no means draining his motivs dry or filling measure after measure with prolix and semi-repetitious development. Directly Mr. d'Indy spoke his musical thoughts, set in his tonal imagery. Similarly with the harmonic vesture, the instrumental color. Nowhere was the one lush, the other merely decorative. Mr. d'Indy made his play of timbres vivid, significant; wasting not one. His harmonies spun background, carried imaginative implication, gave clear and instant reason for being. A like economy of means sufficed for modulations, transitions, the whole process, the whole expression of the music. Unlike our august Senate, Mr. d'Indy spoke his mind tersely and then was done. He neither surfeited nor wearied his hearers. Yet seemingly he fulfilled upon them his entire purpose.

Contrast this "Poem of Sea and Shore," dated 1921, with the Trilogy, "Wallenstein," written in the seventies and heard anew at the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon. Again Mr. d'Indy's design stood clear, since to be so was, from his earliest years and in many sorts of music, a quality intrinsic in his mind and workmanship. In the first division of the piece, he would suggest the many-sided turbulence of Wallenstein's Camp—the merry-making of the dance, the din of exuberant tumult, the mocking sport of the monk's sermon. Finally he would summon the grave and puissant presence of Wallenstein himself. In the second division, Mr. d'Indy would sing, out of "Die Piccolomini," the loves and fates of Max and Thekla—their high-hearted wills, their piteous end, the shadow of Wallenstein darkling upon them. In the final division, the might, almost the majesty, of death overtakes Wallenstein as well. He dies sombrely, portentously in an heroic twilight of doom and mourning.

No less at the end of his twenties with "Wallenstein" as at the end of his sixties with "The Poem of Sea and Shore," Mr. d'Indy fulfills his aim. The tone-picturing of the camp characterizes graphically, animatedly, yet holds firm and keeps pace as fabric of music. Max and Thekla were young—and "cared." They dreamed dreams, they saw visions; they strode to overtake them. And Fate relentless tripped them and overcame. A music, now of tender, again of piteous, beauty sings and halloes them. Ominously begins the music of Wallenstein's death; tumult agitates it; doom haunts it; there is hint of awesome figure come to mournful end. Already Mr. d'Indy can write a pictorial, a poignant, a lofty music as will and need may bid. Yet what are his means and process? Often, as in the music of the camp, an excess of developed motiv and interwoven strand, coming perilously near delineative prolixity. Now and again, as in the music of Wallenstein's end, a thickness of harmony, stifling rather than deepening the composer's voice. Or, as in the music of Max and Thekla, a will to give many an instrumental voice a turn at the developing motivs.

Such over-laboring and exhaustive procedure is by no means Wagnerian imitation or Schumannesque exuberance such as recurs incidentally through "Wallenstein." Rather, it is the unquestioned method and manner of symphonic music forty years ago, in which every composer might exercise himself according to his ability and desire. A succeeding generation or two has made the speech of tones more direct, terse, lean, economical, and thereby—as often as not—more penetrating and illuding. The present moderns strip—and write. Their immediate predecessors donned silks and velvets, like Wagner, and then took pen in hand. And Mr. d'Indy, as the comparison hints between his "Wallenstein" of 1880 and his "Poem" of 1920, has been one of many leaders in the good deed.

In this ultra-modern fashion, within the prescriptions of his purpose, Mr. Eichheim made the other engrossing and significant music of the afternoon—four "Oriental Impressions," Korean, Siamese, Japanese, Chinese. Since fortunate circumstance gained him freedom from daily routine and fixed abode, he has visited, revisited and yet again will return to the Orient, becoming at each sojourn more sensitive to the actual voice, the underlying suggestion of its music, perhaps more fascinated by them. Mr. Eichheim has been studious as well. Hearing the song of street-laborers in Seoul—happy city, as he notes, "where they work when it occurs to them to do so"—he jots it to paper. Listening to the sound of bells, as the wind waves them on a temple in Bangkok, his imagination stirs to a new, strange, almost wondrous sound; while gradually his mind fixes it. He can recall the mixed, muted, murmurous music of Japanese night. He has felt the titillating, nerve-stretching fascination of Chinese dins. Around such record circled a haze of impressions similarly received, retained, and by sub-conscious process, gradually assorted. So stocked and stimulated, Mr. Eichheim, being both executive and composing musician, able to work at leisure and in thoroughness, was finally minded to make tonal sketches of the Orient, possible of performance by Occidental orchestras in Occidental concert-halls.

Of such were the four "Impressions" of Friday, as the composer himself conducted them, with the Symphony Orchestra for his instrument. Sometimes, he amplified the band, especially in the percussive manner, with the voices that other ques composers of the hour occasionally mon—Mr. Grainger's Marimba, for example; Debussy's antique cymbals; the useful xylophone; the obliging piano; not but two tam-tams, waving as well smitten. Again, out of his own collector, Mr. Eichheim set in the orchestra, oriental drums, blocks, discs and like—of a sort to turn Mahler, hearing piciously in the Elysian Fields, green with envy. Yet again he attenuated the orchestra, dismissing violoncellos and double basses, prescribing minutely the number of strings, yet keeping his music tured withal.

In his procedure, Mr. Eichheim now and then to transfer to his Occidental voices as exact a transcript as he of the Oriental music recorded or bered. As often, he would achieve Bostonian orchestra the blend of musical and unmusical, that drifted the night in Tokio; that jangled over nese hills and villages; that thre

the streets of and theatres of
of these Oriental gestions, he would own, as Debussy did evening in Granada
Iberian days, the
Here and there, mo
it in a perceptibly D

More to the point
Mr. Eichheim's music
but hardly the attuned was the satisfaction of curi in the more literal transcri musician's ear, the actual mu and Siam, of Japan and Ch discovered and sounding, what not open to Occidental compo cultivation and adaptation of monies, timbres, progressions, gestions? As Rimsky worked sic of a Nearer East, as works from the tunes of Hun sies, as Mr. Gilbert transmogri of the American Indians, so m ers of the future make these the Orient" (as an older no might have called them) fructif of Western art in tones. Mr. Eichhei ure of yesterday Mr. Eichhein ing, has pointed the way, set t

Second satisfaction, say, wa covery of a new, strange, penetr sessing beauty in some of thes sounds. The sheer loveliness of bells at the beginning and the Siamese "sketch" transported turned the heart to water. Balz in search of the perfect tone m these bells nigh halted. Once such rare and sudden beauty ex
the Japanese Nocturne, tingled th love-song of the Geisha of Se occasional measures, these fitti illuded and intoxicated not mer they were strange and exotic; b in them dwelt a magic not ye into the music of the West. Ak needle-like intensity of some of t tal music, not as a shrillness to ear, but as a voice to cut sharp into the imagination in expressio fied, concentrated mood. Of suc
Geisha's wistful tune, the street-notes in Bangkok, one or another of the sound-laden Japanese ni

More ordinarily, came the satis
Mr. Eichheim's tone-picturing o
Siamese temple and theatre, of Chinese street. Other qualities novel purpose, the novel means, th suggestion, allured and exhilarate ly came the satisfaction of the tion, the skill, the receiving sensi transmitting ingenuity with w composer has written his own mu
East in ultra-modern idiom of t
"An experience," said the pious she came away from the missiona
ing. "An experience" also, and in missioning, was Mr. Eichheim's yesterday.

For interlude, Mr. de Gogorza and sincerely applauded sang tw while to round out the concert, th tra—like Mr. Monteux on mettle th the afternoon—played Goldmark's
"In the Spring." (Usually, when to hearing, a wintry storm beat ofing. Yesterday was exceptionally The baritone sang an air from operatic oratorio of "Semele"—th lar "Where'er You Walk"—with h tones, his subtle undulation of the line, his linked and shapen phras sense of ancient serenities—all at Turning then to an ill-orchestrated of the "Convict's Song of Alvarez" by many an ear from his recita de Gogorza once more affirmed his abilities as dramatizing and charact singer, who measures as well a claims and thereby prevails. Whe unthinking Signor Ixe or Herr Zed have shouted, he etched deep in da dle tones, the prisoner's carking, de memories. As for Goldmark's Ov no doubt it is a jocund, joyous, full-bodied, full-blooded piece—paean as it were to a flamboyant spring. It is possible to prefer th grays, the tender greens, the wist and the sweet content of De "Rondes de Printemps." Why shou
Mr. Monteux revive them?

H. T. P.

TRANS. MAR 25

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

His Oriental Sketche Create Profound Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

A program of unusual inter was given by the Boston Symph Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, cond tor, yesterday afternoon in S phony Hall; the symphonic tri of Vincent d'Indy, after Schill
"Wallenstein"; Henry Eichhei
"Oriental Impressions" for orch tra, performed for the first tim their present form, the comp conducting; Handel's aria "Whe
You W from "Semele" song of Alvarez, "Canto del Pre dario," interpreted by Emilio Gogorza, and Goldmark's overt
"In th

streets of Seoul or from the temples and theatres of Bangkok. Once more, out of these Oriental backgrounds and suggestions, he would write a music of his own, as Debussy did out of the sounds of evening in Granada, out of the sights of Iberian days, the odors of Iberian nights. Here and there, moreover, he has written it in a perceptibly Debussyan manner.

More to the point is the impression of Mr. Eichheim's music upon the interested, but hardly the attuned ear. First, say, was the satisfaction of curiosity. So then, in the more literal transcripts, sounds in musician's ear, the actual music of Korea and Siam, of Japan and China. And so discovered and sounding, what field does it not open to Occidental composers for the cultivation and adaptation of new harmonies, timbres, progressions, linear suggestions? As Rimsky worked from a music of a Nearer East, as Bartók now works from the tunes of Hungarian gypsies, as Mr. Gilbert transmogrifies dances of the American Indians, so may composers of the future make these "echoes of the Orient" (as an older nomenclature might have called them) fructify in terms of Western art in tones. In many a measure of yesterday Mr. Eichheim, pioneering, has pointed the way, set the pace.

Second satisfaction, say, was the discovery of a new, strange, penetrating, possessing beauty in some of these Oriental sounds. The sheer loveliness of the temple bells at the beginning and the end of the Siamese "sketch" transported the ear, turned the heart to water. Balzac's Prince in search of the perfect tone might with these bells nigh halted. Once and again such rare and sudden beauty exhaled from the Japanese Nocturne, tingled through the love-song of the Geisha of Seoul. These occasional measures, these flitting timbres illuded and intoxicated not merely because they were strange and exotic; but because in them dwelt a magic not yet conjured into the music of the West. Akin was the needle-like intensity of some of this Oriental music, not as a shrillness to pierce the ear, but as a voice to cut sharp and deep into the imagination in expression of rarefied, concentrated mood. Of such was the Geisha's wistful tune, the street-musician's notes in Bangkok, one or another murmur of the sound-laden Japanese night.

More ordinarily came the satisfaction of Mr. Eichheim's tone-picturing of remote Siamese temple and theatre, of confused Chinese street. Other qualities aside, the novel purpose, the novel means, the strange suggestion, allured and exhilarated. Finally came the satisfaction of the imagination, the skill, the receiving sensibility, the transmitting ingenuity with which the composer has written his own music of the East in ultra-modern idiom of the West. "An experience," said the pious lady as she came away from the missionary meeting. "An experience" also, and in æsthetic missioning, was Mr. Eichheim's music of yesterday.

For interlude, Mr. de Gogorza heartily and sincerely applauded sang two pieces; while to round out the concert, the orchestra—like Mr. Monteux on mettle throughout the afternoon—played Goldmark's Overture "In the Spring." (Usually when it comes to hearing, a wintry storm beats in the offing. Yesterday was exceptionally benign.) The baritone sang an air from Handel's operatic oratorio of "Semele"—the familiar "Where'er You Walk"—with his silken tones, his subtle undulation of the melodic line, his linked and shapen phrases, his sense of ancient serenities—all at fullest. Turning then to an ill-orchestrated version of the "Convict's Song of Alvarez" recalled by many an ear from his recitals, Mr. de Gogorza once more affirmed his signal abilities as dramatizing and characterizing singer, who measures as well as proclaims, and thereby prevails. Where the unthinking Signor Ixe or Herr Zed would have shouted, he etched deep in dark middle tones, the prisoner's carking, desperate memories. As for Goldmark's Overture, no doubt it is a jocund, joyous, songful, full-bodied, full-blooded piece—Semitic paean as it were to a flamboyant Semitic spring. It is possible to prefer the soft grays, the tender greens, the wistfulness and the sweet content of Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps." Why should not Mr. Monteux revive them?

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 25

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

His 'Oriental Sketches' Create Profound Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of unusual interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: the symphonic trilogy of Vincent d'Indy, after Schiller's "Wallenstein"; Henry Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" for orchestra, performed for the first time in their present form, the composer conducting; Handel's aria "Where'er You Walk," from "Semele," and the song of Alvarez, "Canto del Presidario," interpreted by Emilio de Gogorza, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

D'INDY'S TRAGIC MUSIC

TRANS. MAR. 25

D'Indy's music suggested by the dramatic poem of Schiller is now superlatively vivid and vigorous, as in the tone picture of Wallenstein's Camp, and now magnificently tragic. Once heard, the mysterious opening chords of the last movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," are not forgotten, nor is the conclusion, when these fate-ridden chords return, decked out with all the pomp and the sonority of the great orchestra, the utterance of a small soul. The second movement of the trilogy is perhaps the weakest, but here also the composer is truly and nobly in the tragic vein.

Mr. Monteux gave by far the finest performance of this trilogy that has been heard in Boston. The technical brilliancy of the playing aside, there was for the first time a complete realization of the composer's thought.

Eichheim's "Sketches"

Mr. Eichheim has had the ear and the courage to put down in a series of short and fascinating "sketches," free in form, that which he knows of the East. He knows a good deal. There are composers who buy an excursion ticket, hire a guide, walk through a temple and write a symphony about it. Mr. Eichheim, a dweller in Boston for lo, these many years, is not of this school. He has been enamoured of far countries. Of late years he has not only travelled but lived for extended periods in China, Japan, Siam and such lands. A musician with an exquisitely sensitive ear, he showed yesterday a masterly knowledge of the way in which to reproduce the sounds he had heard, and not only sounds, but the atmosphere of far-off lands.

He has not hesitated to employ native instruments when needed to secure his effects. His rythms, his droning melodies, his singularly skilful use of wind instruments and instruments of percussion for the sake of color as well as rythm—all these qualities mark a refreshing departure from the pseudo orientalism of our composers in big cities and seem even a more faithful approach to the Orient itself than many an approved masterpiece by a modern European.

Mr. De Gogorza sang with his wonted polish and fluency, and warmth of style. He had selected two strongly contrasted but notably beautiful airs.

POST - MAR. 26

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eichheim Charms with His Oriental Music and Instruments

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. D'Indy, "Wallenstein" Trilogy; Eichheim, Four Oriental Impressions (first performance, conducted by the composer); Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring." Mr. De Gogorza sang Handel's "Where'er you walk" from "Semele" and Canto del Presidiaro by Alvarez.

What joy it was, after the adventure of last week, to hear this superb orchestra with a conductor who is a veritable artist, mindful of the composers and the laws of beauty rather than of his own glory, the antipodes of any conductor that might be characterized as a sensation-monger.

Whatever may be said of d'Indy's later works, the music of his "Wallenstein" Trilogy cannot be dismissed as purely intellectual, cerebral. It is in turn riotously dramatic, expressive of love's ecstasy yet with a note of bodement as befits the story of Max and Thekla, strangely impressive in its portrayal of Wallenstein's tragedy and end. The music is intensely human in the first two sections; noble without austerity in the final movement. Never before were the strength, fire, passion of the trilogy so fully revealed. Never before did the opening measures of the last section assume so mysterious and so ominous grandeur.

There is pseudo-orientalism in music; what might be called Brummagem orientalism. After Victor Hugo's "Les Orientales" were published, it was long the fashion in France to write "oriental" music. Felicien David, who, a Saint-Simonist, went as far as Egypt, wrote his "Desert," in which he used Eastern themes, and afterward was so "oriental" in his music that Auber wished him to dismount from his camel. Even Cesar Franck in the early Forties wrote his song "L'Emir de Bengador." Years later Bourgault-Ducoudray went musically to Cambodia; Roussel to Cochin-China; Debussy, who had sojourned in Russia, heard attentively Javanese musicians at a Paris exhibition. Russians and Germans have been oriental, but have not gone beyond Persia. Two or three Americans have used Chinese themes. Puccini borrowed a couple of Japanese tunes for "Madama Butterfly."

But Mr. Eichheim, a musician of fine ear, with a knowledge of orchestral resources, having studied in Korea, Siam, Japan and China the music of temples, streets, laborers, tea-houses, theatres, attempted to reproduce what he had heard, without western sophistication. Fortunately, he has by nature taste and fancy. The result is a series of impressions in which the hearer shares with delight, for these impressions are not vague, and while there is realism in the music it is not distressingly photographic or a laborious striving after the grotesque. Mr. Eichheim employs some Eastern instruments that he brought with him, not merely to excite curiosity in the performance; they are essential. The Suite includes a Korean Sketch, a Siamese Sketch, a Japanese Nocturne and a Chinese Sketch. The various motives are often of a languorous and haunting beauty. Some of them may be said to have Oriental perfume as well as color, as the air played by a Siamese musician. Some bring to mind travelers' descriptions of services in temples of the brooding Buddha. The music throughout is interesting, often fascinating, and Mr. Eichheim has skilfully seen to it that the reproach of monotony in mood and color cannot be urged. He has had experience as a conductor. It was not surprising, therefore, that he led his force with understanding and authority and brought out effectively what he had to say. He and his music were most heartily applauded.

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. De Gogorza again, as singer and interpreter; to hear him sing faultlessly that ravishing air of Handel, the great melodist; to be moved by his dramatically emotional rendering of the song by Alvarez. Handel's air, however, does not need other instruments than the strings for which he wrote, and the orchestration of the accompaniment to the Canto del Presidiaro does not enhance the pathos, rage and despair of the melody. When we listen to Mr. De Gogorza we realise that song cannot, as some would have us believe, be numbered among the lost arts.

A brilliant performance of Goldmark's overture brought the end of a truly memorable concert. To paraphrase a line of Coleridge's, the spring came tumultuously up Goldmark's way. He could not have chosen for a motto: "Come, gentle Spring! ethereal Mildness! come."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras; Gilbert, Suite from Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant (first time in Boston); Franck, "Psyche," a symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus (first time in Boston as a whole).

D'INDY TO MONTEUX

M. Vincent d'Indy in a letter to Mr. Monteux, dated Paris, March 14, wrote as follows:

"I learn from Rabaud that you have been reappointed for two years at Boston. I congratulate the directors and subscribers of the Boston Symphony for having had the discernment to preserve at the head of their orchestra, the man that, in a word, reconstructed it in all respects and has raised it to an artistic level which few similar organisations can pretend to equal.

"Believe me, I cannot lose the remembrance . . . of the artistic enjoyment that your orchestra gave me."

HERALD - MAR. 25

New Composition by Boston Man at the Symphony

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon with Emilio de Gogorza soloist. The program was as follows:

D'Indy ...."Wallenstein" Trilogy
Eichheim ...."Oriental Impressions"
Handel.........Air "Wher'er You Walk," from "Semele"
Alvarez..........."Canto del Presidiario"
Goldmark.......Overture "In the Spring"

D'Indy's Wallenstein Trilogy is the work of early years, before the composer had attained that austerity and aloofness which, while commanding respect, somewhat alienate the average listener from his later works. Conceived on a large plan, yet logically carried out, the composition is filled with a wealth of beautiful detail. To be sure the influence of Wagner is to be felt here and there and more often than the voice of Wagner that of César Franck is heard. These are familiar reproaches. Nevertheless, stronger than these alien influences we feel the individuality of d'Indy himself in this music. He has never since written more touching measures than those allotted the Piccolomoni nor more imaginative music than the opening pages of "Wallenstein's Death." Mr. Monteux is naturally in sympathy with music of a dramatic and descriptive nature, distinguished for its fire and eloquence. Yet in spite of its dramatic force the interpretation never became coarse or over-emphasized. The music was allowed free speech and the personality of the conductor was never for an instant permitted to come between it and the auditors. Interpretations of this kind, while not calculated to appeal to the lovers of the sensational, must be a source of keen delight to genuine lovers of music.

Eichheim's "Oriental Impresions," conducted by the composer, were played for the first time. The composer has reproduced the sounds of the Orient with an almost photographic exactitude. Yet they can hardly be called impressions as they do not seem in any way to reflect his personality. They are as impersonal as a photograph and for this reason, although they astonish by their cleverness, they for the most part leave the hearer cold. Chabrier in his España reproduced the sounds of Spain, yet never for a moment do we lose the feeling that the music, in spite of its glowing color, is but the expression of the emotions of Chabrier himself, affected as they were by the atmosphere of that country of dance and song. Mr. Eichheim does not seem to have absorbed the music and spirit of the Far East and then to have given expression to it in terms of his own. Rather has he spent his energies in setting forth the details of Eastern music in the mater-of-fact manner of a report to a scientific society. There is no effort necessary on the part of the listener to exert his imagination and the East is robbed of that mystery which makes it such a never-ending source of interest. Yet there is much in this music to stimulate the imagination in quite another way. Mr. Eichheim's use of percussion instruments leads to interesting speculations as to the part which they are destined to play in the future development of the orchestra. Only one other composer, Percy Grainger, seems so far to have realized to any great extent the possibilities for new effects of color inherent in this group. To the majority of composers these instruments mean only noise, yet many new effects of a far different nature are obtainable from them. Our so-called modern orchestra is in reality of a comparatively few years' growth. Mr. Salzedo, the harpist, would introduce a large harp section. Mr. Grainger would increase the number and variety of the instruments of percussion. These innovations may yet become commonplace in the music of the future, adding vast new resources to our present comparatively limited means of expression. It is perhaps superfluous to add that these impressions are the work of a thoroughly skilled musician handling his medium with a sure hand. They gave evidence [illegible] to the audience.

Emilio de Gogorza was the soloist. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possess the real tradition of the proper interpretation of the music of the eighteenth century. His singing of Handel's Air from "Semele" was expressive without lapsing into sentimentality, that pitfall of many singers who attempt this music. Alvarez' song, in quite another vein, was given with the perfection of style and dramatic intensity for which Mr. de Gogorza is so justly noted. The orchestra, as usual, played brilliantly. In Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" it played the difficult rhythms and unnusual intervals with real virtuosity.

S. M.

Concert Calender

Sunday afternoon, March 26, in Symphony Hall—A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, in aid of its Pension Fund. The program, a Wagnerian one, is of unusual interest. The first part will consist of the Overture to the "Flying Dutchman," The Cathedral Procession and Introduction to the third act from "Lohengrin" and portions of the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The second part will be made up of selections from the "Ring." They will include the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and the introduction, entire first scene and the principal portions of the closing scene of "Das Rheingold." In this latter number the orchestra will be assisted by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia who will sing the parts of the Rhine daughters; Charles Bennett who will sing the part of Alberich; and Raymond Simonds who will sing the parts of Loge and Froh. The music of "Das Rheingold" is rarely heard in Boston and this presentation of it on Sunday afternoon should make the concert of particular interest. Mr. Monteux is no less at home in the music of the theater than in that of the concert room and the performance bids fair to be a memorable one.

MONITOR - MAR. 25

All-Wagner Bill at Symphony Hall Today

WHAT promises to be one of the most momentous symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon at Symphony Hall, when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present a program of selections from Wagner's music-dramas. The proceeds will be devoted to the pension fund of the orchestra.

The great cycle of "The Ring of the Nibelungs" will occupy the larger part of the program. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene and principal portion of the closing scene. The parts of the Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will also assist.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" are also on the program.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." A suite, which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant music, will also be performed for the first time. Handel's concerto string and wind instruments will open the program.

ADVER. MAR. 26.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 20th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." This score consists of the following episodes: "Psyche Asleep," "Psyche borne away by zephyrs," "Cupid's Gardens," "Psyche and Cupid," "The Punishment—Sufferings and Lamentations of Psyche," "Apotheosis." The chorus of female voices and tenors, which Franck uses in the latter part of the work, have been especially trained by Mr. Monteux. On the same program a suite which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his music written last summer for the Pilgrim Tercentenary pageant will be performed for the first time: Prelude and Norse scene—French and Indian Pantomime—Indian Dance—Pestilence. The concert will begin with Handel's Concerto in F major for string and two wind orchestras.

WAGNER CONCERT TODAY

One of the most important symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a program consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's music dramas. The net proceeds will be devoted to the standing pension fund for retired musicians of the orchestra.

the streets of Seoul or from the temples and theatres of Bangkok. Once more, out of these Oriental backgrounds and suggestions, he would write a music of his own; as Debussy did out of the sounds of evening in Granada, out of the sights of Iberian days, the odors of Iberian nights. Here and there, moreover, he has written it in a perceptibly Debussyan manner.

More to the point is the impression of Mr. Eichheim's music upon the interested, but hardly the attuned ear. First, say, was the satisfaction of curiosity. So then, in the more literal transcripts, sounds in musician's ear, the actual music of Korea and Siam, of Japan and China. And so discovered and sounding, what field does it not open to Occidental composers for the cultivation and adaptation of new harmonies, timbres, progressions, linear suggestions? As Rimsky worked from a music of a Nearer East, as Bartók now works from the tunes of Hungarian gypsies, as Mr. Gilbert transmogrifies dances of the American Indians, so may composers of the future make these "echoes of the Orient" (as an older nomenclature might have called them) fructify in terms of Western art in tones. In many a measure of yesterday Mr. Eichheim, pioneering, has pointed the way, set the pace.

Second satisfaction, say, was the discovery of a new, strange, penetrating, possessing beauty in some of these Oriental sounds. The sheer loveliness of the temple bells at the beginning and the end of the Siamese "sketch" transported the ear, turned the heart to water. Balzac's Prince in search of the perfect tone might with these bells nigh halted. Once and again such rare and sudden beauty exhaled from the Japanese Nocturne, tingled through the love-song of the Geisha of Seoul. These occasional measures, these fitting timbres illuded and intoxicated not merely because they were strange and exotic; but because in them dwelt a magic not yet conjured into the music of the West. Akin was the needle-like intensity of some of this Oriental music, not as a shrillness to pierce the ear, but as a voice to cut sharp and deep into the imagination in expression of rarefied, concentrated mood. Of such was the Geisha's wistful tune, the street-musician's notes in Bangkok, one or another murmur of the sound-laden Japanese night.

More ordinarily came the satisfaction of Mr. Eichheim's tone-picturing of remote Siamese temple and theatre, of confused Chinese street. Other qualities aside, the novel purpose, the novel means, the strange suggestion, allured and exhilarated. Finally came the satisfaction of the imagination, the skill, the receiving sensibility, the transmitting ingenuity with which the composer has written his own music of the East in ultra-modern idiom of the West. "An experience," said the pious lady as she came away from the missionary meeting. "An experience" also, and in æsthetic missioning, was Mr. Eichheim's music of yesterday.

For interlude, Mr. de Gogorza heartily and sincerely applauded sang two pieces; while to round out the concert, the orchestra—like Mr. Monteux on mettle throughout the afternoon—played Goldmark's Overture, "In the Spring." (Usually when it comes to hearing, a wintry storm beats in the offing. Yesterday was exceptionally benign.) The baritone sang an air from Handel's operatic oratorio of "Semele"—the familiar "Where'er You Walk"—with his silken tones, his subtle undulation of the melodic line, his linked and shapen phrases, his sense of ancient serenities—all at fullest. Turning then to an ill-orchestrated version of the "Convict's Song of Alvarez" recalled by many an ear from his recitals, Mr. de Gogorza once more affirmed his signal abilities as dramatizing and characterizing singer, who measures as well as proclaims, and thereby prevails. Where the unthinking Signor Ixe or Herr Zed would have shouted, he etched deep in dark middle tones, the prisoner's carking, desperate memories. As for Goldmark's Overture, no doubt it is a jocund, joyous, songful, full-bodied, full-blooded piece—Semitic paean as it were to a flamboyant Semitic spring. It is possible to prefer the soft grays, the tender greens, the wistfulness and the sweet content of Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps." Why should not Mr. Monteux revive them?

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. MAR. 25

EICHHEIM CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

His 'Oriental Sketches' Create Profound Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

A programme of unusual interest was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: the symphonic trilogy of Vincent d'Indy, after Schiller's "Wallenstein"; Henry Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" for orchestra, performed for the first time in their present form, the composer conducting; Handel's aria "Where'er You Walk," from "Semele," and the song of Alvarez, "Canto del Presidario," interpreted by Emilio de Gogorza, and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

D'INDY'S TRAGIC MUSIC

TRANS. MAR. 25

D'Indy's music suggested by the dramatic poem of Schiller is now superlatively vivid and vigorous, as in the tone picture of Wallenstein's Camp, and now magnificently tragic. Once heard, the mysterious opening chords of the last movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," are not forgotten, nor is the conclusion, when these fate-ridden chords return, decked out with all the pomp and the sonority of the great orchestra, the utterance of a small soul. The second movement of the trilogy is perhaps the weakest, but here also the composer is truly and nobly in the tragic vein.

Mr. Monteux gave by far the finest performance of this trilogy that has been heard in Boston. The technical brilliancy of the playing aside, there was for the first time a complete realization of the composer's thought.

Eichheim's "Sketches"

Mr. Eichheim has had the ear and the courage to put down in a series of short and fascinating "sketches," free in form, that which he knows of the East. He knows a good deal. There are composers who buy an excursion ticket, hire a guide, walk through a temple and write a symphony about it. Mr. Eichheim, a dweller in Boston for lo, these many years, is not of this school. He has been enamoured of far countries. Of late years he has not only travelled but lived for extended periods in China, Japan, Siam and such lands. A musician with an exquisitely sensitive ear, he showed yesterday a masterly knowledge of the way in which to reproduce the sounds he had heard, and not only sounds, but the atmosphere of far-off lands.

He has not hesitated to employ native instruments when needed to secure his effects. His rythms, his droning melodies, his singularly skilful use of wind instruments and instruments of percussion for the sake of color as well as rythm—all these qualities mark a refreshing departure from the pseudo orientalism of our composers in big cities and seem even a more faithful approach to the Orient itself than many an approved masterpiece by a modern European.

Mr. De Gogorza sang with his wonted polish and fluency, and warmth of style. He had selected two strongly contrasted but notably beautiful airs.

POST- MAR.26.

19TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Eichheim Charms with His Oriental Music and Instruments

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. D'Indy, "Wallenstein" Trilogy; Eichheim, Four Oriental Impressions (first performance, conducted by the composer); Goldmark, Overture, "In the Spring." Mr. De Gogorza sang Handel's "Where'er you walk" from "Semele" and Canto Presidiaro by Alvarez.

What joy it was, after the adventure of last week, to hear this superb orchestra with a conductor who is a veritable artist, "mindful of the composers and the laws of beauty rather than of his own glory, the antipodes of any conductor that might be characterized as a sensation-monger.

Whatever may be said of d'Indy's later works, the music of his "Wallenstein" Trilogy cannot be dismissed as purely intellectual, cerebral. It is in turn riotously dramatic, expressive of love's ecstasy yet with a note of bodement as befits the story of Max and Thekla, strangely impressive in its portrayal of Wallenstein's tragedy and end. The music is intensely human in the first two sections; noble without austerity in the final movement. Never before were the strength, fire, passion of the trilogy so fully revealed. Never before did the opening measures of the last section assume so mysterious and so ominous grandeur.

There is pseudo-orientalism in music; what might be called Brummagem orientalism. After Victor Hugo's "Les Orientales" were published, it was long the fashion in France to write "oriental" music. Felicien David, who, a Saint-Simonist, went as far as Egypt, wrote his "Desert," in which he used Eastern themes, and afterward was so "oriental" in his music that Auber wished him to dismount from his camel. Even Cesar Franck in the early Forties wrote his song "L'Emir de Bengador." Years later Bourgault-Ducoudray went musically to Cambodia; Roussel to Cochin-China; Debussy, who had sojourned in Russia, heard attentively Javanese musicians at a Paris exhibition. Russians and Germans have been oriental, but have not gone beyond Persia. Two or three Americans have used Chinese themes. Puccini borrowed a couple of Japanese tunes for "Madama Butterfly."

But Mr. Eichheim, a musician of fine ear, with a knowledge of orchestral resources, having studied in Korea, Siam, Japan and China the music of temples, streets, laborers, tea-houses, theatres, attempted to reproduce what he had heard, without western sophistication. Fortunately, he has by nature taste and fancy. The result is a series of impressions in which the hearer shares with delight, for these impressions are not vague, and while there is realism in the music it is not distressingly photographic or a laborious striving after the grotesque. Mr. Eichheim employs some Eastern instruments that he brought with him, not merely to excite curiosity in the performance; they are essential. The Suite includes a Korean Sketch, a Siamese Sketch, a Japanese Nocturne and a Chinese Sketch. The various motives are often of a languorous and haunting beauty. Some of them may be said to have Oriental perfume as well as color, as the air played by a Siamese musician. Some bring to mind travelers' descriptions of services in temples of the brooding Buddha. The music throughout is interesting, often fascinating, and Mr. Eichheim has skilfully seen to it that the reproach of monotony in mood and color cannot be urged. He has had experience as a conductor. It was not surprising, therefore, that he led his force with understanding and authority and brought out effectively what he had to say. He and his music were most heartily applauded.

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. De Gogorza again, as singer and interpreter; to hear him sing faultlessly that ravishing air of Handel, the great melodist; to be moved by his dramatically emotional rendering of the song by Alvarez. Handel's air, however, does not need other instruments than the strings for which he wrote, and the orchestration of the accompaniment to the Canto del Presidiaro does not enhance the pathos, rage and despair of the melody. When we listen to Mr. De Gogorza we realise that song cannot, as some would have us believe, be numbered among the lost arts.

A brilliant performance of Goldmark's overture brought the end of a truly memorable concert. To paraphrase a line of Coleridge's, the spring came tumultuously up Goldmark's way. He could not have chosen for a motto: "Come, gentle Spring! ethereal Mildness! come."

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras; Gilbert, Suite from Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant (first time in Boston); Franck, "Psyche," a symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus (first time in Boston as a whole).

D'INDY TO MONTEUX

M. Vincent d'Indy in a letter to Mr. Monteux, dated Paris, March 14, wrote as follows:

"I learn from Rabaud that you have been reappointed for two years at Boston. I congratulate the directors and subscribers of the Boston Symphony for having had the discernment to preserve at the head of their orchestra, the man that, in a word, reconstructed it in all respects and has raised it to an artistic level which few similar organizations can pretend to equal.

"Believe me, I cannot lose the remembrance . . . of the artistic enjoyment that your orchestra gave me."

HERALD - MAR. 25

New Composition by Boston Man at the Symphony

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon with Emilio de Gogorza soloist. The program was as follows:

D'Indy	"Wallenstein" Trilogy
Eichheim	"Oriental Impressions"
Handel	Air "Wher'er You Walk," from "Semele"
Alvarez	"Canto del Presidiario"
Goldmark	Overture "In the Spring"

D'Indy's Wallenstein Trilogy is the work of early years, before the composer had attained that austerity and aloofness which, while commanding respect, somewhat alienate the average listener from his later works. Conceived on a large plan, yet logically carried out, the composition is filled with a wealth of beautiful detail. To be sure the influence of Wagner is to be felt here and there and more often than the voice of Wagner that of César Franck is heard. These are familiar reproaches. Nevertheless, stronger than these alien influences we feel the individuality of d'Indy himself in this music. He has never since written more touching measures than those allotted the Piccolomoni nor more imaginative music than the opening pages of "Wallenstein's Death." Mr. Monteux is naturally in sympathy with music of a dramatic and descriptive nature, distinguished for its fire and eloquence. Yet in spite of its dramatic force the interpretation never became coarse or over-emphasized. The music was allowed free speech and the personality of the conductor was never for an instant permitted to come between it and the auditors. Interpretations of this kind, while not calculated to appeal to the lovers of the sensational, must be a source of keen delight to genuine lovers of music.

Eichheim's "Oriental Impresions," conducted by the composer, were played for the first time. The composer has reproduced the sounds of the Orient with an almost photographic exactitude. Yet they can hardly be called impressions as they do not seem in any way to reflect his personality. They are as impersonal as a photograph and for this reason, although they astonish by their cleverness, they for the most part leave the hearer cold. Chabrier in his España reproduced the sounds of Spain, yet never for a moment do we lose the feeling that the music, in spite of its glowing color, is but the expression of the emotions of Chabrier himself, affected as they were by the atmosphere of that country of dance and song. Mr. Eichheim does not seem to have absorbed the music and spirit of the Far East and then to have given expression to it in terms of his own. Rather has he spent his energies in setting forth the details of Eastern music in the mater-of-fact manner of a report to a scientific society. There is no effort necessary on the part of the listener to exert his imagination and the East is robbed of that mystery which makes it such a never-ending source of interest. Yet there is much in this music to stimulate the imagination in quite another way. Mr. Eichheim's use of percussion instruments leads to interesting speculations as to the part which they are destined to play in the future development of the orchestra. Only one other composer, Percy Grainger, seems so far to have realized to any great extent the possibilities for new effects of color inherent in this group. To the majority of composers these instruments mean only noise, yet many new effects of a far different nature are obtainable from them. Our so-called modern orchestra is in reality of a comparatively few years' growth. Mr. Salzedo, the harpist, would introduce a large harp section. Mr. Grainger would increase the number and variety of the instruments of percussion. These innovations may yet become commonplace in the music of the future, adding vast new resources to our present comparatively limited means of expression. It is perhaps superfluous to add that these impressions are the work of a thoroughly skilled musician handling his medium with a sure hand. They gave evident pleasure to the audience.

Emilio de Gogorza was the soloist. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possess the real tradition of the proper interpretation of the music of the eighteenth century. His singing of Handel's Air from "Semele" was expressive without lapsing into sentimentality, that pitfall of many singers who attempt this music. Alvarez' song, in quite another vein, was given with the perfection of style and dramatic intensity for which Mr. de Gogorza is so justly noted. The orchestra, as usual, played brilliantly. In Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" it played the difficult rhythms and unusual intervals with real virtuosity.

S. M.

Concert Calender

Sunday afternoon, March 26, in Symphony Hall—A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, in aid of its Pension Fund. The program, a Wagnerian one, is of unusual interest. The first part will consist of the Overture to the "Flying Dutchman," The Cathedral Procession and Introduction to the third act from "Lohengrin" and portions of the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The second part will be made up of selections from the "Ring." They will include the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the funeral music from "Götterdämmerung" and the introduction, entire first scene and the principal portions of the closing scene of "Das Rheingold." In this latter number the orchestra will be assisted by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia who will sing the parts of the Rhine daughters; Charles Bennett who will sing the part of Alberich; and Raymond Simonds who will sing the parts of Loge and Froh. The music of "Das Rheingold" is rarely heard in Boston and this presentation of it on Sunday afternoon should make the concert of particular interest. Mr. Monteux is no less at home in the music of the theater than in that of the concert room and the performance bids fair to be a memorable one.

MONITOR - MAR 25

All-Wagner Bill at Symphony Hall Today

WHAT promises to be one of the most momentous symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon at Symphony Hall, when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present a program of selections from Wagner's music-dramas. The proceeds will be devoted to the pension fund of the orchestra.

The great cycle of "The Ring of the Nibelungs" will occupy the larger part of the program. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene and principal portion of the closing scene. The parts of the Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will also assist.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" are also on the program.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." A suite, which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant music, will also be performed for the first time. Handel's concerto string and wind instruments will open the program.

ADVTSR. MAR. 26.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 20th pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." This score consists of the following episodes: "Psyche Asleep," "Psyche borne away by zephyrs," "Cupid's Gardens," "Psyche and Cupid," "The Punishment—Sufferings and Lamentations of Psyche," "Apotheosis." The chorus of female voices and tenors, which Franck uses in the latter part of the work, have been especially trained by Mr. Monteux. On the same program a suite which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his music written last summer for the Pilgrim Tercentenary pageant will be performed for the first time: Prelude and Norse scene—French and Indian Pantomime—Indian Dance—Pestilence. The concert will begin with Handel's Concerto in F major for string and two wind orchestras.

WAGNER CONCERT TODAY

One of the most important symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a program consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's music dramas. The net proceeds will be devoted to the standing pension fund for retired musicians of the orchestra.

The great cycle of four dramas, "The Ring of the Nibelungs," will occupy the larger part of the program, since Mr Monteux has chosen a portion from each drama. From "The Valkyrie" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried" the "Forest Murmurs"; from "Dusk of the Gods," the funeral music of Siegfried; from "Das Rheingold," the Introduction, entire first scene and the principal portion of the closing scene. Thus the music which describes the bottom of the Rhine, the conclave of the gods and their entrance over the rainbow into Valhalla, will be heard for the first time in many years in this city. The music of the three Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. The music of Alberich and others will be sung by Charles H. Bennett; that of Loge and Froh by Raymond Simonds.

On the first part of the program Mr. Monteux will conduct the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," and excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

HERALD-MAR.26

WAGNER PROGRAMME FOR PENSION FUND

This afternoon at Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a programme consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's music dramas, the net proceeds to be devoted to the standing Pension Fund for retired musicians of the Orchestra.

The great cycle of four dramas, "The Ring of the Nibelungs," will occupy the larger part of the programme, since Mr. Monteux has chosen a portion from each drama. From "Die Walkure," the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Forest Music" from "Gotterdammerung," the Funeral music of Siegfried; from "Das Rheingold," the Introduction, entire first scene, and the principal portion of the closing scene.

Thus the music which describes the bottom of the Rhine and that which describes the conclave of the gods and their entrance over the rainbow into Valhalla will be heard for the first time in many years in this city.

Twentieth Symphony Programme

At the 20th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 31 and April 1, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche."

POST-MAR.26.

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Wagner Music Performed With Voices

It has been proven long since that one of the most popular attractions that an orchestral concert can offer in this city is a Wagner programme. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting, gave the second of its annual concerts for its pension fund and the programme was of Wagner, with a notable addition which packed the hall: the addition of voice parts to the orchestra, and the inclusion on the programme of considerable excerpts from the four music dramas of "The Ring of the Nibelungs."

Following the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the music of the procession and the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin; the introduction to the last act and much of the final scene of "The Mastersingers," came the scene of the Rhine Maidens from the first act of "The Rheingold," with the voices; the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"; the "Forest Music" from "Siegfried," and the "Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdamerung."

The voice parts were taken by Mme. Ferrabini (Mrs. Jacchia), Laura Littlefield and Gertrude Tingley and Charles Bennet and Raymond Simonds for male singers. Thus there was auralized, as it were, the scene of an opera which has been too seldom performed in Boston—the bottom of the Rhine, the song of the maidens, the theft of the gold. In these pages, in other splendors and glories of the Wagnerian music-drama the orchestra played with a magnificent sonority and brilliancy of effect. At every opportunity there were outbursts of applause. Boston has not yet achieved its permanent opera house, but here, at least, was a foretaste of it.

POST-MAR.27.

BLESSED be Richard Wagner! He makes Symphony Hall a full house for a concert of his music and so enlarges the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchhestra. He puts that band to its mettle, so that it exceeds itself in a diversified and pervading eloquence. He warms Mr. Monteux become for the time operatic conductor, almost transforming concert-hall into theatre. He gives pleasure to the audience, holding it in rapt illusion, stirring it to fervors of applause. Through him, albeit by fragments, we hearers know again "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger"; the Valkyrs riding the skies; Siegfried thrilling to high emprise in the whirr of the wood; the Rhine-Maidens guarding the gold and lifting their song; the rainbow-bridge whereby gods may enter the new-reared Valhalla. [illegible] Wagner descended upon the concert of [illegible] Symphony Orchestra for its Pension [illegible] yesterday afternoon, and so at last, [illegible] time under the new régime, [illegible] so distinguishing itself and the conductor so fully in the vein; good to listen to the applause heaped at every opportunity on both; good, most of all, to watch and feel the spell that, even under the handicap of the concert-room, the Wagner of opera and music-drama may still work deep. In the name of all the gods at once—to use only that mild, yet collective Shakspearean oath, are we never again to have opera that is opera in Boston? Sign multiplies upon sign that here dwells a public eager for it. Yet no managerial hand turns to reap what seems a promising harvest. Off goes the Metropolitan Company to Atlanta—and Boston calls not. The Chicago Company cuts the East from its itinerary—and no Bostonian lifts beckoning finger. Yet where there is a will, as there clearly is among the public, there should also be a managerial way to gratify it. Inertia may masquerade too long as "watchful waiting."

Of old the Symphony Orchestra was on its mettle in these "Wagner Concerts" for its Pension Fund, and yesterday it renewed that fine tradition. As reconstituted after the secession of 1920, it has not yet traversed two seasons; yet personnel for personnel, and work for work, there is not a band in America to match it. In large part, it is an orchestra of younger men throughout it is an orchestra minded to do its best; more and more it becomes a responsive, sensitive instrument to Mr. Monteux; more and more it knows and feels itself; almost always it kindles to the music in hand; while in the operas of Wagner it is an old story that every player below the stage acts in degree with those upon it. The violins have seldom sounded with a richer beauty of pulsing, glowing tone than they brought yesterday to a fragment from the second act of "Lohengrin"—the advance of Elsa's wedding procession toward the minster. The violoncellos sang with Wagnerian depth and splendor through the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The basses sustained the iterated measures of the flow of the Rhine as though such task were their frequent employ. The wood-wind sang with Siegfried's bird, glistened with the gleams, whirred with the rustle of his forest. The horns ran the gamut from mellow musing to high proclamation. The whole brass choir rose and fell in the surge and break of Wagner's sonorities. A more manifold, a more plastic voice the orchestra has seldom seemed. At every [illegible], in euphonies, in the detail inset, in the gradient marshalled and measured, its tone praised its own ear and Mr. Monteux's. It hid skill in beauty; it clothed zest with power. An operatic orchestra might not be more responsive to the sensuousness drenching Wagner's music, to the nervous quiver endlessly whipping it.

No less, in degree, was the conductor enkindled. Give Mr. Monteux a music that he can visualize as upon the stage of a theatre; give him a music vibrant with rhythm, outspoken in song, teeming with harmonic and instrumental colors, characterizing, picturing, enforcing—the speech of scene, spectacle, drama—and intensively he will impart it. So he chose his fragments yesterday; so, one upon another, they quickened and warmed him. Yet in measure he is still "in process" as conductor of Wagner's music. Elsewhere in his days in the opera house lay his field. Not yet, for example, has he quite found the rhythm to which the Valkyrs speed across high heaven. Better he summons the stirrings of Siegfried the Hero to Brünnhilde fire-girt, than the quiver of leaf and light in the forest of noon. Yet when the listener recalls Mr. Monteux's first halting version of the apotheosis of the dead Siegfried and the tonal panoply of heroic proclamation and heroic mourning with which he now invests it, faith and future bound high. As it was, he summoned the spiritual mists, the sensuous glow, the ceremonial pomp that join threefold in the music of Elsa's minster. He missed little of the beauty that broods over the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger"—as though Wagner saw his Nuremberg tranquil, silvered, ruddied in the dawn, saw it and loved it, felt and spoke the poetry in this visioning, in the folk that living, singing, dreaming, within it were enfolded.

The tumult of the sea and of the Dutchman's tortured voyaging again sounded out of Mr. Monteux's version of Wagner's overture. With the depths of the Rhine, in the beginnings of "Das Rheingold," he was not less at one with picture and purport. The waters streamed through the tonal mists; gradually the tonal lights quivered and warmed across them; the final chord was radiant; the song of the Rhine-Maidens more lustrious than their gold. We of the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century properly count tone-picturing one of the arts of music in our time developed and enriched. Seventy-five years ago, Wagner wrote this preluding to "Das Rheingold." Yet how little has it faded. It was possible to wish Mr. Monteux and the orchestra more lambent color in the rainbow that leapt from Donner's hammer, a larger, majesty, a deeper serenity with that wondrous motiv of Valhalla. Yet, maybe, it is Wagner's music that the years are dimming. Or we listeners are such children of the eye that we must see the lights of a theatre-rainbow, behold the human simulacra—often unmajestic enough—of the processioning gods.

At least, too, there are singers in Boston capable of the voice-parts incidental to the fragments of "Das Rheingold." Mmes. Littlefield, Tingley and Ferrabini spoke songfully and in voices of blended color for the Rhine-maidens; Mr. Bennett was by no means characterless with Alberich's sneers and threatenings—all four withal through an orchestra now golden with the still, shining treasure, now black with the scheming, writhing, Nibelung. Mr. Monteux felt this music of contrast and character. And Wagner made it—made it as before he had made other music of the storm-tossed Dutchman; of Elsa silvery among the knights ;of Nuremberg's spirit and Nuremberg's mediaeval life; of Wotan's daughters, warrior-maids; of Siegfried the uprising hero and Siegfried in death transfigured. The world of romance—and one man, one concert had bounded it.

What's a "Model" Orchestral Programme for Musically Uneducated?

As a pastime for the musically inclined let us propose an experiment in programme making, with the particular purpose of selecting a "model" orchestral concert for an audience entirely unfamiliar with symphonic music. Programme making, it may be observed, is one of the tests of an orchestra conductor, and by no means as simple as some might suppose.

As a basis for the discussion the Sunday Journal asked Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to outline the programme he would consider best for this purpose. The question was put thus: "What music would you consider best adapted to interest an audience in a city which had never before heard a symphony orchestra, or an audience entirely composed of those to whom such music was new?" The famous French conductor smilingly consented, but preferred to put it in terms of types of music, with several appropriate examples of each type, rather than to limit himself to individual selections without opportunity for choice.

Mr. Monteux's ideal programme for this particular situation, he declares, would have four numbers, as follows:

1. A SYMPHONY.

(Choice from the following:)

Beethoven, No. 5, in C Minor.

Beethoven, No. 7, in A Major.

Schubert, No. 8, in B Minor (unfinished).

Tchaikovsky, No. 4, in F Minor.

Dvorak, No. 5, in E Minor ("From the New World").

2. A WAGNER NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Overture to "Tannhauser."

Overture to "Lohengrin."

Overture to "Rienzi."

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

3. MODERN FRENCH OR RUSSIAN NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

(As an alternative for this number Mr. Monteux suggests a piano concerto, with soloist.)

4. A "BRILLIANT" NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Liszt, Symphonic poem. Either "Les Preludes" or "Mazeppa."

Strauss, Symphonic poem. Either "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan."

Chabrier, "Spanish Rhapsody.

Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody.

Smetana, Overture, "The Bartered Bride."

Music lovers will study this list with interest. Some who have especial favorites may be tempted to wonder why these were not included, when several choices are offered for each number, but few will be likely to take exception to the outline as a whole. All of the selections are familiar to concert-goers, being frequently included in general programmes. Two of the modern pieces were given in the Boston orchestra's last Providence concert.

In making a programme a number of factors are to be kept in mind. In arranging a series, such as the Boston orchestra gives in Providence each season, due regard must be paid to providing variety from concert to concert. The principal number must represent not merely different composers, but different types of music. Mr. Monteux does not make his Providence programmes without looking over the records of previous concerts. For the different problem here presented—a concert for the musically uneducated—the ease with which the music may be understood is of course the determining factor. There are, however, other considerations.

There must be ample variety within the programme itself, with a fair representation of classic and modern. Different national types of music are to be recognized, and of course compositions in the same key should not follow each other, nor should any one key predominate.

Although it is not a fixed requirement such a programme would naturally begin with a symphony. One of the season's Providence concerts was given without one, a piano concerto being the programme's principal number, but in general one would hardly offer to such an audience as we are considering a symphonic concert minus the form of music which is most characteristic.

Either of the two Beethoven symphonies, listed first, would probably be chosen for such a programme by a majority of musicians. The fifth is perhaps the most familiar of all symphonic compositions, and is often called the "most human" of all Beethoven's works, reflecting individual struggle with fate and alternating hopes and fears. The seventh, nearly as well known, is light and romantic in character, filled with dance rhythms and indeed was described by Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance."

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, played here by Mr. Monteux's orchestra last December, was the composer's own favorite, and while it is characteristic of the author's brilliant methods of expression, is unique among his works for the humorous qualities of some of its movements. Dvorak's "From the New World" has many bewitching passages, and lives up to its title by the use of themes which may be recognized as taken from familiar negro melodies, "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" entering its first movement. Schubert's eighth or unfinished symphony consists of only two movements, and was for many years almost unknown, but for the last half century has been a favorite. Were this to be the choice for the first number the ideal programme would presumably carry a fifth selection, because of the unfinished symphony's brevity.

Mr. Monteux evidently believes that a beginner's introduction to orchestral music would not be complete without some representative number from Wagner, and in the four overtures listed has given ample opportunity for choice. The first two are the better known, while both "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman," the latter eminently brilliant and romantic, furnish chance for enough resonance to convince the tyro that he is at least getting his money's worth of sound.

In the last two divisions of Mr. Monteux's suggested programme the field for choice is obviously wide. A "modern" number, either French or Russian, can hardly be doubted a place. What this number should be is a matter of acquaintance and temperament. "The Afternoon of a Faun" has been both played and danced in Providence, and Mr. Monteux will undoubtedly forgive another's personal choice involved in the declaration that the Rimsky-Karsakoff "Caprice" is on the whole better adapted to the appreciation of the musically uneducated than Debussy's temperamental "Faun."

That every concert may well close with a "brilliant" number is almost axiomatic. Of those Mr. Monteux suggests all have their merits from the point of view of sending the audience away with a ringing in its ears and a tendency to whistle on its lips. (Though we have no doubt that this latter idea will seriously offend "serious" students of music.) Perhaps the "Don Juan" of Strauss would receive the vote of the majority for this purpose, although Liszt's "Mazeppa" is both brilliant and, in part, loudly descriptive.

Confirmed concert-goers may find it hard to put themselves in the mood necessary to answer the question which was asked of Mr. Monteux. The attempt to "imagine back" to the complete beginning of one's musical education is often difficult. For some it is impossible.

Mr. Monteux seems to have been able to bridge the chasm. He has been trained to do so. One may suggest that it is also his happy temperament to do so. The programme he outlined was shown to one Providence concert-goer, who commented:

"If it is a question of 'understanding' music in order to enjoy it, Mr. Monteux has answered the Sunday Journal's question perfectly. Given programme notes of any competence, not a normal human being could fail to 'understand' the programme he has outlined."

Which brings us to the question of programme notes. Some time we shall ask Mr. Monteux or some other authority what he thinks of those as they are commonly perpetrated.

PROV. JOURNAL - MAR.26

Wagner for the Pension Fund

On Sunday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert in aid of its pension fund. The program consisted entirely of selections from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner, as follows:

Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."
Procession into the Cathedral and Prelude to Act III from "Lohengrin."
Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices and Homage to Hans Sachs from the third act of the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg."
Ride of the Valkyries from the "Valkyries."
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried."
Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods."
Introduction, Scene 1 and Closing Scene from the "Rhine Gold."

The orchestra was assisted in the last number by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia, Charles Bennett and Raymond Simonds.

Programs for concerts of this character are usually arranged to attract a public far different from that of the usual symphony concert, yet that of yesterday afternoon could not fail to please persons of all classes. A concert of Wagnerian music is always of interest, particularly in a city deprived of performances of his works in the form in which they were intended to be heard. The selections played yesterday were, however, of unusual variety and interest. Interesting, too, were Mr. Monteux's conceptions of the music. Accustomed in past years to the routine and atmosphere of the opera house, he brought to them a dramatic intensity, a sense of the theater, which duly tempered to the limitations of a concert performance, gave them a more than usual brilliance.

They served to reveal another side of his many-sided musical nature and they furnished another proof, if still more, were necessary, of his sympathy with the music of many styles and schools. No German conductor could have read the selections from "Siegfried" or the "Dusk of the Gods" with a more complete understanding or could have played the other selections on the program with more warmth and spirit. The orchestra, in evident sympathy with its leader's spirit, played with a beauty of tone, a flexibility, and an enthusiasm unusual even in these latter days, in which it has regained its perfections of the past. Wagner in the concert room is most certainly not Wagner in the theater, yet those who will let their imaginations supply the effects of scenery and costume cannot fail to derive much pleasure from a concert performance of his music, particularly such a performance as that of yesterday. The singers of the afternoon performed their not too grateful task creditably. Costumed in conventional dress, it is difficult to give the illusion of a Rhine Maiden, of Alberich the dwarf, of the god Wotan; yet not seldom did they succeed in attaining this apparent impossibility. Mr. Bennett, in the several parts of Alberich, Donner and Wotan, sang with dramatic effect as did Mr. Simonds in the few phrases allotted to him. The Rhine Maidens were also satisfactory in their several parts.

S. M.

MONITOR - MAR 27

SUN
ss New York City
MAR 4 1922

Last Boston Concerts.

The latest work of Charles Martin Loeffler, a series of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra, will be performed from the manuscript at the Thursday evening concert of the season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, which will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 16 and 18. These pieces, based on Gaelic folk tunes, with texts by Yeats, will have their first performance in Boston during the coming week. The three to be played are: (1) "The Host of the Air," (2) "The Fiddler of Dooney," (3) "Caitilin Ni Villachain." Both at the Boston and New York concerts John McCormack will take the vocal part and will also sing two airs from the cantatas of Bach. Schubert's symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Russian Easter" will also be played at the evening concert.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close the season with Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in New York, and the first symphony of Brahms.

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF MAR 4 1922

Mr. Monteux will introduce at the last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York on March 16 and 18, the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler, a series of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra. This work, based on Gaelic folk tunes, with text by Yeats, will have its first performance in Boston next week. John McCormack will be the soloist in both cities.

FROM MAR 5 192
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The fifth and last concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, March 17. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, has chosen as the final symphony of the season the seventh by Schubert in C major, which many regard as the supreme achievement of the composer and which, from generation to generation, holds the highest place in the hearts of all who enjoy symphonic music. The distinguished soloist for this concert will be Emilio de Gogorza, the great baritone, who is of Spanish aristocratic descent.

FROM
TRIBUNE MAR 5 1922
NEW YORK CITY

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season will be given a week from Thursday evening, March 16, and Saturday afternoon, March 18.

ROM MAR 5 192
IMES
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DE GOGORZA, SOLOIST.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's Brooklyn series, which will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. The popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of Brooklyn, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio, "Semele," and in one of his finest Spanish songs, that by Alvarez, entitled "Canto del Presidiario." Pierre Monteux will open this program with the large-proportioned symphony in C major of Schubert. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

1922
NEW YORK CITY

which the Boston Symphony will [illegible] duce here on March 16 at Carnegie [illegible] are composed to texts by W. B. [illegible] and utilize Gaelic folktunes. Mr. [illegible] teux will conduct three excerpts [illegible] manuscript, and the tenor solos will be sung by John McCormack.

The great cycle of four dramas, "The Ring of the Nibelungs," will occupy the larger part of the program, since Mr Monteux has chosen a portion from each drama. From "The Valkyrie" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried" the "Forest Murmurs"; from "Dusk of the Gods," the funeral music of Siegfried; from "Das Rheingold," the Introduction, entire first scene and the principal portion of the closing scene. Thus the music which describes the bottom of the Rhine, the conclave of the gods and their entrance over the rainbow into Valhalla, will be heard for the first time in many years in this city. The music of the three Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. The music of Alberich and others will be sung by Charles H. Bennett; that of Loge and Froh by Raymond Simonds.

On the first part of the program Mr Monteux will conduct the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," and excerpts from the third act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg."

HERALD-MAR.26.

WAGNER PROGRAMME FOR PENSION FUND

This afternoon at Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a programme consisting entirely of selections from Wagner's music dramas, the net proceeds to be devoted to the standing Pension Fund for retired musicians of the Orchestra.

The great cycle of four dramas, "The Ring of the Nibelungs," will occupy the larger part of the programme, since Mr. Monteux has chosen a portion from each drama. From "Die Walkure," the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Forest Music" from "Gotterdammerung," the Funeral music of Siegfried; from "Das Rheingold," the Introduction, entire first scene, and the principal portion of the closing scene.

Thus the music which describes the bottom of the Rhine and that which describes the conclave of the gods and their entrance over the rainbow into Valhalla will be heard for the first time in many years in this city.

Twentieth Symphony Programme

At the 20th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 31 and April 1, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche."

POST-MAR.26.

LAST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Wagner Music Performed With Voices

It has been proven long since that one of the most popular attractions that an orchestral concert can offer in this city is a Wagner programme. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting, gave the second of its annual concerts for its pension fund and the programme was of Wagner, with a notable addition which packed the hall: the addition of voice parts to the orchestra, and the inclusion on the programme of considerable excerpts from the four music dramas of "The Ring of the Nibelungs."

Following the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the music of the procession and the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin; the introduction to the last act and much of the final scene of "The Mastersingers," came the scene of the Rhine Maidens from the first act of "The Rheingold," with the voices; the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "The Valkyrie"; the "Forest Music" from "Siegfried," and the "Funeral Music" from "Die Gotterdamerung."

The voice parts were taken by Mme. Ferrabini (Mrs. Jacchia), Laura Littlefield and Gertrude Tingley and Charles Bennet and Raymond Simonds for male singers. Thus there was auralized, as it were, the scene of an opera which has been too seldom performed in Boston—the bottom of the Rhine, the song of the maidens, the theft of the gold. In these pages, in other splendors and glories of the Wagnerian music-drama the orchestra played with a magnificent sonority and brilliancy of effect. At every opportunity there were outbursts of applause. Boston has not yet achieved its permanent opera house, but here, at least, was a foretaste of it.

POST-MAR.27.

BLESSED be Richard Wagner! He makes Symphony Hall a full house for a concert of his music and so enlarges the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchhestra. He puts that band to its mettle, so that it exceeds itself in a diversified and pervading eloquence. He warms Mr. Monteux become for the time operatic conductor, almost transforming concert-hall into theatre. He gives pleasure to the audience, holding it in rapt illusion, stirring it to fervors of applause. Through him, albeit by fragments, we hearers know again "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger"; the Valkyrs riding the skies; Siegfried thrilling to high emprise in the whirr of the wood; the Rhine-Maidens guarding the gold and lifting their song; the rainbow-bridge whereby gods may enter the new-reared Valhalla. So Wagner descended upon the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for its Pension Fund yestreday afternoon, and so at last, for the first time under the new régime, [illegible] occasion resumed familiar voice and [illegible] theatre, so distinguishing itself and the conductor so fully in the vein; good to listen to the applause heaped at every opportunity on both; good, most of all, to watch and feel the spell that, even under the handicap of the concert-room, the Wagner of opera and music-drama may still work deep. In the name of all the gods at once—to use only that mild, yet collective Shakspearean oath, are we never again to have opera that is opera in Boston? Sign multiplies upon sign that here dwells a public eager for it. Yet no managerial hand turns to reap what seems a promising harvest. Off goes the Metropolitan Company to Atlanta—and Boston calls not. The Chicago Company cuts the East from its itinerary—and no Bostonian lifts beckoning finger. Yet where there is a will, as there clearly is among the public, there should also be a managerial way to gratify it. Inertia may masquerade too long as "watchful waiting."

Of old the Symphony Orchestra was on its mettle in these "Wagner Concerts" for its Pension Fund, and yesterday it renewed that fine tradition. As reconstituted after the secession of 1920, it has not yet traversed two seasons; yet personnel for personnel, and work for work, there is not a band in America to match it. In large part, it is an orchestra of younger men throughout it is an orchestra minded to do its best; more and more it becomes a responsive, sensitive instrument to Mr. Monteux; more and more it knows and feels itself; almost always it kindles to the music in hand; while in the operas of Wagner it is an old story that every player below the stage acts in degree with those upon it. The violins have seldom sounded with a richer beauty of pulsing, glowing tone than they brought yesterday to a fragment from the second act of "Lohengrin"—the advance of Elsa's wedding procession toward the minster. The violoncellos sang with Wagnerian depth and splendor through the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." The basses sustained the iterated measures of the flow of the Rhine as though such task were their frequent employ. The wood-wind sang with Siegfried's bird, glistened with the gleams, whirred with the rustle of his forest. The horns ran the gamut from mellow musing to high proclamation. The whole brass choir rose and fell in the surge and break of Wagner's sonorities. A more manifold, a more plastic voice the orchestra has seldom seemed. At every turn, in phrasing, in euphonies, in the detail inset, in the gradient marshalled and measured, its tone praised its own ear and Mr. Monteux's. It hid skill in beauty; it clothed zest with power. An operatic orchestra might not be more responsive to the sensuousness drenching Wagner's music, to the nervous quiver endlessly whipping it.

No less, in degree, was the conductor enkindled. Give Mr. Monteux a music that he can visualize as upon the stage of a theatre; give him a music vibrant with rhythm, outspoken in song, teeming with harmonic and instrumental colors, characterizing, picturing, enforcing—the speech of scene, spectacle, drama—and intensively he will impart it. So he chose his fragments yesterday; so, one upon another, they quickened and warmed him. Yet in measure he is still "in process" as conductor of Wagner's music. Elsewhere in his days in the opéra house lay his field. Not yet, for example, has he quite found the rhythm to which the Valkyrs speed across high heaven. Better he summons the stirrings of Siegfried the Hero to Brünnhilde fire-girt, than the quiver of leaf and light in the forest of noon. Yet when the listener recalls Mr. Monteux's first halting version of the apotheosis of the dead Siegfried and the tonal panoply of heroic proclamation and heroic mourning with which he now invests it, faith and future bound high. As it was, he summoned the spiritual mists, the sensuous glow, the ceremonial pomp that join threefold in the music of Elsa's minster. He missed little of the beauty that broods over the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger"—as though Wagner saw his Nuremberg tranquil, silvered, ruddied in the dawn, saw it and loved it, felt and spoke the poetry in this visioning, in the folk that living, singing, dreaming, within it were enfolded.

The tumult of the sea and of the Dutchman's tortured voyaging again sounded out of Mr. Monteux's version of Wagner's overture. With the depths of the Rhine, in the beginnings of "Das Rheingold," he was not less at one with picture and purport. The waters streamed through the tonal mists; gradually the tonal lights quivered and warmed across them; the final chord was radiant; the song of the Rhine-Maidens more lustrious than their gold. We of the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century properly count tone-picturing one of the arts of music in our time developed and enriched. Seventy-five years ago, Wagner wrote this preluding to "Das Rheingold." Yet how little has it faded- It was possible to wish Mr. Monteux and the orchestra more lambent color in the rainbow that leapt from Donner's hammer, a larger, majesty, a deeper serenity with that wondrous motiv of Valhalla. Yet, maybe, it is Wagner's music that the years are dimming. Or we listeners are such children of the eye that we must see the lights of a theatre-rainbow, behold the human simulacra—often unmajestic enough—of the processioning gods.

At least, too, there are singers in Boston capable of the voice-parts incidental to the fragments of "Das Rheingold." Mmes. Littlefield, Tingley and Ferrabini spoke songfully and in voices of blended color for the Rhine-maidens; Mr. Bennett was by no means characterless with Alberich's sneers and threatenings—all four withal through an orchestra now golden with the still, shining treasure, now black with the scheming, writhing, Nibelung. Mr. Monteux felt this music of contrast and character. And Wagner made it—made it as before he had made other music of the storm-tossed Dutchman; of Elsa silvery among the knights ;of Nuremberg's spirit and Nuremberg's mediæval life; of Wotan's daughters, warrior-maids; of Siegfried the uprising hero and Siegfried in death transfigured. The world of romance—and one man, one concert had bounded it.

H. T. P.

What's a "Model" Orchestral Programme for Musically Uneducated?

As a pastime for the musically inclined let us propose an experiment in programme making, with the particular purpose of selecting a "model" orchestral concert for an audience entirely unfamiliar with symphonic music. Programme making, it may be observed, is one of the tests of an orchestra conductor, and by no means as simple as some might suppose.

As a basis for the discussion the Sunday Journal asked Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to outline the programme he would consider best for this purpose. The question was put thus: "What music would you consider best adapted to interest an audience in a city which had never before heard a symphony orchestra, or an audience entirely composed of those to whom such music was new?" The famous French conductor smilingly consented, but preferred to put it in terms of types of music, with several appropriate examples of each type, rather than to limit himself to individual selections without opportunity for choice.

Mr. Monteux's ideal programme for this particular situation, he declares, would have four numbers, as follows:

1. A SYMPHONY.

(Choice from the following:)

Beethoven, No. 5, in C Minor.

Beethoven, No. 7, in A Major.

Schubert, No. 8, in B Minor (unfinished).

Tchaikovsky, No. 4, in F Minor.

Dvorak, No. 5, in E Minor ("From the New World").

2. A WAGNER NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Overture to "Tannhauser."

Overture to "Lohengrin."

Overture to "Rienzi."

Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

3. MODERN FRENCH OR RUSSIAN NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."

Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Caprice on Spanish Themes."

(As an alternative for this number Mr. Monteux suggests a piano concerto, with soloist.)

4. A "BRILLIANT" NUMBER.

(Choice from the following:)

Liszt, Symphonic poem. Either "Les Preludes" or "Mazeppa."

Strauss, Symphonic poem. Either "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Juan."

Chabrier, "Spanish Rhapsody.

Enesco, Roumanian Rhapsody.

Smetana, Overture, "The Bartered Bride."

Music lovers will study this list with interest. Some who have especial favorites may be tempted to wonder why these were not included, when several choices are offered for each number, but few will be likely to take exception to the outline as a whole. All of the selections are familiar to concert-goers, being frequently included in general programmes. Two of the modern pieces were given in the Boston orchestra's last Providence concert.

In making a programme a number of factors are to be kept in mind. In arranging a series, such as the Boston orchestra gives in Providence each season, due regard must be paid to providing variety from concert to concert. The principal number must represent not merely different composers, but different types of music. Mr. Monteux does not make his Providence programmes without looking over the records of previous concerts. For the different problem here presented—a concert for the musically uneducated—the ease with which the music may be understood is of course the determining factor. There are, however, other considerations.

There must be ample variety within the programme itself, with a fair representation of classic and modern. Different national types of music are to be recognized, and of course compositions in the same key should not follow each other, nor should any one key predominate.

Although it is not a fixed requirement such a programme would naturally begin with a symphony. One of the season's Providence concerts was given without one, a piano concerto being the programme's principal number, but in general one would hardly offer to such an audience as we are considering a symphonic concert minus the form of music which is most characteristic.

Either of the two Beethoven symphonies, listed first, would probably be chosen for such a programme by a majority of musicians. The fifth is perhaps the most familar of all symphonic compositions, and is often called the "most human" of all Beethoven's works, reflecting individual struggle with fate and alternating hopes and fears. The seventh, nearly as well known, is light and romantic in character, filled with dance rhythms and indeed was described by Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance."

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, played here by Mr. Monteux's orchestra last December, was the composer's own favorite, and while it is characteristic of the author's brilliant methods of expression, is unique among his works for the humorous qualities of some of its movements. Dvorak's "From the New World" has many bewitching passages, and lives up to its title by the use of themes which may be recognized as taken from familiar negro melodies, "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" entering its first movement. Schubert's eighth or unfinished symphony consists of only two movements, and was for many years almost unknown, but for the last half century has been a favorite. Were this to be the choice for the first number the ideal programme would presumably carry a fifth selection, because of the unfinished symphony's brevity.

Mr. Monteux evidently believes that a beginner's introduction to orchestral music would not be complete without some representative number from Wagner, and in the four overtures listed has given ample opportunity for choice. The first two are the better known, while both "Rienzi" and "The Flying Dutchman," the latter eminently brilliant and romantic, furnish chance for enough resonance to convince the tyro that he is at least getting his money's worth of sound.

In the last two divisions of Mr. Monteux's suggested programme the field for choice is obviously wide. A "modern" number, either French or Russian, can hardly be doubted a place. What this number should be is a matter of acquaintance and temperament. "The Afternoon of a Faun" has been both played and danced in Providence, and Mr. Monteux will undoubtedly forgive another's personal choice involved in the declaration that the Rimsky-Karsakoff "Caprice" is on the whole better adapted to the appreciation of the musically uneducated than Debussy's temperamental "Faun."

That every concert may well close with a "brilliant" number is almost axiomatic. Of those Mr. Monteux suggests all have their merits from the point of view of sending the audience away with a ringing in its ears and a tendency to whistle on its lips. (Though we have no doubt that this latter idea will seriously offend "serious" students of music.) Perhaps the "Don Juan" of Strauss would receive the vote of the majority for this purpose, although Liszt's "Mazeppa" is both brilliant and, in part, loudly descriptive.

Confirmed concert-goers may find it hard to put themselves in the mood necessary to answer the question which was asked of Mr. Monteux. The attempt to "imagine back" to the complete beginning of one's musical education is often difficult. For some it is impossible.

Mr. Monteux seems to have been able to bridge the chasm. He has been trained to do so. One may suggest that it is also his happy temperament to do so. The programme he outlined was shown to one Providence concert-goer, who commented:

"If it is a question of 'understanding' music in order to enjoy it, Mr. Monteux has answered the Sunday Journal's question perfectly. Given programme notes of any competence, not a normal human being could fail to 'understand' the programme he has outlined."

Which brings us to the question of programme notes. Some time we shall ask Mr. Monteux or some other authority what he thinks of those as they are commonly perpetrated.

PROV. JOURNAL MAR.26.

Wagner for the Pension Fund

On Sunday afternoon, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert in aid of its pension fund. The program consisted entirely of selections from the music-dramas of Richard Wagner, as follows:

Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."
Procession into the Cathedral and Prelude to Act III from "Lohengrin."
Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices and Homage to Hans Sachs from the third act of the "Masetrsingers of Nuremburg."
The Ride of the Valkyries from the "Valkyries."
Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried."
Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods."
Introduction, Scene I and Closing Scene from the "Rhine Gold."
The orchestra was assisted in the last number by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley, Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia, Charles Bennett and Raymond Simonds.

Programs for concerts of this character are usually arranged to attract a public far different from that of the usual symphony concert, yet that of yesterday afternoon could not fail to please persons of all classes. A concert of Wagnerian music is always of interest, particularly in a city deprived of performances of his works in the form in which they were intended to be heard. The selections played yesterday were, however, of unusual variety and interest. Interesting, too, were Mr. Monteux's conceptions of the music. Accustomed in past years to the routine and atmosphere of the opera house, he brought to them a dramatic intensity, a sense of the theater, which duly tempered to the limitations of a concert performance, gave them a more than usual brilliance.

They served to reveal another side of his many-sided musical nature and they furnished another proof, if still more were necessary, of his sympathy with the music of many styles and schools. No German conductor could have read the selections from "Siegfried" or the "Dusk of the Gods" with a more complete understanding or could have played the other selections on the program with more warmth and spirit. The orchestra, in evident sympathy with its leader's spirit, played with a beauty of tone, a flexibility, and an enthusiasm unusual even in these latter days, in which it has regained its perfections of the past. Wagner in the concert room is most certainly not Wagner in the theater, yet those who will let their imaginations supply the effects of scenery and costume cannot fail to derive much pleasure from a concert performance of his music, particularly such a performance as that of yesterday. The singers of the afternoon performed their not too grateful task creditably. Costumed in conventional dress, it is difficult to give the illusion of a Rhine Maiden, of Alberich the dwarf, of the god Wotan; yet not seldom did they succeed in attaining this apparent impossibility. Mr. Bennett, in the several parts of Alberich, Donner and Wotan, sang with dramatic effect as did Mr. Simonds in the few phrases allotted to him. The Rhine Maidens were also satisfactory in their several parts.

S. M.

MONITOR-MAR 27

SUN

ss New York City

MAR 4 1922

Last Boston Concerts.

The latest work of Charles Martin Loeffler, a series of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra, will be performed from the manuscript at the Thursday evening concert of the season's last pair of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, which will take place on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, March 16 and 18. These pieces, based on Gaelic folk tunes, with texts by Yeats, will have their first performance in Boston during the coming week. The three to be played are: (1) "The Host of the Air," (2) "The Fiddler of Dooney," (3) "Caitilin Ni Villachain." Both at the Boston and New York concerts John McCormack will take the vocal part and will also sing two airs from the cantatas of Bach. Schubert's symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture "The Russian Easter" will also be played at the evening concert.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close the season with Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in New York, and the first symphony of Brahms.

NEW YORK EVE. GLOBE

ISSUE OF MAR 4 1922

Mr. Monteux will introduce at the last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York on March 16 and 18, the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler, a series of Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra. This work, based on Gaelic folk tunes, with text by Yeats, will have its first performance in Boston next week. John McCormack will be the soloist in both cities.

FROM MAR

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The fifth and last concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, March 17. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, has chosen as the final symphony of the season the seventh by Schubert in C major, which many regard as the supreme achievement of the composer and which, from generation to generation, holds the highest place in the hearts of all who enjoy symphonic music. The distinguished soloist for this concert will be Emilio de Gogorza, the great baritone, who is of Spanish aristocratic descent.

FROM MAR 5 1922

TRIBUNE

NEW YORK CITY

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season will be given a week from Thursday evening, March 16, and Saturday afternoon, March 18.

FROM MAR 5

TIMES

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DE GOGORZA, SOLOIST.

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's Brooklyn series, which will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. This popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of Brooklyn, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where'er Ye Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," and in one of his finest Spanish songs [illegible] by Alvarez, entitled "Canto [illegible] Presidiario." Pierre Monteux will open this programme with the large proportioned symphony in C major of Schubert. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

1922

NEW YORK CITY

[illegible] which the Boston Symphony [illegible] at Carnegie [illegible] are composed to texts by W. B. [illegible] and utilize Gaelic folktunes. [illegible] will conduct three excerpts [illegible] manuscript, and the tenor solos [illegible] sung by John McCormack.

[89]

City
4 192

ton Concerts.

of Charles Martin
of Irish fantasies for tra, will be performed
at the Thursday season's last pair
hony concerts in New
take place on Thurs-
Saturday afternoon.
These pieces, based tunes, with texts by heir first performance
the coming week.
played are: (1) "The
(2) "The Fiddler of
itlin Ni Villachain."
on and New York con-
ormack will take the
will also sing two airs
of Bach. Schubert's
major and Rimsky-
rture. "The Russian
so be played at the

matinee Mr. Monteux
ason with Debussy's er "Prelude to a unheard in New York,
phony of Brahms.

YORK
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 4 1922

will introduce at the
the Boston Symphony
ew York on March 16
est work by Charles a series of Irish fan-
and orchestra. This Gaelic folk tunes, with will have its first
Boston next week.
ck will be the soloist

R5 192
nion
yn, N. Y.

d last concert of the
by the Boston Sym-
ra will take place in
of Music a week from
evening, March 17.
ux, the distinguished
he orchestra, has choinal symphony of the eventh by Schubert in ch many regard as the
ievement of the com-
ich, from generation to olds the highest place
of all who enjoy sym-
The distinguished so-concert will be Emilio
the great baritone, who aristocratic descent.

AR5 1922
W YORK CITY

ir of concerts by the Bos-
y Orchestra in New York
will be given a week from ening, March 16, and Sat-
oon, March 18.

5 192
LYN, N. Y.

ORZA, SOLOIST.
Boston Symphony concert
Brooklyn series, which
at the Academy of Music
vening, March 17, the Emilio de Gogorza. This
one of the concert stage,
ive of Brooklyn, although descent, has sung many oist with the famous or-will be heard on this ocndel's air, "Where'er You
the oratorio, "Semelo,"
f his finest Spanish songs,
vares entitled "Canto del
Pierre Monteux will
ogram with the large pro-symphony in C major of The closing number will be verture to "The Flying

MAR 5 - 1922
EW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony will pro-
n March 16 at Carnegie Hall
ed to texts by W. B. Yeats
Gaelic folktunes. Mr. Mon-conduct three excerpts from and the tenor solos will be hn McCormack.

CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 5 1922

DE GOGORZA, SOLOIST, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's series, which will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. This popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of Brooklyn, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where-er You Walk," from the oratorio, "Semelo," and in one of his finest Spanish songs, that by Alvarez entitled "Canto del Presidiario."

Pierre Monteux will open this programme with the Symphony in C major by Schubert, of all the classical symphonies one of the most universally beloved. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From MAR 5 19
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season will be given a week from Thursday evening, March 16, and Saturday afternoon, March 18.

At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will conduct from the manuscript a new set of Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler. These pieces are written for voice and orchestra and utilize Gaelic folk tunes, the texts being by William B. Yeats. The three to be played are entitled: (1) "The Host of the Air," (2) "The Fiddler of Dooney" and (3) "Caitilin Ni Vallachain." They will have their first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this week. John McCormack will sing them at both the Boston and New York concerts. He will also be heard in two airs from the cantatas of Bach. Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," will also be played at the evening concert.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close the season with Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in New York, and the First Symphony of Brahms.

FROM

NEW YORK CITY

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Mr. Hale in The Boston Herald quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

The Boston Orchestra offered new compositions: Two fragments from Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," for the first time in America; a song without words by Prokofieff; the Revery and Dance from Moussorgsky's opera, "The Fair of Sorotchinsk."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

De Gogorza Boston Symphony Soloist.

The fifth and last concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, March 17. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, has chosen as the final symphony of the season the seventh by Schubert in C major, which many regard as the supreme achievement of the composer and which, from generation to generation, holds the highest place in the hearts of all who enjoy symphonic music. Weingartner wrote of this symphony, "Whenever I heard this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect as of flight through a bright ether."

The soloist for this concert will be Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, who, of Spanish aristocratic descent, is a native of Brooklyn. One of the favorite singers of our concert stage, De Gogorza's voice and art should be heard to particular advantage in the classic aria of Handel and the Spanish song which he is to sing with the orchestra on this occasion. The firs will be "Where'er You Walk," fro the oratorio "Semele," and "Cant del Presidiario" of Alvarez. The co cert will close with Wagner's Ov ture to "The Flying Dutchman."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1 2 1922

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

The air "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," by Handel, and the piquant Spanish song "Canto del Presidiario," by Alvarez, will be the numbers sung by Emilio de Gogorza, the great baritone, when he appears as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, in the Academy next Friday evening, March 17.

Mr. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Schubert's immortal symphony in C major, "the symphony of the heavenly lengths," in Schumann's words, which, by its lyric beauties and sustained flight of inspiration, has taken its place among the greatest and finest of them all. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Debussy's "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra with the following movements: 1. In the Streets and Byways; 2. The Fragrance of the Night; 3. The Morning of a festal day. The season will close with the performance of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1 2 1922

THE ORCHESTRAS

Two new scores of interest will be heard at the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert Charles Martin Loeffler's series of Irish Fantasies, in which Irish folk tunes are utilized, will have its first performance in New York. "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are settings of verses by Yeats, while "Kathleen Ni Oulahan" is a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. The voice part will be taken by John McCormack. These Fantasies, which Pierre Monteux conducts from the manuscript, were performed in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

The novelty on the Saturday program will be "The Prelude to a Drama" by Franz Schreker, now looked upon as one of the most notable composers in Germany. This Prelude, written for an orchestra of large proportions, was composed in 1913 and first performed in Berlin in 1914.

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at the evening concert Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter." John McCormack will sing airs from two of Bach's cantatas, "My Beloved Jesus Is Gone," and "Take thou me," "All they from Sheba shall come."

For the final matinee Mr. Monteux will conduct, besides the Schreker number, Debussy's "Iberia" from the composer's orchestral "Images," and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

Established 188
FROM MAR 26 1922
ADVERTISER
Boston, Mass.

All-Wagner Bill at Symphony Hall Today

WHAT promises to be one of the most momentous symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon at Symphony Hall, when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present a program of selections from Wagner's music-dramas. The proceeds will be devoted to the pension fund of the orchestra.

The great cycle of "The Ring of the Nibelungs" will occupy the larger part of the program. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene and principal portion of the closing scene. The parts of the Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will also assist.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" are also on the program.

FROM MAR 26 1922
ADVERTISER
Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." A suite, which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant music, will also be performed for the first time. Handel's concerto string and wind instruments will open the program.

90

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1 9 1922

Loeffler's Irish Fantasies

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY

TOO little of the music of Charles Martin Loeffler is heard these days in our concert halls. Here is one composer who does not advertise who is not exploited by himself or interested friends. Since his retirement from active participation in the Boston Symphony Orchestra he has lived, in comparative seclusion, in Medfield, Mass., devoting his life to the work he loves—composition. Fortunately he has no material worries and may therefore give the fullest measure of his love and devotion to his chosen labor.

Loeffler is a towering figure. Among composers living in this country he has an enviable position. None would dare gainsay his command of the technique of his art. None, I think, would venture to deny his pre-eminence as a maker of music. In such compositions as "The Death of Tintagiles," "Villanelle du Diable," "Hora Mystica" and "A Pagan Poem" he has written himself a monument that will endure the trial and stress of many years.

He is not opulent in his writing. His compositions are carefully nurtured before they are given to the world, and even when they have passed the test of public performance their maker is apt to discover within their pages shortcomings which he believes may be eliminated with revision. That being the case, the composition in question is sure to be withdrawn for some time. The "Hora Mystica" is one of such compositions. At the time of its initial performance in a Norfolk Festival the "Hora Mystica" was rapturously greeted. Another composer would have stood on his laurels, but Loeffler withdrew the composition from public performance that he might, when the occasion and the inspiration rose, give it the benefit of such improvement as he deemed worthy and necessary. Some day the "Hora Mystica" will come out of the Loeffler desk, have a new baptism of public fire; then, unless precedent runs an unwilling course, the world will be the richer for another masterpiece.

Thursday evening the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack joined forces in Carnegie Hall in a performance of three of five Irish Fantasies which Charles Martin Loeffler has set for voice and orchestra. Their beginning goes back a matter of 15 years, when David Bispham sang two such songs (then in arrangement for voice and piano) in Jordan Hall, Boston. Their titles were "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air." Since then, naturally in such moments as Loeffler felt true inspiration for writing, he has added "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan." The poems are, with the exception of the last, from the many which W. B. Yeats wrote in deference to Irish folklore. "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan" is attributed to W. Hefernan the Blind.

The poems are Irish, their thought and imagery are Irish. They are expressions of Irish beliefs, Irish superstitions. Inevitably Loeffler would be attracted to such folk-lore. In all his writing he has disclosed a love for the fantastic, for the thing which is born of simple belief and simple faith. He loved the harrowing other-world fear he found in Maeterlinck's play, "The Death of Tintagiles"; the sumptuous color and glowing faith of mediaevalism which later found expression in the Dies Irae of his "Hora Mystica"; the querulous complainings of disembodied spirits and the tragic merriment of aerial spirits which shimmer through the pages of his "Villanelle du Diable." Irish lore is rich in just such qualities; what wonder, therefore, that these ideas should find fertile ground in the Loeffler imagination and budding should bloom eventually in these "Irish Fantasies"?

The three songs which Mr. McCormack sang Thursday evening were "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan." Their texts run:

THE HOST OF THE AIR.

O'Driscoll drove with a song
The wild duck and the drake
From the tall and the tufted reeds
Of the drear Heart Lake.

And he saw how the reeds grew dark
At the coming of night tide,
And dreamed of the long dim hair
Of Bridget his bride.

He heard while he sang and dreamed
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

And he saw young men and young girls
Who danced on a level place,
And Bridget his bride among them,
With a sad and a gay face.

The dancers crowded about him,
And many a sweet thing said,
And a young man brought him red wine,
And a young girl white bread.

But Bridget drew him away by the sleeve,
Away from the merry bands,
To old men playing at cards
With a twinkling of ancient hands.

The bread and the wine had a doom,
For these are the host of the air;
He sat and played in a dream
Of her long dim hair.

He played with the merry old men
And thought not of evil chance,
Until one bore Bridget his bride
Away from the merry dance.

He bore her away in his arms,
The handsomest young man there,
And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long dim hair.

O'Driscoll scattered the cards
And out of his dream awoke;
Old men and young men and young girls
Were gone like a drifting smoke.

But he heard high up in the air
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

THE FIDDLER OF DOONEY.

When I play on my fiddle in Dooney,
Folks dance like a wave on the sea;
My cousin is priest in Kilvarnet,
My brother in Moharabuile.

I passed my brother and cousin,
They read in their books of prayer;
I read in my books of songs
I bought at the Sligo fair.

When we come at the end of time
To Peter sitting in state,
He will smile on the three old spirits,
But call me first through the gate;

For the good are always the merry,
Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle
And the merry love to dance;

And when the folks there spy me
They will all come up to me
With, "Here is the fiddler of Dooney!"
And dance like a wave of the sea.

THE SONG OF CAITILIN-NI-HOLAHAN.

How tossed, how lost with all hopes crossed we have been!
Our gold is gone; gear have we none, as all have seen.
But ships shall brave the ocean's wave, and morn shall dawn
On Eire green, on Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

Let none believe this lovely Eve outworn or old.
Fair is her form; her blood is warm; her heart is bold.
Her songful voice that makes rejoice hearts grief hath gnawn.
Prove her own queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heav'n will make us strong,
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on
Will aid our queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

O Virgin pure! our true and sure defense thou art.
Pray thou thy Son to help us on in hand and heart!
O Virgin pure! pray thou thy Son!
Our Prince, our Light, shall banish night, then beameth Dawn.
Then shall be seen our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

Our priests are as one man imploring Christ,
Our bards are songful, and their gloom dispelled.
Our souls are hopeful, our hearts have not fear
When we think of our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

So morn shall dawn on Eire green, on Caitilin-ni-Holahan,
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on,
Will aid our queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

A description of the music begins with the poems and ends with them. In other words, what is discoverable by a poetic imagination in the verse of Yeats or Hefernan is to be discerned in Loeffler's composition. Each poem is set verse by verse, with, of course, a rich underlying concept running through the entire poem. The vocal line is difficult, yet it is ever eloquently exp[illegible] of the word-content. Even a less master of the art of distinct enunciation than Mr. McCormack could not have helped do justice to the musical line. The words would sing themselves, while the emotion curves in almost inevitable musical effectiveness. As though Loeffler had dreamed of a shanaghy telling his tales among the hills and had set the lilt of his voice within the frame of a well-tempered scale.

The Loeffler accompaniments are clear pools of composition in which the banks and braes, the skies of Ireland are reflected becomingly and beautifully. There's a smell of burning peat in the air and the mournful cry of a gull at night. Through the greens and blackish blues of melancholy flicker sparks of Gaelic joy. His orchestra speaks with the voice of angels; its choir sings sincere songs that dip into the very heart of the poems.

Loeffler draws on the full resources of his orchestra, but he makes speechful only what is necessary to his purpose. If a single fiddle, a solitary oboe or horn, may say what is in his mind, that individual instrument is suffered to speak. There's no overladening of instrumental force. The color is spread cleanly, smoothly, consistently. One may see through this orchestration, for its palette glows with transparent depths.

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 2 9 1922

According to the Boston Herald Vincent d'Indy in a letter to Pierre Monteux, dated Paris, March 14, wrote as follows:

"I learn from Rabaud that you have been reappointed for two years at Boston. I congratulate the directors and subscribers of the Boston Symphony for having had the discernment to preserve at the head of their orchestra the man who, in a word, reconstructed it in all respects and has raised it to an artistic level which few similar organizations can pretend to equal.

"Believe me, I cannot lose the remembrance . . . of the artistic enjoyment that your orchestra gave me."

Established
FROM MAR 31 1922
COMMERCIAL
New York

THE MAN AT THE DESK

By PAULL HAYDEN

Some men go in the direction they are pushed.

Others, even if circumstances turn them around, walk backwards, but stick to their direction.

BLOCKED

Some years ago, in Carnegie Hall, during the intermission at a concert of the Boston Symphony, an undersized, elderly man had occasion to rise and walk up the aisle. As he faced the audience there was a sudden spontaneous outburst of applause. The gentleman was Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder and supporter of the famous Symphony Orchestra. There were few audiences of Americans which would not have acknowledged the presence of the fine old man of New England. Major Higginson was a great American.

He was great through his identification with Harvard University.

He was great as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He was great for his "faith in his fellow-men and his country."

And it is very interesting to read in the paths he later trod to fame was BLOCKED TO HIM in his youth. Major Higginson was unfortunate in poor eyesight, which frustrated his desire to "go to Harvard" with his companions. He never obtained his degree in course at Harvard, but his name is one of the cornerstones of the University.

Major Higginson yearned his whole life to be a musician. Five years he studied in Europe—but no musical talent appeared. He had none! But the Boston Symphony, through the disappointed musician-not-to-be, gave to America the music which Higginson, if the gift had been his, would have created. And Major Higginson longed to distinguish himself during the Civil War—and was compelled to remain practically inactive throughout his service. Yet his name is honored by his country and his countrymen as one of the great American patriots.

BLOCKED? If he did not travel the roads he wanted he BUILT the roads themselves! What appears to be a gate across your path may be no more than a hurdle to make you jump the higher! Higginson cleared the hurdles and finished the race—first!

City
R4 1922

ton Concerts.
rk of Charles Martin s of Irish fantasies for tra, will be performed
cript at the Thursday of the season's last pair
hony concerts in New
take place on Thurs-
d Saturday afternoon,
8. These pieces, based tunes, with texts by their first performance
g the coming week.
played are: (1) "The
(2) "The Fiddler of
aitlin Ni Villachain."
on and New York con-
ormack will take the
will also sing two airs
s of Bach. Schubert's
major and Rimsky-
rture, "The Russian
so be played at the y matinee Mr. Monteux eason with Debussy's

ker "Prelude to a
unheard in New York,
phony of Brahms.

YORK
GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 4 1922

will introduce at the
the Boston Symphony
ew York on March 16
test work by Charles
a series of Irish fan-
and orchestra. This Gaelic folk tunes, with
will have its first
Boston next week.
ck will be the soloist

R5 192
nion
yn, N. Y.

d last concert of the
by the Boston Sym-
ra will take place in
of Music a week from
evening, March 17.
ux, the distinguished
he orchestra, has cho-
nal symphony of the eventh by Schubert in ch many regard as the
ievement of the com-
ich, from generation to
olds the highest place
of all who enjoy sym-
The distinguished so-
concert will be Emilio
the great baritone, who aristocratic descent.

AR 5 1922
W YORK CITY

ir of concerts by the Bos-
y Orchestra in New York
will be given a week from
ening, March 16, and Sat-
noon, March 18.

5 192
LYN, N. Y.

ORZA, SOLOIST.
Boston Symphony concert
Brooklyn series, which
at the Academy of Music evening, March 17, the Emilio de Gogorza. This
one of the concert stage,
ive of Brooklyn, although descent, has sung many oist with the famous or-
will be heard on this ocandel's air, "Where'er You
the oratorio, "Semelo,"
f his finest Spanish songs,
entitled "Canto del
varez.
Pierre Monteux will
gram with the large proymphony in C major he closing number will be verture to "The Flying

MAR 1922
W YORK CITY

Boston Symphony will pro-
n March 16 at Carnegie Hall,
d to texts by W. B. Yeats
Gaelic folktunes. Mr. Mon-onduct three excerpts from
and the tenor solos will be n McCormack.

CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

DE GOGORZA, SOLOIST, WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's series, which will be given at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. This popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of Brooklyn, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where-er You Walk," from the oratorio, "Semelo," and in one of his finest Spanish songs, that by Alvarez entitled "Canto del Presidiario."

Pierre Monteux will open this programme with the Symphony in C major by Schubert, of all the classical symphonies one of the most universally beloved. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The last pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season will be given a week from Thursday evening, March 16, and Saturday afternoon, March 18.

At the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux will conduct from the manuscript a new set of Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler. These pieces are written for voice and orchestra and utilize Gaelic folk tunes, the texts being by William B. Yeats. The three to be played are entitled: (1) "The Host of the Air," (2) "The Fiddler of Dooney" and (3) "Caitilin Ni Vallachain." They will have their first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston this week. John McCormack will sing them at both the Boston and New York concerts. He will also be heard in two airs from the cantatas of Bach. Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter," will also be played at the evening concert.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Monteux will close the season with Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama," as yet unheard in New York, and the First Symphony of Brahms.

FROM

NEW YORK CITY

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Mr. Hale in The Boston Herald quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

The Boston Orchestra offered new compositions: Two fragments from Saminsky's ballet, "The Lament of Rachel," for the first time in America; a song without words by Prokofieff; the Revery and Dance from Moussorgsky's opera, "The Fair of Sorotchinsk."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

De Gogorza Boston Symphony Soloist.

The fifth and last concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Academy of Music a week from next Friday evening, March 17. Pierre Monteux, the distinguished conductor of the orchestra, has chosen as the final symphony of the season the seventh by Schubert in C major, which many regard as the supreme achievement of the composer and which, from generation to generation, holds the highest place in the hearts of all who enjoy symphonic music. Weingartner wrote of this symphony, "Whenever I heard this work well conducted, or when I conduct it myself, I always experience the most happy sensations and am absolutely intoxicated with the music. It produces on me the effect as of flight through a bright ether."

The soloist for this concert will be Emilio de Gogorza, the baritone, who, of Spanish aristocratic descent, is a native of Brooklyn. One of the favorite singers of our concert stage, De Gogorza's voice and art should be heard to particular advantage in the classic aria of Handel and the Spanish song which he is to sing with the orchestra on this occasion. The first will be "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," and "Canto del Presidiario" of Alvarez. The concert will close with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1 2 1922

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

The air "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio "Semele," by Handel, and the piquant Spanish song, "Canto del Presidiario," by Alvarez, will be the numbers sung by Emilio de Gogorsa, the great baritone, when he appears as soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the present season, in the Academy next Friday evening, March 17.

Mr. Pierre Monteux will open this concert with Schubert's immortal symphony in C major, "the symphony of the heavenly lengths," in Schumann's words, which, by its lyric beauties and sustained flight of inspiration, has taken its place among the greatest and finest of them all. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Debussy's "Iberia," "Images" for orchestra with the following movements: 1. In the Streets and Byways; 2. The Fragrance of the Night; 3. The Morning of a festal day. The season will close with the performance of Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1 2 1922

THE ORCHESTRAS

Two new scores of interest will be heard at the last pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert Charles Martin Loeffler's series of Irish Fantasies, in which Irish folk tunes are utilized, will have its first performance in New York. "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are settings of verses by Yeats, while "Kathleen Ni Oulahan" is a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. The voice part will be taken by John McCormack. These Fantasies, which Pierre Monteux conducts from the manuscript, were performed in Boston last Friday and Saturday.

The novelty on the Saturday program will be "The Prelude to a Drama" by Franz Schreker, now looked upon as one of the most notable composers in Germany. This Prelude, written for an orchestra of large proportions, was composed in 1913 and first performed in Berlin in 1914.

Pierre Monteux will also conduct at the evening concert Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture, "The Russian Easter." John McCormack will sing airs from two of Bach's cantatas, "My Beloved Jesus Is Gone," and "Take thou me," "All they from Sheba shall come."

For the final matinee Mr. Monteux will conduct, besides the Schreker number, Debussy's "Iberia" from the composer's orchestral "Images," and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

Established 1881
FROM MAR 26 1922
ADVERTISER
Boston, Mass.

All-Wagner Bill at Symphony Hall Today

WHAT promises to be one of the most momentous symphony concerts of the season will take place this afternoon at Symphony Hall, when Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra present a program of selections from Wagner's music-dramas. The proceeds will be devoted to the pension fund of the orchestra.

The great cycle of "The Ring of the Nibelungs" will occupy the larger part of the program. From "Die Walkure" the "Ride of the Valkyries" will be played; from "Siegfried," the "Waldweben"; from "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music of "Siegfried"; from "Das Rheingold," the introduction, entire first scene and principal portion of the closing scene. The parts of the Rhine Daughters will be sung by Laura Littlefield, Gertrude Tingley and Esther Ferrabini-Jacchia. Charles H. Bennett and Raymond Simonds will also assist.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the procession into the cathedral and introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" are also on the program.

FROM MAR 26 1922
ADVERTISER
Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will produce for the first time here, in its complete form, with chorus, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche." A suite, which Henry Gilbert has drawn from his Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant music, will also be performed for the first time. Handel's concerto string and wind instruments will open the program.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 19 1922

Loeffler's Irish Fantasies

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY

TOO little of the music of Charles Martin Loeffler is heard these days in our concert halls. Here is one composer who does not advertise who is not exploited by himself or interested friends. Since his retirement from active participation in the Boston Symphony Orchestra he has lived, in comparative seclusion, in Medfield, Mass., devoting his life to the work he loves—composition. Fortunately he has no material worries and may therefore give the fullest measure of his love and devotion to his chosen labor.

Loeffler is a towering figure. Among composers living in this country he has an enviable position. None would dare gainsay his command of the technique of his art. None, I think, would venture to deny his pre-eminence as a maker of music. In such compositions as "The Death of Tintagiles," "Villanelle du Diable," "Hora Mystica" and "A Pagan Poem" he has written himself a monument that will endure the trial and stress of many years.

He is not opulent in his writing. His compositions are carefully nurtured before they are given to the world, and even when they have passed the test of public performance their maker is apt to discover within their pages shortcomings which he believes may be eliminated with revision. That being the case, the composition in question is sure to be withdrawn for some time. The "Hora Mystica" is one of such compositions. At the time of its initial performance in a Norfolk Festival the "Hora Mystica" was rapturously greeted. Another composer would have stood on his laurels, but Loeffler withdrew the composition from public performance that he might, when the occasion and the inspiration rose, give it the benefit of such improvement as he deemed worthy and necessary. Some day the "Hora Mystica" will come out of the Loeffler desk, have a new baptism of public fire; then, unless precedent runs an unwilling course, the world will be the richer for another masterpiece.

Thursday evening the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux and Mr. McCormack joined forces in Carnegie Hall in a performance of three of five Irish Fantasies which Charles Martin Loeffler has set for voice and orchestra. Their beginning goes back a matter of 15 years, when David Bispham sang two such songs (then in arrangement for voice and piano) in Jordan Hall, Boston. Their titles were "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air." Since then, naturally in such moments as Loeffler felt true inspiration for writing, he has added "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan." The poems are, with the exception of the last, from the many which W. B. Yeats wrote in deference to Irish folklore. "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan" is attributed to W. Hefernan the Blind.

The poems are Irish, their thought and imagery are Irish. They are expressions of Irish beliefs, Irish superstitions. Inevitably Loeffler would be attracted to such folk-lore. In all his writing he has disclosed a love for the fantastic, for the thing which is born of simple belief and simple faith. He loved the harrowing other-world fear he found in Maeterlinck's play, "The Death of Tintagiles"; the sumptuous color and glowing faith of mediaevalism which later found expression in the Dies Irae of his "Hora Mystica"; the querulous complainings of disembodied spirits and the tragic merriment of aerial spirits which shimmer through the pages of his "Villanelle du Diable." Irish lore is rich in just such qualities; what wonder, therefore, that these ideas should find fertile ground in the Loeffler imagination and budding should bloom eventually in these "Irish Fantasies"?

The three songs which Mr. McCormack sang Thursday evening were "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "The Song of Caitilin-ni-Holahan." Their texts run:

THE HOST OF THE AIR.

O'Driscoll drove with a song
The wild duck and the drake
From the tall and the tufted reeds
Of the drear Heart Lake.

And he saw how the reeds grew dark
At the coming of night tide,
And dreamed of the long dim hair
Of Bridget his bride.

He heard while he sang and dreamed
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

And he saw young men and young girls
Who danced on a level place,
And Bridget his bride among them,
With a sad and a gay face.

The dancers crowded about him,
And many a sweet thing said,
And a young man brought him red wine,
And a young girl white bread.

But Bridget drew him away by the sleeve,
Away from the merry bands,
To old men playing at cards
With a twinkling of ancient hands.

The bread and the wine had a doom,
For these are the host of the air;
He sat and played in a dream
Of her long dim hair.

He played with the merry old men
And thought not of evil chance,
Until one bore Bridget his bride
Away from the merry dance.

He bore her away in his arms,
The handsomest young man there,
And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long dim hair.

O'Driscoll scattered the cards
And out of his dream awoke;
Old men and young men and young girls
Were gone like a drifting smoke.

But he heard high up in the air
A piper piping away,
And never was piping so sad,
And never was piping so gay.

THE FIDDLER OF DOONEY.

When I play on my fiddle in Dooney,
Folks dance like a wave on the sea;
My cousin is priest in Kilvarnet,
My brother in Moharabuile.

I passed my brother and cousin,
They read in their books of prayer;
I read in my books of songs
I bought at the Sligo fair.

When we come at the end of time
To Peter sitting in state,
He will smile on the three old spirits,
But call me first through the gate;

For the good are always the merry,
Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle
And the merry love to dance;

And when the folks there spy me
They will all come up to me
With, "Here is the fiddler of Dooney!"
And dance like a wave of the sea.

THE SONG OF CAITILIN-NI-HOLAHAN.

How tossed, how lost with all hopes crossed we have been!
Our gold is gone; gear have we none, as all have seen.
But ships shall brave the ocean's wave, and morn shall dawn
On Eire green, on Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

Let none believe this lovely Eve outworn or old.
Fair is her form; her blood is warm; her heart is bold.
Her songful voice that makes rejoice hearts grief hath gnawn,
Prove her own queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

We will not bear the chains we wear, not bear them long,
We seem bereaven, but mighty Heav'n will make us strong,
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on
Will aid our queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

O Virgin pure! our true and sure defense thou art.
Pray thou thy Son to help us on in hand and heart!
O Virgin pure! pray thou thy Son!
Our Prince, our Light, shall banish night, then beameth Dawn.
Then shall be seen our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

Our priests are as one man imploring Christ,
Our bards are songful, and their gloom dispelled.
Our souls are hopeful, our hearts have not fear
When we think of our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

So morn shall dawn on Eire green, on Caitilin-ni-Holahan,
The God who led through Ocean Red all Israel on
Will aid our queen, our Caitilin-ni-Holahan.

A description of the music begins with the poems and ends with them. In other words, what is discoverable by a poetic imagination in the verse of Yeats or Hefernan is to be discerned in Loeffler's composition. Each poem is set verse by verse, with, of course, a rich underlying concept running through the entire poem. The vocal line is difficult, yet it is ever eloquently expressive of the word-content. Even a less master of the art of distinct enunciation than Mr. McCormack could not have helped do justice to the musical line. The words would sing themselves, while the emotion curves in almost inevitable musical effectiveness. As though Loeffler had dreamed of a shanaghy telling his tales among the hills and had set the lilt of his voice within the frame of a well-tempered scale.

The Loeffler accompaniments are clear pools of composition in which the banks and braes, the skies of Ireland are reflected becomingly and beautifully. There's a smell of burning peat in the air and the mournful cry of a gull at night. Through the greens and blackish blues of melancholy flicker sparks of Gaelic joy. His orchestra speaks with the voice of angels; its choir sings sincere songs that dip into the very heart of the poems.

Loeffler draws on the full resources of his orchestra, but he makes speechful only what is necessary to his purpose. If a single fiddle, a solitary oboe or horn, may say what is in his mind, that individual instrument is suffered to speak. There's no overladening of instrumental force. The color is spread cleanly, smoothly, consistently. One may see through this orchestration, for its palette glows with transparent depths.

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 29 1922

According to the Boston Herald, Vincent d'Indy in a letter to Pierre Monteux, dated Paris, March 14, wrote as follows:

"I learn from Rabaud that you have been reappointed for two years at Boston. I congratulate the directors and subscribers of the Boston Symphony for having had the discernment to preserve at the head of their orchestra, the man who, in a word, reconstructed it in all respects and has raised it to an artistic level which few similar organizations can pretend to equal.

"Believe me, I cannot lose the remembrance . . . of the artistic enjoyment that your orchestra gave me."

Established
FROM MAR 31 1922
COMMERCIAL
New York

THE MAN AT THE DESK

By PAULL HAYDEN

Some men go in the direction they are pushed.

Others, even if circumstances turn them around, walk backwards, but stick to their direction.

BLOCKED

Some years ago, in Carnegie Hall, during the intermission at a concert of the Boston Symphony, an undersized, elderly man had occasion to rise and walk up the aisle. As he faced the audience there was a sudden spontaneous outburst of applause. The gentleman was Major Henry Lee Higginson, founder and supporter of the famous Symphony Orchestra. There were few audiences of Americans which would not have acknowledged the presence of the fine old man of New England. Major Higginson was a great American.

He was great through his identification with Harvard University.

He was great as the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He was great for his "faith in his fellow-men and his country."

And it is very interesting to read in the paths he later trod to fame was BLOCKED TO HIM in his youth. Major Higginson was unfortunate in poor eyesight, which frustrated his desire to "go to Harvard" with his companions. He never obtained his degree in course at Harvard, but his name is one of the cornerstones of the University.

Major Higginson yearned his whole life to be a musician. Five years he studied in Europe—but no musical talent appeared. He had none! But the Boston Symphony, through the disappointed musician-not-to-be, gave to America the music which Higginson, if the gift had been his, would have created. And Major Higginson longed to distinguish himself during the Civil War—and was compelled to remain practically inactive throughout his service. Yet his name is honored by his country and his countrymen as one of the great American patriots.

BLOCKED? If he did not travel the roads he wanted he BUILT the roads themselves! What appears to be a gate across your path may be no more than a hurdle to make you jump the higher! Higginson cleared the hurdles and finished the race—first!

From ~~Sun &~~ Herald MAR 26 1922
New York

A few days ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the unmagic wand of the wholly methodical M. Monteux performed the "Iberia" of Debussy, a work which at one time seemed to be an opalescent web of subtle suggestions. It no longer creates such an illusion. It reveals itself now as a somewhat awkward effort on the part of a French philosopher to transform himself into a Spanish serenader—one of those gay masqueraders who stole most of his good ideas from the Arabs, as, for instance, when he sang:

"How beauteous is this garden, where the flowers of the earth vie with the stars of heaven. What can compare with the vase of yon alabaster fountain filled with crystal water? Nothing but the moon in her fullness shining in the midst of an unclouded sky."

The Parisian is lost in the bosky groves beside the Guadalquiver. The fault of his music for us is that it is too subtle. We clamor for something more definite. We hearken to Charles Martin Loeffler orchestrating Irish poems and we exclaim, "That is it!" Yet Mr. Loeffler is a true musical poet, if ever there was one. Still he is compelled to follow the march of progress. His instrumental background in his "Irish Fantasias for Voice and Orchestra" is plainly affected by the contemporaneous tendency of music to go into the moving picture business.

The Skill of a Loeffler.

If a composer must make moving pictures, let him do it with the skill of a Loeffler. The Alsatian-American employs orchestral instruments with something like an artist's instinct for color. He seems always to select the right one. If you wonder for a moment what the xylophone is doing in Ireland, the next instant you decide that it must have been born there. Mr. Loeffler compels it to rattle with a brogue. And no matter what claims may be set up for the Egyptians with their museum of flutes, it is certain that the piccolo grew up beside the Kerry dance.

Yet one wonders whether the art of music is materially advanced by this species of composition. Illustration is a thing demanding insight and sympathy and inexhaustible technical skill, but after all it is not always creation.

In the end the value of a musical composition must be sought in its independent beauty and strength as music. A painting must be judged as a painting, not as a record of a face or a scene. A sculpture is not accorded a position of high rank because it is a perfect portrait of Dr. Marion Sims or Sunset Cox, but because it is a creation in sculpture. Macaulay's essay on Warren Hastings is not an enduring piece of literature because it gives a complete and presumably accurate report of the achievements and impeachment of the Indian administrator, but because of its splendor as literature.

It is a pity that composers do not take the truth underlying such facts more to heart. There is no reason why they should not write illustrative music. There are scores of reasons why they should. But the subject of the illustration should be merely a source of inspiration for good music. In this respect Debussy's "Iberia" is rightly conceived. That the Frenchman saw Spain through a pair of spectacles purchased in the Boulevard des Italians was inevitable.

Mr. Loeffler, on the other hand, procured his perfectly good artistic eyes in Alsace and for many years has exercised their vision on this side of the Atlantic. He has lived a sober and contemplative life in spite of the address on his letterheads, and he has become a part of all he hears in Boston. No other composer is likely to raise the musical movie to such a high level of art as he.

The concert going public does not imperatively demand illustrative music. This is proved by the continued popularity of such works as the symphonies of Brahms, which offer no peg for the support of idle minds. Perhaps it would be a beneficial thing for musical art if composers would more frequently write just a symphony in B flat or at best a tone poem with a suggestive title and no pamphlet of explanations.

But this would be hard on the writers of program notes, would it not? They are certainly entitled to some consideration, and movie music is a rich field for their delightful cultivation.

Franck's "Psyche," Hitherto Known He in Orchestral Fragments Only, to Heard at the Symphony Concerts T morrow with the Choral Parts — M Gilbert's Music from the Pageant Plymouth for Further Novelty

In his latest and ripest years, betwe the Sonata for Violin and the Symphon in D minor, Franck wrote for orchest and chorus a Symphonic Poem, "Psyche
From it he subsequently drew a Suite four numbers for orchestra alone—"Ps che's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Aloft by t Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyc and Eros." One of these fragments, "Ps che and Eros," was played at the Sy phony Concerts as long ago as 1905, wh
[illegible]

ward Mr. Gericke set two upon a programme; while, in 1919, Mr. Rabaud assembled all four. Now, at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will make known the whole piece as Franck wrote it, with orchestral and choral voices joined and in order. Never before has it been so heard in Boston:

The authorship of the poem which serves as pretext for the choral portions of the music has not been definitely established. It has been credited to three sources—Sicard and Fourcaud, Grandmougin, "L. L." In his biography of Franck Mr. d'Indy is silent on the subject. Of the three divisions of the Symphonic Poem the first is purely orchestral, and comprises "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne Aloft by the Zephyrs." Though these fragments are known here, for the sake of completeness the following "argument" from the score may be quoted:

> Psyche is sleeping . . . Cradled in dreams, her spirit glimpses for an instant an absolute happiness which is not of this world, but of which there comes to her a fleeting vision.
>
> Suddenly the air quivers, filled with strange sounds . . . . Psyche, lifted up by the light breezes, is borne away to the gardens of Eros.

The second division, "The Gardens of Eros," opens with an extended orchestral passage suggestive of Psyche, "fairer than Beauty's self," lying amid flowers and "like a sovereign feted by Nature in festal attire." Voices murmur in her ear of the power of Love:

> Love, the source of all life! Strong young god of the conquering darts! Hail, blessed power! Hail, gentle ruler of hearts! Thou fillest all with a holy joy, thy footsteps make fertile the fields. Earth, the mother, brings forth with gladness when there descends upon her the ineffable caress of high heaven, her bridegroom, deluged with light.
>
> Oh, white sister of the lilies, gentler than the dawn and fairer than Beauty, doest thou not feel the sweet, new-born desire stir in thy breast? Hear in the distance the invisible lyres, gently sighing in the harmonious air. The mysterious bridegroom comes, to pour holy joys into thy virginal heart.
>
> See, the gates of the palace open for thee. But Psyche, remember that thou must never know the face of thy mystic lover. Although thou may not understand, yet obey this all-wise destiny. Psyche, remember, remember!

The orchestral section known as "Psyche and Eros" follows. Again to quote the argument:

> The voices are silent. Already there sounds another voice, gentle but penetrating; it is that of Eros himself. Psyche hesitatingly responds . . . . Soon their spirits are joined . . . . All is passion, all is light, all is happiness . . . . . eternal happiness . . . if Psyche will but remember.

Mr. d'Indy, in matters of art, an ascetic, scorning the flesh with almost monkish fervor, and trying as well to transform Franck into his own image, finds this poetically sensuous music "a dialogue between the Soul . . . . and a Seraph sent from heaven to instruct it in the eternal verities."

Wholly new to Bostonian ears is the third division of the poem, "The Punishment—Sufferings and Laments of Psyche—Apotheosis." Forthwith the chorus sings:

> Love, she has known thy glory. Woe unto her! Amid sweet mystery, amid exquisite happiness, doubt entered the heart of the young immortal. Her punishment begins and her suffering is cruel. Far from the gardens of Eros and from those sacred precincts, she now wanders over the earth and the paths are hard to her bruised feet. A weary traveler, ever solitary, she wanders on, sobbing out her regret for the lost mystery of the blue gardens of Eros and those sacred precincts. The inner darkness grows ever deeper, and only the wind hears her despairing cries. No hope touches her. She has known thy glory, oh Love, but now she weeps. Oh! restore to her the blue gardens and those sacred precincts.

A lengthy orchestral interlude ensues, descanting upon Psyche's suffering and her ultimate release. Again the chorus takes up the tale:

> Eros has pardoned! Rejoice, oh heavens and earth! Oh! Psyche, thou mayest once more lift up thy pallid head. Let the sad remembrance of that first mistake be drowned forever in eternal forgetfulness. Oh! divine pair, rise into the light! The miracle of Love is wrought at last.

To the orchestra are left the final statement of Psyche's glorification, and an instrumental epilogue; beginning quietly, rising to a powerful affirmation, and therewith bringing the end.

It is hardly necessary to recall the mystical quality of this music—the sliding, characteristically Franckian chromaticism, the warm, caressing melodies, the luminous instrumentation. Franck has employed guiding themes in the Wagnerian manner, though they lack Wagnerian saliency and individuality. There are, for example, typical motives for Psyche and Eros, for Sleep, for Longing, for Zephyrs, but of them all only the last has sufficient physiognomy to make it easily recognizable.

Also new to the Symphony Concerts is the other major item of the programme tomorrow—the Suite drawn from Henry F. Gilbert's music for the Pageant of Plymouth last summer. Nine American composers contributed instrumental and choral pieces to the spectacle, and Mr. Gilbert's numbers accompanied the "Norse Scene" and several subsequent episodes. This "Norse Scene" forms the first of the two divisions of the present Suite. The action exhibited the landing on our shores, in the year 1000 A. D., of Thorwald and his Vikings. As the Norsemen's ship came to land it was seen by a band of Indians, who hid in terror under their canoes. The Norsemen attacked the frightened redskins and all but one were killed. The survivor ran to a neighboring village and returned with reinforcements. Arrows flew, and one of them struck down Thorwald himself. Knowing his wound to be mortal, he pointed out the spot where he wished to be buried, then died in the arms of his followers. Sadly they lifted his body on their shields and bore it away. Mr. Gilbert's accompanying music begins with a short Prelude. A vigorous motive, typical of Thorwald, is exposed and developed, and then appears a poignant theme for woodwind, later used to accompany the Viking's death. The music that follows suggests in turn the approach of the ship, the two combats, and the tragic end.

The second part of the Suite contains Mr. Gilbert's music for three episodes—Champlain trading with the Indians in 1605; a War Dance of Indians for the entertainment of Admiral Blok (the discoverer of Block [illegible] followers in 1614; the Pestilence that visited the Indians around Plymouth two years before the coming of the Mayflower. Champlain and his companions are suggested by the old French song, "Lorraine"; the Indians by aboriginal motivs. The War-Dance needs no explanation. In the Pageant the effect of the scene of Pestilence was heightened by a ghastly greenish light. In the gray expanse of Symphony Hall the music must suggest its own background. If it succeeds, the more credit to the composer.

Of the technical aspects of this, Mr. Gilbert's latest music, there is little that need be said in anticipation. Naturally it relies upon bold strokes and relatively simple means. But Mr. Gilbert is one of the few modern composers who can be at the same time simple and forceful. The music for the Pageant was composed for a wind-band of seventy. In rescoring it for orchestra Mr. Gilbert has used the normal forces, augmented by a large array of instruments of percussion.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR. 30.

FIRST PERFORMANCE HERE OF "PSYCHE"

Symphony Orchestra and Chorus Win Applause

Yesterday's was again a Symphony concert without a symphony on the program, although "Psyche," Franck's elaborate symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus is longer than many symphonies. The performance of this work as a whole was the first in Boston, although excerpts from it have been given here many times. Mr Monteux had trained a chorus of sopranos, altos and tenors especially for this concert. The excellent quality of the singing in the two choral interludes, and the warmth of the subsequent applause, roused fresh hopes that we may once more have opportunities to hear other and more intricate pieces for chorus and orchestra.

Franck's music in "Psyche," whether it be nearer in emotional content to Apuleius or as d'Indy claims, to the Christian mystics, is too episodic, too much lacking in constructive power to be a first-rate masterpiece. The apotheosis at the end is reminiscent of Wagner. Yet the piece contains many remarkably beautiful passages, to which yesterday's unusually eloquent and finely wrought performance did full justice.

A suite arranged for symphony orchestra by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge from incidental music he composed for the memorial pageant given last Summer at Plymouth, was played for the first time in its new guise. It was cordially received, the composer being compelled to bow his acknowledgments from his place in the audience.

As Mr Gilbert wrote in his note printed in the program books, this music was originally conceived for a wind orchestra containing 22 clarinets and a peculiar combination of other wood wind and brass instruments. Its effectiveness also depended to a large extent upon the accompanying action. In the concert hall it seemed disjointed, angular music, less admirable than other works by the same composer. The "Indian Dance," a cross between what Beethoven's contemporaries would have called "Turkish music" and what the present day knows as jazz, especially pleased the audience.

The opening number was Handel's concerto in F major for strings and woodwind, in which the thrifty composer uses again sundry fine choruses from his previous choral works. The stately music is embroidered with difficult passages for horns, oboes, and bassoons which again displayed the virtuosity of individual players in the orchestra. It gave much pleasure.

Next week the soloist is Alexander Siloti, an authentic pupil of Liszt and teacher of Rachmaninoff, besides being famous as a pianist in his own right. He will play the piano part in a Bach Brandenburg concerto, and in Liszt's "Dance of Death." The other numbers announced are Sibelius' new Fifth Symphony, and Georges Hue's "Titania," also new to Boston.

GLOBE APRL-1

Twentieth Program Given at Symphony

George Frederic Handel's music is of a pompous nature, but never a swaggering pomposity. It is rather superbly pompous, if the word can be justifiably used with such a sense. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra played his Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras in five movements. Much of this piece is taken from themes of oratorios and other compositions he had written, shortened, changed and made into an altogether interesting orchestral work. The third part (Largo, D minor), was in the form of a "Siciliano," with the theme from the Esther chorus, "Ye Sons of Israel Morn." In this number a flute duet proved particularly effective.

The second number was some of the music written by George Gilbert for the Pilgrim tercentenary festival in Plymouth last year. In two parts, the music represented the Prelude and Norse Scene of the pageant, the French and Indian pantomime which swung immediately into an Indian dance, and the Pestilence was personified in the last piece. They have been rewritten by the composer for orchestra and are interesting. Mr. Gilbert was at the concert and received hearty applause.

The last number, which made up the second half of the program, was Cesar Franck's idea of the "Cupid and Psyche" tales set to music. Many composers have set this theme to music but few as delicately and in more intricate manner than Franck's Symphonic Poem. A large chorus, with Laura Littlefield as soloist, sang choral parts in the second movement.

M. J. W.

TRAV. APRL-1

[91]

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The closing concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was so successfully started this season, will take place on Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15, at Symphony Hall. The program will begin with Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala" and include Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the great symphony of Saint-Saëns with organ in C minor.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux and the full Boston Symphony orchestra will present the following program at both concerts: Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession," from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes's "Coppelia," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

SILOTI, SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The soloist at the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place next Friday and Saturday, April 7 and 8, will be Alexander Siloti, the great pianist, who was a pupil of Liszt. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Danse Macabre," and the solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto.

TRAV. APRL. 1.

Boston Symphony Concert

The twentieth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday with the following program:

Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras .... Handel
Suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant .... Gilbert
Psyché, for orchestra and chorus . Franck

Henry F. Gilbert is without doubt one of the most distinctive of American composers. However much one may differ with him as to what constitutes the true basis of American music, if such a thing really exists, however much one may differ with him as to his artistic ideals, this much must be acknowledged. He has succeeded in holding himself aloof from all foreign influences and has sought to develop his talent free from the restraint of the schools. Perhaps he has not been altogether wise in this. His technic is often clumsy, refinement is sometimes lacking, yet withal his music, often bordering on the uncouth and savage as it does, possesses a certain wild grandeur which is peculiarly its own and which no other American composer has succeeded in attaining. This is true, however, only when his imagination is excited by some one of the subjects to which he is particularly inclined, as, for example, Negro or Indian folk music. Then he often achieves real expressiveness. But his is not a talent for the drawing room. Wild dances of the Indian camp or the Place Congo are the places in which he is musically most at home. For this reason much of this suite, arranged from the music which he contributed to the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant and played at the symphony concert in orchestral form yesterday afternoon, fails to ring true. Only in the Indian dance, and, occasionally, in the other numbers was the real Gilbertian idiom to be perceived. Many of the remaining portions of the suite are excellently conceived and executed, yet they sound strangely conventional, coming from Mr. Gilbert's pen. No doubt they provided an adequate musical accompaniment to the scenes of the pageant for which they were designed, but standing by themselves as music pure and simple they were not wholly convincing. The performance was more than excellent. Ever since his tenure of the conductorship of the orchestra, Mr. Monteux has taken particular pains in the production of American compositions, thereby earning the everlasting gratitude of American composers, too long accustomed to slight consideration from the majority of foreign conductors.

César Franck's "Psyché" was performed here for the first time in its complete form with chorus. The chorus has relatively little to do, yet that little greatly enhances the effect of the orchestral portions which are more familiar. It is needless at this late day to speak of Franck's genius. In this work it shines in all its ethereal splendor. If the pagan legend is not illustrated in the commonly accepted way, it inspired the master to the making of some of his greatest music. The several movements are more concise, more closely woven, than is usual in many of his compositions in which the very multitude of ideas seeking expression often betrays him into prolixity. The chorus, specially assembled and trained by Mr. Monteux, sang creditably. The tenors were at times strident, the sopranos shrill, but on the whole an excellent balance of tone was maintained. In certain passages the orchestra attained great beauty of tone, more particularly in the opening movement, "Psyche asleep." This was somewhat marred by the roughness and uncertainty of the clarinet solo.

Handel's concerto served to show the virtuosity of the oboes and horns. The concerto was played without the additions of Kögel, for which Mr. Monteux is to be thanked. Handel requires no such modernization. An innovator in his day, a bold experimentor in the domain of orchestral color, his music is always of surpassing beauty. Too often thought of as the composer of a single work, "The Messiah," his instrumental compositions are unduly neglected. On the occasional revival of one of them the hearer is amazed at their nobility of style, their freshness of invention, their melodic variety, their harmonic richness. They are always a welcome addition to the usual repertory.

S. M.

MONITOR-APRL. 1.

Two pieces new to Boston stand upon the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, in E-flat major, and a Symphonic Suite, "Titania," by the Parisian composer, Hué. The Symphony, already heard and debated in London, Philadelphia and New York, runs in the later vein of Sibelius. That is to say, it is an exceedingly terse, thin, sharp-set music, developed from brief motivs, making ultra-modern play with harmonies and timbres, fitful as well of mood. In contrast Hué's music is light, fanciful, dexterous, altogether pleasing. Almost as novel are the other two items of the programme: Liszt's "Dance of Death" for Piano and Orchestra, suggested by Orcagna's fresco at Pisa, utilizing the music of the hymn, "Dies Iræ," and seldom heard nowadays anywhere. Mr. Siloti, the pianist, revisiting America after long years and reappearing with the Symphony Orchestra next week, has resurrected it. He will also play the piano-part in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, with Mr. Burgin as solo violin and Mr. Laurent as solo flute. Not often does a visiting virtuoso so join in an ensemble piece. Mr. Siloti, however, is as zealous for Bach as he is for Liszt; while in no respect have the years dimmed [illegible] powers.

On Thursday evening the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, likewise with Mr. Siloti as assisting pianist. As in Boston he will play Liszt's "Dance of Death." The other items of the programme are Brahms's Symphony in C minor with which Mr. Monteux excels; three orchestral numbers from Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche" and Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial overture, "Russian Easter."

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons at four o'clock in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will round out the Young People's Concerts for the current musical year. The same pieces will be played at both concerts—the Overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding;" the Minuet and Finale from a Symphony by Haydn; two fragments of Debussys "Little Suite;" dances from Delibes's ballet, "Coppélia" and from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker"; the sonorous introduction to the third act of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Surely a promising miscellany for both young and old. Beside the tickets distributed to the schools, a few for either concert are available to the public; but in every instance an adult to be admitted, must be accompanied by one or more children.

Monday evening, April 10, in Symphony Hall, the fifth and last of the "special" Symphony Concerts designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than usually frequents them. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other items of the programme are Goldmark's Overture, "Sakunrtala," Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Saint-Saëns's large voiced Symphony with Organ.

TRANS-APRL-6

Symphony Plays Pilgrim Music

Music written for the Pilgrim Pageant at Plymouth last summer by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge is one of the features of this week's Symphony program. It consists for the most part of tone pictures of the landing of the Norsemen and the death of Thorvald in the fight with Indians; Champlain trading with the redskins; an Indian dance and an episode representing the plague at Plymouth.

Mr. Gilbert's compositions are less affected by European vogues than those of almost any other representative American musician. They are imaginative, scholarly, dramatic, the work of an artist with poetic feeling. The suite played yesterday pleased the audience and won much applause for the composer.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyche," was performed with the assistance of a chorus trained by Mr. Monteux. Laura Littlefield was the soloist. Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind orchestras opened the concert.

ADVTCR. APRL-1

20TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS INTERESTING

Gilbert "Suite From Pilgrim Pageant" One of the Offerings

Three, and three only, numbers comprised the program that Mr. Monteux offered to his audience at the twentieth Symphony concert yeste

From ~~Sun &~~ Herald MAR 26 1922
New York

A few days ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the unmagic wand of the wholly methodical M. Monteux performed the "Iberia" of Debussy, a work which at one time seemed to be an opalescent web of subtle suggestions. It no longer creates such an illusion. It reveals itself now as a somewhat awkward effort on the part of a French philosopher to transform himself into a Spanish serenader—one of those gay masqueraders who stole most of his good ideas from the Arabs, as, for instance, when he sang:

"How beauteous is this garden, where the flowers of the earth vie with the stars of heaven. What can compare with the vase of yon alabaster fountain filled with crystal water? Nothing but the moon in her fullness shining in the midst of an unclouded sky."

The Parisian is lost in the bosky groves beside the Guadalquiver. The fault of his music for us is that it is too subtle. We clamor for something more definite. We hearken to Charles Martin Loeffler orchestrating Irish poems and we exclaim, "That is it!" Yet Mr. Loeffler is a true musical poet, if ever there was one. Still he is compelled to follow the march of progress. His instrumental background in his "Irish Fantasias for Voice and Orchestra" is plainly affected by the contemporaneous tendency of music to go into the moving picture business.

The Skill of a Loeffler.

If a composer must make moving pictures, let him do it with the skill of a Loeffler. The Alsatian-American employs orchestral instruments with something like an artist's instinct for color. He seems always to select the right one. If you wonder for a moment what the xylophone is doing in Ireland, the next instant you decide that it must have been born there. Mr. Loeffler compels it to rattle with a brogue. And no matter what claims may be set up for the Egyptians with their museum of flutes, it is certain that the piccolo grew up beside the Kerry dance.

Yet one wonders whether the art of music is materially advanced by this species of composition. Illustration is a thing demanding insight and sympathy and inexhaustible technical skill, but after all it is not always creation.

In the end the value of a musical composition must be sought in its independent beauty and strength as music. A painting must be judged as a painting, not as a record of a face or a scene. A sculpture is not accorded a position of high rank because it is a perfect portrait of Dr. Marion Sims or Sunset Cox, but because it is a creation in sculpture. Macaulay's essay on Warren Hastings is not an enduring piece of literature because it gives a complete and presumably accurate report of the achievements and impeachment of the Indian administrator, but because of its splendor as literature.

It is a pity that composers do not take the truth underlying such facts more to heart. There is no reason why they should not write illustrative music. There are scores of reasons why they should. But the subject of the illustration should be merely a source of inspiration for good music. In this respect Debussy's "Iberia" is rightly conceived. That the Frenchman saw Spain through a pair of spectacles purchased in the Boulevard des Italians was inevitable.

Mr. Loeffler, on the other hand, procured his perfectly good artistic eyes in Alsace and for many years has exercised their vision on this side of the Atlantic. He has lived a sober and contemplative life in spite of the address on his letterheads, and he has become a part of all he hears in Boston. No other composer is likely to raise the musical movie to such a high level of art as he.

The concert going public does not imperatively demand illustrative music. This is proved by the continued popularity of such works as the symphonies of Brahms, which offer no peg for the support of idle minds. Perhaps it would be a beneficial thing for musical art if composers would more frequently write just a symphony in B flat or at best a tone poem with a suggestive title and no pamphlet of explanations.

But this would be hard on the writers of program notes, would it not? They are certainly entitled to some consideration, and movie music is a rich field for their delightful cultivation.

Franck's "Psyche," Hitherto Known Here in Orchestral Fragments Only, to Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow with the Choral Parts — Mr. Gilbert's Music from the Pageant at Plymouth for Further Novelty

In his latest and ripest years, between the Sonata for Violin and the Symphony in D minor, Franck wrote for orchestra and chorus a Symphonic Poem, "Psyche." From it he subsequently drew a Suite of four numbers for orchestra alone—"Psyche's Sleep," "Psyche Borne Aloft by the Zephyrs," "The Gardens of Eros," "Psyche and Eros." One of these fragments, "Psyche and Eros," was played at the Symphony Concerts as long ago as 1905, when [illegible] first visited them. Soon afterward Mr. Gericke set two upon a programme; while, in 1919, Mr. Rabaud assembled all four. Now, at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will make known the whole piece as Franck wrote it, with orchestral and choral voices joined and in order. Never before has it been so heard in Boston:

The authorship of the poem which serves as pretext for the choral portions of the music has not been definitely established. It has been credited to three sources—Sicard and Fourcaud, Grandmougin. "L. L." In his biography of Franck Mr. d'Indy is silent on the subject. Of the three divisions of the Symphonic Poem the first is purely orchestral, and comprises "Psyche's Sleep" and "Psyche Borne Aloft by the Zephyrs." Though these fragments are known here, for the sake of completeness the following "argument" from the score may be quoted:

> Psyche is sleeping . . . Cradled in dreams, her spirit glimpses for an instant an absolute happiness which is not of this world, but of which there comes to her a fleeting vision.
>
> Suddenly the air quivers, filled with strange sounds . . . Psyche, lifted up by the light breezes, is borne away to the gardens of Eros.

The second division, "The Gardens of Eros," opens with an extended orchestral passage suggestive of Psyche, "fairer than Beauty's self," lying amid flowers and "like a sovereign fêted by Nature in festal attire." Voices murmur in her ear of the power of Love:

> Love, the source of all life! Strong young god of the conquering darts! Hail, blessed power! Hail, gentle ruler of hearts! Thou fillest all with a holy joy, thy footsteps make fertile the fields. Earth, the mother, brings forth with gladness when there descends upon her the ineffable caress of high heaven, her bridegroom, deluged with light.
>
> Oh, white sister of the lilies, gentler than the dawn and fairer than Beauty, doest thou not feel the sweet, new-born desire stir in thy breast? Hear in the distance the invisible lyres, gently sighing in the harmonious air. The mysterious bridegroom comes, to pour holy joys into thy virginal heart.
>
> See, the gates of the palace open for thee. But Psyche, remember that thou must never know the face of thy mystic lover. Although thou may not understand, yet obey this all-wise destiny. Psyche, remember, remember!

The orchestral section known as "Psyche and Eros" follows. Again to quote the argument:

> The voices are silent. Already there sounds another voice, gentle but penetrating; it is that of Eros himself. Psyche hesitatingly responds . . .
> Soon their spirits are joined . . .
> All is passion, all is light, all is happiness . . . eternal happiness . . .
> if Psyche will but remember.

Mr. d'Indy, in matters of art, an ascetic, scorning the flesh with almost monkish fervor, and trying as well to transform Franck into his own image, finds this poetically sensuous music "a dialogue between the Soul . . . and a Seraph sent from heaven to instruct it in the eternal verities."

Wholly new to Bostonian ears is the third division of the poem, "The Punishment—Sufferings and Laments of Psyche—Apotheosis." Forthwith the chorus sings:

> Love, she has known thy glory. Woe unto her! Amid sweet mystery, amid exquisite happiness, doubt entered the heart of the young immortal. Her punishment begins and her suffering is cruel. Far from the gardens of Eros and from those sacred precincts, she now wanders over the earth and the paths are hard to her bruised feet. A weary traveler, ever solitary, she wanders on, sobbing out her regret for the lost mystery of the blue gardens of Eros and those sacred precincts. The inner darkness grows ever deeper, and only the wind hears her despairing cries. No hope touches her. She has known thy glory, oh Love, but now she weeps. Oh! restore to her the blue gardens and those sacred precincts.

A lengthy orchestral interlude ensues, descanting upon Psyche's suffering and her ultimate release. Again the chorus takes up the tale:

> Eros has pardoned! Rejoice, oh heavens and earth! Oh! Psyche, thou mayest once more lift up thy pallid head. Let the sad remembrance of that first mistake be drowned forever in eternal forgetfulness. Oh! divine pair, rise into the light! The miracle of Love is wrought at last.

To the orchestra are left the final statement of Psyche's glorification, and an instrumental epilogue; beginning quietly, rising to a powerful affirmation, and therewith bringing the end.

It is hardly necessary to recall the mystical quality of this music—the sliding, characteristically Franckian chromaticism, the warm, caressing melodies, the luminous instrumentation. Franck has employed guiding themes in the Wagnerian manner, though they lack Wagnerian saliency and individuality. There are, for example, typical motives for Psyche and Eros, for Sleep, for Longing, for Zephyrs, but of them all only the last has sufficient physiognomy to make it easily recognizable.

Also new to the Symphony Concerts is the other major item of the programme tomorrow—the Suite drawn from Henry F. Gilbert's music for the Pageant of Plymouth last summer. Nine American composers contributed instrumental and choral pieces to the spectacle, and Mr. Gilbert's numbers accompanied the "Norse Scene" and several subsequent episodes. This "Norse Scene" forms the first of the two divisions of the present Suite. The action exhibited the landing on our shores, in the year 1000 A. D., of Thorwald and his Vikings. As the Norsemen's ship came to land it was seen by a band of Indians, who hid in terror under their canoes. The Norsemen attacked the frightened redskins and all but one were killed. The survivor ran to a neighboring village and returned with reinforcements. Arrows flew, and one of them struck down Thorwald himself. Knowing his wound to be mortal, he pointed out the spot where he wished to be buried, then died in the arms of his followers. Sadly they lifted his body on their shields and bore it away. Mr. Gilbert's accompanying music begins with a short Prelude. A vigorous motive, typical of Thorwald, is exposed and developed, and then appears a poignant theme for woodwind, later used to accompany the Viking's death. The music that follows suggests in turn the approach of the ship, the two combats, and the tragic end.

The second part of the Suite contains Mr. Gilbert's music for three episodes—Champlain trading with the Indians in 1605; a War Dance of Indians for the entertainment of Admiral Blok (the discoverer of Block [illegible] followers in 1614; the Pestilence that visited the Indians around Plymouth two years before the coming of the Mayflower. Champlain and his companions are suggested by the old French song, "Lorraine"; the Indians by aboriginal motivs. The War-Dance needs no explanation. In the Pageant the effect of the scene of Pestilence was heightened by a ghastly greenish light. In the gray expanse of Symphony Hall the music must suggest its own background. If it succeeds, the more credit to the composer.

Of the technical aspects of this, Mr. Gilbert's latest music, there is little that need be said in anticipation. Naturally it relies upon bold strokes and relatively simple means. But Mr. Gilbert is one of the few modern composers who can be at the same time simple and forceful. The music for the Pageant was composed for a wind-band of seventy. In rescoring it for orchestra Mr. Gilbert has used the normal forces, augmented by a large array of instruments of percussion.

W. S. S.

TRANS. MAR. 30.

FIRST PERFORMANCE HERE OF "PSYCHE"

Symphony Orchestra and Chorus Win Applause

Yesterday's was again a Symphony concert without a symphony on the program, although "Psyche," Franck's elaborate symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus is longer than many symphonies. The performance of this work as a whole was the first in Boston, although excerpts from it have been given here many times. Mr Monteux had trained a chorus of sopranos, altos and tenors especially for this concert. The excellent quality of the singing in the two choral interludes, and the warmth of the subsequent applause, roused fresh hopes that we may once more have opportunities to hear other and more intricate pieces for chorus and orchestra.

Franck's music in "Psyche," whether it be nearer in emotional content to Apuleius or as d'Indy claims, to the Christian mystics, is too episodic, too much lacking in constructive power to be a first-rate masterpiece. The apotheosis at the end is reminiscent of Wagner. Yet the piece contains many remarkably beautiful passages, to which yesterday's unusually eloquent and finely wrought performance did full justice.

A suite arranged for symphony orchestra by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge from incidental music he composed for the memorial pageant given last Summer at Plymouth, was played for the first time in its new guise. It was cordially received, the composer being compelled to bow his acknowledgments from his place in the audience.

As Mr Gilbert wrote in his note printed in the program books, this music was originally conceived for a wind orchestra containing 22 clarinets and a peculiar combination of other wood wind and brass instruments. Its effectiveness also depended to a large extent upon the accompanying action. In the concert hall it seemed disjointed, angular music, less admirable than other works by the same composer. The "Indian Dance," a cross between what Beethoven's contemporaries would have called "Turkish music" and what the present day knows as jazz, especially pleased the audience.

The opening number was Handel's concerto in F major for strings and woodwind, in which the thrifty composer uses again sundry fine choruses from his previous choral works. The stately music is embroidered with difficult passages for horns, oboes, and bassoons which again displayed the virtuosity of individual players in the orchestra. It gave much pleasure.

Next week the soloist is Alexander Siloti, an authentic pupil of Liszt and teacher of Rachmaninoff, besides being famous as a pianist in his own right. He will play the piano part in a Bach Brandenburg concerto, and in Liszt's "Dance of Death." The other numbers announced are Sibelius' new Fifth Symphony, and Georges Hue's "Titania," also new to Boston.

GLOBE APRL-1.

Twentieth Program Given at Symphony

George Frederic Handel's music is of a pompous nature, but never a swaggering pomposity. It is rather superbly pompous, if the word can be justifiably used with such a sense. Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra played his Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras in five movements. Much of this piece is taken from themes of oratorios and other compositions he had written, shortened, changed and made into an altogether interesting orchestral work. The third part (Largo, D minor), was in the form of a "Siciliano," with the theme from the Esther chorus, "Ye Sons of Israel Morn." In this number a flute duet proved particularly effective.

The second number was some of the music written by George Gilbert for the Pilgrim tercentenary festival in Plymouth last year. In two parts, the music represented the Prelude and Norse Scene of the pageant, the French and Indian pantomime which swung immediately into an Indian dance, and the Pestilence was personified in the last piece. They have been rewritten by the composer for orchestra and are interesting. Mr. Gilbert was at the concert and received hearty applause.

The last number, which made up the second half of the program, was Cesar Franck's idea of the "Cupid and Psyche" tales set to music. Many composers have set this theme to music but few as delicately and in more intricate manner than Franck's Symphonic Poem. A large chorus, with Laura Littlefield as soloist, sang choral parts in the second movement.

M. J. W.

TRAV. APRL. 1

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The closing concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was so successfully started this season, will take place on Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15, at Symphony Hall. The program will begin with Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala" and include Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and the great symphony of Saint-Saëns with organ in C minor.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux and the full Boston Symphony orchestra will present the following program at both concerts: Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. and H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession," from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes's "Coppelia," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

SILOTI, SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The soloist at the 21st pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place next Friday and Saturday, April 7 and 8, will be Alexander Siloti, the great pianist, who was a pupil of Liszt. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Danse Macabre," and the solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto.

TRAV. APRL. 1.

Boston Symphony Concert

The twentieth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday with the following program:

Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras .... Handel
Suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant .... Gilbert
Psyché, for orchestra and chorus. .Franck

Henry F. Gilbert is without doubt one of the most distinctive of American composers. However much one may differ with him as to what constitutes the true basis of American music, if such a thing really exists, however much one may differ with him as to his artistic ideals, this much must be acknowledged. He has succeeded in holding himself aloof from all foreign influences and has sought to develop his talent free from the restraint of the schools. Perhaps he has not been altogether wise in this. His technic is often clumsy, refinement is sometimes lacking, yet withal his music, often bordering on the uncouth and savage as it does, possesses a certain wild grandeur which is peculiarly its own and which no other American composer has succeeded in attaining. This is true, however, only when his imagination is excited by some one of the subjects to which he is particularly inclined, as, for example, Negro or Indian folk music. Then he often achieves real expressiveness. But his is not a talent for the drawing room. Wild dances of the Indian camp or the Place Congo are the places in which he is musically most at home. For this reason much of this suite, arranged from the music which he contributed to the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant and played at the symphony concert in orchestral form yesterday afternoon, fails to ring true. Only in the Indian dance, and, occasionally, in the other numbers was the real Gilbertian idiom to be perceived. Many of the remaining portions of the suite are excellently conceived and executed, yet they sound strangely conventional, coming from Mr. Gilbert's pen. No doubt they provided an adequate musical accompaniment to the scenes of the pageant for which they were designed, but standing by themselves as music pure and simple they were not wholly convincing. The performance was more than excellent. Ever since his tenure of the conductorship of the orchestra, Mr. Monteux has taken particular pains in the production of American compositions, thereby earning the everlasting gratitude of American composers, too long accustomed to slight consideration from the majority of foreign conductors.

César Franck's "Psyché" was performed here for the first time in its complete form with chorus. The chorus has relatively little to do, yet that little greatly enhances the effect of the orchestral portions which are more familiar. It is needless at this late day to speak of Franck's genius. In this work it shines in all its ethereal splendor. If the pagan legend is not illustrated in the commonly accepted way, it inspired the master to the making of some of his greatest music. The several movements are more concise, more closely woven, than is usual in many of his compositions in which the very multitude of ideas seeking expression often betrays him into prolixity. The chorus, specially assembled and trained by Mr. Monteux, sang creditably. The tenors were at times strident, the sopranos shrill, but on the whole an excellent balance of tone was maintained. In certain passages the orchestra attained great beauty of tone, more particularly in the opening movement, "Psyche asleep." This was somewhat marred by the roughness and uncertainty of the clarinet solo.

Handel's concerto served to show the virtuosity of the oboes and horns. The concerto was played without the additions of Kögel, for which Mr. Monteux is to be thanked. Handel requires no such modernization. An innovator in his day, a bold experimentor in the domain of orchestral color, his music is always of surpassing beauty. Too often thought of as the composer of a single work, "The Messiah," his instrumental compositions are unduly neglected. On the occasional revival of one of them the hearer is amazed at their nobility of style, their freshness of invention, their melodic variety, their harmonic richness. They are always a welcome addition to the usual repertory.

S. M.

MONITOR APRL. 1.

Two pieces new to Boston stand upon the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, in E-flat major, and a Symphonic Suite, "Titania," by the Parisian composer, Hué. The Symphony, already heard and debated in London, Philadelphia and New York, runs in the later vein of Sibelius. That is to say, it is an exceedingly terse, thin, sharp-set music, developed from brief motivs, making ultra-modern play with harmonies and timbres, fitful as well of mood. In contrast Hué's music is light, fanciful, dexterous, altogether pleasing. Almost as novel are the other two items of the programme: Liszt's "Dance of Death" for Piano and Orchestra, suggested by Orcagna's fresco at Pisa, utilizing the music of the hymn, "Dies Iræ," and seldom heard nowadays anywhere. Mr. Siloti, the pianist, revisiting America after long years and reappearing with the Symphony Orchestra next week, has resurrected it. He will also play the piano-part in the Fifth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, with Mr. Burgin as solo violin and Mr. Laurent as solo flute. Not often does a visiting virtuoso so join in an ensemble piece. Mr. Siloti, however, is as zealous for Bach as he is for Liszt; while in no respect have the years dimmed his powers.

On Thursday evening the Symphony Orchestra will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, likewise with Mr. Siloti as assisting pianist. As in Boston, he will play Liszt's "Dance of Death." The other items of the programme are Brahms's Symphony in C minor with which Mr. Monteux excels; three orchestral numbers from Franck's tone-poem, "Psyche" and Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial overture, "Russian Easter."

On Monday and Tuesday afternoons at four o'clock in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will round out the Young People's Concerts for the current musical year. The same pieces will be played at both concerts—the Overture to Mozart's opera, "Figaro's Wedding;" the Minuet and Finale from a Symphony by Haydn; two fragments of Debussys "Little Suite;" dances from Delibes's ballet, "Coppélia" and from Chaikovsky's ballet, "Nutcracker"; the sonorous introduction to the third act of Wagner's "Lohengrin." Surely a promising miscellany for both young and old. Beside the tickets distributed to the schools, a few for either concert are available to the public; but in every instance an adult to be admitted, must be accompanied by one or more children.

Monday evening, April 10, in Symphony Hall, the fifth and last of the "special" Symphony Concerts designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than usually frequents them. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other items of the programme are Goldmark's Overture, "Sakuntala," Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Saint-Saëns's large voiced Symphony with Organ.

TRAV. APRL. 1

Symphony Plays Pilgrim Music

Music written for the Pilgrim Pageant at Plymouth last summer by Henry F. B. Gilbert of Cambridge is one of the features of this week's Symphony program. It consists for the most part of tone pictures of the landing of the Norsemen and the death of Thorvald in the fight with Indians; Champlain trading with the redskins; an Indian dance and an episode representing the plague at Plymouth.

Mr. Gilbert's compositions are less affected by European vogues than those of almost any other representative American musician. They are imaginative, scholarly, dramatic, the work of an artist with poetic feeling. The suite played yesterday pleased the audience and won much applause for the composer.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Psyche," was performed with the assistance of a chorus trained by Mr. Monteux. Laura Littlefield was the soloist. Handel's F major concerto for strings and wind orchestras opened the concert.

ADVER. APRL. 1

20TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS INTERESTING

Gilbert "Suite From Pilgrim Pageant" One of the Offerings

Three, and three only, numbers comprised the program that Mr. Monteux offered to his audience at the twentieth Symphony concert yesterday their nobility

ness of invention,
ety, their harmonic
always a welcome
nal repertory.
S. M.

APRL 1

w to Boston stand upon me for the Symphony
next Friday afternoon
ening.—Sibelius's Fifth flat major, and a Symitania" by the Parisian
The Symphony, already in London, Philadelphia
runs in the later vein of
to say, it is an ex-hin, sharp-set music, de-
of motivs, making ultra-
harmonies and timbres,
mood. In contrast Hue's
fanciful, dexterous, alto-most as novel are the
the programme: Liszt's
for Piano and Orchestra,
rcagna's fresco at Pisa,
olo of the hymn, "Dies heard nowadays any-
the pianist, revisiting
years and reappearing
y Orchestra next week,
He will also play the
Fifth Brandenburg Con-
with Mr. Burgin as solo aurent as solo flute. Not ng virtuoso so join in an
Mr. Siloti, however, is as
as he is for Liszt; while e, the years dimmed h

vening the Symphony Or-
in Sanders Theatre at se with Mr. Siloti as ass in Boston he will play
Death." The other items
are Brahms's Symphony
hich Mr. Monteux excels;
numbers from Franck's
he" and Rimsky-Korsa-
rture, "Russian Easter."
d Tuesday afternoons at Symphony Hall, Mr.
e orchestra will round
eople's Concerts for the year. The same pieces
at both concerts—the art's opera, "Figaro's
Minuet and Finale from Haydn; two fragments
tle Suite;" dances from
"Coppelia" and from
"Nutcracker"; the
ction to the third act Lohengrin." Surely a iany for both young
the tickets distributed few for either concert
he public; but in every t to be admitted, must
y one or more children.

April 10, in Symphony
last of the "special"
designed to please a
and less regular public uents them. Eagerly desired audience has
chestra will play; Mr.
t and Mr. Burgin, first will take the solos Concerto. The other mme are Goldmark's
ala," Strauss's tone-
iegel's Merry Pranks" rge voiced Symphony

APRL 1

y Plays
rim Music

for the Pilgrim
th last summer
Gilbert of Cam-
the features of ony program. It
ost part of tone
landing of the death of Thor-
with Indians;
with the red-
dance and an
ing the plague at compositions are European vogues

st any other rep-
rican musician.
native, scholarly k of an artist with
The suite played
the audience
applause for the

symphonic poem
erformed with the horus trained by ra Littlefield was
el's F major con-
and wind orches-
concert.

APRL

MPHONY
AM IS STING

From Pilgrim
ne of the ngs

---

day afternoon. However the three numbers that he had selected were of sufficient interest, so that there was no feeling of something lacking; variety, for instance, as there often is when the program is so restricted in scope.

The Handel concerto in F major for strings and two wing orchestras opened the program, and was followed by the Gilbert "Suite From the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant." For those who had not journeyed to Plymouth last Summer to see and hear the pageant, the music was of unusual interest. It is full of color and depicts with skill the subject in hand. Mr. Gilbert was in the audience and acknowledged the plaudits of the house several times.

The closing number of the afternoon was "Psyche," by Cesar Franck. To supplement the orchestra there was rather a large chorus of men's and women's voices, and to further glorify the music of the French master, Laura Littlefield appeared as soloist.

She has been heard here on several occasions and her voice needs no comment. She sang her share of the oratorio very acceptably. The Franck version of the legend of Cupid and Psyche is an interesting one because it is so abstract in treatment. It is though not in the least lacking in length.

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Selected from Works of Handel, Gilbert and Franck

ORCHESTRA NUMBERS ELOQUENTLY PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto, F major for strings and two wind orchestras; Gilbert, Suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant (Prelude and Norse Scene, French and Indian Pantomime, Indian Dance, Pestilence); Franck, "Psyche" symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus. The short solos in "Psyche" were sung by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

Mr. Monteux selected four movements of Handel's virile concerto. There is a freshness in this music surprising to those of the younger generation who have persuaded themselves that Handel was a big-wig, who wrote in a tiresome style long out of date. They are unacquainted with Handel, the great melodist, though, perhaps, they have heard "The Messiah" and judge him only by that work, which is not one of his best, although it is the most popular and the hearing of it has become a religious ceremony. In this concerto there is an epic quality, also a lightness, a playfulness that is not elephantine; witness the passages for two oboes played marvellously by Messrs. Longy and Speyer; witness the thoroughly English Allegro with its joyous hunting fanfares. And in the Largo there is the Miltonic side of Handel, who is thus unapproached by later composers, incomparable. No wonder that Beethoven declared him to be the greatest of composers and wished to kneel by his tomb.

Mr. Gilbert wrote music for the first episode of the Pilgrim Tercentenary at Plymouth in 1921. He wrote for a huge band, and for an out-of-door performance. For a performance in a concert hall he was obliged to rescore his music. Mr. Gilbert thinks musically in large terms and speaks musically in them. There is no prettiness, no sentimentalism, no frippery in his compositions. He has ideas, and is not chiefly concerned with agreeable or fantastic juggling with the instruments. He would prefer rough but irresistible oratory to polished sentences, nor would he delight, as Hazlitt said of the Marquis Wellesley, to launch a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt.

The short Prelude, his "mere statement," as Mr. Gilbert modestly says, of the Pilgrim Adventurer motive is impressive by its mighty breadth and sweep. Then come the Norsemen in the spirit of Grieg and MacDowell, but with Mr. Gilbert's musical speech. Perhaps there is too much repetition of a leading idea. The French and Indian Pantomime is in effective contrast, charming in its simplicity and directness. The Indian Dance is one of splendid savagery. Mr. Gilbert has been singularly fortunate in the section "Pestilence" in expressing desolation without falling into the abomination of desolation. Here he is more than picturesque; he conveys the feeling without the aid of any program; there is the hopeless, despairing, tragic note. There is this to be added: in these episodes Mr. Gilbert gains his effects concisely, with a few strokes. Only in the Norse episode does he grow somewhat diffuse. Mr. Monteux, as is his habit in producing a work by an American composer, took the pains in preparation that he bestows on any symphony or symphonic poem by this or that celebrated foreigner. The result was shown in the performance. Mr. Gilbert was obliged to rise from his seat and bow in acknowledgment of the applause.

The orchestral Suite from Franck's "Psyche" was known here. The choruses and the final section were heard for the first time. It seems ungracious to say, when the labor of rehearsal is considered, that we prefer the Suite as it has been played. The measures for the chorus are seldom dramatic or even interesting in pure narration. In spite of one great climax, not the final one, the music of the last section has little inspiration. It falls rather flat after the glowing and superb orchestral "Psyche

There is a famous "Song of Solomon," an orientally sensuous little play which was probably performed during Jewish wedding festivities. Look in the margin of many Bibles, and you will see notes of some pious commentator, beginning: "The Churches love unto Christ." Against "Behold, thou art fair, my love, behold, thou art fair," you will read: "Christ setteth forth the graces of the Church."

Cesar Franck considered the myth of Cupid and Psyche and wrote music for it, as many others did before him. Is it possible that he had in mind, as M. Derepas insists, that the whole work is charged with Christian mysticism? That, as M. d'Indy believes, the ecstatic love duet is an etherial dialogue between the soul and a seraph sent from heaven to instruct it in the eternal verities? We doubt it strongly. We doubt if to Franck, much less to Psyche, Cupid appeared as a catechist.

The performance of the purely orchestral numbers was eloquent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is this: Sibelius, Symphony, No. 5 (first time in Boston); Liszt, "Dance of Death" for piano and orchestra (Mr. Siloti, pianist); Bacch, 5th Brandenburg Concerto for piano, flute and violin (Messrs. Siloti, Laurent and Burgin); Hue, "Titania," suite for orchestra (first time in Boston).

HERALD-APR 1.

PAGEANT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Gilbert's Suite Is Applauded—Franck's "Psyche" Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's suite, arranged from the music he wrote for the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant last July and August at Plymouth, was played for the first time in its orchestral version at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Cesar Franck's "Psyche," symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus, was given in its entirety, with Mrs. Laura Littlefield as soprano soloist.

A Handel concert in F major for strings and two-wind orchestra, in five movements, made a good curtain-raiser.

SOLO PLAYERS' OUTING

This concerto seems to us rather routine stuff, but in the days of Handel and Bach even routine stuff was likely to be well made, and as superior in facture to the average musical composition of today as old Flemish cloth would be superior to cheap shoddy. In this performance, moreover, solo players of wind and string instruments had opportunity to show their skill.

Mr. Gilbert's music, or the material of the music heard yesterday, originally accompanied scenes of the early Norse explorers who landed on this continent, the fight of the followers of Thorvald and the death, by an arrow, of the Norse leader; a French and Indian pantomime, an Indian dance. Then there was the interlude, played as an instrumental piece between certain scenes at the Pageant. The thought which inspired this interlude was the agony and despair of the pestilence which decimated the Indians before the arrival of the early settlers.

Bold, Tragic and Heroic

The opening is bold and heroic. There is that vigor and virility of manner which usually characterizes Mr. Gilbert's musical expression, whatever his particular theme. The note of high adventure in a virgin land is struck at once, in the announcement and the development of the call of the trumpet. What follows is more intimately related to action than is wholly effective on the concert stage. The Indian Dance it is true, immediately aroused applause, but the moment which furnished the balance and the completion of the opening was the tragic concluding music of the Pestilence. Here Mr. Gilbert was free to express a mood, not to accompany a spectacle, and the instant he has this mood with him and his feet are not encumbered by any practical consideration he is at his best and most eloquent.

More for the Stage

These final pages are for us most impressive of the whole score, and the lesson, as we see it, is plain. Music for a spectacle or a drama, even when it has been worked over and co-ordinated as carefully as in the score heard yesterday, seldom stands as high in the concert room as it did with the stage, and furthermore, the less realistic the theme and the more fundamental the mood, the better the chance of the composer to fulfil to the utmost his creative nature.

Gilbert shows again in this music the quality of his imagination, and his ability to speak in a strong, simple sincere manner in his art. His instrumen-

ing in the open ... pages rival his best passages of orchestration in other works. At least this is true of the first part of his suite. But the instant imagination and dramatic feeling are required, he writes in an impressive and original manner. The music was warmly applauded, and the composer rose from his place in the audience to acknowledge the applause.

Tenderly Sensuous

Franck's music is tenderly, purely sensuous. It has naivete, innocence and an exquisite grace in its finest moments. There are moments of sonorous platitude, but they are comparatively few. There is, however, the quality of sameness of color and idiom which makes the score over long. The best portions of it appear to be those which have been given by themselves at previous concerts in Boston, "Psyche borne away by zephyrs" and the rapturous conclusion of the second part, "Psyche and Cupid." The measures for chorus are well introduced, well scored, and they were well sung, with the exception of a point of uncertain attack. The quality of tone of the chorus was fresh and beautiful. Mrs. Littlefield made the most of passages of dramatic declamation which had both dignity and difficfiulty. We do not rank this symphonic poem, on the whole, among the masterpieces of Franck. An excellent performance was warmly applauded.

POST-APR 1

Merle Alcock with Symphony

With Merle Alcock, contralto, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final concert of the season a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Alcock is well known and admired for her appearances in this city, and in concert and oratorio throughout the country. She will sing with the orchestra three songs of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer, and the aria "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos," selections that will bring out the singer's lyric as well as dramatic powers.

Mr. Monteux, in place of a symphony at this concert, will perform for the first time here "Wallenstein," by Vincent d'Indy, considered by many the foremost living French composer, who has just visited America and appeared as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. "Wallenstein" is in three parts, based on the three dramas of Schiller, entitled "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "The Death of Wallenstein."

The first, according to the play, depicts the life in the camp of the famous General; the second, the romantic love of Max and Thekla, which is ultimately thwarted, and the last the tragic episode of the great leader's death. On account of its poetic inspiration and individual color, this romantic work of d'Indy's is considered by many one of his finest. The impressive prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," will also be played, and Liszt's ever-popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

Merle Alcock

Contralto, Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 11.

PROV JOURNAL APR 2

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following program at both concerts: Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession" from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes' "Coppelia," Tschaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III. from Wagner's "Lohengrin." Although almost all seats for these concerts are being distributed through the schools of Greater Boston, a few good ones are available at the box office in Symphony Hall. No adults will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The prices are 25, 50 and 53 cents.

SILOTI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti. This great pianist, once the pupil of Liszt and for years the apostle of the Lisztian school, has recently returned to this country, after a number of years' absence, and won high praise by his concerts in New York. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto in D major, in which the flute solo will be played by Mr. Laurent and the violin solo by Mr. Burgin. Mr. Monteux will open this concert with the latest symphony of Sibelius, the fifth in E flat, which, played and applauded in other cities, will have its first performance in Boston. The concert will close with the symphonic suite, "Titania," by Georges Hue: The Fairy Paradise, Dance of Philida, Prelude, the Chase and Apparition.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

A splendid program has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for the fifth and last concert of the extra series of Boston symphony orchestra concerts, successfully instituted this season. This concert will take place on Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15. Saint-Saens's symphony with organ in C minor, which many consider the masterpiece of the late French composer, will be the chief number. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and Strauss's humorous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," one of the living German composer's finest works. Richard Burgin, the illustrious concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the violin concerto of Mendelssohn. Mr. Burgin came from eastern Europe two years ago to take this post of honor. One of the youngest concertmasters the orchestra has had, he is one of the finest.

HERALD-APR 2.

Monday and Wednesday at 4, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Concerts for young people. No adults unaccompanied by children will be admitted. Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Minuet and Finale from Symphony in G major, Haydn; "En Bateau" and "Cortege" from "Petite Suite," Debussy; Theme and Variations from "Coppelia," Delibes; "Nutcracker Suite," Tschaikovsky; Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Wagner.

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 21st program. Fifth Symphony, Sibelius (first time in Boston); "Dance of Death," Liszt; Brandenburg Concerto in D major, Bach; "Titania," Hue. Soloist, Alexander Siloti.

Alexander Siloti, the veteran Russian pianist, who is to be soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, is not merely one of the few living pupils of Liszt, but also the cousin and teacher of Rachmaninoff, whose popular "Prelude in C Sharp Minor" he was first to introduce in America on a former tour, in 1898.

Richard Burgin will play the Mendelssohn concerto at the last extra Symphony concert, April 10. Saint-Saens' organ symphony is the chief item on the program.

GLOBE-APR. 2.

Siloti Symphony Soloist

At the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 7-8, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti. This virtuoso, a pupil of Liszt and for years looked upon as an apostle of the Lisztian school, has recently returned to this country and won high praise by his concerts in New York. Siloti will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death"—a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae"—and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto in D major, in which the flute solo will be played by Georges Laurent and the violin solo by Richard Burgin.

Young People's Concerts

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall.

Pierre Monteux and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme at both concerts: Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession" from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes' "Coppelia," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III. from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

POST-APR 2

Siloti to Play at Symphony Concerts

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti, pianist, who will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death," and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in D major. Sibelius, E flat, symphony, will have its first performances in Boston. The symphonic suite, "Titania," by Georges Hue, is also on the program.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Tomorrow and Wednesday afternoon the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall.

Although almost all seats are being distributed through the schools a few are available at the box office.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

A splendid program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for the last extra Monday night concert on April 10. Saint-Saens's symphony with organ in C minor, Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," are included. Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will be the soloist, playing the violin concerto by Mendelssohn.

ADVTSR. APR. 2.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
WORLD
New York City
MAR 12 1922
Bklyn Section

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's series, which will be given at the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. This popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of this borough, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio, "Semelo," and in one of his finest Spanish songs, that by Alvarez, entitled "Canto del Presidiario." Pierre Monteux will open this programme with the large-proportioned Symphony in C major of Schubert. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ~~BULLETIN~~ Journal
Providence, R. I.
MAR 12 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Philip Hale in his review quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

NEW YORK
WORLD
ISSUE OF
~~FEB~~ MAR 12 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, at its last New York concert this season, will play Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" for the first time in New York. Debussy's "Iberia" and Brahms's First Symphony.

NEW YORK
WORLD
ISSUE OF
~~FEB~~ MAR 12 1922

Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, will play a new set of Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler, written for voice and orchestra, utilizing Gaelic tunes, and with texts by William Butler Yeats. They are entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan." The Irish tenor, John McCormack, will sing the voice parts. He will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas. The orchestral programme in addition will consist of Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture of the "Russian Easter."

FROM COMMERCIAL
New York
MAR 13 1922

Boston Symphony Closing Season

Charles Martin Loeffler's Irish Fantasies will be given by the Boston Symphony at the evening concert of the last pair to be given in New York this season, next Thursday evening. John McCormack will sing the vocal part in the three numbers. The first two, set to the texts of Yeats, are "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney." The third, "Kahleen Ni Culahan," is a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. Loeffler has utilized Irish folk tunes in this music. John McCormack will also sing two airs from the cantatas of Bach, "My Beloved Jesus is Gone" and "Take Thou Me" from "All They from Sheba Shall Come." Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Koreakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

At the afternoon concert, to take place next Saturday at 2:30, Franz Schreker's Prelude to a Drama will have its first performance in New York. This score by the German composer was first performed in Berlin in 1914 and is written for an orchestra of largest size. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Debussy's "Iberia" and close the season with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

instrumental comly neglected. On val of one of them
ed at their nobility
shness of invention,
iety, their harmonic
re always a welcome
usual repertory.
S. M.

APRL. 1.

ew to Boston stand upon mme for the Symphony
next Friday afternoon
evening—Sibelius's Fifth
flat major, and a Sym-Titania" by the Parisian
The Symphony, already
d in London, Philadelphia
runs in the later vein of
is to say, it is an ex-thin, sharp-set music, de-
of motivs, making ultra-
harmonies and timbres,
mood. In contrast Hue's
fanciful, dexterous, alto-Almost as novel are the of the programme: Liszt's
for Piano and Orchestra,
rcagna's fresco at Pisa,
sic of the hymn, "Dies
heard nowadays any-ti, the pianist, revisiting
g years and reappearing
ony Orchestra next week,
He will also play the
Fifth Brandenburg Con-
with Mr. Burgin as solo aurent as solo flute. Not ing virtuoso so join in an
Mr. Siloti, however, is as
as he is for Liszt; while ve the years dimmed h

vening the Symphony Or-
in Sanders Theatre at ise with Mr. Siloti as ass in Boston he will play
Death." The other items
are Brahms's Symphony
hich Mr. Monteux excels;
numbers from Franck's
he" and Rimsky-Korsa-erture, "Russian Easter."
d. Tuesday afternoons at Symphony Hall, Mr.
e orchestra will round
eople's Concerts for the year. The same pieces
at both concerts—the art's opera, "Figaro's
Minuet and Finale from Haydn; two fragments
ttle Suite;" dances from
"Coppelia" and from
let, "Nutcracker"; the
ction to the third act Lohengrin." Surely a lany for both young
the tickets distributed
few for either concert
the public; but in every
t to be admitted, must
y one or more children.
April 10, in Symphony
last of the "special"
designed to please a
and less regular public
uents them. Eagerly
desired audience has
chestra will play; Mr.
t and Mr. Burgin, first nd, will take the solos Concerto. The other amme are Goldmark's
ala," Strauss's tone-
piegel's Merry Pranks' arge voiced Symphony

APRL 1

y Plays
rim Music

for the Pilgrim
outh last summer
Gilbert of Cam-
the features of hony program. It
ost part of tone
landing of the death of Thor-
t with Indians;
with the red-
dance and an
ing the plague at

compositions are European vogues
est any other rep-
rican musician.
ative, scholarly of an artist with
The suite played
the audience
applause for the

symphonic poem.
erformed with the chorus trained by ra Littlefield was
el's F major con-
and wind orches-
concert.

APRL

MPHONY
AM IS STING

From Pilgrim
ne of the ngs

only, numbers
n that Mr. Mon-audience at the

---

day afternoon. However, the three numbers that he had selected were of sufficient interest, so that there was no feeling of something lacking; variety, for instance, as there often is when the program is so restricted in scope.

The Handel concerto in F major for strings and two wing orchestras opened the program, and was followed by the Gilbert "Suite From the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant." For those who had not journeyed to Plymouth last Summer to see and hear the pageant, the music was of unusual interest. It is full of color and depicts with skill the subject in hand. Mr. Gilbert was in the audience and acknowledged the plaudits of the house several times.

The closing number of the afternoon was "Psyche," by Cesar Franck. To supplement the orchestra there was rather a large chorus of men's and women's voices, and to further glorify the music of the French master. Laura Littlefield appeared as soloist.

She has been heard here on several occasions and her voice needs no comment. She sang her share of the oratorio very acceptably. The Franck version of the legend of Cupid and Psyche is an interesting one because it is so abstract in treatment. It is though not in the least lacking in length.

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Selected from Works of Handel, Gilbert and Franck

ORCHESTRA NUMBERS ELOQUENTLY PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto, F major for strings and two wind orchestras; Gilbert, Suite from the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant (Prelude and Norse Scene, French and Indian Pantomime, Indian Dance, Pestilence); Franck, "Psyche," symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus. The short solos in "Psyche" were sung by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

Mr. Monteux selected four movements of Handel's virile concerto. There is a freshness in this music surprising to those of the younger generation who have persuaded themselves that Handel was a big-wig, who wrote in a tiresome style long out of date. They are unacquainted with Handel, the great melodist, though, perhaps, they have heard "The Messiah" and judge him only by that work, which is not one of his best, although it is the most popular and the hearing of it has become a religious ceremony. In this concerto there is an epic quality, also a lightness, a playfulness that is not elephantine; witness the passages for two oboes played marvellously by Messrs. Longy and Speyer; witness the thoroughly English Allegro with its joyous hunting fanfares. And in the Largo there is the Miltonic side of Handel, who is thus unapproached by later composers, incomparable. No wonder that Beethoven declared him to be the greatest of composers and wished to kneel by his tomb.

Mr. Gilbert wrote music for the first episode of the Pilgrim Tercentenary at Plymouth in 1921. He wrote for a huge band, and for an out-of-door performance. For a performance in a concert hall he was obliged to rescore his music. Mr. Gilbert thinks musically in large terms and speaks musically in them. There is no prettiness, no sentimentalism, no frippery in his compositions. He has ideas, and is not chiefly concerned with agreeable or fantastic juggling with the instruments. He would prefer rough but irresistible oratory to polished sentences, nor would he delight, as Hazlitt said of the Marquis Wellesley, to launch a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt.

The short Prelude, his "mere statement," as Mr. Gilbert modestly says, of the Pilgrim Adventurer motive is impressive by its mighty breadth and sweep. Then come the Norsemen in the spirit of Grieg and MacDowell, but with Mr. Gilbert's musical speech. Perhaps there is too much repetition of a leading idea. The French and Indian Pantomime is in effective contrast, charming in its simplicity and directness. The Indian Dance is one of splendid savagery. Mr. Gilbert has been singularly fortunate in the section "Pestilence" in expressing desolation without falling into the abomination of desolation. Here he is more than picturesque; he conveys the feeling without the aid of any program; there is the hopeless, despairing, tragic note. There is this to be added: in these episodes Mr. Gilbert gains his effects concisely, with a few strokes. Only in the Norse episode does he grow somewhat diffuse. Mr. Monteux, as is his habit in producing a work by an American composer, took the pains in preparation that he bestows on any symphony or symphonic poem by this or that celebrated foreigner. The result was shown in the performance. Mr. Gilbert was obliged to rise from his seat and bow in acknowledgment of the applause.

The orchestral Suite from Franck's "Psyche" was known here. The choruses and the final section were heard for the first time. It seems ungracious to say, when the labor of rehearsal is considered, that we prefer the Suite as it has been played. The measures for the chorus are seldom dramatic or even interesting in pure narration. In spite of one great climax, not the final one, the music of the last section has little inspiration. It falls rather flat after the glowing and superb orchestral "Psyche and Cupid."

There is a famous "Song of Solomon," an orientally sensuous little play which was probably performed during Jewish wedding festivities. Look in the margin of many Bibles, and you will see notes of some pious commentator, beginning: "The Churches love unto Christ." Against "Behold, thou art fair, my love, behold, thou art fair," you will read: "Christ setteth forth the graces of the Church."

Cesar Franck considered the myth of Cupid and Psyche and wrote music for it, as many others did before him. Is it possible that he had in mind, as M. Derepas insists, that the whole work is charged with Christian mysticism? That, as M. d'Indy believes, the ecstatic love duet is an etherial dialogue between the soul and a seraph sent from heaven to instruct it in the eternal verities? We doubt it strongly. We doubt if to Franck, much less to Psyche, Cupid appeared as a catechist.

The performance of the purely orchestral numbers was eloquent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is this: Sibelius, Symphony, No. 5 (first time in Boston); Liszt, "Dance of Death" for piano and orchestra (Mr. Siloti, pianist); Bacch, 5th Brandenburg Concerto for piano, flute and violin (Messrs. Siloti, Laurent and Burgin); Hue, "Titania," suite for orchestra (first time in Boston).

HERALD-APR. 1.

PAGEANT MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Gilbert's Suite Is Applauded — Franck's "Psyche" Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

Henry F. Gilbert's suite, arranged from the music he wrote for the Pilgrim Tercentenary Pageant last July and August at Plymouth, was played for the first time in its orchestral version at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Cesar Franck's "Psyche," symphonic poem for orchestra and chorus, was given in its entirety, with Mrs. Laura Littlefield as soprano soloist.

A Handel concert in F major for strings and two-wind orchestra, in five movements, made a good curtain-raiser.

SOLO PLAYERS' OUTING

This concerto seems to us rather routine stuff, but in the days of Handel and Bach even routine stuff was likely to be well made, and as superior in facture to the average musical composition of today as old Flemish cloth would be superior to cheap shoddy. In this performance, moreover, solo players of wind and string instruments had opportunity to show their skill.

Mr. Gilbert's music, or the material of the music heard yesterday, originally accompanied scenes of the early Norse explorers who landed on this continent, the fight of the followers of Thorvald and the death, by an arrow, of the Norse leader; a French and Indian pantomime, an Indian dance. Then there was the interlude, played as an instrumental piece between certain scenes at the Pageant. The thought which inspired this interlude was the agony and despair of the pestilence which decimated the Indians before the arrival of the early settlers.

Bold, Tragic and Heroic

The opening is bold and heroic. There is that vigor and virility of manner which usually characterizes Mr. Gilbert's musical expression, whatever his particular theme. The note of high adventure in a virgin land is struck at once, in the announcement and the development of the call of the trumpet. What follows is more intimately related to action than is wholly effective on the concert stage. The Indian Dance it is true, immediately aroused applause, but the moment which furnished the balance and the completion of the opening was the tragic concluding music of the Pestilence. Here Mr. Gilbert was free to express a mood, not to accompany a spectacle, and the instant he has this mood with him and his feet are not encumbered by any practical consideration he is at his best and most eloquent.

More for the Stage

These final pages are for us most impressive of the whole score, and the lesson, as we see it, is plain. Music for a spectacle or a drama, even when it has been worked over and co-ordinated as carefully as in the score heard yesterday, seldom stands as high in the concert room as it did with the stage, and furthermore, the less realistic the theme and the more fundamental the mood, the better the chance of the composer to fulfil to the utmost his creative nature.

Gilbert shows again in this music the quality of his imagination, and his ability to speak in a strong, simple sincere manner in his art. His instrumentation retains too much of the impress [illegible] of the effects [illegible] band playing in the open to make these pages rival his best passages of orchestration in other works. At least this is true of the first part of his suite. But the instant imagination and dramatic feeling are required, he writes in an impressive and original manner. The music was warmly applauded, and the composer rose from his place in the audience to acknowledge the applause.

Tenderly Sensuous

Franck's music is tenderly, purely sensuous. It has naivete, innocence and an exquisite grace in its finest moments. There are moments of sonorous platitude, but they are comparatively few. There is, however, the quality of sameness of color and idiom which makes the score over long. The best portions of it appear to be those which have been given by themselves at previous concerts in Boston, "Psyche borne away by zephyrs" and the rapturous conclusion of the second part, "Psyche and Cupid." The measures for chorus are well introduced, well scored, and they were well sung, with the exception of a point of uncertain attack. The quality of tone of the chorus was fresh and beautiful. Mrs. Littlefield made the most of passages of dramatic declamation which had both dignity and diffcffiulty. We do not rank this symphonic poem, on the whole, among the masterpieces of Franck. An excellent performance was warmly applauded.

POST-APR. 1.

Merle Alcock with Symphony

With Merle Alcock, contralto, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and final concert of the season a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Alcock is well known and admired for her appearances in this city, and in concert and oratorio throughout the country. She will sing with the orchestra three songs of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer, and the aria "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos," selections that will bring out the singer's lyric as well as dramatic powers.

Mr. Monteux, in place of a symphony at this concert, will perform for the first time here "Wallenstein," by Vincent d'Indy, considered by many the foremost living French composer, who has just visited America and appeared as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. "Wallenstein" is in three parts, based on the three dramas of Schiller, entitled "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "The Death of Wallenstein."

The first, according to the play, depicts the life in the camp of the famous General; the second, the romantic love of Max and Thekla, which is ultimately thwarted, and the last the tragic episode of the great leader's death. On account of its poetic inspiration and individual color, this romantic work of d'Indy's is considered by many one of his finest. The impressive prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," will also be played, and Liszt's ever-popular symphonic poem, "The Preludes."

Merle Alcock

Contralto, Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 11.

PROV JOURNAL APR 2

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following program at both concerts: Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession" from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes' "Coppelia," Tschaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III from Wagner's "Lohengrin." Although almost all seats for these concerts are being distributed through the schools of Greater Boston, a few good ones are available at the box office in Symphony Hall. No adults will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The prices are 25, 50 and 50 cents.

SILOTI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

At the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti. This great pianist, once the pupil of Liszt and for years the apostle of the Lisztian school, has recently returned to this country, after a number of years' absence, and won high praise by his concerts in New York. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae," and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto in D major, in which the flute solo will be played by Mr. Laurent and the violin solo by Mr. Burgin. Mr. Monteux will open this concert with the latest symphony of Sibelius, the fifth in E flat, which, played and applauded in other cities, will have its first performance in Boston. The concert will close with the symphonic suite, "Titania," by Georges Hue: The Fairy Paradise, Dance of Philida, Prelude, the Chase and Apparition.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

A splendid program has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for the fifth and last concert of the extra series of Boston symphony orchestra concerts, successfully instituted this season. This concert will take place on Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15. Saint-Saens's symphony with organ in C minor, which many consider the masterpiece of the late French composer, will be the chief number. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and Strauss's humorous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," one of the living German composer's finest works. Richard Burgin, the illustrious concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the violin concerto of Mendelssohn. Mr. Burgin came from eastern Europe two years ago to take this post of honor. One of the youngest concertmasters the orchestra has had, he is one of the finest.

HERALD-APR. 2.

Monday and Wednesday at 4, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Concerts for young people. No adults unaccompanied by children will be admitted. Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Minuet and Finale from Symphony in G major, Haydn; "En Bateau" and "Cortege" from "Petite Suite," Debussy; Theme and Variations from "Coppelia," Delibes; "Nutcracker Suite," Tschaikovsky; Introduction to Act 3 of "Lohengrin," Wagner.

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 21st program. Fifth Symphony, Sibelius (first time in Boston); "Dance of Death," Liszt; Brandenburg Concerto in D major, Bach; "Titania," Hue. Soloist, Alexander Siloti.

Alexander Siloti, the veteran Russian pianist, who is to be soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, is not merely one of the few living pupils of Liszt, but also the cousin and teacher of Rachmaninoff, whose popular "Prelude in C Sharp Minor" he was first to introduce in America on a former tour, in 1898.

Richard Burgin will play the Mendelssohn concerto at the last extra Symphony concert, April 10. Saint-Saens' organ symphony is the chief item on the program.

GLOBE-APR. 2

Siloti Symphony Soloist

At the 21st pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 7-8, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti. This virtuoso, a pupil of Liszt and for years looked upon as an apostle of the Lisztian school, has recently returned to this country and won high praise by his concerts in New York. Siloti will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death"—a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae"—and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto in D major, in which the flute solo will be played by Georges Laurent and the violin solo by Richard Burgin.

Young People's Concerts

Next Monday and Wednesday afternoons, April 3 and 5, at 4 o'clock, the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall.

Pierre Monteux and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programme at both concerts: Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in G major (B. & H. 13), "In a Boat" and "Procession" from Debussy's Little Suite, the Slavic Theme with Variations from Delibes' "Coppelia," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, and the Introduction to Act III. from Wagner's "Lohengrin."

POST-APR 2

Siloti to Play at Symphony Concerts

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Alexander Siloti, pianist, who will play with the orchestra Liszt's "Dance of Death," and will also take the piano solo part in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in D major. Sibelius, E flat, symphony, will have its first performances in Boston. The symphonic suite, "Titania," by Georges Hue, is also on the program.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Tomorrow and Wednesday afternoon the last pair of Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given at Symphony Hall.

Although almost all seats are being distributed through the schools a few are available at the box office.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

A splendid program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for the last extra Monday night concert on April 10. Saint-Saens' Symphony with organ in C minor, Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," are included. Richard Burgin, concertmaster, will be the soloist, playing the violin concerto by Mendelssohn.

ADVTSR. APR. 2.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
WORLD
New York City
MAR 12 1922
Bklyn Section

At the last Boston Symphony concert of this year's series, which will be given at the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 17, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. This popular baritone of the concert stage, who is a native of this borough, although of Spanish descent, has sung many times as soloist with the famous orchestra. He will be heard on this occasion in Handel's air, "Where'er You Walk," from the oratorio, "Semelo," and in one of his finest Spanish songs, that by Alvarez, entitled "Canto del Presidiario." Pierre Monteux will open this programme with the large-proportioned Symphony in C major of Schubert. The closing number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
BULLETIN,
Providence, R. I.
Journal
MAR 12 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently played for the first time a set of waltzes for orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill, Professor of Music at Harvard. Philip Hale in his review quotes as a high compliment unwittingly paid them the remark of a young woman in the corridor: "Why, there wasn't one I could dance to."

NEW YORK
WORLD
ISSUE OF
MAR
~~FEB~~ 12 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, at its last New York concert this season, will play Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" for the first time in New York. Debussy's "Iberia" and Brahms's First Symphony.

NEW YORK
WORLD
ISSUE OF
MAR
~~FEB~~ 12 1922

Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, at Carnegie Hall, will play a new set of Irish fantasies by Charles Martin Loeffler, written for voice and orchestra, utilizing Gaelic tunes, and with texts by William Butler Yeats. They are entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Kathleen Ni Oulahan." The Irish tenor, John McCormack, will sing the voice parts. He will also sing two arias from Bach cantatas. The orchestral programme in addition will consist of Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture of the "Russian Easter."

FROM COMMERCIAL
New York
MAR 13 1922

Boston Symphony Closing Season

Charles Martin Loeffler's Irish Fantasies will be given by the Boston Symphony at the evening concert of the last pair to be given in New York this season, next Thursday evening. John McCormack will sing the vocal part in the three numbers. The first two, set to the texts of Yeats, are "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney." The third, "Kahleen Ni Culahan," is a setting of the age-old ballad of the woman who embodies the spirit of Ireland. Loeffler has utilized Irish folk tunes in this music. John McCormack will also sing two airs from the cantatas of Bach, "My Beloved Jesus is Gone" and "Take Thou Me" from "All They from Sheba Shall Come." Pierre Monteux will conduct Schubert's Symphony in C major and Rimsky-Koreakoff's overture, "The Russian Easter."

At the afternoon concert, to take place next Saturday at 2:30, Franz Schreker's Prelude to a Drama will have its first performance in New York. This score by the German composer was first performed in Berlin in 1914 and is written for an orchestra of largest size. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Debussy's "Iberia" and close the season with the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

Die Boſtoner kommen uns nur ſelten mit Soliſten, geſtern aber machte eine von Herrn Monteux vorgeführte Reihe von drei Loeffler'ſchen Liedern mit Orcheſterverbrämung die Mitwirkung eines hervorragenden Tenors zur Bedingung, und dazu wurde Herr John McCormack erkoren. Carnegie Hall war ſehr gut beſucht, und der populäre Künſtler errang einen wirklichen Erfolg. Er erſchien zuerſt mit zwei Bach'ſchen Werken, nämlich der Arie aus der Kantate „Mein liebſter Jeſu iſt verloren" und „Nimm mich Dir zu eigen hin" aus der Kantate „Sie werden aus Saba Alle kommen". Des Künſtlers Stimme klang da, ſo ſchön er auch den Stil meiſterte, mitunter naſal, was bei Bach's durchſichtiger Klarheit jederzeit ein Nachteil iſt, ſonſt könnte man dem Sänger nichts vorwerfen. Sicher iſt es, daß er vom Publikum ungemein warm und ehrlich ausgezeichnet wurde.

Die Novität trug den Titel „Iriſh Fantaſies" für Stimme und Orcheſter, und zwar trug Herr MacCormack drei der im Ganzen die Zahl fünf betragenden Stücke vor, nämlich „The Hoſt of the Air", „The Fiddler of Dooney" und „Caitilin Ni Ballachain". Die zwei erſtgenannten ſind auf Gedichte von W. B. Yeats, das dritte auf ein Gedicht von W. Hefernan geſchrieben. Unter dieſen iſt das erſterwähnte bei weitem das wertvollſte; es iſt poetiſcher Stimmung voll, apart behandelt und mit ſtarker Wirkung durchwoben. Die Inſtrumentation ſteckt voll feiner Züge, was zum Teil auch von den beiden anderen Liedern gelten kann, welche jedoch mehr durch rhythmiſchen Schmiß, ſowie durch gewiſſe etwas ausgeklügelte Effekte wirken. Die Aufführung hatte ſich eines ehrlichen Erfolges zu erfreuen.

Schubert's Symphonie in C-Dur wurde von Herrn Monteux mit liebevoller Ausbreitung des Melos dirigiert und vom Orcheſter ſehr klangſchön geſpielt. Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Ruſſian Eaſter" mit ſeinen charakterichiſch moskowitiſchen Klängen beſchloß ein Konzert, das auch dem Dirigenten und ſeinen Mannen einen ſehr ſchönen Erfolg brachte.

STAATS. MAR. 17

NEW YORK EVE. GLOBE

ISSUE OF MAR 17 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at its last concert, Saturday afternoon, Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama for Full Orchestra," its first performance in New York. According to the programme notes by Philip Hale, "Schreker, born of Austrian parents, studied music in Vienna with Robert Fuchs. In 1911 he founded and became the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic chorus. In 1912 he was appointed teacher of composition at the Imperial Academy of Music in Vienna. As a composer he has been hotly discussed. His admirers have been as enthusiastic as his opponents have been bitter." He is at present head professor of composition at the Hochschule in Berlin.

Under the title of "Portrait of My Character," Schreker contributed the following personal exploitation to the latest issue of the Art Review:

"I am an impressionist, an expressionist, an internationalist, a futurist, a musical verist (an exponent of musical truth), a Jew, and raised through the power of Judaism, a Christian, and one "made" by a Catholic (Romish) clique under the patronage of a thorough arch-Catholic Viennese princess.

"I am an artificer in sound (sound-artist—Klangkunstler), a fantastic in sound (Klangphantist, a magician in sound, an æsthetic in sound, and I have not a trace of melody in me apart from the so-called asthmatic phrases nowadays called "melodylets." I am a melodist of pure lineage, but as a harmonist anæmic, perverse, and in spite of it all, a full-blooded musician. I am (unfortunately!) an erotomane, and I exercise a corrupt influence over the German public (erotic feelings are obviously my very own invention in spite of Figaro, Don Juan, Carmen, Tannhäuser, Tristan, Walküre, Salome, Elektra, Rosenkavalier, etc.).

"But I am also an idealist (thank heaven!) a symbolist, I stand on the extremist left wing of the moderns (Schönberg, Debussy), I do not stand entirely on the left, am harmless in my music, use triads, even the absolutely "trivial" diminished seventh, am inclined to Verdi, Puccini, Halévy, and Meyerbeer; am absolutely odd, a speculator in the instincts of the masses, a dramatist for the cinema, a being who draws his strength from longing and morbid trifles. I write exclusively homophon, my scores are both masterpieces in counterpoint and in artistic "mannerism," my music is pure and true, pondered over, puzzled out, sought out, a sea of euphony (sweet sounds—Wohllaut), an appalling accumulation of cacophonies (discords), I am, as contrasted with others, a self-advertiser of the worst sort, am full of new wine, a grand document of the decay of our culture, mad, a clear calculating mind, a miserable conductor, but on the other hand a personality as a conductor, a brilliant technologist, am not even capable of conducting my own works and conduct them all the time), and in any case I am a "case" (some will maintain a bad case, others a case of [illegible]), further I am a but my poetical gift is undoubtedly far more remarkable than my musical gift, my music grows out of poetry, my poetry out of music, I am the antippodes of Pfitzner, Wagner's only disciple, a competitor with Strauss and Puccini, I flatter the public, write only in order to annoy all people, and a little while ago actually thought of emigrating to—Peru!

"But what on earth am I not? I am not mad (so far!), I have not a swelled head, I am not embittered, I am no ascetic, no duffer or dilettante, and have never yet written a criticism."

From MAR 17 1922
EVENING WORLD
New York City

John McCormack Sings With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By Frank H. Warren.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra for its last evening concert of the season by enlisting John McCormack as soloist reclaimed some of its lost attendance laurels. It looked like the old Boston days to see all the boxes at Carnegie Hall occupied. Mr. McCormack had two widely contrasted duties to perform. First he sang two Bach arias, taken from sacred cantatas, simple and sincere, with honest orchestral accompaniment. They constituted the high lights of the programme, brief as they were. And here Mr. McCormack's versatile art was brought into play, for he sang them in true classic style, unaffected, with the clearest of diction and with the proper religious feeling. A noble illustration of his art. His other offering was three Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra by Charles Martin Loeffler, who, though born an Alsatian, has long made his home near Boston. Of the fantasies, entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney," and "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan," a name by which Ireland was allegorically known, the first two are poems by W. B. Yeats and the third by W. Hefernan. Mr. Loeffler has dressed these ballads with ingenious accompaniments, often artificial and complex, and foreign to the simple spirit of the texts. His treatment of "The Host of the Air" would scarcely be recognized by Mr. McCormack's host of regular supporters. It might be termed the Irish Free State of composition. "The Fiddler of Dooney" had fancy, though the composer played loose with the verse rhythm. The "Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" brought smiles and approving nods from the audience because of the orchestral imitation of the Irish bagpipes and a march tempo. Mr. McCormack was as fully in sympathy with these involved numbers as he is with his customary run of Irish folk tunes, and here again his diction, style and sound feeling for the text call for approbation. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme were Schubert's C major symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

BROOKLYN EAGLE

ISSUE OF MAR 17 1922

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

John McCormack lent his informing art to the Boston Symphony's program last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was St. Patrick's Eve, but the tenor's presence had a definite musical significance—the introduction to this town of three Irish Fantasies, for voice and orchestra, by Charles Martin Loeffler. In addition, Mr. McCormack sang eloquently arias from two of Bach's sacred cantatas, while the strictly orchestral part of the program comprised Schubert's Symphony in C Major and the Overture which Rimsky-Korsakoff made out of thematic treasuries of the Russian Church.

Charles Martin Loeffler does not compose much music, or if he does he hesitates to give it to the world. He works slowly, painstakingly. He believes thoroughly in revision. There was the stunning "Hora Mystica," for example, a composition which made a deep impression at one of the Norfolk Festivals. Immediately thereafter Mr. Loeffler withdrew the work. So far as I know he is still engaged in its rewriting.

Some fifteen years ago Mr. Loeffler set for voice and piano "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air," poems by W. B. Yeats. Since he has added to the list of Irish Fantasies three others—"The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin Ni Vallachain"—and has scored all five for voice and orchestra. "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter" were not sung last evening. The three heard are eloquent pieces. Mr. Loeffler's composing has atmosphere, a breath from the Irish hills. They encompass a study in pentatonic scales. He has written meaningfully for the voice, a fact of which Mr. McCormack took full advantage. Every word was distinct in the singer's mouth, and eloquent, inasmuch as the vocal line served its true purpose of heightening the textual content.

The orchestral message is true. Mr. Loeffler paints in tone, whether the mood be gay or somber. His accompaniments mirror the emotions, reflect the image of every line of song. There's noble protest in the sorrows of "Caitilin-ni-Holahan" (blind Hefernan's allegorical name for the Auld Sod), lifted and invigorated by the solemn intoning of a prayer to the Virgin. In "The Fiddler of Dooney" the orchestral handling boasts a lightness of touch, a delicacy of sentiment that is vivid in its picturing of

"For the good are always merry,
Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle,
And the merry love to dance."

As for "The Host of the Air," those who remember the composer's "Devil's Villanelle" will recognize an old love for the eerie and the fantastic. The little folk of Irish legend were certain to appeal to a Loeffler imagination, for there's more of the Gaul in this Alsatian musician than he wots of. He is a true medievalist—a believer in ecclesiastical glory (recall the "Hora Mystica"), a friend of gentle and loving superstition—yet, withal, a pagan at heart. His muse is on familiar ground in "The Host." Should his eloquence, therefore, be an occasion for marvel?

NEW YORK EVE. GLOBE

ISSUE OF MAR 17 1922

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

John McCormack Sings Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies" With the Boston Symphony.

Three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Charles Martin Loeffler were the feature of the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Loeffler is the author of a set of "Five Irish Fantasies" from which the three songs sung on this occasion are taken. The text of two of these songs, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are by W. B. Yeats. The third song is composed to a poem by W. Hefernan, the Blind, entitled "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan."

In the two songs with words by Mr. Yeats, Mr. Loeffler has worked a spell that is truly magical. The Alsatian-American composer has matched in fancy, in caprice, in eeriness the imaginings of the Irish poet. It is music marked by the quick sensitiveness of mood and the exquisite feeling for instrumental color that have always characterized Mr. Loeffler as a composer. Especially memorable is the song of O'Driscoll's strange adventure, and haunting indeed is the music set to the lines,

And never was piping so sad
And never was piping so gay,

and again to these:

And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long, dim hair.

"The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" seems at a first hearing less inspired. There is here the suspicion of effort, of the master-workman deliberately fabricating something.

Mr. Monteux conducted the elaborate accompaniments to the songs most sympathetically, and Mr. McCormack sang the songs as probably not another singer could. His clear enunciation and his emotional fervor combined with the native beauty of his voice to carry all before them. The large audience received the songs with enthusiasm. After Messrs. McCormack and Monteux had bowed several times, Mr. Loeffler himself appeared on the stage. For him there was an ovation.

Earlier in the concert Mr. McCormack sang two Bach airs, both from church cantatas. The first, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from the cantata of the same name, is only second best Bach, like unto scores of other Bach airs, but the second, "Take for Your Very Own," from the cantata "All They From Sheba Shall Come," is a piece possessed of singular charm, with even a curious pre-echo in it of "Boris Godounoff." Mr. McCormack sang them both most admirably.

There were two instrumental numbers on the programme—Schubert's C major symphony, which opened it, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which closed it.

The most salient quality of Schubert's great C major symphony is its persistent, inevitable rhythm, as of a gigantic mechanism. Each section ought to move relentlessly, without change or modification, at the tempo chosen. But human conductors have of late years taken to tampering with the pace and indulging in nuances that detract from the character of the music. One would like to hear the work conducted by a metronome. Mr. Monteux in his reading yesterday deferred to the prevailing fashion. But, still, his reading was painstaking, the orchestral performance was a fine one, and the audience applauded with seeming approval, so why bother about Schubert and his inevitable and relentless rhythm?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's rich-hued and sonorous overture was played superbly.

FROM MAR 17 1922
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

McCormack Sings With Boston Band

New Loeffler Composition Is Heard for First Time—Opera in Brooklyn Next Week

By Henry T. Finck

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra always had prominent soloists at its home concerts, it dispensed with them in its Carnegie Hall series, and the audiences were nevertheless large. They are not so large now that M. Monteux is the conductor, and it seems probable that in the future a bid for larger audiences will be made by having soloists here as well as in Boston. Last night, at any rate, there was a soloist, McCormack, who never fails to draw large audiences, usually at the spacious Hippodrome. He seemed somewhat out of his element when he sang "Mein liebster Jesus ist verloren" and "Nimm mich Du zu eigen hin" from two of Bach's cantatas, but gave more pleasure in Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Piano," which were the evening's novelty, and the third of which, "Caitilin Ni Vallachain," approximated his specialty. Here he could let out the full force of his voice, although one wonders how he can have any voice at all with his chin up high in the air, which is bad for the throat and gives an appearance of effort that is not agreeable.

In this third number Loeffler's music, both vocal and orchestral, is far more original and interesting than in the two songs which precede it: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney." Here singer and players do little more than intensify the spirit of Yeats's poems. That Mr. Loeffler knows how to write for orchestra has been demonstrated heretofore. It was pleasant to note the absence of all Debussyan influences, although there are signs of a struggle in the last two stanzas of "The Host of the Air."

The orchestra, under M. Monteux, was heard to great advantage in this work by Mr. Loeffler, who was once a member of it. The conductor's interpretation, on the other hand, of the opening number of the programme, Schubert's C major symphony, was perfunctory. There is a world of poetry in this work of "heavenly length" which M. Monteux's conducting did not reveal.

FROM TELEGRAPH
MAR 17 1922
NEW YORK CITY

M'CORMACK SINGS WITH BOSTON BAND

Tenor Takes Part in New Irish Fantasies by Charles Loeffler at Concert Last Night.

The last but one of the current season's Boston Symphony concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last evening with John McCormack as soloist. The auditorium was packed almost to suffocation and the audience was about as enthusiastic as Carnegie has ever sheltered.

The program, prepared in honor of St. Patrick's Day, was composed of Irish music and real Irish melody. Charles Martin Loeffler's series of Irish fantasies, which was given its first performance before a New York audience, was warmly received.

"The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Doonly," verses by Yeats, and "Kathleen Ni Iulahan," a setting of an old ballad embodying the spirit of Ireland, were enjoyable and melodious. Mr. McCormack sang the voice part, with Pierre Monteux directing the orchestra.

The final program of the Boston Symphony will be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, when Franz Schreker's "The Prelude to a Drama" will be offered as a featured number.

---

om MAR 17 1922
VENING MAIL
New York City

OPERA and CONCERT

By KATHARINE SPAETH

THE policeman came in off his beat to hear John McCormack sing Bach with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and he stayed for Loeffler's conception of Irish music, interpreted by the same combination.

It was difficult to tell which was the more modern of the two composers, in spite of the vast difference in the resources through which they achieved their effects.

Bach accomplished his purpose simply and with the greatest economy of material. Loeffler aimed at a similar simplicity eventually, but approached it by paths of elaborate complexity.

The Irish tunes themselves were what made the Loeffler work really worth while, and no amount of orchestration and modern harmony could hide their essential gusto. Mr. McCormack sang the three numbers as sympathetically as the most mothery of his ballads.

It was in his Bach, however, that the tenor revealed his greatest art. The need of true vocal beauty in such music was never so clearly demonstrated as last evening. The ease with which the long, sustained phrases poured from the golden McCormack throat emphasized the eternal simplicity of genius without ever betraying the technique that made such an accomplishment possible.

Mr. Monteux began his programme with Schubert and ended it with Rimsky-Korsakoff, all ravishingly played.

At the opera house Catalani's "Loreley" drew a capacity audience to hear the singing of Muzio, Sundelius, Gigli and Danise.

BROOKLYN EAGLE

ISSUE OF MAR 1 .. 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy for this season was made memorable by the presence of that great and rarely heard artist, Emilio de Gogorza. Mr. De Gogorza sang only two songs although but for the iron clad rule of the Boston orchestra against encores he could hardly have escaped with less than half a dozen. His is that perfection of art which makes difficult things sound easy. The noble simplicity of "Where'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," with its finely rounded and noble tones, offered the most perfect evidence of this mastery. Mr. De Gogorza sang it as simply and easily as if it had been a Scotch ballad. The contrasting "Song of a Prisoner," by F. M. Alvarez, had warmth and depth of tragic feeling, yet it was given as naturally as the other, the moving tone color being attained without a touch of effort. It was singing far above the usual concert standard.

For the rest, there was the Schubert Symphony in C, not often played in these days. To tell the truth 53 minutes of a symphony is a good deal, even when Schubert wrote it. The work delights and must always delight lovers of Schubert's songs, because of its lovely and abounding melody, but without the modern orchestral devices for securing variety melody, even Schubert melody, can seem long drawn out.

The Debussy group, "Iberia," suffered for one thing because it followed a Spanish song with real flesh and blood in it, and for another because the rhythms of the first piece in the group suggested those of "Carmen" so strongly that one missed the qualities of Bizet which Debussy so conspicuously lacks. When it comes to dreams and moonlight, however, Debussy is supreme, and the piece called "The Fragrance of the Night" was charmingly, even hauntingly, ethereal, and his performance by Monteux and his men was con amore. The concert closed with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," not often heard of late. The music is not very big Wagner, but it would have been tremendously big Berlioz. Its sonorous brasses were welcome.

Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Die Boſtoner kommen uns nur ſelten mit Soliſten, geſtern aber machte eine von Herrn Monteux vorgeführte Reihe von drei Loeffler'ſchen Liedern mit Orcheſterverbrämung die Mitwirkung eines hervorragenden Tenors zur Bedingung, und dazu wurde Herr John McCormack erkoren. Carnegie Hall war ſehr gut beſucht, und der populäre Künſtler errang einen wirklichen Erfolg. Er erſchien zuerſt mit zwei Bach'ſchen Werken, nämlich der Arie aus der Kantate „Mein liebſter Jeſu iſt verloren“ und „Nimm mich Dir zu eigen hin“ aus der Kantate „Sie werden aus Saba Alle kommen“. Des Künſtlers Stimme klang da, ſo ſchön er auch den Stil meiſterte, mitunter naſal, was bei Bach's durchſichtiger Klarheit jederzeit ein Nachteil iſt, ſonſt könnte man dem Sänger nichts vorwerfen. Sicher iſt es, daß er vom Publikum ungemein warm und ehrlich ausgezeichnet wurde.

Die Novität trug den Titel „Iriſh Fantaſies“ für Stimme und Orcheſter, und zwar trug Herr MacCormack drei der im Ganzen die Zahl fünf betragenden Stücke vor, nämlich „The Hoſt of the Air“, „The Fiddler of Dooney“ und „Caitilin Ni Ballachain“. Die zwei erſtgenannten ſind auf Gedichte von W. B. Yeats, das dritte auf ein Gedicht von W. Hefernan geſchrieben. Unter dieſen iſt das erſterwähnte bei weitem das wertvollſte; es iſt poetiſcher Stimmung voll, apart behandelt und mit ſtarker Wirkung durchwoben. Die Inſtrumentation ſteckt voll feiner Züge, was zum Teil auch von den beiden anderen Liedern gelten kann, welche jedoch mehr durch rhythmiſchen Schmiß, ſowie durch gewiſſe etwas ausgeklügelte Effekte wirken. Die Aufführung hatte ſich eines ehrlichen Erfolges zu erfreuen.

Schubert's Symphonie in C-Dur wurde von Herrn Monteux mit liebevoller Ausbreitung des Melos dirigiert und vom Orcheſter ſehr klangſchön geſpielt. Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Ruſſian Eaſter“ mit ſeinen charakterichiſch moskowitiſchen Klängen beſchloß ein Konzert, das auch dem Dirigenten und ſeinen Mannen einen ſehr ſchönen Erfolg brachte.

STAATS

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 17 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at its last concert, Saturday afternoon, Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama for Full Orchestra," its first performance in New York. According to the programme notes by Philip Hale, "Schreker, born of Austrian parents, studied music in Vienna with Robert Fuchs. In 1911 he founded and became the conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic chorus. In 1912 he was appointed teacher of composition at the Imperial Academy of Music in Vienna. As a composer he has been hotly discussed. His admirers have been as enthusiastic as his opponents have been bitter." He is at present head professor of composition at the Hochschule in Berlin.

Under the title of "Portrait of My Character," Schreker contributed the following personal exploitation to the latest issue of the Art Review:

"I am an impressionist, an expressionist, an internationalist, a futurist, a musical verist (an exponent of musical truth), a Jew, and raised through the power of Judaism, a Christian, and one "made" by a Catholic (Romish) clique under the patronage of a thorough arch-Catholic Viennese princess.

"I am an artificer in sound (sound-artist—Klangkunstler), a fantastic in sound (Klangphantist, a magician in sound, an æsthetic in sound, and I have not a trace of melody in me apart from the so-called asthmatic phrases nowadays called "melodylets." I am a melodist of pure lineage, but as a harmonist anæmic, perverse, and in spite of it all, a full-blooded musician. I am (unfortunately!) an erotomane, and I exercise a corrupt influence over the German public (erotic feelings are obviously my very own invention in spite of Figaro, Don Juan, Carmen, Tannhäuser, Tristan, Walküre, Salome, Elektra, Rosenkavalier, etc.).

"But I am also an idealist (thank heaven!) a symbolist, I stand on the extremist left wing of the moderns (Schönberg, Debussy), I do not stand entirely on the left, am harmless in my music, use triads, even the absolutely "trivial" diminished seventh, am inclined to Verdi, Puccini, Halévy, and Meyerbeer; am absolutely odd, a speculator in the instincts of the masses, a dramatist for the cinema, a being who draws his strength from longing and morbid trifles. I write exclusively homophon, my scores are both masterpieces in counterpoint and in artistic "mannerism," my music is pure and true, pondered over, puzzled out, sought out, a sea of euphony (sweet sounds—Wohllaut), an appalling accumulation of cacophonies (discords), I am, as contrasted with others, a self-advertiser of the worst sort, am full of new wine, a grand document of the decay of our culture, mad, a clear calculating mind, a miserable conductor, but on the other hand a personality as a conductor, a brilliant technologist, am not even capable of conducting my own works (and conduct them all the time), and in any case I am a "case" (some will maintain a bad case, others a case of [illegible]) (Reinfall), further I am a [illegible] but a good musi[illegible] but my poetical gift is undoubtedly far more remarkable than my musical gift, my music grows out of poetry, my poetry out of music, I am the antippodes of Pfitzner, Wagner's only disciple, a competitor with Strauss and Puccini, I flatter the public, write only in order to annoy all people, and a little while ago actually thought of emigrating to—Peru.

"But what on earth am I not? I am not mad (so far!), I have not a swelled head, I am not embittered, I am no ascetic, no duffer or dilettante, and have never yet written a criticism."

From MAR 17 1922
EVENING WORLD
New York City

John McCormack Sings With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By Frank H. Warren.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra for its last evening concert of the season by enlisting John McCormack as soloist reclaimed some of its lost attendance laurels. It looked like the old Boston days to see all the boxes at Carnegie Hall occupied. Mr. McCormack had two widely contrasted duties to perform. First he sang two Bach arias, taken from sacred cantatas, simple and sincere, with honest orchestral accompaniment. They constituted the high lights of the programme, brief as they were. And here Mr. McCormack's versatile art was brought into play, for he sang them in true classic style, unaffected, with the clearest of diction and with the proper religious feeling. A noble illustration of his art. His other offering was three Irish fantasies for voice and orchestra by Charles Martin Loeffler, who, though born an Alsatian, has long made his home near Boston. Of the fantasies, entitled "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney," and "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan," a name by which Ireland was allegorically known, the first two are poems by W. B. Yeats and the third by W. Hefernan. Mr. Loeffler has dressed these ballads with ingenious accompaniments, often artificial and complex, and foreign to the simple spirit of the texts. His treatment of "The Host of the Air" would scarcely be recognized by Mr. McCormack's host of regular supporters. It might be termed the Irish Free State of composition. "The Fiddler of Dooney" had fancy, though the composer played loose with the verse rhythm. The "Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" brought smiles and approving nods from the audience because of the orchestral imitation of the Irish bagpipes and a march tempo. Mr. McCormack was as fully in sympathy with these involved numbers as he is with his customary run of Irish folk tunes, and here again his diction, style and sound feeling for the text call for approbation. The purely orchestral numbers on the programme were Schubert's C major symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter."

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 17 1922

~~THE BOSTON SYMPHONY~~

16

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

John McCormack lent his informing art to the Boston Symphony's program last evening in Carnegie Hall. It was St. Patrick's Eve, but the tenor's presence had a definite musical significance—the introduction to this town of three Irish Fantasies, for voice and orchestra, by Charles Martin Loeffler. In addition, Mr. McCormack sang eloquently arias from two of Bach's sacred cantatas, while the strictly orchestral part of the program comprised Schubert's Symphony in C Major and the Overture which Rimsky-Korsakoff made out of thematic treasuries of the Russian Church.

Charles Martin Loeffler does not compose much music, or if he does he hesitates to give it to the world. He works slowly, painstakingly. He believes thoroughly in revision. There was the stunning "Hora Mystica," for example, a composition which made a deep impression at one of the Norfolk Festivals. Immediately thereafter Mr. Loeffler withdrew the work. So far as I know he is still engaged in its rewriting.

Some fifteen years ago Mr. Loeffler set for voice and piano "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Host of the Air," poems by W. B. Yeats. Since he has added to the list of Irish Fantasies three others—"The Ballad of the Fox Hunter," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin Ni Vallachain"—and has scored all five for voice and orchestra. "The Hoisting of the Sidhe" and "The Ballad of the Fox Hunter" were not sung last evening.

The three heard are eloquent pieces. Mr. Loeffler's composing has atmosphere, a breath from the Irish hills. They encompass a study in pentatonic scales. He has written meaningfully for the voice, a fact of which Mr. McCormack took full advantage. Every word was distinct in the singer's mouth, and eloquent, inasmuch as the vocal line served its true purpose of heightening the textual content.

The orchestral message is true. Mr. Loeffler paints in tone, whether the mood be gay or somber. His accompaniments mirror the emotions, reflect the image of every line of song. There's noble protest in the sorrows of "Caitilin-ni-Holahan" (blind Hefernan's allegorical name for the Auld Sod), lifted and invigorated by the solemn intoning of a prayer to the Virgin. In "The Fiddler of Dooney" the orchestral handling boasts a lightness of touch, a delicacy of sentiment that is vivid in its picturing of

"For the good are always merry,
  Save by an evil chance,
And the merry love the fiddle,
  And the merry love to dance."

As for "The Host of the Air," those who remember the composer's "Devil's Villanelle" will recognize an old love for the eerie and the fantastic. The little folk of Irish legend were certain to appeal to a Loeffler imagination, for there's more of the Gaul in this Alsatian musician than he wots of. He is a true medievalist—a believer in ecclesiastical glory (recall the "Hora Mystica"), a friend of gentle and loving superstition—yet, withal, a pagan at heart. His muse is on familiar ground in "The Host." Should his eloquence, therefore, be an occasion for marvel?

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 17 1922

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

John McCormack Sings Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies" With the Boston Symphony.

Three songs with orchestral accompaniment by Charles Martin Loeffler were the feature of the Boston Symphony Concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Loeffler is the author of a set of "Five Irish Fantasies" from which the three songs sung on this occasion are taken. The text of two of these songs, "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney" are by W. B. Yeats. The third song is composed to a poem by W. Hefernan, the Blind, entitled "The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan."

In the two songs with words by Mr. Yeats, Mr. Loeffler has worked a spell that is truly magical. The Alsatian-American composer has matched in fancy, in caprice, in eeriness the imaginings of the Irish poet. It is music marked by the quick sensitiveness of mood and the exquisite feeling for instrumental color that have always characterized Mr. Loeffler as a composer. Especially memorable is the song of O'Driscoll's strange adventure, and haunting indeed is the music set to the lines,

And never was piping so sad
And never was piping so gay,

and again to these:

And his neck and his breast and his arms
Were drowned in her long, dim hair.

"The Song of Caitilin-Ni-Holahan" seems at a first hearing less inspired. There is here the suspicion of effort, of the master-workman deliberately fabricating something.

Mr. Monteux conducted the elaborate accompaniments to the songs most sympathetically, and Mr. McCormack sang the songs as probably not another singer could. His clear enunciation and his emotional fervor combined with the native beauty of his voice to carry all before them. The large audience received the songs with enthusiasm. After Messrs. McCormack and Monteux had bowed several times, Mr. Loeffler himself appeared on the stage. For him there was an ovation.

Earlier in the concert Mr. McCormack sang two Bach airs, both from church cantatas. The first, "Lost Is My Dear Jesus," from the cantata of the same name, is only second best Bach, like unto scores of other Bach airs, but the second, "Take for Your Very Own," from the cantata "All They From Sheba Shall Come," is a piece possessed of singular charm, with even a curious pre-echo in it of "Boris Godounoff." Mr. McCormack sang them both most admirably.

There were two instrumental numbers on the programme—Schubert's C major symphony, which opened it, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture, which closed it. The most salient quality of Schubert's great C major symphony is its persistent, inevitable rhythm, as of a gigantic mechanism. Each section ought to move relentlessly, without change or modification, at the tempo chosen. But human conductors have of late years taken to tampering with the pace and indulging in nuances that detract from the character of the music. One would like to hear the work conducted by a metronome. Mr. Monteux in his reading yesterday deferred to the prevailing fashion. But, still, his reading was painstaking, the orchestral performance was a fine one, and the audience applauded with seeming approval, so why bother about Schubert and his inevitable and relentless rhythm?

Rimsky-Korsakoff's rich-hued and sonorous overture was played superbly.

ROM MAR 1
VE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

McCormack Sings With Boston Band

New Loeffler Composition Is Heard for First Time—Opera in Brooklyn Next Week

By Henry T. Finck

While the Boston Symphony Orchestra always had prominent soloists at its home concerts, it dispensed with them in its Carnegie Hall series, and the audiences were nevertheless large. They are not so large now that M. Monteux is the conductor, and it seems probable that in the future a bid for larger audiences will be made by having soloists here as well as in Boston. Last night, at any rate, there was a soloist, McCormack, who never fails to draw large audiences, usually at the spacious Hippodrome. He seemed somewhat out of his element when he sang "Mein liebster Jesus ist verloren" and "Nimm mich Du zu eigen hin" from two of Bach's cantatas, but gave more pleasure in Loeffler's "Irish Fantasies for Voice and Piano," which were the evening's novelty, and the third of which, "Caitilin Ni Vallachain," approximated his specialty. Here he could let out the full force of his voice, although one wonders how he can have any voice at all with his chin up high in the air, which is bad for the throat and gives an appearance of effort that is not agreeable.

In this third number Loeffler's music, both vocal and orchestral, is far more original and interesting than in the two songs which precede it: "The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Dooney." Here singer and players do little more than intensify the spirit of Yeats's poems. That Mr. Loeffler knows how to write for orchestra has been demonstrated heretofore. It was pleasant to note the absence of all Debussyan influences, although there are signs of a struggle in the last two stanzas of "The Host of the Air."

The orchestra, under M. Monteux, was heard to great advantage in this work by Mr. Loeffler, who was once a member of it. The conductor's interpretation, on the other hand, of the opening number of the programme, Schubert's C major symphony, was perfunctory. There is a world of poetry in this work of "heavenly length" which M. Monteux's conducting did not reveal.

FROM TELEGRAPH
MAR 1
NEW YORK CITY

M'CORMACK SINGS WITH BOSTON BAND

Tenor Takes Part in New Irish Fantasies by Charles Loeffler at Concert Last Night.

The last but one of the current season's Boston Symphony concerts took place in Carnegie Hall last evening with John McCormack as soloist. The auditorium was packed almost to suffocation and the audience was about as enthusiastic as Carnegie has ever sheltered.

The program, prepared in honor of St. Patrick's Day, was composed of Irish music and real Irish melody. Charles Martin Loeffler's series of Irish fantasies, which was given its first performance before a New York audience, was warmly received.

"The Host of the Air" and "The Fiddler of Doonly," verses by Yeats, and "Kathleen Ni Iulahan," a setting of an old ballad embodying the spirit of Ireland, were enjoyable and melodious. Mr. McCormack sang the voice part, with Pierre Monteux directing the orchestra.

The final program of the Boston Symphony will be given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, when Franz Schreker's "The Prelude to a Drama" will be offered as a featured number.

BROOKLYN
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy for this season was made memorable by the presence of that great and rarely heard artist, Emilio de Gogorza. Mr. De Gogorza sang only two songs although but for the iron clad rule of the Boston orchestra against encores he could hardly have escaped with less than half a dozen. His is that perfection of art which makes difficult things sound easy. The noble simplicity of "Where'er You Walk," from Handel's "Semele," with its finely rounded and noble tones, offered the most perfect evidence of this mastery. Mr. De Gogorza sang it as simply and easily as if it had been a Scotch ballad. The contrasting "Song of a Prisoner," by F. M. Alvarez, had warmth and depth of tragic feeling, yet it was given as naturally as the other, the moving tone color being attained without a touch of effort. It was singing far above the usual concert standard.

For the rest, there was the Schubert Symphony in C, not often played in these days. To tell the truth 53 minutes of a symphony is a good deal, even when Schubert wrote it. The work delights and must always delight lovers of Schubert's songs, because of its lovely and abounding melody, but without the modern orchestral devices for securing variety melody, even Schubert melody, can seem long drawn out.

The Debussy group, "Iberia," suffered for one thing because it followed a Spanish song with real flesh and blood in it, and for another because the rhythms of the first piece in the group suggested those of "Carmen" so strongly that one missed the qualities of Bizet which Debussy so conspicuously lacks. When it comes to dreams and moonlight, however, Debussy is supreme, and the piece called "The Fragrance of the Night" was charmingly, even hauntingly, ethereal, and its performance by Monteux and his men was con amore. The concert closed with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," not often heard of late. The music is not very big Wagner, but it would have been tremendously big Berlioz. Its sonorous brasses were welcome.

---

om
VENING MAIL
New York City

OPERA and CONCERT

By KATHARINE SPAETH

THE policeman came in off his beat to hear John McCormack sing Bach with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and he stayed for Loeffler's conception of Irish music, interpreted by the same combination.

It was difficult to tell which was the more modern of the two composers, in spite of the vast difference in the resources through which they achieved their effects.

Bach accomplished his purpose simply and with the greatest economy of material. Loeffler aimed at a similar simplicity eventually, but approached it by paths of elaborate complexity.

The Irish tunes themselves were what made the Loeffler work really worth while, and no amount of orchestration and modern harmony could hide their essential gusto. Mr. McCormack sang the three numbers as sympathetically as the most mothery of his ballads.

It was in his Bach, however, that the tenor revealed his greatest art. The need of true vocal beauty in such music was never so clearly demonstrated as last evening. The ease with which the long, sustained phrases poured from the golden McCormack throat emphasized the eternal simplicity of genius without ever betraying the technique that made such an accomplishment possible.

Mr. Monteux began his programme with Schubert and ended it with Rimsky-Korsakoff, all ravishingly played.

At the opera house Catalani's "Loreley" drew a capacity audience to hear the singing of Muzio, Sundelius, Gigli and Danise.

[93]

From
AMERICAN
New York City
MAR 17 1922

In the Music World

By MAX SMITH.

RETURNING to New York for their two final concerts of the season, Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra brought with them last night in Carnegie Hall a soloist, if you please, and no less distinguished a one than John McCormack.

In departing from their usual custom, however, the musicians from the Hub had a valid artistic excuse. For their programme included not only two airs by Bach but three of Charles Martin Loeffler's Five Irish Fantasies for voice and orchestra. And what singer could have met the requirements of the concert, especially in the last-named folk-lore experiments, more delightfully and more authoritatively than the famous tenor from the Emerald Isle. Moreover, was this not the eve of St. Patrick's Day?

Mr. Loeffler needs no introduction to the local public. He stands in the very front rank of Americanized composers, and the three pieces heard yesterday for the first time here—instrumental tone-pictures with voice, entitled respectively "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan"—ought to add something to his well earned reputation.

Especially imaginative in conception and execution is the first song, which dates back to 1909. For here the composer has found instrumental tints and harmonic colors that illustrate and illuminate with peculiar felicity the poem by Yeats.

There is much animation and humor in the brilliantly orchestrated "Fiddler of Dooney," with its clever use of characteristically Irish jig rhythms and pipe tunes. There are moments stirringly impressive, too, in the treatment of W. Hefernan's poem, as in the verse beginning "We will not bear the chains we bear," which Loeffler builds up in a remarkable crescendo.

In inspiration and spontaneity of feeling the two later works, however, are not equal to the earlier composition. They seem strained and labored in comparison.

The insinuating timbre of McCormack's voice and the tenor's extraordinarily distinct diction were peculiarly well adapted to the Loeffler tone-poems—better, indeed, than to the two airs by Bach: "Lost is my dear Jesus" from the similarly entitled Cantata and "Take for your very own" from the Cantata "All they from Sheba shall come." And Mr. Loeffler himself joined the singer and conductor in acknowledging the enthusiastic and well-deserved applause of the audience.

The purely instrumental contributions of the evening embraced Schubert's C major symphony No. 7, heard several times recently, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, "La Grande Pâque Russe."

NEW YORK WORLD
ISSUE OF MAR 19 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Two Concerts Given at Aeolian Hall—Opera Bills by the Metropolitan.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York concert of this season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's "First Symphony," all magnificently played, and the audience applauded the conductor and the musicians in detail at the end.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, at his piano recital in the afternoon at Aeolian Hall, played Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Schubert's "Sonata in A Minor," Chopin's "Etude in E Major," his "Etude in C Minor," his "Prelude in D Flat Major" and his "Scherzo, Opus 20," Brahms's Intermezzo in E Minor" and his "Rhapsody in E Flat Major."

In the evening Adele Bliss, soprano, at Aeolian Hall sang Veracini's "Pastoral," Chausson's "Papillons," Fourdrain's "Chanson Norvegienne," Tschaikovsky's "Was I Not a Blade of Grass?" and songs by Handel, Gretchaninoff, MacDowell and others.

At the Metropolitan Opera House the afternoon opera was "Manon Lescaut," with Alda, Schaaf, Gigli and De Luca, conducted by Papi, and in the evening it was "Rigoletto," with Ottein, Perini, Berat, Chamlee, Danise and Didur, with Bomboschek conducting.

In Brooklyn the last of the ten opera performances of the season by the Metropolitan Opera Company was given last night—a double bill consisting of "The Secret of Suzanne," followed by "Pagliacci."

NEW YORK
Eve. Telegram
ISSUE OF
MAR 19 1922

Prelude by Schreker Well Orchestrated

There was a single novelty on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, a prelude to a drama by Franz Schreker. It is a clever work written in the complicated orchestral manner of Strauss, though not exactly imitative. There is melody and colorful instrumentation to be found in the prelude. It is an interesting if not an important work.

Yesterday's concert closed the series of Boston Sympony concerts here.

While there has not been as much interest in these entertainments as there was a few years ago, the Boston organization in many respects has shown improvement. Yesterday, for instance, Pierre Monteux conducted an excellent performance of Brahms' first symphony, a thing which he could not have done when he first came to America. He was always a skilled leader in French and Russian music. But he is now capable of interesting American audiences in the German classics as well.

Im letzten Programm der Bostoner führte uns Herr Monteux erstmalig eine Ouverture von Franz Schrecker vor, dem modernen deutschen Komponisten, der uns hier, so sehr er drüben auch gefeiert ist, namentlich auf unseren Opernbrettern hartnäckig vorenthalten wird. Diese Ouverture „zu einem Stücke“ ist ein solid und erfreulich gearbeitetes Musikwerk, das einen guten Eindruck von des Neutöners Talent beizubringen geeignet ist. Mit sehr gutem Material arbeitet das Stück, vielleicht etwas allzulange ausgedehnt, nach den besten Regeln und dabei deutlich individuellen Zügen folgerichtig, so daß man sich mit diesem extremen Modernisten, hinter dem offenbar ein ganzer Musiker steckt, ganz gut zu stellen vermag. Die treffliche Leitung von Herrn Monteux und die glänzende Orchesterleistung kamen dem Stücke gleichfalls sehr zugute. Der Beifall klang herzlich. Eine weitere Glanzleistung der Herren war Debussy's „Iberia“.

MAR:20

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season on Saturday afternoon with a concert the programme of which included Debussy's "Iberia" and Brahms's first symphony, the first of which had a brilliant and genuinely Parisian performance. There was also a novelty—Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." Schreker is well known in the opera houses and concert halls of Germany and Austria, but it remained for a Frenchman, M. Monteux, to try him on an American audience, so far as known to this writer, although it is possible he may have been tried in Chicago, Cincinnati, or Minneapolis. His "Prelude to a Drama" is agreeably free from obtrusive and meaningless dissonances; it has melody, which, while not strikingly new, is agreeable. The composition is too scholarly and too long to win popularity, but it was worth hearing. His demands in the way of instruments make it possible for only the largest orchestras to play his score.

NY POST MAR 20

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF MAR 20 1922

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Some Week-End Adventures in Unfamiliar Music—At Last Schreker.

The incuriosity of the New York public about music that is new or otherwise unfamiliar would be amazing if we weren't through long habit so inured to it. But it remains irritating, none the less. This season the "Five Pieces" for orchestra of Arnold Schönberg at last reached our concert rooms (and in all conscience they were long enough in getting there!) Was there then any concerted action on the part of patrons of the local concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra to persuade Mr. Stokowski to repeat the "Five Pieces" at the next concert in his Carnegie Hall series? Not a bit of it! Had he threatened to do anything of the kind there would much more likely have been a concerted action to drop him out of a Carnegie Hall window into the nearest subway chasm.

And yet a work not previously played here of such importance and so difficult to prepare as the "Five Pieces" ought as a matter of course to have been repeated at the next concert, and the patrons of those concerts, whether they individually enjoyed the pieces or not, ought to have insisted on the conductor's so doing through a curiosity not yet wholly satisfied, if for no higher motive. But no! It was back to a comfortable snooze in the shelter of the Bach barrel and the Brahms basket, and the certainty that when one woke up the law and the prophets would still be intact.

Similarly, the Chicago Opera Association regaled us with one lone performance of "The Love for the Three Oranges," an enormously difficult work to prepare for the stage, when, in a community really keen to the interest of the new, the sheer beauty and fun of the production entitled it to at least three performances. A distinguished visiting conductor from Holland was quite dazed because of the punishment meted out to him for daring to conduct here a symphony by Berlioz (no new man in music, by the way, this Berlioz!), and whenever some unsuspecting leader has the temerity to put a work by poor, old, half-crazed Anton Bruckner on a programme there is such an outcry that he promptly decides that Beethoven and Brahms are the only symphonists for New York, and safety and his job lie in sticking to the Immortal Nine and the Unflagging Four. Still, Gustav Mahler has his posthumous innings, and that is some satisfaction, whatever you may think of his music. One earnestly hopes that in some bright province of the asphodel fields his disembodied spirit laughs away in rich, ironic laughter all the painful memories of his corporeal sojourn in New York.

Now some unfamiliar music we do hear in this our town thanks to a few intrepid persons. The last of Lady Dean Paul's exceedingly interesting Concerts Internationaux de la Libre Esthétique at the Hotel Ambassador Saturday noon; the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, and the second concert of the International Composers' Guild at the Greenwich Village Theatre last evening are cases immediately in point.

Franz Schreker is regarded as one of the foremost composers of Germany to-day, and he is the author of a number of operas, and yet I do not recall his name on a New York programme previous to Saturday afternoon. He made his local début at the concert in question of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sandwiched in between Debussy's "Ibéria" and Brahms's first symphony. The work, for full orchestra, is entitled "Prelude to a Drama."

In this composition Schreker is distinctly of the school of Richard Strauss. There is an harmonic echo of Debussy, and there is a suggestion of Puccini, but in general the work moves along in the approved Wagnerian-Straussian manner, with plenty of Richard the Second's molasses in the score. The orchestration, rich and sonorous, but never fine or pungent, is distinctly of the Strauss school, though obviously of less than the Strauss excellence. This "Prelude to a Drama" is a dignified composition, but it does not reveal Schreker as a composer of vivid imagination or marked originally. Morover, it already sounds decidedly "dated."

NY GLOBE-MAR.20

NEW YORK
EVENING JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR 20 1922

MONTEUX PLAYS NEW GERMAN MUSIC

Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" Heard at Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Whatever Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, may or may not accomplish toward true revelation of the classics of the symphonic repertoire (and the reviewer's experience has been that they very largely elude him) he must be credited with an alert eagerness and a good deal of courage in regard to the music of his contemporaries. And strange and forbidding as some of it seems, this does not deter him; wherefore the concertgoer, except he have not yet emerged from the nineteenth century, ought to be grateful that this conductor appears to be alive to what is going on in the world.

At Saturday's concert of the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Monteux introduced to New York some of the not too recent output of the Austrian, Franz Schreker, none of whose music, so far as one knows, had been played here before, although Schreker has been the cause of much heated discussion in Austria and Germany for ten years or more. Mr. Monteux brought out the "Vorspiel zu einem Drama," which, however, proved to be no stranger than Richard Strauss and was a modicum so forbidding as Gustav Mahler.

SOUTHERN INFLUENCES.

This "Prelude to a Drama" (probably a drama definite enough in Schreker's mind, but an unwritten one) dates from 1913, when he was thirty-five. Except for the "Kammersymphonie," it is practically the only purely orchestral work of Schreker that has not been discarded. For his chief activity has been as an operatic composer, and it is as such that he is principally known and fought over in the German-speaking countries. He writes his own texts for these operas, and at least three of them have had considerable success, although hisses appear always to have mingled with the applause at their premieres. The latest of them, "Der Schatzgraber ("The Treasure Seeker," or literally, "Digger") was produced last year, but seems not to have been so successful as "Die Gezeichneten" ("Marked Men") or the still earlier "Der ferne Klang" ("The Sound Afar").

It is not without some significance that Schreker was born in Monaco, under southern skies, even though his parents were Austrian. The Mediterranean impulse shows itself in his music, which to this extent at least is less distinctively Germanic than that of any other of his contemporaries in Central and Northern Europe. Nevertheless, no one could mistake this "Prelude to a Drama" for anything else than the product of a Teutonic mind. Nor is it particularly impressive music. One glimpses the two Richards through it, both in character and quality of its orchestration and in the type and line of its melodic material; and the latter is never highly original or striking.

One's impression, indeed, is that Schreker at thirty-five has not yet found himself, although he does display certain solid accomplishments and much skill in handling his effects. Mr. Monteux played the piece with the vigor and breadth it seemed to require, but it is possible that a greater dynamic variety would have made it say more than it did.

The Schreker music was preceded by Debussy's "Iberia," presented with but little of the orchestral subtlety it so imperatively demands, and the afternoon was concluded with the Brahms C minor symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MIXED MATTER, WELL CONTRASTED, WELL PLAYED

Again Mr. Monteux Breaks Routine—Handel in a Characteristic Concerto—The Whole of Franck's "Psyche," Leaving Familiar Residue—Mr. Gilbert in New Music Variously

PRETEND as we may, most of us take the Symphony Concerts for granted. Through three pairs of them no symphony, classic or modern, has stood upon the programme—a break with precedent possibly hard to match in all the forty years of the orchestra. Yet if any one has heeded, no one, so far as observation goes, has murmured. Three weeks ago, Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" and Mr. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasias" left room for no more than two fragments of Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," passing as the occasional pieces they really were. The following week the orchestra journeyed to New York and there were no concerts in Boston. A week later Mr. d'Indy's exercises upon Schiller's plays about Wallenstein and Mr. Eichheim's excursions into music of the Orient denied place to any symphonist; while last Friday and Saturday, Franck's "Psyche" was as unkind.

Not so long ago it was possible to chide Mr. Monteux for the playing of too many classic symphonies in succession—albeit unjustly, since the engagements of the orchestra up and down New England left him no time to prepare any other. Now it were as plausible to charge him with neglect of symphonies altogether. Yet not a voice or a pen has stirred—because a symphony concert remains its pleasurable self, even if it contain no symphony. As the event has proved, the absence of these four-square monuments of music may even swell—for the while—the common enjoyment. Missing they have been for three full weeks; yet numberless voices have praised these self-same concerts as present climax to our orchestral year. So does change make still, burrowing way without a rustle of dissent. So does Mr. Monteux, as quietly, keep his programmes fluid, interesting, unexpected. Once more his works therein praise him. It is good to be bold—without fuss.

Handel began this third pair of Symphony Concerts without a symphony—the Handel of the long-promised Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs. Through nine movements, the superabundant composer led it—with no surfeit, seemingly, upon the receptive audiences of the leisurely eighteenth century. Five made "the limit" to which Mr. Monteux dared go in these shorter-breathed, more restless days; while of the five all but one were fresh versions of tunes used by Handel elsewhere in ode or oratorio. After all, a frugal spendthrift with his music was the paradoxical George Frideric. The Concerto begins with sonorous, striding, full-throated preluding—"pomposo" in the full force of the composer's guiding word. An Allegro ensues in which oboes begin to pipe or bassoons to drone between vigorous ensembles of the strings. A third division continues these exercises, more and more exacting and displayful upon the wind choirs. A fourth, and all concerned subside into a slow-paced, gravely phrased, loftily mournful song. A fifth and the horns are in full cry of fanfares between the massed, hard-riding strings.

Throughout, the Concerto is a superbly assertive, a superbly self-confident piece. That music could be written in any other way apparently never occurred to Handel or to his immediate hearers. There it was—six feet high, broad in proportion, firm of bone, thick of sinew, wagging its big head, marching in its big stride, speaking in its big voice, sober, merry, ceremonial, displayful, but never once doubting its own virtue or its own finality. Demur—and it rode down the timid questioner. It still rides down twentieth-century hearers; but they—the hypocrites!—have ceased to demur. Ancient they merely call it, and would have the mighty George Frideric agreeably exhumed now and then as symphonic composer. No wonder, the oboists, the bassoonists, the paired horns—to say nothing of the strings—played the Concerto to the full. Handel, in the actors' phrase, wrote music in which singers or players may set their teeth.

The "contrasting piece," as they say in the movies, was Franck's tone-poem of "Psyche," at the other end of the programme, heard for the first time "in entirety" in Boston. By this token, a choral interlude—for women's voices supplemented by a handful of tenors—parted the music of the Garden of Eros from the music of Eros and Psyche enlaced. It begins in measures of praise hymning the God of Love; it ends in admonition to Psyche lest, to her peril, she question bliss. Declamatory periods for single voice, understandingly sung by Mrs. Littlefield, diversify it; while in English, the text inclines to the succulent and seraphic prose of the late Mrs. Eddy. "Entirety" also brought the third part of the tone-poem wherewith Franck rounded both narrative and music. The chorus, capable, practised, but in no way remarkable with measures in themselves sparkless, recounted briefly the pangs of Psyche, outcast upon earth in penalty for her questioning. The orchestra, with occasional choral assistance, relented, pardoned, upbore her again to the amorous heavens upon a Jacob's ladder barred with all the motivs by Franck assembled. "Apotheosis" he named it—and rightly since the music nowhere excels the quality that word connotes in the opera house. It is agreed that the excellent Monsieur Meyerbeer might have signed certain pages in Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes." There is no more doubt that he would have clapped loudly after this "Apotheosis."

So was curiosity satisfied, so did Mr. Monteux fulfill a just ambition; but the sum and substance of "Psyche," the poetic [illegible], the tingling erotic imagery, the

[94]

MAR 17 1922

From
AMERICAN
New York City

In the Music World

By MAX SMITH.

RETURNING to New York for their two final concerts of the season, Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra brought with them last night in Carnegie Hall a soloist, if you please, and no less distinguished a one than John McCormack.

In departing from their usual custom, however, the musicians from the Hub had a valid artistic excuse. For their programme included not only two airs by Bach but three of Charles Martin Loeffler's Five Irish Fantasies for voice and orchestra. And what singer could have met the requirements of the concert, especially in the last-named folk-lore experiments, more delightfully and more authoritatively than the famous tenor from the Emerald Isle. Moreover, was this not the eve of St. Patrick's Day?

Mr. Loeffler needs no introduction to the local public. He stands in the very front rank of Americanized composers, and the three pieces heard yesterday for the first time here—instrumental tone-pictures with voice, entitled respectively "The Host of the Air," "The Fiddler of Dooney" and "Caitilin-Ni-Holahan"—ought to add something to his well earned reputation.

Especially imaginative in conception and execution is the first song, which dates back to 1909. For here the composer has found instrumental tints and harmonic colors that illustrate and illuminate with peculiar felicity the poem by Yeats.

There is much animation and humor in the brilliantly orchestrated "Fiddler of Dooney," with its clever use of characteristically Irish jig rhythms and pipe tunes. There are moments stirringly impressive, too, in the treatment of W. Hefernan's poem, as in the verse beginning "We will not bear the chains we bear," which Loeffler builds up in a remarkable crescendo.

In inspiration and spontaneity of feeling the two later works, however, are not equal to the earlier composition. They seem strained and labored in comparison.

The insinuating timbre of McCormack's voice and the tenor's extraordinarily distinct diction were peculiarly well adapted to the Loeffler tone-poems—better, indeed, than to the two airs by Bach: "Lost is my dear Jesus" from the similarly entitled Cantata and "Take for your very own" from the Cantata "All they from Sheba shall come." And Mr. Loeffler himself joined the singer and conductor in acknowledging the enthusiastic and well-deserved applause of the audience.

The purely instrumental contributions of the evening embraced Schubert's C major symphony No. 7, heard several times recently, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, "La Grande Paque Russe."

* * *

NEW YORK
Eve. Telegram
ISSUE OF
MAR 19 1922

Prelude by Schreker Well Orchestrated

There was a single novelty on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, a prelude to a drama by Franz Schreker. It is a clever work written in the complicated orchestral manner of Strauss, though not exactly imitative. There is melody and colorful instrumentation to be found in the prelude. It is an interesting if not an important work.

Yesterday's concert closed the series of Boston Sympony concerts here.

While there has not been as much interest in these entertainments as there was a few years ago, the Boston organization in many respects has shown improvement. Yesterday, for instance, Pierre Monteux conducted an excellent performance of Brahms' first symphony, a thing which he could not have done when he first came to America. He was always a skilled leader in French and Russian music. But he is now capable of interesting American audiences in the German classics as well.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season on Saturday afternoon with a concert the programme of which included Debussy's "Iberia," and Brahms's first symphony, the first of which had a brilliant and genuinely Parisian performance. There was also a novelty—Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama." Schreker is well known in the opera houses and concert halls of Germany and Austria, but it remained for a Frenchman, M. Monteux, to try him on an American audience, so far as known to this writer, although it is possible he may have been tried in Chicago, Cincinnati, or Minneapolis. His "Prelude to a Drama" is agreeably free from obtrusive and meaningless dissonances; it has melody, which, while not strikingly new, is agreeable. The composition is too scholarly and too long to win popularity, but it was worth hearing. His demands in the way of instruments make it possible for only the largest orchestras to play his score.

NY POST MAR 20

NEW YORK
WORLD
ISSUE OF
MAR 19 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Two Concerts Given at Aeolian Hall—Opera Bills by the Metropolitan.

Pierre Monteux conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last New York concert of this season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Debussy's "Iberia," Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" and Brahms's "First Symphony," all magnificently played, and the audience applauded the conductor and the musicians in detail at the end.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, at his piano recital in the afternoon at Aeolian Hall, played Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Schubert's "Sonata in A Minor," Chopin's "Etude in E Major," his "Etude in C Minor," his "Prelude in D Flat Major" and his "Scherzo, Opus 20," Brahms's Intermezzo in E Minor" and his "Rhapsody in E Flat Major."

In the evening Adele Bliss, soprano, at Aeolian Hall sang Veracini's "Pastoral," Chausson's "Papillons," Fourdrain's "Chanson Norvegienne," Tschaikovsky's "Was I Not a Blade of Grass?" and songs by Handel, Gretchaninoff, MacDowell and others.

At the Metropolitan Opera House the afternoon opera was "Manon Lescaut," with Alda, Schaaf, Gigli and De Luca, conducted by Papi, and in the evening it was "Rigoletto," with Ottein, Perini, Berat, Chamlee, Danise and Didur, with Bomboschek conducting.

In Brooklyn the last of the ten opera performances of the season by the Metropolitan Opera Company was given last night—a double bill, consisting of "The Secret of Suzanne," followed by "Pagliacci."

Im letzten Programm der Boſtoner führte uns Herr Monteux erſtmalig eine Ouverture von Franz Schreker vor, dem modernen deutſchen Komponiſten, der uns hier, ſo ſehr er drüben auch gefeiert iſt, namentlich auf unſeren Opernbrettern hartnäckig vorenthalten wird. Dieſe Ouverture „zu einem Stücke" iſt ein ſolid und erfreulich gearbeitetes Muſikwerk, das einen guten Eindruck von des Neutöners Talent beizubringen geeignet iſt. Mit ſehr gutem Material arbeitet das Stück, vielleicht etwas allzulange ausgedehnt, nach den beſten Regeln und dabei deutlich individuellen Zügen folgerichtig, ſo daß man ſich mit dieſem extremen Moderniſten, hinter dem offenbar ein ganzer Muſiker ſteckt, ganz gut zu ſtellen vermag. Die treffliche Leitung von Herrn Monteux und die glänzende Orcheſterleiſtung kamen dem Stücke gleichfalls ſehr zugute. Der Beifall klang herzlich. Eine weitere Glanzleiſtung der Herren war Debuſſy's „Iberia".

MAR: 20

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
MAR 20 1922

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Some Week-End Adventures in Unfamiliar Music—At Last Schreker.

The incuriosity of the New York public about music that is new or otherwise unfamiliar would be amazing if we weren't through long habit so inured to it. But it remains irritating, none the less. This season the "Five Pieces" for orchestra of Arnold Schönberg at last reached our concert rooms (and in all conscience they were long enough in getting there!) Was there then any concerted action on the part of patrons of the local concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra to persuade Mr. Stokowski to repeat the "Five Pieces" at the next concert in his Carnegie Hall series? Not a bit of it! Had he threatened to do anything of the kind there would much more likely have been a concerted action to drop him out of a Carnegie Hall window into the nearest subway chasm.

And yet a work not previously played here of such importance and so difficult to prepare as the "Five Pieces" ought as a matter of course to have been repeated at the next concert, and the patrons of those concerts, whether they individually enjoyed the pieces or not, ought to have insisted on the conductor's so doing through a curiosity not yet wholly satisfied, if for no higher motive. But no! It was back to a comfortable snooze in the shelter of the Bach barrel and the Brahms basket, and the certainty that when one woke up the law and the prophets would still be intact.

Similarly, the Chicago Opera Association regaled us with one lone performance of "The Love for the Three Oranges," an enormously difficult work to prepare for the stage, when, in a community really keen to the interest of the new, the sheer beauty and fun of the production entitled it to at least three performances. A distinguished visiting conductor from Holland was quite dazed because of the punishment meted out to him for daring to conduct here a symphony by Berlioz (no new man in music, by the way, this Berlioz!), and whenever some unsuspecting leader has the temerity to put a work by poor, old, half-crazed Anton Bruckner on a programme there is such an outcry that he promptly decides that Beethoven and Brahms are the only symphonists for New York, and safety and his job lie in sticking to the Immortal Nine and the Unflagging Four. Still, Gustav Mahler has his posthumous innings, and that is some satisfaction, whatever you may think of his music. One earnestly hopes that in some bright province of the asphodel fields his disembodied spirit laughs away in rich, ironic laughter all the painful memories of his corporeal sojourn in New York.

Now some unfamiliar music we do hear in this our town thanks to a few intrepid persons. The last of Lady Dean Paul's exceedingly interesting Concerts Internationaux de la Libre Esthétique at the Hotel Ambassador Saturday noon; the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, and the second concert of the International Composers' Guild at the Greenwich Village Theatre last evening are cases immediately in point.

Franz Schreker is regarded as one of the foremost composers of Germany to-day, and he is the author of a number of operas, and yet I do not recall his name on a New York programme previous to Saturday afternoon. He made his local début at the concert in question of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sandwiched in between Debussy's "Ibéria" and Brahms's first symphony. The work, for full orchestra, is entitled "Prelude to a Drama."

In this composition Schreker is distinctly of the school of Richard Strauss. There is an harmonic echo of Debussy, and there is a suggestion of Puccini, but in general the work moves along in the approved Wagnerian-Straussian manner, with plenty of Richard the Second's molasses in the score. The orchestration, rich and sonorous, but never fine or pungent, is distinctly of the Strauss school, though obviously of less than the Strauss excellence. This "Prelude to a Drama" is a dignified composition, but it does not reveal Schreker as a composer of vivid imagination or marked originally. Morover, it already sounds decidedly "dated."

NY GLOBE - MAR. 20

NEW YORK
EVENING JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
MAR 20 1922

MONTEUX PLAYS NEW GERMAN MUSIC

Franz Schreker's "Prelude to a Drama" Heard at Boston Orchestra's Concert.

Whatever Mr. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, may or may not accomplish toward true revelation of the classics of the symphonic repertoire (and the reviewer's experience has been that they very largely elude him) he must be credited with an alert eagerness and a good deal of courage in regard to the music of his contemporaries. And strange and forbidding as some of it seems, this does not deter him; wherefore the concertgoer, except he have not yet emerged from the nineteenth century, ought to be grateful that this conductor appears to be alive to what is going on in the world.

At Saturday's concert of the Bostonians in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Monteux introduced to New York some of the not too recent output of the Austrian, Franz Schreker, none of whose music, so far as one knows, had been played here before, although Schreker has been the cause of much heated discussion in Austria and Germany for ten years or more. Mr. Monteux brought out the "Vorspiel zu einem Drama," which, however, proved to be no stranger than Richard Strauss and was a modicum so forbidding as Gustav Mahler.

SOUTHERN INFLUENCES.

This "Prelude to a Drama" (probably a drama definite enough in Schreker's mind, but an unwritten one) dates from 1913, when he was thirty-five. Except for the "Kammersymphonie," it is practically the only purely orchestral work of Schreker that has not been discarded. For his chief activity has been as an operatic composer, and it is as such that he is principally known and fought over in the German-speaking countries. He writes his own texts for these operas, and at least three of them have had considerable success, although hisses appear always to have mingled with the applause at their premieres. The latest of them, "Der Schatzgraber ("The Treasure Seeker," or literally, "Digger") was produced last year, but seems not to have been so successful as "Die Gezeichneten" ("Marked Men") or the still earlier "Der ferne Klang" ("The Sound Afar").

It is not without some significance that Schreker was born in Monaco, under southern skies, even though his parents were Austrian. The Mediterranean impulse shows itself in his music, which to this extent at least is less distinctively Germanic than that of any other of his contemporaries in Central and Northern Europe. Nevertheless, no one could mistake this "Prelude to a Drama" for anything else than the product of a Teutonic mind. Nor is it particularly impressive music. One glimpses the two Richards through it, both in character and quality of its orchestration and in the type and line of its melodic material; and the latter is never highly original or striking.

One's impression, indeed, is that Schreker at thirty-five has not yet found himself, although he does display certain solid accomplishments and much skill in handling his effects. Mr. Monteux played the piece with the vigor and breadth it seemed to require, but it is possible that a greater dynamic variety would have made it say more than it did.

The Schreker music was preceded by Debussy's "Iberia," presented with but little of the orchestral subtlety it so imperatively demands, and the afternoon was concluded with the Brahms C minor symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MIXED MATTER, WELL CONTRASTED, WELL PLAYED

Again Mr. Monteux Breaks Routine—Handel in a Characteristic Concerto—The Whole of Franck's "Psyche," Leaving Familiar Residue—Mr. Gilbert in New Music Variously

PRETEND as we may, most of us take the Symphony Concerts for granted. Through three pairs of them no symphony, classic or modern, has stood upon the programme—a break with precedent possibly hard to match in all the forty years of the orchestra. Yet if any one has heeded, no one, so far as observation goes, has murmured. Three weeks ago, Mozart's "Haffner Serenade" and Mr. Loeffler's "Irish Fantasias" left room for no more than two fragments of Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," passing as the occasional pieces they really were. The following week the orchestra journeyed to New York and there were no concerts in Boston. A week later Mr. d'Indy's exercises upon Schiller's plays about Wallenstein and Mr. Eichheim's excursions into music of the Orient denied place to any symphonist; while last Friday and Saturday, Franck's "Psyche" was as unkind.

Not so long ago it was possible to chide Mr. Monteux for the playing of too many classic symphonies in succession—albeit unjustly, since the engagements of the orchestra up and down New England left him no time to prepare any other. Now it were as plausible to charge him with neglect of symphonies altogether. Yet not a voice or a pen has stirred—because a symphony concert remains its pleasurable self, even if it contain no symphony. As the event has proved, the absence of these four-square monuments of music may even swell—for the while—the common enjoyment. Missing they have been for three full weeks; yet numberless voices have praised these self-same concerts as present climax to our orchestral year. So does change make still, burrowing way without a rustle of dissent. So does Mr. Monteux, as quietly, keep his programmes fluid, interesting, unexpected. Once more his works therein praise him. It is good to be bold—without fuss.

Handel began this third pair of Symphony Concerts without a symphony—the Handel of the long-promised Concerto for Strings and Two Wind Choirs. Through nine movements, the superabundant composer led it—with no surfeit, seemingly, upon the receptive audiences of the leisurely eighteenth century. Five made "the limit" to which Mr. Monteux dared go in these shorter-breathed, more restless days; while of the five all but one were fresh versions of tunes used by Handel elsewhere in ode or oratorio. After all, a frugal spendthrift with his music was the paradoxical George Frideric. The Concerto begins with sonorous, striding, full-throated preluding—"pomposo" in the full force of the composer's guiding word. An Allegro ensues in which oboes begin to pipe or bassoons to drone between vigorous ensembles of the strings. A third division continues these exercises, more and more exacting and displayful upon the wind choirs. A fourth, and all concerned subside into a slow-paced, gravely phrased, loftily mournful song. A fifth and the horns are in full cry of fanfares between the massed, hard-riding strings.

Throughout, the Concerto is a superbly assertive, a superbly self-confident piece. That music could be written in any other way apparently never occurred to Handel or to his immediate hearers. There it was—six feet high, broad in proportion, firm of bone, thick of sinew, wagging its big head, marching in its big stride, speaking in its big voice, sober, merry, ceremonial, displayful, but never once doubting its own virtue or its own finality. Demur—and it rode down the timid questioner. It still rides down twentieth-century hearers; but they—the hypocrites!—have ceased to demur. Ancient they merely call it, and would have the mighty George Frideric agreeably exhumed now and then as symphonic composer. No wonder, the oboists, the bassoonists, the paired horns—to say nothing of the strings—played the Concerto to the full. Handel, in the actors' phrase, wrote music in which singers or players may set their teeth.

The "contrasting piece," as they say in the movies, was Franck's tone-poem of "Psyche," at the other end of the programme, heard for the first time "in entirety" in Boston. By this token, a choral interlude—for women's voices supplemented by a handful of tenors—parted the music of the Garden of Eros from the music of Eros and Psyche enlaced. It begins in measures of praise hymning the God of Love; it ends in admonition to Psyche lest, to her peril, she question bliss. Declamatory periods for single voice, understandingly sung by Mrs. Littlefield, diversify it; while in English, the text inclines to the succulent and seraphic prose of the late Mrs. Eddy. "Entirety" also brought the third part of the tone-poem wherewith Franck rounded both narrative and music. The chorus, capable, practised, but in no way remarkable with measures in themselves sparkless, recounted briefly the pangs of Psyche, outcast upon earth in penalty for her questioning. The orchestra, with occasional choral assistance, relented, pardoned, upbore her again to the amorous heavens upon a Jacob's ladder barred with all the motivs by Franck assembled. "Apotheosis" he named it—and rightly since the music nowhere excels the quality that word connotes in the opera house. It is agreed that the excellent Monsieur Meyerbeer might have signed certain pages in Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes." There is no more doubt that he would have clapped loudly after this "Apotheosis."

So was curiosity satisfied, so did Mr. Monteux fulfill a just ambition; but the sum and substance of "Psyche," the poetic visioning, the tingling erotic imagery, the [illegible] or the impassioned beauty, still abode in the four orchestral movements, now and again played in the past "at these concerts." There also it is easy to pick flaws. Franck caressed as well as wrote not a little of this music. Sometimes he strokes it so long and tenderly that it becomes monotonously sweet. In a sense, "Psyche" was his music-drama, his opera, sung, acted, set and played upon the stage of the imagination. Sometimes in such obsession, he declined into mere music of the current Parisian theatre with which, as "The Beatitudes" now and then bear witness, he was not fortunate. Psyche and Eros, Elsa and Lohengrin, were hardly unrelated beings in Franck's imagination, and at instants it yielded to the unescapable accents of Wagner. The tone-poem was work of Franck's final years; by that time, like the rest of us, whatever our trade, he had accumulated a modicum of formulas—of phrases moulded, of progressions achieved, of harmonies distributed, of motiv bourgeoning into melody. His symphony—also of these final years—epitomizes them. Here and there, in innocent honesty, they recur in "Psyche." Possibly Franck kept both manuscripts on his study-table; in that case it was easy to mix matters.

[94]

Yet, every deduction made, the four orchestral parts of "Psyche" still illude the ear and enfold the imagination. Elsewhere Franck has scarcely written music of serener beauty than that which evokes the image of Psyche in sleep. The motivs upspring in loveliness of line; they warm into melody as serene, sensuous, silvery. The strings are in gentle glow, the wind-choirs deepen and smooth the calm radiance. Only longing ruffles this music of beauty still. For the quiver of tones—be it of the flesh or of the spirit—is Franck's major means through the tone-poem. The Zephyrs bear Psyche toward the courts of Eros and Franck writes a music delicate and vaporous in fancy, artifice, illusion. His imaginary music-drama enters the god's garden. Therewith and forthwith the quiver of longing becomes the pulse of desire. The motiv of Eros, "chaleur, lumière, vainqueur," dominates and pervades the music. Franck's means are sometimes more delicate, his passion is now and again less of the body than of the spirit finding outlet and expression through the body, but Wagner himself has hardly written a more erotic music than is this "Garden of Eros" and the succeeding division of Psyche's union with the god. As soon call "The Song of Solomon" a pious canticle as such pages "a dialogue between soul and seraph." Passing strange are the deceptions of those who would deceive themselves. Yes; Franck could write an opera—once he had put out of hand and mind the trammels of the theatre.

The middle number of the evening was again offset to the other two and just desert of the composer, Mr. Henry Gilbert, to whom Mr. Monteux wisely holds open the door of Symphony Hall. A year ago Mr. Gilbert set music to certain episodes in Mr. G. P. Baker's "Pageant of Plymouth"—to the coming of the Norsemen, to Champlain's tranquil trafficking with the Indians, to their war-dance before a Dutch voyager, to the pestilence that wasted them. Originally Mr. Gilbert wrote for the huge "wind-orchestra"—stringless—becomingly employed for the pageant. More recently he has rescored his pieces as Symphonic Suite for the concert-hall—a process accomplished with his usual directness of means, yet not quite hiding the earlier dependence upon reed and brass choirs. According to the pageant, the Indians looked upon the landing Norsemen with wonder and dread; soon arrows flew; presently the Viking chief was smitten. Around the seafarers and these encounters, Mr. Gilbert has written a terse, vigorous, close-knit, sonorous music that quickly strikes the high, heroic note of such adventure—only to cloud it, as directly and simply, with the note of death and bane. The interlude of Champlain, with frank quotation of a French folk-tune, charms by a fancy of substance and a lightness of means so rarely exercised by Mr. Gilbert that most of us had forgotten his possession of such virtue. At last he has written his little tone-poem of our Indian summer. Per contra, the war-dance, skilfully and vividly as it beats up through the orchestra, is but routine stuff—for the composer of the thrilling, searching "Indian Sketches" of last year. In the music of "The Pestilence," however, Mr. Gilbert does no small feat of imagination and expression. It continues hardly five minutes; it had in Symphony Hall no scenic aid to illusion. Yet in it plague crept upon the bodies and the spirits of men, and death compassed them about, and all the air ached and stank with the misery of the folk. A briefer, barer, music, more stark, more instant, in impression is hard to recall.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR 3

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

40-Year-Old Rule Is Broken for Young Guests

BY OLIN DOWNES

The best programme yet presented at the Children's Concerts given by the Symphony Orchestra was offered by Mr. Monteux and his men yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was a [illegible] contained [illegible] position of over two minutes in length, most of these compositions of a lively tempo, most of them with rather delicate, though at times brilliant, orchestration, and each one a work by an acknowledged master.

ENJOY THE MUSIC

Mozart was represented by the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro", Haydn by two movements, the Minuet and Finale of the familiar and delightful G major symphony; Debussy by the two pieces, "En Bateau" and "Cortege" from the early and charming piano suite; Delibes by the variations on a Russian theme; Tschaikowsky by the dance of the Sugar Plums, the Chinese and the Russian dances from the Nut-cracker suite, and Wagner by the short but exciting prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin."

This music, in a greater degree than we remember ever having seen before at these admirably conceived concerts, caught and held the attention of the children. They used sharp eyes as well as ears, and when young Mr. Fiedler played the celesta in the first of the Tschaikowsky dances they observed with considerable interest the instrument which looked a good deal like a piano, was played like a piano, and gave out such delicate, silvery tones. A number, perhaps instructed in advance, knew the instruments which made certain exceptional sounds. The music was enjoyed. It is not too much to say that it was also understood.

The orchestral performances were on the whole admirable. Mr. Monteux would show a high artistic conscience, whoever his audience included. Yesterday he appeared to take a personal pleasure in his task, and he, too, and his "signals," were watched and applauded to the echo by the young audience. The children were granted a privilege the grownups had never enjoyed. The "Dance of the Sugar Plums" was repeated in response to their insistent applause, whereas in the regular subscription concerts an encore by the orchestra is a thing unknown.

This same programme will be repeated for other school children of Greater Boston, tomorrow afternoon. More and more are these concerts finding their audience and making of that audience future subscribers to the winter series of concerts.

POST-APR 4

CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Symphony Orchestra Gives an Interesting Performance

AUDIENCE FRANK IN AWARD OF FAVOR

Yesterday afternoon, before an audience that all but filled Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux gave one of his "Young People's Concerts," with this program:

Mozart—Overture to "The Marriage to Figaro."
Haydn—Two movements from the Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13). (a) Minuet: Trio. (b) Finale: Allegro con Spirito.
Debussy—From the "Little Suite." (a) In a Boat. (b) Procession.
Delibes—Slavic Theme with Variations from "Coppelia."
Tschaikowsky—Ballet Suite, "The Nutcracker." (a) Dance of the Sugar Fairy. (b) Chinese Dance. (c) Trepak (Russian Dance).
Wagner—Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin."

Since the "young people," who formed quite nine-tenths of the audience, were manifestly no respecters of persons, it was interesting to guess, from the warmth of the applause, at what they liked best. The Mozart overture left them cold, the Debussy pieces pleased them little better, the Haydn minuet something more. With the Haydn allegro, however, came content; throughout its course all talking and fidgeting ceased. And then, Debussy once over, enthusiasm grew. The first movement of the Tchaikovsky suite, which the audience regarded as a solo for Celesta, they would have again, and they tried hard for the Chinese and Russian dances once more. And the Lohengrin introduction drew forth as hearty applause as any all the afternoon.

Rhythm, in short, in company with color or better still much sound, is what the audience yesterday liked best. If half the company, in place of children, could have consisted of music teachers disposed to watch and listen, it might have proved a very good thing for the betterment of musical standards. For if this audience so keenly relished rhythm, surely the majority of the individuals who formed it could be taught to play in time, or sing.

Although, in our schools and music schools and at the hands of private masters, much music teaching is going forward, how many young pupils are learning the value of notes, and the necessity of observing the same? For an answer ask any good musician. If all music teachers whose job it is to teach the rudiments could recognize the love of rhythm which exists in every child fit to study music at all, and would make that child understand that the rhythm he loves plain cannot be without firm time, the situation would improve. Yesterday's concert should serve as an object lesson to teachers.

That it is of vast benefit for young pupils to hear a concert of such high quality cannot be questioned; all teachers know that they will work the better for it. The quality was high indeed, genuinely brilliant playing. R. R. G.

HERALD-APR 4

NEW MUSIC IMPENDS

FOR FIRST TIME A SYMPHONY OF SIBELIUS

His Fifth, by Some Accounted a Masterpiece, at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—The Course, Matter and Manner of the Debated Pages—Hue Likewise for First Time, in a Fanciful, Artful Suite—Liszt's "Dance of Death" to Be Revived by Siloti

According to a statement of Ernest Newman once quoted in these columns, Boston must know the symphonies of Jan Sibelius far better than does London; for in the British city, he avers, no music-lover would be found who could write from memory two bars of any of these pieces. Eighteen years ago Mr. Gericke and the Symphony Orchestra played the Second Symphony of Sibelius to an audience frankly bewildered by the strangeness of the composer's idiom—an idiom that has since become one of the familiar things in modern music. Dr. Muck was assiduous with this Symphony and with the more direct and ingratiating predecessor, which he introduced here in 1907. He also made known to us the Fourth, of an uncompromising severity and frequent harshness which puzzled even the warmest admirers of the composer. Although Sibelius's Northern bleakness of mood is seemingly alien to the more genial French temperament, Mr. Monteux has also looked kindly upon the Finn's music. He even considered a performance of Sibelius's Third Symphony, usually regarded on all side as a flat failure, and dismissed the project only when rehearsal confirmed the weakness of the music. Within the last two years Mr. Monteux has given notable performances of the First, and Second Symphonies while on his programme for tomorrow and Saturday he has placed the Fifth—and latest—hitherto unheard here.

This Fifth Symphony is not actually new. It was played in Helsingfors some time before 1914, but until it was heard in London in 1920 it had not reached any of the important music-centres of Europe, and the score was not published until the following year. Last October the piece was played in Philadelphia, and a month later it was made known by the Philharmonic Society to New York. The reviewers in London, none too familiar with even the first two symphonies, were as puzzled by the Fifth as they had been by the Fourth. As Mr. Newman felicitously expressed it, they found the piece remarkable, but they were not at all sure whether it was remarkably good or remarkably bad. In his programme-notes for the performances in Philadelphia and New York, Mr. Lawrence Gilman gave a list of the adjectives used by the London newspapers in describing the Symphony—among them, "dour," "bleak," "harsh," "rugged," "angular," "cold," "gray," "reticent," "austere," "drastic," "ungenial," "bare," "lonely" and "trenchent." Yet certain of these critics found in the music a more generous and expansive mood than Sibelius had hitherto disclosed. more spontaneity, a larger simplicity, a directer speech. Commenting on Sibelius's economy of material and device—an economy and restraint unparalled in modern music—Mr. Newman found this quality less conspicuous in the Fifth Symphony than in the one that came before it.

In the main he praised the music but as one not wholly sure of his ground, trusting to impression rather than relying on conviction.

To each hearer of the piece on Friday and Saturday will come opportunity to judge it for himself, to see whether, with Mr. Granville Bantock, he finds it "superb," or whether he agrees with those who have contemptuously dismissed it as drab and dull. Meanwhile it may serve the interest both of composer and of audiences to set forth a brief account and analysis of the music. Ostensibly this Fifth Symphony contains but three movements; practically it has four, as the first falls into two well defined divisions—a slow Introduction and a Scherzo. The opening, in E flat major, is pastoral in character. Over a roll of drums a horn proclaims a motiv, of which the first part—four ascending tones, B flat, E flat, F, B flat—is prominently employed throughout the dual movement. Much use is made of a wavering wood-wind figure in thirds and of a more expressive theme first announced by the flutes. At length a crescendo, combined with a quickening of the pace, brings the second section (Allegro moderato, B major), a Scherzo of Beethovenish simplicity, ruggedness and directness. The thirds of the opening are once more in evidence, but now in rhythm of the dance, while the initial phrase recurs from time to time. At the end the music returns to the tonality of E flat.

Unpromising indeed is the kernel from which grows the second movement, an Andante mosso, quasi allegretto, in G major, 3-2 time. Against sustained harmonies in the wood-wind, the violas and violoncellos, pizzicato, begin a simple tune that is completed by flutes in thirds. If through affinity of mood and utterance the Scherzo suggests Beethoven, the Andante also suggests that composer by reason of mastery of development. The melody upon which it is based is treated with wondrous resource, at times flowering into moving eloquence. Throughout the movement Sibelius seldom leaves his centre-key.

To Mr. Gilman the Finale is "the most nobly imagined and most nobly eloquent music Sibelius has given us. . . . Here there is little that even the heedless could fairly call drastic or harsh or bleak; here is forthright directness of passionate speech, breadth and fervor and amplitude of line, largeness and freedom of movement. The superb coda, in particular, is a page of uplifting beauty and power." Beneath quick chords in the violins—each chord played twice—the violas announce a nervous, insistent theme, in the rhythm of the accompaniment. A lyric motiv brings the needed contrast. With a change to G-flat major the theme becomes ghostly, mysterious; and a gradual enlarging and unfolding of the music leads to the triumphant end.

In this Fifth Symphony, as in the others, Sibelius uses a comparatively small orchestra—except for an added trumpet, that of the symphonies of Schumann and Mendelssohn: two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, tympani and strings. As before he shuns both Straussian magniloquence and Debussyan subtleties. Much of the Symphony is diatonic and although the harmonies are not conventional they are seldom acridly dissonant; while there is no attempt at the "polytony" of the preceding Symphony. One and all the themes are of extreme simplicity. It is the bareness, not the complexity, of music that has proved so baffling. Yet if it is spare it is by no means thin or empty, and for some it is to a marked degree gripping and vital.

Offsets

With his usual skill in programme-making Mr. Monteux will also include in these concerts another "novelty" of wholly different character—the Symphonic Suite by Georges-Adolphe Huë drawn from his opera, "Titania," first produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1903. While his is a new name at the Symphony Concerts, no much need be said either of the composer or his music. He was born at Versailles May 6, 1858. At the age of twenty-one he won the Prix de Rome, and two years later the Prix Cressent. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and upon the death of Saint-Saëns he succeeded to that composer's place in the French Institute. His "Rubezähl," a "Symphonic Legend," produced at the Colonne Concerts in 1886, long contested with d'Indy's "Song of the Bell" a prize offered by the city of Paris. In the end Huë was defeated by one vote. He has produced many operas, a symphony and several short orchestral pieces; but outside France he is chiefly known through his songs. Among the latter may be mentioned a set of six, to poems by Heine, that includes the popular "J'ai Pleuré en Rêve" and the fine "Croquis d'Orient."

The Suite to be played tomorrow and Saturday runs in two main divisions, each of which is again subdivided. Part one begins with an imaginative, warmly-colored movement, "Le Paradis Féerique," which leads directly to a graceful, typically French "Danse de Phillida." A sombre Prelude, notable for its rich instrumentation, opens the second part. Following this is a section called "La Chasse," that needs no explanation. A sonorous movement, by title "Apparition," brings the end. Like most Frenchmen who were writing two decades ago, Huë knew his Wagner; but the music of this Suite has also its portion of Gallic delicacy and fancy, while it is scored with surpassing skill.

From Liszt Also

With Mr. Siloti as pianist, Liszt's "Dance of Death" is also to be played on Friday and Saturday. Though the composer first took thought of these variations in 1839 and handed them to Bülow for performance in 1864-65, they will be virtually new to Bostonian audiences of 1922. Only twice in the past have they been played at the Symphony Concerts—by Mr. Bauer in 1912, by Mr. Busoni in 1914. As the books say, during Liszt's sojourn in Italy in 1838-39, he was deeply affected by a gruesome fresco by Orcagna in the Campo Santo at Pisa, "The Triumph of Death." The central group in the picture shows a party of men and women, in sumptuous attire, entertained by a minstrel and by dancing cupids. Death, in the shape of a woman with claw-like hands, bat-wings and streaming hair, flies toward them swinging a scythe. Corpses lie at her feet and along the path she has travelled. There are numerous other episodes in the fresco, but they are not pertinent to the music.

Liszt made the first sketch of his piece at Pisa in 1839. Ten years later at Weimar he developed and orchestrated it, and in another decade revised it thoroughly. It was first played by Hans von Bülow, to whom it was dedicated, some time during this season of 1864-1865. In form, it is a free paraphrase in the form of variations, on the ancient plain-song, "Dies Irae," a theme that has tempted many composers, from Berlioz to Loeffler. Against a reiterated accompaniment-figure in the piano and kettle-drums, the melody is immediately proclaimed by clarinets, bassoons, trombones, tuba, violas, violoncellos and double-basses. After a cadenza for the piano it is thundered again by the full orchestra. Beginning in the spirit of the theme, the variations grow gentle, turn tumultuous, and end fantastically. The piano-part is replete with glissandi and other bizarre effects. It is interesting to note that the "Dance of Death" was played by Siloti at Leipzig in November, 1883, in a concert arranged by him and made up wholly of pieces by Liszt.

In a recent issue of the "Living Age" appeared an article "Borodin and Liszt," by Louise Cruppi, taken from "La Revue Musicale," a portion of which deserves to be quoted apropos this "Dance of Death":

> Borodin once arrived at the master's house when Liszt was in his bedroom being shaved by his valet. While we were talking [says Borodin] his toilet advanced. His valet put on the master's hair, the little black, white-edged cap of a Catholic abbé, and got him, not without difficulty, into a long black coat. Just as I was saying that I should be happy to hear his "Danse Macabre," which I consider the finest of all compositions for piano and orchestra, because of its originality, the power of the theme, the novelty of the instrumentation and its Gothic and liturgical character, Liszt broke in hastily with, "Yes, yes! You see that pleases you Russians, but here they don't like it. It has been played five or six times in Germany and has been a failure every time. Once even the orchestra was astonished, and had to get used to it by degrees!

WARREN STOREY SMITH

MEMORANDA ABOUT MUSIC

Strauss's "Don Quixote" from Mr. Mo teux—A New Symphony from Mr. Co verse—Dr. Muck's New Job—Nikisch Successor

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux will undertake for the first times in Boston one of the longer tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Quixote," the celebrated "Variations on a Knightly Theme," unheard here since Dr. Muck's day. The solo violoncello and the solo viola, representing respectively Don Q ota and Sancho Panza, will be played by Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Fourel. The other numbers of the programme are a li symphony of Haydn, No. 2 in D Major, the beautiful music of spring lights, a colors, the so-called "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"; three fragments of Schumann's incidental music to Byron's play, "Manfred," viz: an Entr'acte, the Cowherd's Melody for English horn, and the Invocation to the Fairy of the Alps. Mr. Speyer of the wind-choir will play the English horn.

A week later, at the Symphony Concerts of April 21 and 22, a new Symphony by Mr. Converse will be played for the first times anywhere; while at the final concerts for the season, on April 28 and 29 the major number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial and displayful Suite from The Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade."

TRANS. APR 6.

As usual when the Symphony Orchestra betakes itself to Harvard College, repertory pieces of old or recent standing filled last evening the major part of the concert. As usual also, the sensitive and therefore enhancing acoustics of the wooden-walled Sanders Theatre, seemed, now and again, to give them cleared and freshened voice. So heard, not a few measures for strings in Brahms's Symphony in C minor gained incisiveness or suavity; while, as a whole, the songful andante gained richness of tone throughout and, as it seemed, new euphonies in the blendings of the wind-choir. After all Mr. Weingartner was only a step or two ahead of the rest of us when in an essay, he acclaimed Brahms as both sensitive and masterful with instrumental voices. Seldom, too, have the horns sounded more beautifully than they did yesterday the call of the summoning heavens to the rejoicing earth of the Finale. To Sanders likewise Mr. Monteux bore three orchestral fragments—Psyche Asleep, Psyche Borne by the Zephyrs and Psyche in the Embrace of Eros—from Franck's tone-poem as played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston last week. Whether the strands were thin and finely spaced or large and amply woven, the web of the music shone the brighter for the reflecting resonance of the wooden walls. Yet orchestra and conductor hardly brought to the music the communicative zest of earlier adventure. No more will Rimsky-Korsakov's overture of a Russian Easter Mass—in an opera house disguised as a church—bear too frequent hearing. There are persistent magnificences in the music—and also persistent lengths.

For wayfarers out of the Subway, the spice to the concert was the return of Mr. Siloti as pianist, to play that seldom-heard piece, Liszt's "Dance of Death." He nears his sixtieth year; not for a generation or two, counted musically, has he returned to the United States; indeed it was only the exactions and the privations of the Soviet régime in Russia that persuaded him away into the Western World. Years or no years, he keeps his familiar vigors and—as all concerned discovered at rehearsals—his familiar will imperious. It was good to see him come springily to the stage—tall, spare, keen-nerved, quick-spirited, in this blessed land of the soft, the complaisant and the fat. It was kindling to see and hear him "taking charge of things," as the homely phrase goes, as soon as Liszt's music was under way. It asks little in sensuous beauty of tone, and voluptuous pleasures of sound were as few in Mr. Siloti's performance. No more does Liszt or need the pianist, stimulate the minds of hearers. Enough that he has mastered the technical exactions of the piece and can achieve through them the feats of macabre imagination designed by the composer. On both scores, Mr. Siloti, equally firm-set in his notions of the music and in his power with it, sufficed, and more.

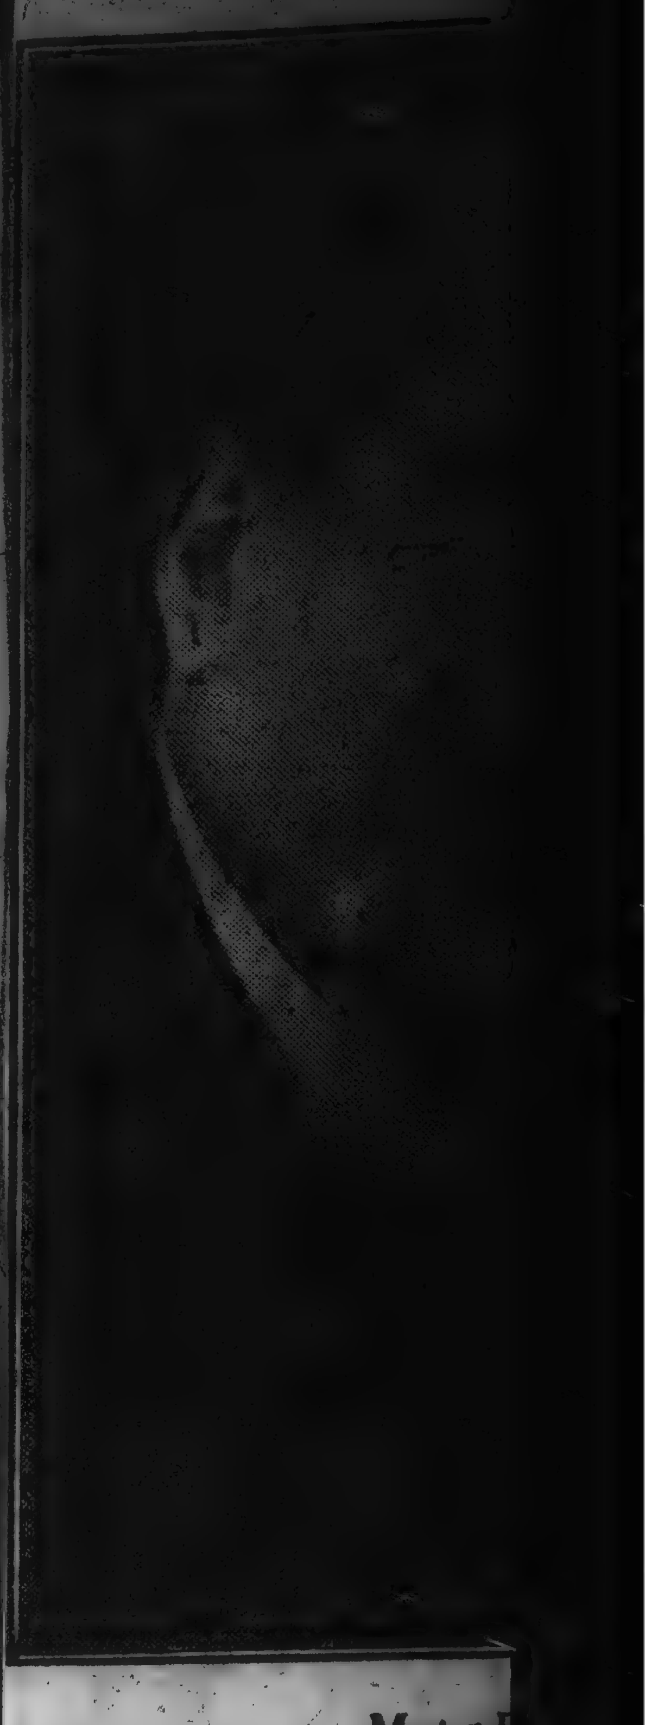
In Italian journeyings, Liszt looked upon Orcagna's fresco, "The Triumph of Death," on a wall of the Campo Santo in Pisa. Elsewhere described on these pages in Vasari's naive phrases, it teems with gruesome and grotesque imaginings of the contrast of Death, which is scourge and bane, with Life, which is pleasure and joy. Even into the next world it ascends in like imagery and to heaven or to hell the souls of men are bestowed. The fresco haunted Liszt; through a full twenty years he labored at the music it bred in him. Bülow, the friendly, brought it to birth; a few Lisztian pianists ingrained—Busoni, Friedheim, Siloti—thereafter nurtured it. The form is a set of separate, rather than enchained, variations for piano and orchestra on the hymn of the mediæval church, "Dies Iræ." The means are an excessively difficult, displayful and Lisztian piano-part, crackling into cadenzas; vivid with runs, clangorous with octaves; and an orchestral part, curiously bare-boned as it seems nowadays, yet full of strange progressions, and play of harmonies and timbres as such composition went in the innocent fifties.

The matter is impetuous, changeful, macabre, in kind, imaginative. Death, gaunt, grim, grotesque, now and again rattles its bones in orchestra or in piano strides, as it were scythe-swinging through the music. Liszt hints little at the zest and the pleasure of life for Death to dull, curdle, cut. Nowhere is his word to the players "dolce"; nowhere is it "resoluto ed energico." Rather he seems to have designed and accomplished a monstrous and manifold grotesquerie in tones, as fantastical of heaven and hell, death and life, holy hermits and dancing sporting youth, as is Orcagna's fresco. Written in the composer's unregenerate days, often the stench of decay, rather than the perfume of sanctity, ascends from the music. At moments the dread of death, that haunted mediæval men-artists, haunts also this virtuoso's dance. And through it all runs a fantastical imagery. Like other romantics, world without end, Liszt looked with pleasure upon "death's heads"; not without satisfaction fingered "bloody bones." But always in the art.

H. T. P.

TRANS. APR 7

[95]



Master-F

To the Piano

Vasari's Accoun
Fresco, "The
Backgroun
Symp

MOVED by the fame of th praised, the men who him summoned to work
Santo of that city, even as Gi
Wherefore, putting his hand Judgment, with some fanciful ing towards the Duomo, besid falmacco; and making the fir therein all the degrees of lords this world, placing them seate shade of many orange-trees, w have some Cupids in their br around and over many young it seems clear, of noble ladies son of the long lapse of time, of shooting at the hearts of the young men and nobles who ar and watching the amorous da sweetly taking joy in their lov
trayed Castruccio, Lord of Luc with a blue cap wound round h and near him other nobles of they are. In short, in that firs and his art demanded, he pain exceeding great grace. In the sented on a high mountain the for their sins and by the desire to that mountain, which is all the Lord, busy in diverse pur
Some, reading and praying, are others, laboring in order to gai selves in various forms of acti
a hermit who is milking a goat, lifelike in appearance than he ing to three Kings, who are rid and going to the chase, huma who are lying dead but not being contemplated with attent beautiful attitudes full of won flecting with pity for their own to become such. In one of th trayed Uguccione della Faggiu holding its nose with one hand dead and corrupted Kings. In flying through the air and dra cut off with her scythe the lives of all sorts and conditions, poo old, male and female, and in s sex. Round these bodies are s from their mouths, and are car which are on the summit of a ve are angels who are likewise tak of these dead people, who have with them to Paradise. [From ers, Sculptors and Architects."

TRANS-AP

serene or the impassioned beauty, still abode in the four orchestral movements, now and again played in the past "at these concerts." There also it is easy to pick flaws. Franck caressed as well as wrote not a little of this music. Sometimes he strokes it so long and tenderly that it becomes monotonously sweet. In a sense, "Psyche" was his music-drama, his opera, sung, acted, set and played upon the stage of the imagination. Sometimes in such obsession, he declined into mere music of the current Parisian theatre with which, as "The Beatitudes" now and then bear witness, he was not fortunate. Psyche and Eros, Elsa and Lohengrin, were hardly unrelated beings in Franck's imagination, and at instants it yielded to the unescapable accents of Wagner. The tone-poem was work of Franck's final years; by that time, like the rest of us, whatever our trade, he had accumulated a modicum of formulas—of phrases moulded, of progressions achieved, of harmonies distributed, of motiv bourgeoning into melody. His symphony—also of these final years—epitomizes them. Here and there, in innocent honesty, they recur in "Psyche." Possibly Franck kept both manuscripts on his study-table; in that case it was easy to mix matters.

Yet, every deduction made, the four orchestral parts of "Psyche" still illude the ear and enfold the imagination. Elsewhere Franck has scarcely written music of serener beauty than that which evokes the image of Psyche in sleep. The motivs upspring in loveliness of line; they warm into melody as serene, sensuous, silvery. The strings are in gentle glow, the wind-choirs deepen and smooth the calm radiance. Only longing ruffles this music of beauty still. For the quiver of tones—be it of the flesh or of the spirit—is Franck's major means through the tone-poem. The Zephyrs bear Psyche toward the courts of Eros and Franck writes a music delicate and vaporous in fancy, artifice, illusion. His imaginary music-drama enters the god's garden. Therewith and forthwith the quiver of longing becomes the pulse of desire. The motiv of Eros, "chaleur, lumière, vainqueur," dominates and pervades the music. Franck's means are sometimes more delicate, his passion is now and again less of the body than of the spirit finding outlet and expression through the body, but Wagner himself has hardly written a more erotic music than is this "Garden of Eros" and the succeeding division of Psyche's union with the god. As soon call "The Song of Solomon" a pious canticle as such pages "a dialogue between soul and seraph." Passing strange are the deceptions of those who would deceive themselves. Yes; Franck could write an opera—once he had put out of hand and mind the trammels of the theatre

---

The middle number of the evening was again offset to the other two and just desert of the composer, Mr. Henry Gilbert, to whom Mr. Monteux wisely holds open the door of Symphony Hall. A year ago Mr. Gilbert set music to certain episodes in Mr. G. P. Baker's "Pageant of Plymouth"—to the coming of the Norsemen, to Champlain's tranquil trafficking with the Indians, to their war-dance before a Dutch voyager, to the pestilence that wasted them. Originally Mr. Gilbert wrote for the huge "wind-orchestra"—stringless—becomingly employed for the pageant. More recently he has rescored his pieces as Symphonic Suite for the concert-hall—a process accomplished with his usual directness of means, yet not quite hiding the earlier dependence upon reed and brass choirs. According to the pageant, the Indians looked upon the landing Norsemen with wonder and dread; soon arrows flew; presently the Viking chief was smitten. Around the seafarers and these encounters, Mr. Gilbert has written a terse, vigorous, close-knit, sonorous music that quickly strikes the high, heroic note of such adventure—only to cloud it, as directly and simply, with the note of death and bane. The interlude of Champlain, with frank quotation of a French folk-tune, charms by a fancy of substance and a lightness of means so rarely exercised by Mr. Gilbert that most of us had forgotten his possession of such virtue. At last he has written his little tone-poem of our Indian summer. Per contra, the war-dance, skilfully and vividly as it beats up through the orchestra, is but routine stuff—for the composer of the thrilling, searching "Indian Sketches" of last year. In the music of "The Pestilence," however, Mr. Gilbert does no small feat of imagination and expression. It continues hardly five minutes; it had in Symphony Hall no scenic aid to illusion. Yet in it plague crept upon the bodies and the spirits of men, and death compassed them about, and all the air ached and stank with the misery of the folk. A briefer, barer, music, more stark, more instant, in impression is hard to recall.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR 3

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

40-Year-Old Rule Is Broken for Young Guests

BY OLIN DOWNES

The best programme yet presented at the Children's Concerts given by the Symphony Orchestra was offered by Mr. Monteux and his men yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was a programme which contained no composition of over five minutes in length, most of these compositions of a lively tempo, most of them with rather delicate, though at times brilliant, orchestration, and each one a work by an acknowledged master.

ENJOY THE MUSIC

Mozart was represented by the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Haydn by two movements, the Minuet and Finale of the familiar and delightful G major symphony; Debussy by the two pieces, "En Bateau" and "Cortege" from the early and charming piano suite; Delibes by the variations on a Russian theme; Tschaikowsky by the dance of the Sugar Plums, the Chinese and the Russian dances from the Nut-cracker suite, and Wagner by the short but exciting prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin."

This music, in a greater degree than we remember ever having seen before at these admirably conceived concerts, caught and held the attention of the children. They used sharp eyes as well as ears, and when young Mr. Fiedler played the celesta in the first of the Tschaikowsky dances they observed with considerable interest the instrument which looked a good deal like a piano, was played like a piano, and gave out such delicate, silvery tones. A number, perhaps instructed in advance, knew the instruments which made certain exceptional sounds. The music was enjoyed. It is not too much to say that it was also understood.

The orchestral performances were on the whole admirable. Mr. Monteux would show a high artistic conscience, whoever his audience included. Yesterday he appeared to take a personal pleasure in his task, and he, too, and his "signals," were watched and applauded to the echo by the young audience. The children were granted a privilege the grownups had never enjoyed. The "Dance of the Sugar Plums" was repeated in response to their insistent applause, whereas in the regular subscription concerts an encore by the orchestra is a thing unknown.

This same programme will be repeated for other school children of Greater Boston, tomorrow afternoon. More and more are these concerts finding their audience and making of that audience future subscribers to the winter series of concerts.

POST-APR 3

CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Symphony Orchestra Gives an Interesting Performance

AUDIENCE FRANK IN AWARD OF FAVOR

Yesterday afternoon, before an audience that all but filled Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux gave one of his "Young People's Concerts," with this program:

Mozart—Overture to "The Marriage to Figaro."
Haydn—Two movements from the Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13). (a) Minuet; Trio. (b) Finale: Allegro con Spirito.
Debussy—From the "Little Suite." (a) In a Boat. (b) Procession.
Delibes—Slavic Theme with Variations from "Coppelia."
Tschaikowsky—Ballet Suite, "The Nutcracker." (a) Dance of the Sugar Fairy. (b) Chinese Dance. (c) Trepak (Russian Dance).
Wagner—Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin."

Since the "young people," who formed quite nine-tenths of the audience, were manifestly no respecters of persons, it was interesting to guess, from the warmth of the applause, at what they liked best. The Mozart overture left them cold, the Debussy pieces pleased them little better, the Haydn minuet something more. With the Haydn allegro, however, came content; throughout its course all talking and fidgeting ceased. And then, Debussy once over, enthusiasm grew. The first movement of the Tchaikovsky suite, which the audience regarded as a solo for Celesta, they would have again, and they tried hard for the Chinese and Russian dances once more. And the Lohengrin introduction drew forth as hearty applause as any all the afternoon.

Rhythm, in short, in company with color or better still much sound, is what the audience yesterday liked best. If half the company, in place of children, could have consisted of music teachers disposed to watch and listen, it might have proved a very good thing for the betterment of musical standards. For if this audience so keenly relished rhythm, surely the majority of the individuals who formed it could be taught to play in time, or sing.

Although, in our schools and music schools and at the hands of private masters, much music teaching is going forward, how many young pupils are learning the value of notes, and the necessity of observing the same? For an answer ask any good musician. If all music teachers whose job it is to teach the rudiments could recognize the love of rhythm which exists in every child fit to study music at all, and would make that child understand that the rhythm he loves plain cannot be without firm time, the situation would improve. Yesterday's concert should serve as an object lesson to teachers.

That it is of vast benefit for young pupils to hear a concert of such high quality cannot be questioned; all teachers know that they will work the better for it. The quality was high indeed genuinely brilliant playing.

R. R. G.

HERALD - APR 4

NEW MUSIC IMPENDS

FOR FIRST TIME A SYMPHONY OF SIBELIUS

His Fifth, by Some Accounted a Masterpiece, at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—The Course, Matter and Manner of the Debated Pages—Hue Likewise for First Time, in a Fanciful, Artful Suite—Liszt's "Dance of Death" to Be Revived by Siloti

ACCORDING to a statement of Ernest Newman once quoted in these columns. Boston must know the symphonies of Jan Sibelius far better thon does London; for in the British city, he avers, no music-lover would be found who could write from memory two bars of any of these pieces. Eighteen years ago Mr. Gericke and the Symphony Orchestra played the Second Symphony of Sibelius to an audience frankly bewildered by the strangeness of the composer's idiom—an idiom that has since become one of the familiar things in modern music. Dr. Muck was assiduous with this Symphony and with the more direct and ingratiating predecessor, which he introduced here in 1907. He also made known to us the Fourth, of an uncompromising severity and frequent harshness which puzzled even the warmest admirers of the composer. Although Sibelius's Northern bleakness of mood is seemingly alien to the more genial French temperament, Mr. Monteux has also looked kindly upon the Finn's music. He even considered a performance of Sibelius's Third Symphony, usually regarded on all side as a flat failure, and dismissed the project only when rehearsal confirmed the weakness of the music. Within the last two years Mr. Monteux has given notable performances of the First and Second Symphonies while on his programme for tomorrow and Saturday he has placed the Fifth—and latest—hitherto unheard here.

This Fifth Symphony is not actually new. It was played in Helsingfors some time before 1914, but until it was heard in London in 1920 it had not reached any of the important music-centres of Europe. and the score was not published until the following year. Last October the piece was played in Philadelphia, and a month later it was made known by the Philharmonic Society to New York. The reviewers in London, none too familiar with even the first two symphonies, were as puzzled by the Fifth as they had been by the Fourth. As Mr. Newman felicitously expressed it, they found the piece remarkable, but they were not at all sure whether it was remarkably good or remarkably bad. In his programme-notes for the performances in Philadelphia and New York, Mr. Lawrence Gilman gave a list of the adjectives used by the London newspapers in describing the Symphony—among them, "dour," "bleak," "harsh," "rugged," "angular," "cold," "gray," "reticent," "austere," "drastic," "ungenial," "bare," "lonely" and "trenchent." Yet certain of these critics found in the music a more generous and expansive mood than Sibelius had hitherto disclosed. more spontaneity, a larger simplicity, a directer speech. Commenting on Sibelius's economy of material and device—an economy and restraint unparalled in modern music—Mr. Newman found this quality less conspicuous in the Fifth Symphony than in the one that came before it.

In the main he praised the music but as one not wholly sure of his ground, trusting to impression rather than relying on conviction.

To each hearer of the piece on Friday and Saturday will come opportunity to judge it for himself, to see whether, with Mr. Granville Bantock, he finds it "superb," or whether he agrees with those who have contemptuously dismissed it as drab and dull. Meanwhile it may serve the interest both of composer and of audiences to set forth a brief account and analysis of the music. Ostensibly this Fifth Symphony contains but three movements; practically it has four, as the first falls into two well defined divisions—a slow Introduction and a Scherzo. The opening, in E flat major, is pastoral in character. Over a roll of drums a horn proclaims a motiv, of which the first part—four ascending tones, B flat, E flat, F, B flat—is prominently employed throughout the dual movement. Much use is made of a wavering wood-wind figure in thirds and of of a more expressive theme first announced by the flutes. At length a crescendo, combined with a quickening of the pace, brings the second section (Allegro moderato, B major), a Scherzo of Beethovenish simplicity, ruggedness and directness. The thirds of the opening are once more in evidence, but now in rhythm of the dance, while the initial phrase recurs from time to time. At the end the music returns to the tonality of E flat.

Unpromising indeed is the kernel from which grows the second movement, an Andante mosso, quasi allegretto, in G major, 3-2 time. Against sustained harmonies in the wood-wind, the violas and violoncellos, pizzicato, begin a simple tune that is completed by flutes in thirds. If through affinity of mood and utterance the Scherzo suggests Beethoven, the Andante also suggests that composer by reason of mastery of development. The melody upon which it is based is treated with wondrous resource, at times flowering into moving eloquence. Throughout the movement Sibelius seldom leaves his centre-key.

To Mr. Gilman the Finale is "the most nobly imagined and most nobly eloquent music Sibelius has given us. . . . Here there is little that even the heedless could fairly call drastic or harsh or bleak; here is forthright directness of passionate speech, breadth and fervor and amplitude of line, largeness and freedom of movement. The superb coda, in particular, is a page of uplifting beauty and power." Beneath quick chords in the violins—each chord played twice—the violas announce a nervous, insistent theme, in the rhythm of the accompaniment. A lyric motiv brings the needed contrast. With a change to G-flat major the theme becomes ghostly, mysterious; and a gradual enlarging and unfolding of the music leads to the triumphant end.

In this Fifth Symphony, as in the others, Sibelius uses a comparatively small orchestra—except for an added trumpet, that of the symphonies of Schumann and Mendelssohn: two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, tympani and strings. As before he shuns both Straussian magniloquence and Debussyan subtleties. Much of the Symphony is diatonic and although the harmonies are not conventional, they are seldom acridly dissonant; while there is no attempt at the "polytony" of the preceding Symphony. One and all the themes are of extreme simplicity. It is the bareness, not the complexity, of music that has proved so baffling. Yet if it is spare it is by no means thin or empty, and for some it is to a marked degree gripping and vital.

Offsets

With his usual skill in programme-making Mr. Monteux will also include in these concerts another "novelty" of wholly different character—the Symphonic Suite by Georges-Adolphe Huë drawn from his opera, "Titania," first produced at the Opéra-Comique in 1903. While his is a new name at the Symphony Concerts, not much need be said either of the composer or his music. He was born at Versailles May 6, 1858. At the age of twenty-one he won the Prix de Rome, and two years later the Prix Cressent. He is a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor and upon the death of Saint-Saëns he succeeded to that composer's place in the French Institute. His "Rubezähl," a "Symphonic Legend," produced at the Colonne Concerts in 1886, long contested with d'Indy's "Song of the Bell" a prize offered by the city of Paris. In the end Huë was defeated by one vote. He has produced many operas, a symphony and several short orchestral pieces, but outside France he is chiefly known through his songs. Among the latter may be mentioned a set of six, to poems by Heine, that includes the popular "J'ai Pleuré en Rêve" and the fine "Croquis d'Orient."

The Suite to be played tomorrow and Saturday runs in two main divisions, each of which is again subdivided. Part one begins with an imaginative, warmly-colored movement, "Le Paradis Féerique," which leads directly to a graceful, typically French "Danse de Phillida." A sombre Prelude, notable for its rich instrumentation, opens the second part. Following this is a section called "La Chasse," that needs no explanation. A sonorous movement, by title "Apparition," brings the end. Like most Frenchmen who were writing two decades ago, Huë knew his Wagner; but the music of this Suite has also its portion of Gallic delicacy and fancy, while it is scored with surpassing skill.

From Liszt Also

With Mr. Siloti as pianist, Liszt's "Dance of Death" is also to be played on Friday and Saturday. Though the composer first took thought of these variations in 1839 and handed them to Bülow for performance in 1864-65, they will be virtually new to Bostonian audiences of 1922. Only twice in the past have they been played at the Symphony Concerts—by Mr. Bauer in 1912, by Mr. Busoni in 1914. As the books say, during Liszt's sojourn in Italy in 1838-39, he was deeply affected by a gruesome fresco by Orcagna in the Campo Santo at Pisa, "The Triumph of Death." The central group in the picture shows a party of men and women, in sumptuous attire, entertained by a minstrel and by dancing cupids. Death, in the shape of a woman with claw-like hands, bat-wings and streaming hair, flies toward them swinging a scythe. Corpses lie at her feet and along the path she has travelled. There are numerous other episodes in the fresco, but they are not pertinent to the music.

Liszt made the first sketch of his piece at Pisa in 1839. Ten years later at Weimar he developed and orchestrated it, and in another decade revised it thoroughly. It was first played by Hans von Bülow, to whom it was dedicated, some time during this season of 1864-1865. In form, it is a free paraphrase in the form of variations, on the ancient plain-song, "Dies Irae," a theme that has tempted many composers, from Berlioz to Loeffler. Against a reiterated accompaniment-figure in the piano and kettle-drums, the melody is immediately proclaimed by clarinets, bassoons, trombones, tuba, violas, violoncellos and double-basses. After a cadenza for the piano it is thundered again by the full orchestra. Beginning in the spirit of the theme, the variations grow gentle, turn tumultuous, and end fantastically. The piano-part is replete with glissandi and other bizarre effects. It is interesting to note that the "Dance of Death" was played by Siloti at Leipzig in November, 1883, in a concert arranged by him and made up wholly of pieces by Liszt.

In a recent issue of the "Living Age" appeared an article "Borodin and Liszt," by Louise Cruppi, taken from "La Revue Musicale," a portion of which deserves to be quoted apropos this "Dance of Death:"

> Borodin once arrived at the master's house when Liszt was in his bedroom being shaved by his valet. While we were talking [says Borodin] his toilet advanced. His valet put on the master's hair, the little black, white-edged cap of a Catholic abbé, and got him, not without difficulty, into a long black coat. Just as I was saying that I should be happy to hear his "Danse Macabre," which I consider the finest of all compositions for piano and orchestra, because of its originality, the power of the theme, the novelty of the instrumentation and its Gothic and liturgical character, Liszt broke in hastily with, "Yes, yes! You see that pleases you Russians, but here they don't like it. It has been played five or six times in Germany and has been a failure every time. Once even the orchestra was astonished, and had to get used to it by degrees!

WARREN STOREY SMITH

MEMORANDA ABOUT MUSIC

Strauss's "Don Quixote" from Mr. Monteux—A New Symphony from Mr. Converse—Dr. Muck's New Job—Nikisch's Successor

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Monteux will undertake for the first times in Boston one of the longer tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Quixote," the celebrated "Variations on a Knightly Theme," unheard here since Dr. Muck's day. The solo violoncello and the solo viola, representing respectively Don Qui- ote and Sancho Panza, will be played by Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Fourel. The other numbers of the programme are a little symphony of Haydn, No. 2 in D Major, the beautiful music of spring lights, and colors, the so-called "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"; three fragments of Schumann's incidental music to Byron's play, "Manfred," viz: an Entr'acte, the Cowherd's Melody for English horn, and the Invocation to the Fairy of the Alps. Mr. Speyer of the wind-choir will play the English horn.

A week later, at the Symphony Concert of April 21 and 22, a new Symphony by Mr. Converse will be played for the first times anywhere; while at the final concerts for the season, on April 28 and 29, the major number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's pictorial and displayful Suite from The Arabian Nights, "Scheherazade."

TRANS. APR. 6.

AS usual when the Symphony Orchestra betakes itself to Harvard College, repertory pieces of old or recent standing filled last evening the major part of the concert. As usual also, the sensitive and therefore enhancing acoustics of the wooden-walled Sanders Theatre, seemed now and again, to give them cleared and freshened voice. So heard, not a few measures for strings in Brahms's Symphony in C minor gained incisiveness or suavity; while, as a whole, the sought... andante gained richness of tone through and, as it seemed, new euphonies in the blendings of the wind-choir. After all Mr. Weingartner was only a step or two ahead of the rest of us when in an essay, he acclaimed Brahms as both sensitive and masterful with instrumental voices. Seldom, too, have the horns sounded more beautifully than they did yesterday in the call of the summoning heavens to the rejoicing earth of the Finale. To Sanders likewise Mr. Monteux bore three orchestral fragments—Psyche Asleep, Psyche Borne by the Zephyrs and Psyche in the Embraces of Eros—from Franck's tone-poem as played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston last week. Whether the strands were thin and finely spaced or large and amply woven, the web of the music shone the brighter for the reflecting resonance of the wooden walls. Yet orchestra and conductor hardly brought to the music the communicative zest of earlier adventure. No more was Rimsky-Korsakov's overture of a Russian Easter Mass—in an opera house disguised as a church—bear too frequent hearing. There are persistent magnificences in the music—and also persistent lengths.

For wayfarers out of the Subway, the spice to the concert was the return of Mr. Siloti as pianist, to play that seldom-heard piece. Liszt's "Dance of Death." He nears his sixtieth year; not for a generation or two, counted musically, has he returned to the United States; indeed it was only the exactions and the privations of the Soviet régime in Russia that persuaded him anew into the Western World. Years or no years, he keeps his familiar vigors and as all concerned discovered at rehearsals his familiar will imperious. It was good to see him come springily to the stage—tall, spare, keen-nerved, quick-spirited, in this blessed land of the soft, the complaisant and the fat. It was kindling to see and hear him "taking charge of things," as the homely phrase goes, as soon as Liszt's music was under way. It asks little by sensuous beauty of tone, and voluptuous pleasures of sound were as few in Mr. Siloti's performance. No more does Liszt or need the pianist, stimulate the minds of hearers. Enough that he has mastered the technical exactions of the piece and can achieve through them the feats of macabre imagination designed by the composer. On both scores, Mr. Siloti, equally firm-set in his notions of the music and in his power with it, sufficed, and more.

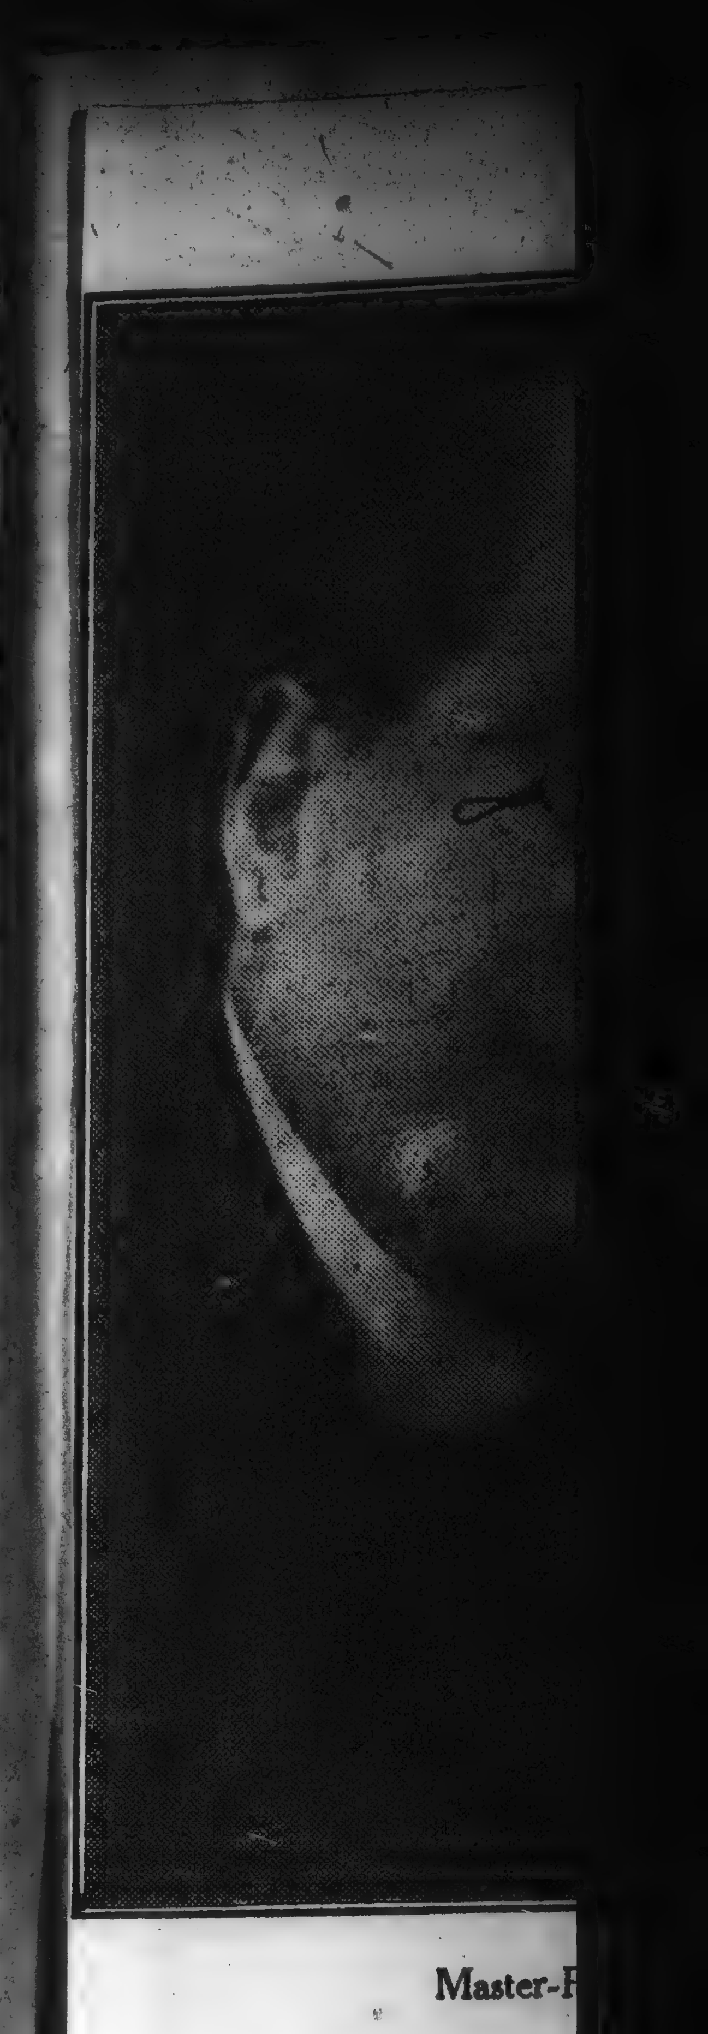
In Italian journeyings, Liszt looked upon Orcagna's fresco, "The Triumph of Death," on a wall of the Campo Santo in Pisa. Elsewhere described on these pages in Vasari's naive phrases, it teems with grim, some and grotesque imaginings of the contrast of Death, which is scourge and bane, with Life, which is pleasure and joy. Even into the next world it ascends with like imagery and to heaven or to hell the souls of men are bestowed. The fresco haunted Liszt: through a full twenty years he labored at the music it bred in him. Bülow, the friendly, brought it to birth; a few Lisztian pianists ingrained—Busoni, Friedheim, Siloti—thereafter nurtured it. The form is a set of separate, rather than enchained, variations for piano and orchestra on the hymn of the mediaeval church, "Dies Irae." The means are excessively difficult, displayful and Lisztian piano-part, crackling into cadenzas; with runs, clangorous with octaves; and an orchestral part, curiously bare-boned as it seems nowadays, yet full of strange progressions, and play of harmonies and timbres as such composition went in the innocent fifties.

The matter is impetuous, changeful, macabre, in kind, imaginative. Death, gaunt, grim, grotesque, now and again rattles its bones in orchestra or in piano strides, as it were scythe-swinging through the music. Liszt hints little of the zest and the pleasure of life for Death to dull, curdle, cut. Nowhere is his writing to the players "dolce"; nowhere is "resoluto ed energico." Rather he seems to have designed and accomplished a monstrous and manifold grotesquerie of tones, as fantastical of heaven and hell, death and life, holy hermits and dancing sporting youth, as is Orcagna's fresco. Written in the composer's unregenerate days, often the stench of decay, rather than the perfume of sanctity, ascends from the music. At moments the dread death, that haunted mediaeval men, artists, haunts also this virtuoso's fantasy. And through it all runs a fantastical imagery. Like other romantics, world without end, Liszt looked with pleasure upon "death's heads"; not without satisfaction fingers "bloody bones." But always in the

H. T. P.

TRANS. A

[95]



Master-F

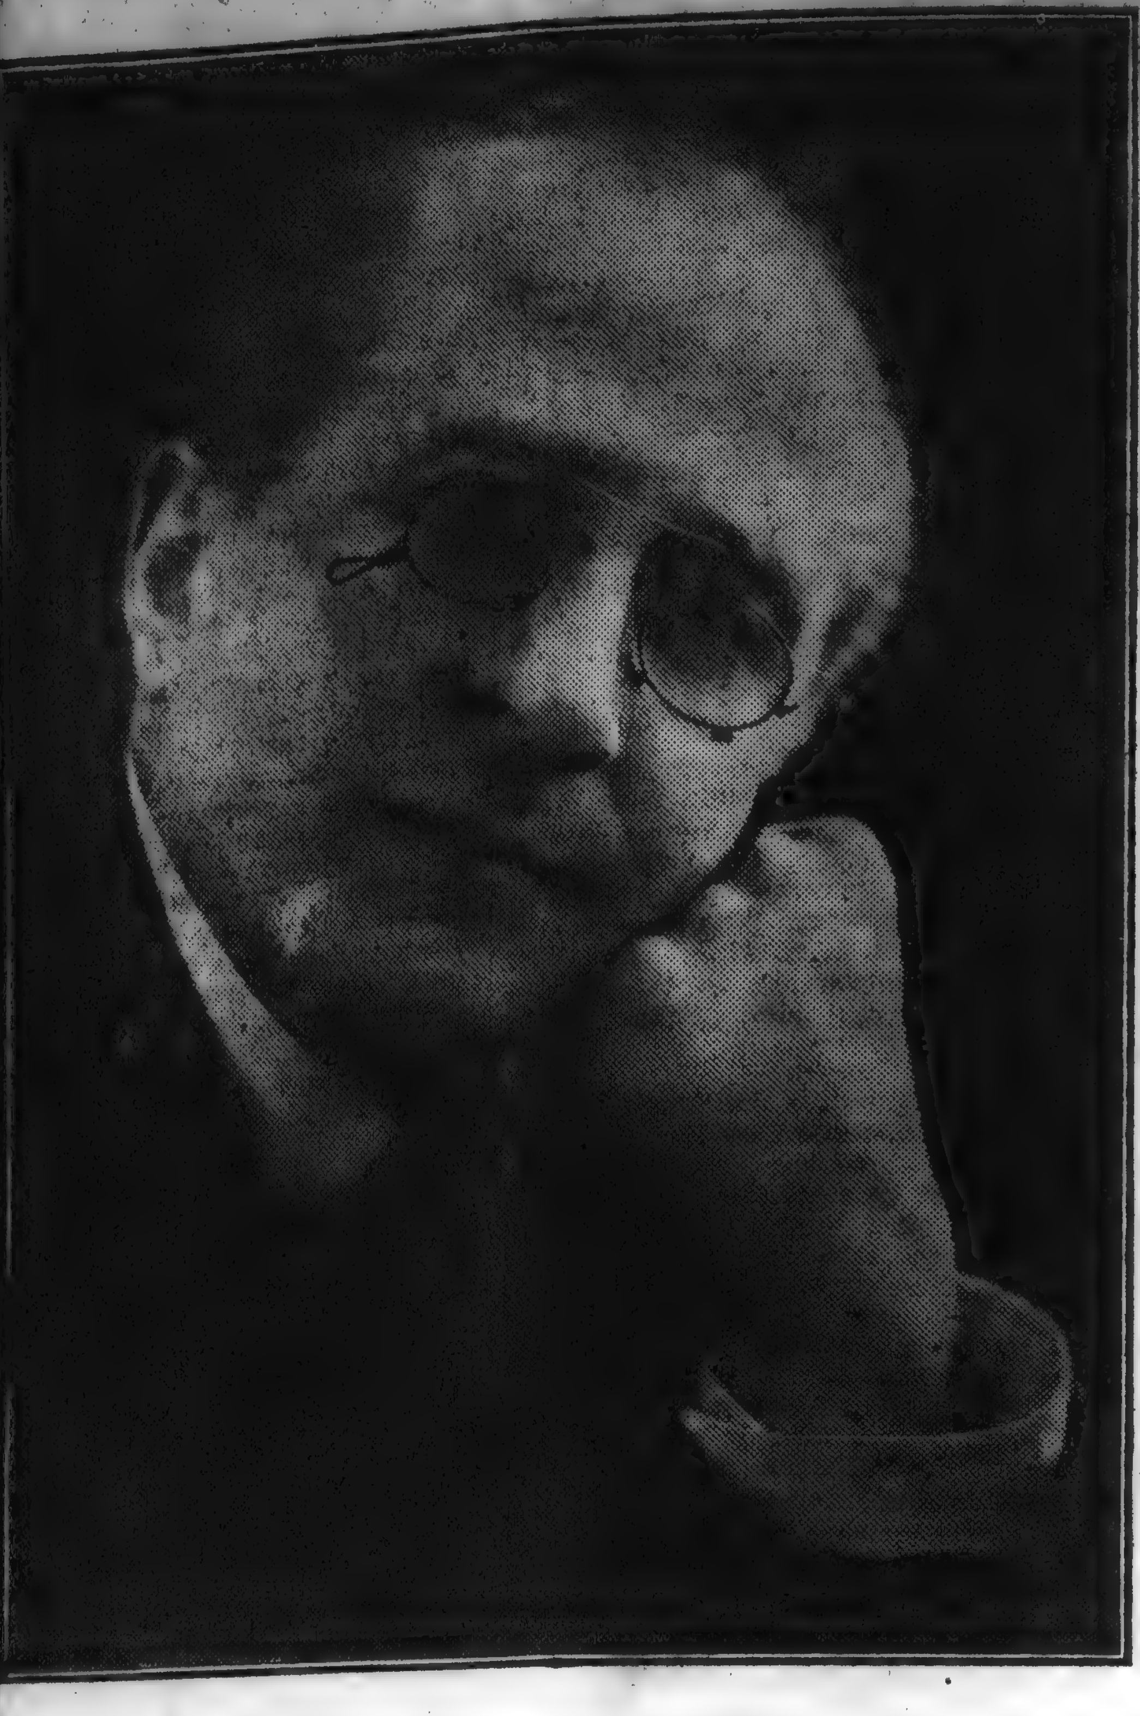
To the Piano

Vasari's Accoun Fresco, "The Backgroun Symp

MOVED by the fame of the praised, the men who him summoned to work Santo of that city, even as G Wherefore, putting his hand judgment, with some fanciful ing towards the Duomo, besid falmacco; and making the fir therein all the degrees of lord this world, placing them seat shade of many orange-trees, w have some Cupids in their la around and over many young it seems clear, of noble ladies a son of the long lapse of time, a of shooting at the hearts of the young men and nobles who ar and watching the amorous da sweetly taking joy in their lov trayed Castruccio, Lord of Luc with a blue cap wound round and near him other nobles of they are. In short, in that firs and his art demanded, he pain exceeding great grace. In the sented on a high mountain the for their sins and by the desire to that mountain, which is all the Lord, busy in diverse pur Some, reading and praying, are others, laboring in order to gai selves in various forms of acti a hermit who is milking a goat lifelike in appearance than he ing to three Kings, who are rid and going to the chase, huma who are lying dead but not v being contemplated with attent beautiful attitudes full of won flecting with pity for their own to become such. In one of th trayed Uguccione della Faggiu holding its nose with one hand dead and corrupted Kings. In flying through the air and dra cut off with her scythe the lives of all sorts and conditions, poo old, male and female, and in sex. Round these bodies are se from their mouths, and are car which are on the summit of a ve are angels who are likewise taki of these dead people, who are them to Paradise. [From " ers, Sculptors and Architects.

TRANS-APR

Across the Mellowing Years



Master-Pianist — Boston, 1922

Pupil of Liszt — Weimar, 1884

Alexander Siloti Returns to the Symphony Concerts

To the Piano via Liszt and Siloti

Vasari's Account in 1550 of Orcagna's Fresco, "The Triumph of Death," Background to a Piece at the Symphony Concerts Today

MOVED by the fame of these works of Orcagna, which were much praised, the men who at that time were governing Pisa had him summoned to work on a portion of one wall in the Campo Santo of that city, even as Giotto and Buffalmacco had done before. Wherefore, putting his hand to this, Andrea painted a Universal Judgment, with some fanciful inventions of his own, on the wall facing towards the Duomo, beside the Passion of Christ made by Buffalmacco; and making the first scene on the corner, he represented therein all the degrees of lords temporal wrapped in the pleasures of this world, placing them seated in a flowery meadow and under the shade of many orange-trees, which make a most delicious grove and have some Cupids in their branches above; and these Cupids flying around and over many young women (all portraits from the life, as it seems clear, of noble ladies and dames of those times, who, by reason of the long lapse of time, are not recognized), are making a show of shooting at the hearts of these young women, who have beside them young men and nobles who are standing listening to music and song and watching the amorous dances of youths and maidens, who are sweetly taking joy in their loves. Among these nobles Orcagna portrayed Castruccio, Lord of Lucca, as a youth of most beautiful aspect, with a blue cap wound round his head and with a hawk on his wrist, and near him other nobles of that age, of whom we know not who they are. In short, in that first part, in so far as the space permitted and his art demanded, he painted all the delights of the world with exceeding great grace. In the other part of the same scene he represented on a high mountain the life of those who, drawn by repentance for their sins and by the desire to be saved, have fled from the world to that mountain, which is all full of saintly hermits who are serving the Lord, busy in diverse pursuits with most vivacious expressions. Some, reading and praying, are shown all intent on contemplation, and others, laboring in order to gain their livelihood, are exercising themselves in various forms of action. There is seen here among others a hermit who is milking a goat, who could not be more active or more lifelike in appearance than he is. Below there is St. Macarius showing to three Kings, who are riding with their ladies and their retinues and going to the chase, human misery in the form of three Kings who are lying dead but not wholly corrupted in a tomb, which is being contemplated with attention by the living Kings in diverse and beautiful attitudes full of wonder, and it appears as if they are reflecting with pity for their own selves that they have in a short time to become such. In one of these Kings on horseback Andrea portrayed Uguccione della Faggiuola of Arrezzo, in a figure which is holding its nose with one hand in order not to feel the stench of the dead and corrupted Kings. In the middle of this scene is Death, who, flying through the air and draped in black, is showing that she has cut off with her scythe the lives of many, who are lying on the ground, of all sorts and conditions, poor and rich, halt and whole, young and old, male and female, and in short a good number of every age and sex. Round these bodies are some devils who are tearing their souls from their mouths, and are carrying them to certain pits full of fire, which are on the summit of a very high mountain. Over against these are angels who are likewise taking the souls from the mouths of others of these dead people, who have belonged to the good, and are flying with them to Paradise. [From "The Lives of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors and Architects."

TRANS-APR. 7.

SILOTI SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

ALEXANDER SILOTI

Alexander Siloti's triumph at the Symphony matinee yesterday was by far the greatest scored this season by any pianist who has appeared at these concerts.

After his performance of Liszt's "Dance of Death," which he first played when he was a Liszt pupil in Weimar 40 years ago, the towering Russian was recalled many times. The orchestra, by the way, deserved no small share of the applause.

Siloti, who has not visited Boston for more than 20 years, won another triumph after his performance, with the orchestra, of Bach's fifth Brandenburg concerto. But it was his "Dance of Death" interpretation, a brilliant feat in the true Lisztian manner, that makes the return of this distinguished Russian pianist one of the red letter events of the season. For many years he has been regarded abroad as the foremost Liszt interpreter. Certainly his achievements yesterday justified such a reputation.

All in all, this 21st program, which will be repeated tonight, is one of the season's best. It opens with the fifth Sibelius symphony, which yesterday was played here for the first time, and closes with another novelty, Georges Hue's symphonic suite, "Titania," culled from the Hue opera, produced in Paris some 20 years ago. Both are exceptionally interesting works; one thoroughly Finnish, with dark shadings even in the piquant pastoral-like movement, and the other, as characteristically French.

Throughout the concert Mr. Monteux and his men were at their best.

ADVTSR. APR. 8

SILOTI AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Amazes by Virtuosity —Sibelius' Fifth Played

Alexander Siloti, the pupil of Liszt, the young Russian who astonished Europe in his 20's, astonished a Boston symphony audience yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the fire, the power, the youthful contagious enthusiasm of his playing, at the age of 59.

He is a cousin of the Russian composer, Rachmaninoff, and is of the same huge build.

PLAYS THREE NUMBERS

He played Liszt's paraphrase, for piano and orchestra, of the "Dies Irae"—the "Dance of Death," and also, with Mr. Burgin, the concert master, and Georges Laurent, first flutist of the orchestra, Bach's 5th Branderburg concerto. He played Bach, of course, in an entirely different manner, but with the same plenitude of strength and of feeling, the same bigness and beauty of time that he had displayed in a different style in the brilliant if meretricious music of his old master. Mr. Siloti is one of the few remaining survivors of the day when there were not merely brilliant, out great pianists, great masters, in the land.

Sibelius' 5th symphony and Hue's symphonic suite from his ballet, "Titania," were played for the first time in Boston.

The Sibelius symphony was received with exceptional enthusiasm, and this in face of disquieting rumors which had seeped out from the rehearsal room. The 5th symphony is anything but weak or uninspired. If it has a principle defect it is that the composer is so absorbed in his mood that he does not always take the trouble to make his weaving clear and unmistakable to an audience.

First Movement Melancholy

The first movement is melancholy, very beautiful, softer in its colors and less austere in its mood than the same movement of symphony number four. True, there is again the thought of winds and bleak moors and skies, and again the tragic outcry of the human confronted with fate. But this movement is very clear, despite its impressionism. Simple means produce unforgettable effects. Thus the singular

ir memory movement

which rare

ich

the brass choir [illegible] from the prevailing dull and misty coloring of this music.

The next movement, in the manner of a scherzo, hints at happiness, gayety. It is held together by repetitions of the opening horn call of the symphony.

The third movement, suggestive of a formal old fashioned dance, is interrupted by passion and foreboding. It ends abruptly, too much so for those who insist on the completed period.

Three Soloists

The Bach music was played by the three soloists, with Mr. Silotti as cooperating conductor, so to speak, with Mr. Monteux, with the most loving enthusiasm. Mr. Silotti's rhythm was a rock for the others. Tribute must also be paid to the art of Mr. Burgin and to the beautiful tone and musicianship of Mr. Laurent.

Hue's music, brilliant, pleasing, theatrical as it should be for a ballet, quotes alike from Debussy, Strauss, and other people. Yet it is written in a beautiful manner. The orchestra shimmers and coruscates with color.

POST-APR. 8.

21ST SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Sibelius Production Played for First Time in Boston

SILOTI, PIANIST, THE SOLO ARTIST

By PHILIP HALE

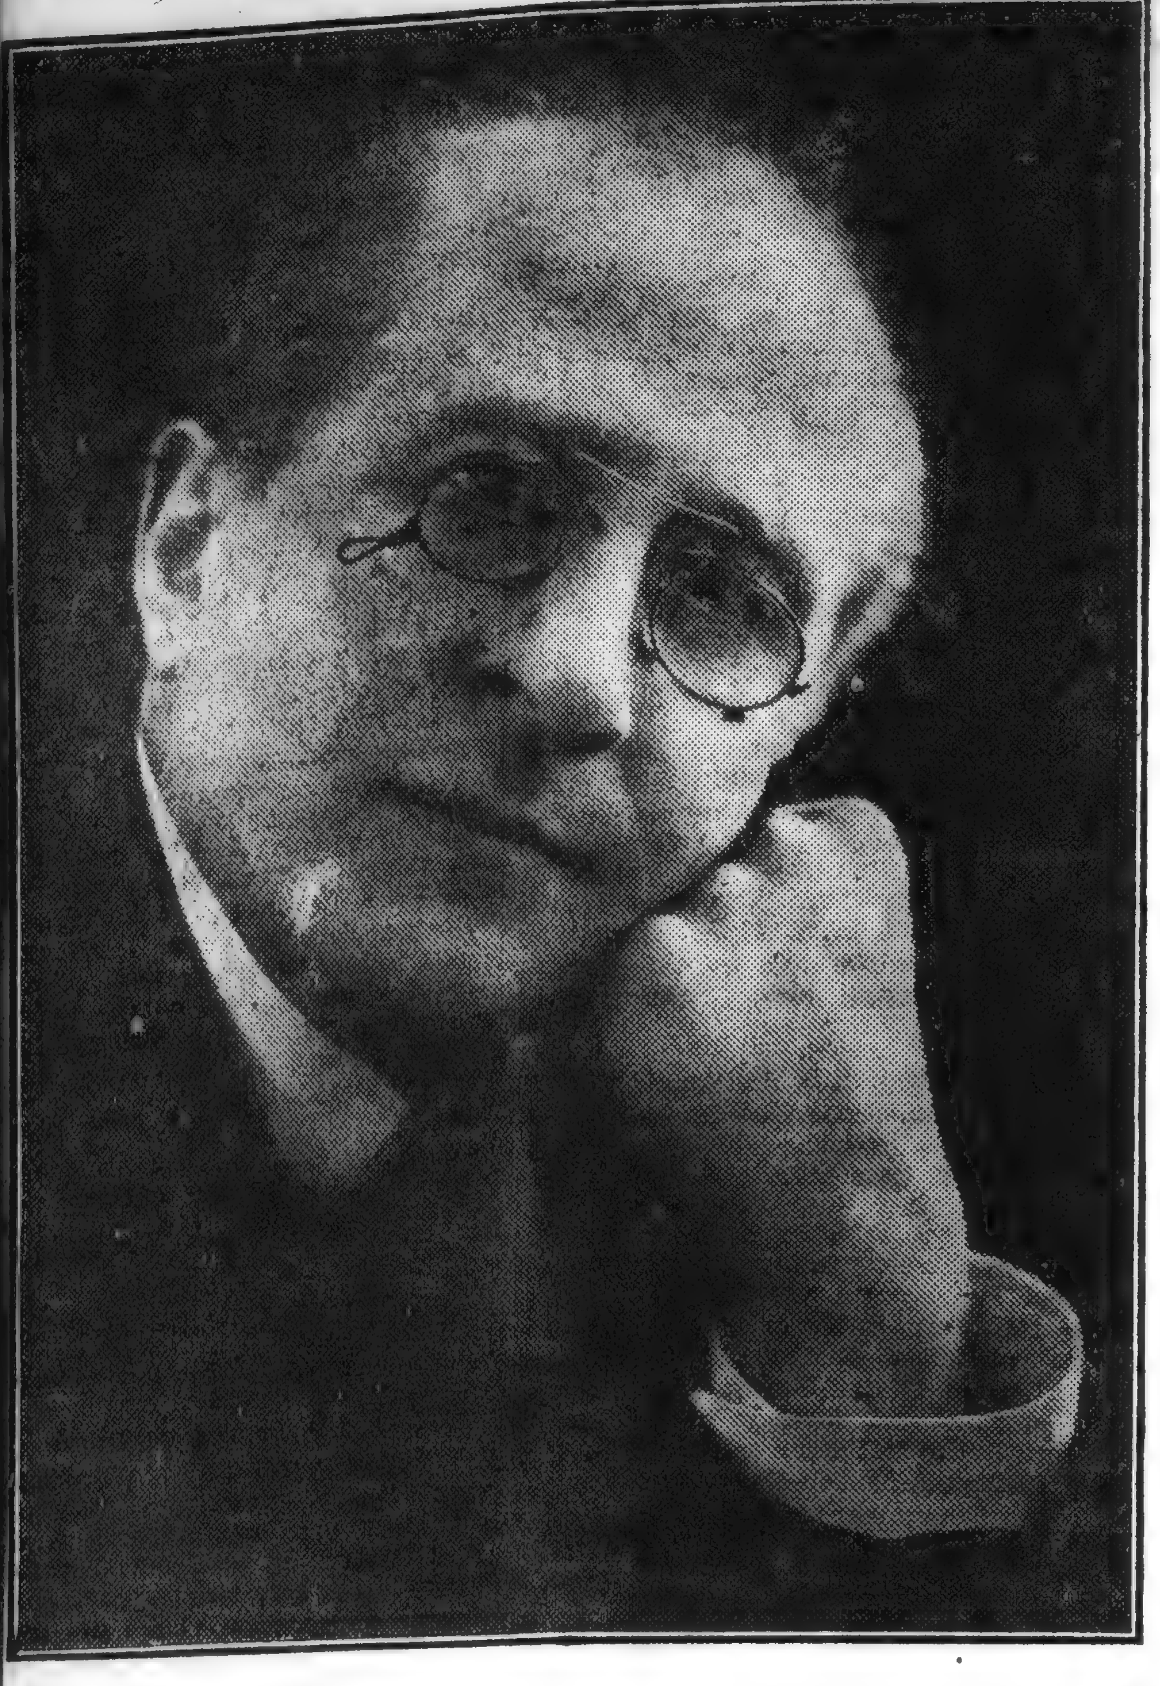
The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5 (first time here); Liszt, "Dance of Death," for piano and orchestra (Mr. Siloti, pianist); Bach, 5th Brandenburg Concerto, D major, for piano, flute and violin (Messrs. Siloti, Laurent and Burgin); Hue, Suite "Titania" (first time in Boston).

The symphony of Sibelius would probably grow on the hearer in power and significance with future performances. There is no immediate impression of beauty as that word is commonly understood, but as Thomas Hardy once said that generations to come might visit Ultima Thule searching for beauty, rather than journey to the Vale of Temple, so there is something in this symphony that pleases more than tuneful measures, or scherzo that sets heels in motion, and a conventionally pompous, heaven-defying apotheosis. This symphony—if it may be called a symphony, for it is surely not one according to orthodox rules—is one of moods, sullen, despairing, defiant moods. That it would be virile was to be expected from Sibelius, but here we miss the long, sweeping, irresistible line that characterized him in his earlier works. The themes, if themes they can be called, are merely guide-posts to the composer's state of mind. In the first section, the introduction and the first allegro, some may easily find a seascape, but not old ocean with its laughter, its spray, its invitations; but a leaden sea under a murky sky, with hoarse mumurings, with the shrieks of gulls; the sea in which so many mortals keep their secret far down. Yet the music does not whine; it cannot be called pessimistic, in the manner of Brahms or Tchaikovsky; it has tonic qualities. Not a sensuous note; not a singlebid for immediate popularity; but there is something in it that will be permanent. The symphony is skilfully constructed in a new manner; skilfully scored, with most ingenious effects not too loboriously contrived, and with a comparatively small orchestra. The young composer of today, looking at the score, will rub his eyes in wonder and exclaim: "What! No English horn, no bass clarinet, only four horns, no celesta, xylophone, harp, tam-tam? What's the man thinking about?" But Sibelius has ideas; he feels deeply; he pours out his emotions; he snaps his fingers at decorations, at sensational effects, at sugared pages sure to please. When he is in lighter mood, it is only for a moment; the eternal questions asked since the beginning of time are ever in his mind; yet serious, he is not dull, he does not sermonize. He writes music first of all to free himself of what is in his heart and brain and must out.

The suite of Hue, on the other hand, derived from his opera, "Titania," has a superficial charm. Its effect depends largely on the instrumentation, which is now delicate, now brilliant. The suite is not conspicuous for melodic originality or any revelation of a strong musical nature. It contains some agreeable pages, pleasant to hear once in a season.

Mr. Siloti played here at a Symphony concert and in recitals in 1898 and then charmed his audience by the fine musical quality, the tonal beauty, the elegance and the brilliance of his performance. Yesterday he played his own edition of Liszt's fantastic "Danse Macabre." (This fact was announced here too late for mention in the program book.) He thinks highly of these showy variations on the old cantus firmus, the "Dies Irae," and he won the warm approbation of Liszt by playing them as far back as 1883. The Danse Macabre is known here, for it has been played by Messrs. Bauer and Busoni, but not with the supreme display of striking pianistic art that excited the audience yesterday to genuine enthusiasm. Hearing Mr. Siloti, one did not consider too seriously the music itself, which is frankly sensational. Those who dislike Liszt's

Across the Mellowing Years



Master-Pianist — Boston, 1922

Pupil of Liszt — Weimar, 1884

Alexander Siloti Returns to the Symphony Concerts

To the Piano via Liszt and Siloti

Vasari's Account in 1550 of Orcagna's Fresco, "The Triumph of Death," Background to a Piece at the Symphony Concerts Today

MOVED by the fame of these works of Orcagna, which were much praised, the men who at that time were governing Pisa had him summoned to work on a portion of one wall in the Campo Santo of that city, even as Giotto and Buffalmacco had done before. Wherefore, putting his hand to this, Andrea painted a Universal Judgment, with some fanciful inventions of his own, on the wall facing towards the Duomo, beside the Passion of Christ made by Buffalmacco; and making the first scene on the corner, he represented therein all the degrees of lords temporal wrapped in the pleasures of this world, placing them seated in a flowery meadow and under the shade of many orange-trees, which make a most delicious grove and have some Cupids in their branches above; and these Cupids flying around and over many young women (all portraits from the life, as it seems clear, of noble ladies and dames of those times, who, by reason of the long lapse of time, are not recognized), are making a show of shooting at the hearts of these young women, who have beside them young men and nobles who are standing listening to music and song and watching the amorous dances of youths and maidens, who are sweetly taking joy in their loves. Among these nobles Orcagna portrayed Castruccio, Lord of Lucca, as a youth of most beautiful aspect, with a blue cap wound round his head and with a hawk on his wrist, and near him other nobles of that age, of whom we know not who they are. In short, in that first part, in so far as the space permitted and his art demanded, he painted all the delights of the world with exceeding great grace. In the other part of the same scene he represented on a high mountain the life of those who, drawn by repentance for their sins and by the desire to be saved, have fled from the world to that mountain, which is all full of saintly hermits who are serving the Lord, busy in diverse pursuits with most vivacious expressions. Some, reading and praying, are shown all intent on contemplation, and others, laboring in order to gain their livelihood, are exercising themselves in various forms of action. There is seen here among others a hermit who is milking a goat, who could not be more active or more lifelike in appearance than he is. Below there is St. Macarius showing to three Kings, who are riding with their ladies and their retinues and going to the chase, human misery in the form of three Kings who are lying dead but not wholly corrupted in a tomb, which is being contemplated with attention by the living Kings in diverse and beautiful attitudes full of wonder, and it appears as if they are reflecting with pity for their own selves that they have in a short time to become such. In one of these Kings on horseback Andrea portrayed Uguccione della Faggiuola of Arrezzo, in a figure which is holding its nose with one hand in order not to feel the stench of the dead and corrupted Kings. In the middle of this scene is Death, who, flying through the air and draped in black, is showing that she has cut off with her scythe the lives of many, who are lying on the ground, of all sorts and conditions, poor and rich, halt and whole, young and old, male and female, and in short a good number of every age and sex. Round these bodies are some devils who are tearing their souls from their mouths, and are carrying them to certain pits full of fire, which are on the summit of a very high mountain. Over against these are angels who are likewise taking the souls from the mouths of others of these dead people, who have belonged to the good, and are flying with them to Paradise. [From "The Lives of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors and Architects."

TRANS - APR. 7.

SILOTI SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

Alexander Siloti's triumph at the Symphony matinee yesterday was by far the greatest scored this season by any pianist who has appeared at these concerts.

ALEXANDER SILOTI

After his performance of Liszt's "Dance of Death," which he first played when he was a Liszt pupil in Weimar 40 years ago, the towering Russian was recalled many times. The orchestra, by the way, deserved no small share of the applause.

Siloti, who has not visited Boston for more than 20 years, won another triumph after his performance, with the orchestra, of Bach's fifth Brandenburg concerto. But it was his "Dance of Death" interpretation, a brilliant feat in the true Lisztian manner, that makes the return of this distinguished Russian pianist one of the red letter events of the season. For many years he has been regarded abroad as the foremost Liszt interpreter. Certainly his achievements yesterday justified such a reputation.

All in all, this 21st program, which will be repeated tonight, is one of the season's best. It opens with the fifth Sibelius symphony, which yesterday was played here for the first time, and closes with another novelty, Georges Hue's symphonic suite, "Titania," culled from the Hue opera, produced in Paris some 20 years ago. Both are exceptionally interesting works; one thoroughly Finnish, with dark shadings even in the piquant pastoral-like movement, and the other, as characteristically French.

Throughout the concert Mr. Monteux and his men were at their best.

ADVISR. APR. 8

SILOTI AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Amazes by Virtuosity —Sibelius' Fifth Played

Alexander Siloti, the pupil of Liszt, the young Russian who astonished Europe in his 20's, astonished a Boston symphony audience yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall by the fire, the power, the youthful contagious enthusiasm of his playing, at the age of 59.

He is a cousin of the Russian composer, Rachmaninoff, and is of the same huge build.

PLAYS THREE NUMBERS

He played Liszt's paraphrase, for piano and orchestra, of the "Dies Irae" —the "Dance of Death," and also, with Mr. Burgin, the concert master, and Georges Laurent, first flutist of the orchestra, Bach's 5th Branderburg concerto. He played Bach, of course, in an entirely different manner, but with the same plenitude of strength and of feeling, the same bigness and beauty of time that he had displayed in a different style in the brilliant if meretricious music of his old master. Mr. Siloti is one of the few remaining survivors of the day when there were not merely brilliant, but great pianists, great masters, in the land.

Sibelius' 5th symphony and Hue's symphonic suite from his ballet, "Titania," were played for the first time in Boston.

The Sibelius symphony was received with exceptional enthusiasm, and this in face of disquieting rumors which had seeped out from the rehearsal room. The 5th symphony is anything but weak or uninspired. If it has a principle defect it is that the composer is so absorbed in his mood that he does not always take the trouble to make his weaving clear and unmistakable to an audience.

First Movement Melancholy

The first movement is melancholy, very beautiful, softer in its colors and less austere in its mood than the same movement of symphony number four. True, there is again the thought of winds and bleak moors and skies, and again the tragic outcry of the human confronted with fate. But this movement is very clear, despite its impressionism. Simple means produce unforgettable effects. Thus the singular

if memory

movement

which rare

ich

the brass choir emerges from the prevailing dull and misty coloring of this music.

The next movement, in the manner of a scherzo, hints at happiness, gayety. It is held together by repetitions of the opening horn call of the symphony.

The third movement, suggestive of a formal old fashioned dance, is interrupted by passion and foreboding. It ends abruptly, too much so for those who insist on the completed period.

Three Soloists

The Bach music was played by the three soloists, with Mr. Silotti as cooperating conductor, so to speak, with Mr. Monteux, with the most loving enthusiasm. Mr. Silotti's rhythm was a rock for the others. Tribute must also be paid to the art of Mr. Burgin and to the beautiful tone and musicianship of Mr. Laurent.

Hue's music, brilliant, pleasing, theatrical as it should be for a ballet, quotes alike from Debussy, Strauss, and other people. Yet it is written in a beautiful manner. The orchestra shimmers and coruscates with color.

POST - APR. 8.

21ST SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Sibelius Production Played for First Time in Boston

SILOTI, PIANIST, THE SOLO ARTIST

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5 (first time here); Liszt, "Dance of Death," for piano and orchestra (Mr. Siloti, pianist); Bach, 5th Brandenburg Concerto, D major, for piano, flute and violin (Messrs. Siloti, Laurent and Burgin); Hue, Suite "Titania" (first time in Boston).

The symphony of Sibelius would probably grow on the hearer in power and significance with future performances. There is no immediate impression of beauty as that word is commonly understood, but as Thomas Hardy once said that generations to come might visit Ultima Thule searching for beauty, rather than journey to the Vale of Temple, so there is something in this symphony that pleases more than tuneful measures, or scherzo that sets heels in motion, and a conventionally pompous, heaven-defying apotheosis. This symphony—if it may be called a symphony, for it is surely not one according to orthodox rules—is one of moods, sullen, despairing, defiant moods. That it would be virile was to be expected from Sibelius, but here we miss the long, sweeping, irresistible line that characterized him in his earlier works. The themes, if themes they can be called, are merely guide-posts to the composer's state of mind. In the first section, the introduction and the first allegro, some may easily find a seascape, but not old ocean with its laughter, its spray, its invitations; but a leaden sea under a murky sky, with hoarse murmurings, with the shrieks of gulls; the sea in which so many mortals keep their secret far down. Yet the music does not whine; it cannot be called pessimistic, in the manner of Brahms or Tchaikovsky; it has tonic qualities. Not a sensuous note; not a singlebid for immediate popularity; but there is something in it that will be permanent. The symphony is skilfully constructed in a new manner; skilfully scored, with most ingenious effects not too loboriously contrived, and with a comparatively small orchestra. The young composer of today, looking at the score, will rub his eyes in wonder and exclaim: "What! No English horn, no bass clarinet, only four horns, no celesta, xylophone, harp, tam-tam? What's the man thinking about?" But Sibelius has ideas; he feels deeply; he pours out his emotions; he snaps his fingers at decorations, at sensational effects, at sugared pages sure to please. When he is in lighter mood, it is only for a moment; the eternal questions asked since the beginning of time are ever in his mind; yet serious, he is not dull, he does not sermonize. He writes music first of all to free himself of what is in his heart and brain and must out.

The suite of Hue, on the other hand, derived from his opera, "Titania," has a superficial charm. Its effect depends largely on the instrumentation, which is now delicate, now brilliant. The suite is not conspicuous for melodic originality or any revelation of a strong musical nature. It contains some agreeable pages, pleasant to hear once in a season.

Mr. Siloti played here at a Symphony concert and in recitals in 1898 and then charmed his audience by the fine musical quality, the tonal beauty, the elegance and the brilliance of his performance. Yesterday he played his own edition of Liszt's fantastic "Danse Macabre." (This fact was announced here too late for mention in the program book.) He thinks highly of these showy variations on the old cantus firmus, the "Dies Irae," and he won the warm approbation of Liszt by playing them as far back as 1883. The Danse Macabre is known here, for it has been played by Messrs. Bauer and Busoni, but not with the supreme display of striking pianistic art that excited the audience yesterday to genuine enthusiasm. Hearing Mr. Siloti, one did not consider too seriously the music itself, which is frankly sensational. Those who dislike Liszt's say that this Danse Macabre adds another terror to Death; yet there are strokes of genius even in the most extravagant portions of it. And then Mr. Siloti showed his versatility by playing delightfully with those admirable artists, Messrs. Laurent and Burgin, a concerto of Bach, with an endless opening Allegro of slight interest, an eloquent slow movement, and a finale that was not too spun-out.

[96]

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (B. and H. No. 2); Schumann, entr'acte, Ranz des Vaches, and invocation from the music to "Manfred;" Wagner, "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal;" Strauss, "Don Quixote" (violoncello, Mr. Bedetti; viola, Mr. Fourel).

HERALD APR. 8

TRIUMPH BY SILOTI AT THE SYMPHONY

Noted Russian Pianist Plays "Dance of Death"

Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist, unheard here since 1898, was enthusiastically applauded by both orchestra and audience at yesterday's Symphony concert at the end of his teacher Liszt's "Dance of Death." His playing, both in this number and in the Bach 'Brandenburg Concerto' in D major, which followed, was that of a great virtuoso who is also a great musician. Mr Siloti's performance is better balanced and more finely wrought than that of his pupil and cousin Rachmaninoff, with no sacrifice of dynamic energy.

Liszt's seldom heard music is an attempt to depict in tones Orcagna's fresco "The Triumph of Death," in the Campo Santo at Pisa. But it is neither naive, grotesque, nor sincere enough to achieve this aim. The nearest it carried one listener to Pisa was to recall the barren, desolate stretches in the Apennines between Bologna and Florence.

Bach's splendid, triumphantly vital music dwarfed everything else on the program. It was capably interpreted by all concerned. Mr Siloti's exquisite playing in the "adagio affetuoso," where he was ably seconded by Mr Burgin and Mr Laurent, will not soon be forgotten.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, composed in 1914, and played yesterday for the first time in Boston, is far less modern in idiom than his fourth, and in distinctly better taste than his first and second. He has apparently written what pleased him, disregarding musical fashions. The piece is no mere academic symphony, concocted after painstaking study of the best models. It is new ore from a vein which since Brahms has seemed exhausted. He is not afraid of melody, like most present day composers. Nor is he ashamed to write music intelligible to the middle-aged. His idiom is made up of elements that can be traced back to historic sources in Wagner, Mozart and others. But did not Bach, Beethoven and all the rest build upon the work of their predecessors? The performance was eloquent.

The other novelty was a suite drawn by Hue from his forgotten opera "Titania," produced in Paris in 1903, performed, perhaps, in honor of the composer's recent election to the institute in succession to Saint-Saens. There is no fault to find with it except that it tended to put one to sleep by its total lack of creative power. Everything that talent and taste can give, M Hue has, but not by these is great music achieved.

For next week a Haydn symphony, some excerpts from Schumann's incidental music for Byron's "Manfred," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and Strauss' "Don Quixote," are announced. There will be no soloist.

GLOBE - APR. 8

HUB ORCHESTRA PLEASES THRONG

Director Monteux Given Ovation During Brilliant and Impressive Program

Brilliant and impressively beautiful was the concert program presented last evening at Le Chateau by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players who appeared under the auspices of the Manchester Musical association in a program, beyond question, the most inspiring and enthusiastically received of the season.

The numbers chosen showed unerring judgment, being popular in character and of direct appeal, still representing the finest achievement in the rich field of symphony music.

This great orchestra which, under its present illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteaux, is said to equal and even exceed its long-standing preeminence among the orchestras of the world, is completing its 41st season, perhaps the most noteworthy in its history. To hear a Boston symphony concert is always a rare experience, affording as it does an opportunity to hear an ideal, perfect presentation of symphonic music, but never have the performances been more enjoyed or more highly praised than under Monsieur Monteux' direction.

The symphony which opened the program was the fourth of Tschaikowsky in F minor, which the great Russian composer considered one of the finest of his works, a judgment since reaffirmed enthusiastically by music lovers the world over. The playing of the horns in this piece was magnificent and the slow movements comprise some of the most melodiously beautiful passages in all music.

The modern school was represented by Debussy when M. Monteux, his conferee, presented the prelude to the afternoon of a Faun. This number is noted for the hauntingly beautiful flute solo parts played with the highest artistry by M. Laurent, the famous virtuoso.

Monteux Inspiring.

M. Monteux gave an inspiring reading of the Liszt prelude and his magnificent work throughout won him a veritable ovation reaching a climax in the storm of applause which followed the performance of Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" when he was recalled again and again. It may be safely said that no artist has been accorded such a reception and last evening's concert may be considered the most important musical event which Manchester has enjoyed for several seasons.

During the intermission, A. B. Jenks, speaking for the committee, announced that the association was closing its seventh year with a deficit of several hundred dollars, due largely to unusual conditions this season, stating further that this deficit would be assumed by the committee. After announcing next season's program, Mr. Jenks said that a tentative program had been considered to feature the Peoples' Symphony orchestra and Harry C. Whittemore, well known local pianist. It is the plan of the committee to present this program in the auditorium of the new high school building, provided the school committee favors such an arrangement.

The program:

Tchaikovsky ....
  Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36
  (a) Andante sostenuto.
  (b) Andantino in modo di canzona.
  (c) Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
  (d) Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Liszt, "Les Preludes,"
  Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine)
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Wagner, ...Overture to "Tannhauser"

MANCHESTER FEB. 29

NEW YORK
EVE. GLOBE
ISSUE OF
APR 3 1922

Just three weeks after their first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Henry Eicheim's "Oriental Impressions" will be played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, on April 14. The performance in Boston was conducted by the composer, who, it is interesting to note, though now a resident of that city, was born in Chicago in 1870. Mr. Eicheim's father, Meinhard Eicheim, was a 'cellist in Theodore Thomas's Orchestra for many years. Mr. Eicheim himself was at various times associated with the Thomas orchestra and the Boston band as one of the first violinists, and for four years was conductor of the Winchester (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra. He has twice visited in the Orient, where he studied the native music and gave concerts in the eastern cities.

The impressions on both these orchestral programmes are four in number: 1, Corean sketch; 2, Siamese sketch; 3, Japanese nocturne, and 4, Chinese sketch. Each contains a number of widely varied themes with orchestration calling variously for a Chinese drum (double-headed and without snares), antique cymbals, a large and a fluctuating tam-tam, a marimba, a fish head (wooden drum to accompany prayers, as well as for violins, flutes, oboes, etc. Other compositions by Mr. Eicheim include a symphonic poem for orchestra, "The Story of the Bell" (suggested by a story by Lafcadio Hearn), a sextet for strings, a string quartet, a violin and piano sonata, some forty songs, studies for the violin and piano pieces.

Mr. Eicheim first began composing oriental sketches when he was asked by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge to write music for the music festival at Pittsfield, Mass., for 1921, where four were performed in October. There are now seven in all. Three were given last year in New York by Eva Gauthier, soprano, and at one of the Concerts Internationaux de la Libre Esthétique in February at the Ambassador Hotel the Pittsfield programme was repeated. Some of them were performed in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra Ensemble. As they now stand they will also be given in London under the direction of Albert Coates.

Third Concert for Young People

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave its third concert for young people. The program was pleasantly diversified, none of the pieces being long or complicated. Beginning with Mozart's gay Overture to the "Marriage of Figaro" it continued with two movements from a Haydn symphony, two pieces by Debussy ("En Bateau" and "Cortège" from the "Petite Suite") a part of Delibes' delightful music to "Coppelia," three movements from Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin." An evident sympathy existed between the conductor and his audience of small admirers and the orchestra too entered into the spirit of the afternoon. The program, although well suited to the occasion, contained nothing which was trivial or which would not have been a source of pleasure to a more musically experienced audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

MONITOR - APR. 4

WISE WAYS OF YOUTH

Another Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with an Audience Astir to Wagner and Chaikovsky, Indifferent to Haydn and Mozart, Quite Sure That Debussy Is Dull—An Hour of Signs and Morals

"NO adults," said the admonishing announcement of the Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra, "will be admitted unless they are accompanied by one or more children." Such "grown-ups" were few in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—for the most part teachers convoying flocks of pupils. Yet many who have put regretted teens a quarter of a century behind them, would have enjoyed Mr. Monteux's hour of miscellany. Praise be, these Young People's Concerts are not intended to be "educational." Elsewhere that nuisance sufficiently clutters and confounds what should be the ornaments, the hobbies, the diversions of life. It is the satisfactions of symphonic music that the listening youngsters are to absorb, unconscious of aught but new sensations and untried paths to pleasure. Mr. Monteux's pieces plentifully fulfilled such purpose; while the playing of the band might have contented even the connoisseurs of Saturday evenings. A few among them would doubtless have resented the bulk of tone, the breadth of phrase, the weight and incisiveness of accent bestowed by Mr. Monteux on the Minuet of a Symphony by Haydn. Surely such music, at once formal and lightsome, was never written to sound with this pseudo-Handelian stress and sonority. On the other hand, in the succeeding Finale, with a leaping, circling tune that is fascination in itself, the orchestra regained a lightness, fleetness, suppleness that in eighteenth-century music it has not known since Dr. Muck's day. Even in their most baffling field—that self-same music—conductor and band do go forward. Indeed, in the Introduction to the Third Act of "Lohengrin" Mr. Monteux went forward to Mengelbergian magnitude and magnificence of tone. The orchestra strode; the orchestra clashed and clamored—even as does the music. It was good to hear it so played. Mr. Mengelberg projects his pieces; energizes his composers. He is not anathema except to the superfluously refined. Within his own field he is example and precept. With profit other conductors may study him.

Not too pleased, seemingly, were the children and youth with this eighteenth-century music. More for adults, perhaps, are the actual and the retrospective pleasures of Haydn and Mozart. Possibly for full delight in them the listener must be a little old, more than a little weary. Even the blue and silver glint, the springing pace, the piquancies—in velvet—of the Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," left the young listeners puzzled—and applausive only because they like to clap. They were discoverably restless, too, under fragments of Debussy's Little Suite—"The Boat-Song" for melody, "The Procession" for rhythm. To the Debussyans they are "cambric-tea," and by the queer instinct that in mere children somehow divines, the youngsters agreed. They were interested but by no means elated over the ballerina's variations of the straw from the first act of "Coppélia." The music sorely needs a dancer; without her, Delibes's ballet-mechanics are stripped rather bare.

Again the young instincts were going true. Straight home they went to the joys of three dances from Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker"—the Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy to the silvering celesta; the Chinese Dance, pattering in the strings, piping shrill in the flutes; the Trepak for whirl and plunge. The youngsters saluted Mr. A. Fiedler as the virtuoso of the celesta that he is. Over again they would have and did have the fairy's dance. They would have been as pleased with repetitions of the other two; but for some reason Mr. Monteux took no cue. Evidently from the youngest to the oldest, the youngsters rise to bright rhythms, to melody beating to them, to the "character-dances" of such familiar things as "Chinks" and fairies. As pleased were the young ear with the full-throated tumult of the fragment of "Lohengrin"—din of chivalry, if ever in music it sounded, for that mixture of realities and dreams which is the mood of sensitive teens. No: these Young People's Concerts do not come and go in vain. Four times a year they prove how sound is youthful instinct with music, how amply it deserves cultivation.

H. T. P.

TRANS - APR. 4

Boston's Orchestra Presents a Noteworthy Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-first concert of the season yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Sibelius—Symphony No. 5 in E flat major op. 82.
Liszt—"Dance of Death" for piano and orchestra.
Bach—Fifth Brandenburg Concerto for piano, flute and violin.
Huë—"Titania" Symphonic Suite for orchestra.

Alexander Siloti was the pianist, and the flute and violin sool parts in the Bach Concerto were played by Georges Laurent and Richard Burgin respectively.

No program of the season, and few of those past, have equaled that of yesterday either in the novelty and interest of the music or in the quality of the playing of both soloists and orchestra. Sibelius' Symphony and Huë's Suite were played for the first time in Boston, the pieces by Liszt and Bach were unusual and Mr. Siloti, the pianist, has not been heard here for many years.

Not only were the compositions played novel and unusual; they were also of absorbing musical interest, opinions as has this symphony it is at least a sign that the work is strong and virile. The strength of character, the originality of thought and utterance noticeable to greater or less degree in this composer's other works in the symphonic form are here more vividly brought out than ever. He seems to have found a musical speech thoroughly in conformity with his thought, and harsh and unsympathetic as it may seem to some, all must admit its sincerity and its power to express aptly the composer's moods. The simplicity of the thematic material employed in this symphony is striking. There is practically no development in the old-fashioned sense of the word. The influence of German musical thought, occasionally to be observed in the earlier symphonies, is here entirely absent. The composer evidently cared little for producing music which would charm by beauty of sound alone, for there are pages which barely escape downright ugliness. Yet there are impressive moments, as the opening of the andante, moments in which the imagination is stirred to complete the composer's thought, to fill in the outline barely indicated by a few telling strokes. Such music escapes analysis, yet like it or not its power cannot be denied.

Liszt, even at the present day hardly receiving due acknowledgment as a composer and usually represented on orchestral programs by his least significant compositions, was revealed yesterday in the full glory of his genius. No composer of recent times and few of his contemporaries could equal in imaginative power, in felicity of expression, in true romantic feeling this "Dance of Dealth." The reason why so powerful and effective a composition appears so rarely on programs is not hard to find. The pianists capable of giving it an adequate interpretation are few and far between. Of course few, and it must be confessed that among those of the present day no other name readily suggests itself, Mr. Siloti is undoubtedly the most capable. The piece, not of unusual technical difficulty, requires on the part of the pianist a creative imagination equal to that of the composer himself. Otherwise this grotesque parody, this satirical play upon the "Dies Irae" would degenerate into sacrligious buffonery. Not so under Mr. Siloti's hands. To speak in detail of so perfect a conception, so perfectly realized is impossible.

In Bach's Concerto, than which no greater contrast to Liszt's horrible realism could have been offered, the pianist displayed a no less beautiful and remarkable side of his art. Again it is impossible to give details of an interpretation in which every detail was so beautifully worked out. Mr. Siloti's beauty and variety of tone, the clarity of his passage work, the immense technical resources of which hs is master—all these may, of course, be mentioned, but all this, unusual as it is, is lost sight of in the force of his musical feeling, in his ability to recreate the composer's thought, that gift of the supreme artist.

Hue's Suite is agreeable music, well orchestrated, somewhat reminscent of Massenet, although this is not by way of reproach. Coming after the more stirring music of the earlier numbers it may, perhaps, haev lost somewhat of its full effect. It arouses no particular emotions, it has little distinction other than that of being wel land skillfully written. Such is the music of many composers, content to follow well beaten paths, content day after day and year after year to avoid giving offence or to excite bitter argument by attempting to create an individual musical speech for themselves. Musical progress owes them little, yet they serve to charm and sooth after the more arduous task of listening to their more adventurous brethren.

S. M.

MONITOR. APR. 8

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SIGNS, WONDERS AND NEW MUSIC OF SIBELIUS

His Fifth Symyphony for the First Tim in Characteristic Manner and Procedure in New Birth of Beauty, in Final Glo of Power—A Masterpiece (as It Seemed Revealed—Mr. Siloti from Liszt Eve to Bach—Sweetmeats to Old Recipe Vi Paris

THE ordeal has been safely passed—passed even with pleasure an plaudits. Sibelius's newest Sym phony—his fifth, in E-flat major—has been played at the Symphony Concert Since late-comers were few, none, appa ently, delayed arrival at Symphony Ha until the orchestra had advanced to othe numbers. Since no more departed in th course of Sibelius's piece, it is safe conclude that not a hearer found it uner durable or his resentful wrath not to b contained so long as he remained sitting Rather, the audience listened intently, a plauded warmly, was ill at ease only ove the unexepected close of the slow move ment. Even in the chatter of the inte mission, where Mr. Siloti occasionally di placed domestic gossip, there was n "grouching" over Sibelius—except fro those who find all unstencilled music "ex cruciating." So did superfluous forebo ings dwindle; while the repetition of th Symphony this evening will whisk the once and for all away. A little reluctant Mr. Monteux had undertaken the musi admitting that it deserved performance b mistrustful of hearers' mood and so the more plying the pains of preparation. Measurably apprehensive, too, were those who have long set Sibelius high and rare among the composers of our time. Now the event justifies the adventure, and the Finn's newer pieces bid fair to be as welcome in Symphony Hall as the old. The truth is that his baffling Fourth Symphony of Dr. Muck's time gave him a bad name undeserved. In the new Fifth he has been of no mind to ultra-modern experimentation; has spoken less close-lipped.

Above any other, Sibelius is the individualist among contemporary composers. In more senses than one, his music is as solitary, reticent, remote, as his Finnish life. He belongs to no school, like all and sundry in Paris, like the camps of Strauss and of Schönberg in Germany and Austria. He is no eclectic in thought and speech like the young Britons and the young Americans. No one has quite plausibly traced his antecedents, as though to say there he noted a manner and there he learned a method. Out of the failure of these cataloging devices has come the custom to explain Sibelius by Finland. This or that in his music, we are told, reflects Finnish air and lights, Finnish lakes and forests. Or he has assimilated into tones ancient Finnish legend and epic. Or through his measures run Finnish trait and temper in sharpened, sublimated play. Perhaps and perhaps; few of us know Finland by absorption or even by sight and hearing.

It is easy critical device to attribute a poet, a painter, a composer, to his environment. It is comfortable also when he happens to be baffling. The wonder is that Taine turned the trick so belatedly into rite of reviewing. Yet it seems quite as easy and well-cushioned to attribute such artist to himself. After all, men have been known to look in their own minds and hearts—and write or paint, carve or compose. Antecedents, environment, nationality, the "time-spirit," no doubt has each a place in the cosmos of a composer. Yet as a man thinks and feels in himself, by himself, for himself, so shall he make music. The secret of creation, the main-spring thereof is individuality. It abounds—and it limits—in Sibelius as, perhaps, in no other composer of our time. By it, assuredly, he has ascended to unique place in twentieth-century music.

From first measure to last this new Fifth Symphony is a wholly individual music. Recall Sibelius's orchestra—the usual strings, paired wind-instruments, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, the kettle-drums—less than the band of Brahms, akin to the bands of Mendelssohn and Schumann. Many a twentieth-century composer would use such an orchestra condescendingly, employ it when he was writing by will and for adventure in the ancient style. Consider Sibelius's use of these instruments and find that he seeks no bizarre timbres, mated or isolated, that he lingers in no "register" as the phrase goes; that he would neither stretch nor confine these voices. Note the form of this Fifth Symphony—spare and bare as is the composer's cast of mind and hand, shunning the orthodox subjects and repetitions, the academic fluffs and tufts that scholiasts would hallow. Sibelius's music must speak stripped; while, like all discerning and self-reliant artists, he lets his design condition his form. Yet it departs not wholly from symphonic prescription: a movement Moderato quickens into a movement Scherzo-like; a songful Andante ensues at length—for Sibelius; a full-throated and striding Allegro—again for Sibelius—brings and rounds end.

Recall again—for the instant impression of the Symphony went deep enough to haunt memory—Sibelius's procedure. His terseness of musical speech, his economy of musical means, are an old story. He continues this concision on the new pages; indeed it is second nature to him; but he carries it less far, uses it less drastically, than he did in the immediate predecessor. Earlier still—say in his first two Symphonies and in some of his tone-poems—he unfolded his music in large, long, sweeping line. Now he more concentrates and broods upon it. The motivs, whence this Fifth Symphony ascends and amplifies, are for the most part brief and bare. They give birth in Sibelius's mind and imagination to minor motivs of kindred shape and surface. He less enlarges and enriches them than he holds them in his thought, letting pensive, moody, reticent, "very personal" impulse and imagery play upon them.

Often, for example, perhaps too often to escape the reproach of mannerism, Sibelius keeps the string-choir in whirring background; while through this tonal mist sound from the wind instruments his melancholy melodies, remote and penetrating. Recall, too, how of a sudden an instrumental voice will pierce this mist, as a gleam of northern sunshine, fitful, sharp, almost acidulous; or a harmony impinge upon it with as swift, as fine an iridescence. Remember most of all the complement to the Sibelian concision and economy—the reticence of mood whereby that mood in penetrating paradox—is the more eloquent. Therewith goes the other Sibelian virtue, almost divine. He is never commonplace; yet not once does he labor to avoid formula and familiarity. His mind, his heart, his speech in tones are a man's, his own.

Yet all these things, interesting as they are, remain but means to the beauty of the music, intrinsic, emanating, unfolding, sustained. True, it is not a beauty for all ears, for every imagination, or for the lack thereof. Yet it was persuasive enough to hold the miscellaneous company of a Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall still and rapt. The beginning of each movement brings it, as Sibelius's spirit seems to waken and quicken from some self-communion. The listener feels the instant thrill of the veritable act of creation. Let there be music—and there is music. Yet slowly through the first sion the composer's spirit seems to It walks in those mists of dream; fleck it; the voice, the illusion, is grave and poignant ecstasy as far soft sentiment, as it is from swollen vor—the ecstasy of a man, master self. Gradually the music clarifies escapes, takes form and motion. So to sharper-edged rce. Sibelius has no mind t ess of Beethoven and Bruckn music; he is as remote fro fluttering virtuoso-exercises tha nt fashion therewith. He sh merry-making, in no free play gayeties. He watches, records ters. So do the sons and the e men believe that life, whic ay mask as joy. The pity, t it. Wan, in spite of itself, music.

The longer Andante ensues, Sibelius would comfort himself ternal quest of the ideal beauty Now and then, perhaps, Moz found it; yet it slipped from hereafter has been only sear mighty, again wistful. Sibeliu a motiv that brief, bare as it with eagerness. He sets to t Through choir after choir, up changeful modulations, in the monies, in the snare of t rhythm that quivers and alm with his desire, he carries the never perhaps shall mortal ca unchain this hunted, evasive be is the nature of the ideal an who seek it that it should alw Yet in the pursuit they leave ea of beauty, and of such is the ment of this Fifth Symphony. sounds an absolute music wit but its own longing, no patte own wanderings. But the lon the heart with its depth of de the pattern is like the foot-pri flying beauty fugitive. Too d passion of the pursuer for aug stilled music. As often as Sibelius in the pangs that are the pleasures of such ecstasy. pains know also exaltation.

Through the finale, almost it is as though Sibelius wer these bonds. Again, as in his phonies, his music streams; ag sion drives and floods it. H whip; his modulations goad; swell; his orchestra beats and beauty evades him, yet may power, mount it, ride it down his Pegasus of tone. Life m mists; life may mock and be may seek and find not; yet life and superbly its prides and ene and superbly, its prides and ene sion of illusions, phantom of ghost of ghosts! Gaunt and gr mists again for the while the ishes. Does the end, sonoro only echo the energies? . . . Li Once again music to exalt th been written in our immediate d

In essence the rest of the Mr. Siloti. In this place yester was said of the return of the Russian to the profession tha to the America that through years has hardly known hi also was printed of Liszt's Death" which pianist and now resumed. A second not materially alter the im the first. Not too easy to foll grim mediæval grotesquerie in day lacks the grisly imaginat Dante over the circles of he gether unrejoicing, that fil Angelo's altar-piece in the Si with the terrors as well as t the Judgment-Day. Orcagna death and demons, of stinking perfumed damsels, of anchorit at play, is minor exercise in t fantastical, the far-ranging, fired Liszt believed he could and transfer it to piano and o moments the listener agrees w but hardly answers with th shudder. In 1922, the cade taves, the other trappings clo the imagery. Other times, fantasmal—even to "The Emp Yet, for enlightenment, mo Thursday in Cambridge, Mr. S the measures of the pale joy life or difficult beatitude th beauty and illusion.

Other, however, than Lisztia both as pianist and musician Laurent at the flute, Mr. Bu first violin and the gently a string orchestra, he played Bach's Brandenburg Concerto dle division is Trio for the ments. It flowed with Mr. Si gentle and musing song, of d lation, of suffusing euphoni with reason the younger virt Again in the first moment, long solo-passage, teeming figuration and ornament, a were lining contours and ara the resilient, smiling air. T luminous; artfully yet as it light and shade played over pianist. Elsewhere the lit Brandenburg—no doubt exa seurs—might have applau evenness, now his plasticity grandiloquent and grotesqu rene and spacious goes naught in either balks him.

And came to a longish co orchestral fancies and plati sieur Georges Hue—about fa thin, pale tones, about a lar dance, with a curiously titil about the bleakness of win in bare harmonies; about T ing resonantly before the mo preferred her fleeting, sinist to more homely virtuous lo music-drama, beyond perad strife of phantom-lure and e votion, at odds and racking the fairies' prey. Yet Mo not write it. He dispensed, ant confections made from ne to the boys and maide parents lead to the Opéra-C scription nights." In Bosto led into Symphony Hall o hoons. No doubt, here as they were pleased.

TRANS

might say that this Danse Macabre lends another terror to Death; yet there are strokes of genius even in the most extravagant portions of it. And then Mr. Siloti showed his versatility by playing delightfully with those admirable artists, Messrs. Laurent and Burgin, a concerto of Bach, with an endless opening Allegro of slight interest, an eloquent slow movement, and a finale that was not too spun-out.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D-major (B. and H. No. 2); Schumann, entr'acte, Ranz des Vaches, and invocation from the music to "Manfred;" Wagner, "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal;" Strauss, "Don Quixote" (violoncello, Mr. Bedetti; viola, Mr. Fourel).

HERALD. APR. 8.

TRIUMPH BY SILOTI AT THE SYMPHONY

Noted Russian Pianist Plays "Dance of Death"

Alexander Siloti, the noted Russian pianist, unheard here since 1898, was enthusiastically applauded by both orchestra and audience at yesterday's Symphony concert at the end of his teacher Liszt's "Dance of Death." His playing, both in this number and in the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto" in D major, which followed, was that of a great virtuoso who is also a great musician. Mr Siloti's performance is better balanced and more finely wrought than that of his pupil and cousin Rachmaninoff, with no sacrifice of dynamic energy.

Liszt's seldom heard music is an attempt to depict in tones Orcagna's fresco "The Triumph of Death," in the Campo Santo at Pisa. But it is neither naive, grotesque, nor sincere enough to achieve this aim. The nearest it carried one listener to Pisa was to recall the barren, desolate stretches in the Apennines between Bologna and Florence.

Bach's splendid, triumphantly vital music dwarfed everything else on the program. It was capably interpreted by all concerned. Mr Siloti's exquisite playing in the "adagio affetuoso," where he was ably seconded by Mr Burgin and Mr Laurent, will not soon be forgotten.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, composed in 1914, and played yesterday for the first time in Boston, is far less modern in idiom than his fourth, and in distinctly better taste than his first and second. He has apparently written what pleased him, disregarding musical fashions. The piece is no mere academic symphony, concocted after painstaking study of the best models. It is new ore from a vein which since Brahms has seemed exhausted. He is not afraid of melody, like most present day composers. Nor is he ashamed to write music intelligible to the middle-aged. His idiom is made up of elements that can be traced back to historic sources in Wagner, Mozart and others. But did not Bach, Beethoven and all the rest build upon the work of their predecessors? The performance was eloquent.

The other novelty was a suite drawn by Hue from his forgotten opera "Titania," produced in Paris in 1903, performed, perhaps, in honor of the composer's recent election to the institute in succession to Saint-Saens. There is no fault to find with it except that it tended to put one to sleep by its total lack of creative power. Everything that talent and taste can give, M Hue has, but not by these is great music achieved.

For next week a Haydn symphony, some excerpts from Schumann's incidental music for Byron's "Manfred," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," and Strauss' "Don Quixote," are announced. There will be no soloist.

GLOBE - APR. 8.

HUB ORCHESTRA PLEASES THRONG

Director Monteux Given Ovation During Brilliant and Impressive Program

Brilliant and impressively beautiful was the concert program presented last evening at Le Chateau by the Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players who appeared under the auspices of the Manchester Musical association in a program, beyond question, the most inspiring and enthusiastically received of the season.

The numbers chosen showed unerring judgment, being popular in character and of direct appeal, still representing the finest achievement in the rich field of symphony music.

This great orchestra which, under its present illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteaux, is said to equal and even exceed its long-standing preeminence among the orchestras of the world, is completing its 41st season, perhaps the most noteworthy in its history. To hear a Boston symphony concert is always a rare experience, affording as it does an opportunity to hear an ideal, perfect presentation of symphonic music, but never have the performances been more enjoyed or more highly praised than under Monsieur Monteux' direction.

The symphony which opened the program was the fourth of Tschaikowsky in F minor, which the great Russian composer considered one of the finest of his works, a judgment since reaffirmed enthusiastically by music lovers the world over. The playing of the horns in this piece was magnificent and the slow movements comprise some of the most melodiously beautiful passages in all music.

The modern school was represented by Debussy when M. Monteux, his confrere, presented the prelude to the afternoon of a Faun. This number is noted for the hauntingly beautiful flute solo parts played with the highest artistry by M. Laurent, the famous virtuoso.

Monteux Inspiring.

M. Monteux gave an inspiring reading of the Liszt prelude and his magnificent work throughout won him a veritable ovation reaching a climax in the storm of applause which followed the performance of Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" when he was recalled again and again. It may be safely said that no artist has been accorded such a reception and last evening's concert may be considered the most important musical event which Manchester has enjoyed for several seasons.

During the intermission, A. B. Jenks, speaking for the committee, announced that the association was closing its seventh year with a deficit of several hundred dollars, due largely to unusual conditions this season, stating further that this deficit would be assumed by the committee. After announcing next season's program, Mr. Jenks said that a tentative program had been considered to feature the Peoples' Symphony orchestra and Harry C. Whittemore, well known local pianist. It is the plan of the committee to present this program in the auditorium of the new high school building, provided the school committee favors such an arrangement.

The program:

Tchaikovsky ....
  Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36
  (a) Andante sostenuto.
  (b) Andantino in modo di canzona.
  (c) Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
  (d) Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
Liszt, "Les Preludes,"
  Symphonic Poem No. 3 (after Lamartine)
Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" ("Prélude to The Afternoon of a Faun"), Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Wagner, ...Overture to "Tannhauser"

MANCHESTER FEB. 29.

NEW YORK EVE. GLOBE

ISSUE OF

APR 3 192

Just three weeks after their first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Henry Eicheim's "Oriental Impressions" will be played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, on April 14. The performance in Boston was conducted by the composer, who, it is interesting to note, though now a resident of that city, was born in Chicago in 1870. Mr. Eicheim's father, Meinhard Eicheim, was a 'cellist in Theodore Thomas's Orchestra for many years. Mr. Eicheim himself was at various times associated with the Thomas orchestra and the Boston band as one of the first violinists, and for four years was conductor of the Winchester (Mass.) Symphony Orchestra. He has twice visited in the Orient, where he studied the native music and gave concerts in the eastern cities.

The impressions on both these orchestral programmes are four in number: 1, Corean sketch; 2, Siamese sketch; 3, Japanese nocturne, and 4, Chinese sketch. Each contains a number of widely varied themes with orchestration calling variously for a Chinese drum (double-headed and without snares), antique cymbals, a large and a fluctuating tam-tam, a marimba, a fish head (wooden drum to accompany prayers, as well as for violins, flutes, oboes, etc. Other compositions by Mr. Eicheim include a symphonic poem for orchestra, "The Story of the Bell" (suggested by a story by Lafcadio Hearn), a sextet for strings, a string quartet, a violin and piano sonata, some forty songs, studies for the violin and piano pieces.

Mr. Eicheim first began composing oriental sketches when he was asked by Mrs. F. S. Coolidge to write music for the music festival at Pittsfield, Mass., for 1921, where four were performed in October. There are now seven in all. Three were given last year in New York by Eva Gauthier, soprano, and at one of the Concerts Internationaux de la Libre Esthétique in February at the Ambassador Hotel the Pittsfield programme was repeated. Some of them were performed in Philadelphia by the Philadelphia Orchestra Ensemble. As they now stand they will also be given in London under the direction of Albert Coates.

Third Concert for Young People

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave its third concert for young people. The program was pleasantly diversified, none of the pieces being long or complicated. Beginning with Mozart's gay Overture to the "Marriage of Figaro" it continued with two movements from a Haydn symphony, two pieces by Debussy ("En Bateau" and "Cortège" from the "Petite Suite") a part of Delibes' delightful music to "Coppelia," three movements from Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and the Prelude to Act III of "Lohengrin." An evident sympathy existed between the conductor and his audience of small admirers and the orchestra too entered into the spirit of the afternoon. The program, although well suited to the occasion, contained nothing which was trivial or which would not have been a source of pleasure to a more musically experienced audience. The concert will be repeated tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock.

MONITOR - APR. 4.

WISE WAYS OF YOUTH

Another Young People's Concert by the Symphony Orchestra, with an Audience Astir to Wagner and Chaikovsky, Indifferent to Haydn and Mozart, Quite Sure That Debussy Is Dull—An Hour of Signs and Morals

"NO adults," said the admonishing announcement of the Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra, "will be admitted unless they are accompanied by one or more children." Such "grown-ups" were few in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon—for the most part teachers convoying flocks of pupils. Yet many who have put regretted teens a quarter of a century behind them, would have enjoyed Mr. Monteux's hour of miscellany. Praise be, these Young People's Concerts are not intended to be "educational." Elsewhere that nuisance sufficiently clutters and confounds what should be the ornaments, the hobbies, the diversions of life. It is the satisfactions of symphonic music that the listening youngsters are to absorb, unconscious of aught but new sensations and untried paths to pleasure. Mr. Monteux's pieces plentifully fulfilled such purpose; while the playing of the band might have contented even the connoisseurs of Saturday evenings. A few among them would doubtless have resented the bulk of tone, the breadth of phrase, the weight and incisiveness of accent bestowed by Mr. Monteux on the Minuet of a Symphony by Haydn. Surely such music, at once formal and lightsome, was never written to sound with this pseudo-Handelian stress and sonority. On the other hand, in the succeeding Finale, with a leaping, circling tune that is fascination in itself, the orchestra regained a lightness, fleetness, suppleness that in eighteenth-century music it has not known since Dr. Muck's day. Even in their most baffling field—that self-same music—conductor and band do go forward. Indeed, in the Introduction to the Third Act of "Lohengrin" Mr. Monteux went forward to Mengelbergian magnitude and magnificence of tone. The orchestra strode; the orchestra clashed and clamored—even as does the music. It was good to hear it so played. Mr. Mengelberg projects his pieces; energizes his composers. He is not anathema except to the superfluously refined. Within his own field he is example and precept. With profit other conductors may study him.

Not too pleased, seemingly, were the children and youth with this eighteenth-century music. More for adults, perhaps, are the actual and the retrospective pleasures of Haydn and Mozart. Possibly for full delight in them the listener must be a little old, more than a little weary. Even the blue and silver glint, the springing pace, the piquancies—in velvet—of the Overture to "Figaro's Wedding," left the young listeners puzzled—and applausive only because they like to clap. They were discoverably restless, too, under fragments of Debussy's Little Suite—"The Boat-Song" for melody, "The Procession" for rhythm. To the Debussyans they are "cambric-tea," and by the queer instinct that in mere children somehow divines, the youngsters agreed. They were interested but by no means elated over the ballerina's variations of the straw from the first act of "Coppélia." The music sorely needs a dancer; without her, Delibes's ballet-mechanics are stripped rather bare.

Again the young instincts were going true. Straight home they went to the joys of three dances from Chaikovsky's "Nutcracker"—the Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy to the silvering celesta; the Chinese Dance, pattering in the strings, piping shrill in the flutes; the Trepak for whirl and plunge. The youngsters saluted Mr. A. Fiedler as the virtuoso of the celesta that he is. Over again they would have and did have the fairy's dance. They would have been as pleased with repetitions of the other two; but for some reason Mr. Monteux took no cue. Evidently from the youngest to the oldest, the youngsters rise to bright rhythms, to melody beating to them, to the "character-dances" of such familiar things as "Chinks" and fairies. As pleased were the young ear with the full-throated tumult of the fragment of "Lohengrin"—din of chivalry, if ever in music it sounded, for that mixture of realities and dreams which is the mood of sensitive teens. No: these Young People's Concerts do not come and go in vain. Four times a year they prove how sound is youthful instinct with music, how amply it deserves cultivation.

H. T. P.

TRANS - APR. 4

Boston's Orchestra Presents a Noteworthy Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-first concert of the season yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Sibelius—Symphony No. 5 in E flat major op. 82.
Liszt—"Dance of Death" for piano and orchestra.
Bach—Fifth Brandenburg Concerto for piano, flute and violin.
Hue—"Titania" Symphonic Suite for orchestra.

Alexander Siloti was the pianist, and the flute and violin sool parts in the Bach Concerto were played by Georges Laurent and Richard Burgin respectively.

No program of the season, and few of those past, have equaled that of yesterday either in the novelty and interest of the music or in the quality of the playing of both soloists and orchestra. Sibelius' Symphony and Hue's Suite were played for the first time in Boston, the pieces by Liszt and Bach were unusual and Mr. Siloti, the pianist, has not been heard here for many years.

Not only were the compositions played novel and unusual; they were also of absorbing musical interest, opinions as has this symphony it is at least a sign that the work is strong and virile. The strength of character, the originality of thought and utterance noticeable to greater or less degree in this composer's other works in the symphonic form are here more vividly brought out than ever. He seems to have found a musical speech thoroughly in conformity with his thought, and harsh and unsympathetic as it may seem to some, all must admit its sincerity and its power to express aptly the composer's moods. The simplicity of the thematic material employed in this symphony is striking. There is practically no development in the old-fashioned sense of the word. The influence of German musical thought, occasionally to be observed in the earlier symphonies, is here entirely absent. The composer evidently cared little for producing music which would charm by beauty of sound alone, for there are pages which barely escape downright ugliness. Yet there are impressive moments, as the opening of the andante, moments in which the imagination is stirred to complete the composer's thought, to fill in the outline barely indicated by a few telling strokes. Such music escapes analysis, yet like it or not its power cannot be denied.

Liszt, even at the present day hardly receiving due acknowledgment as a composer and usually represented on orchestral programs by his least significant compositions, was revealed yesterday in the full glory of his genius. No composer of recent times and few of his contemporaries could equal in imaginative power, in felicity of expression, in true romantic feeling this "Dance of Dealth." The reason why so powerful and effective a composition appears so rarely on programs is not hard to find. The pianists capable of giving it an adequate interpretation are few and far between. Of course few, and it must be confessed that among those of the present day no other name readily suggests itself, Mr. Siloti is undoubtedly the most capable. The piece, not of unusual technical difficulty, requires on the part of the pianist a creative imagination equal to that of the composer himself. Otherwise this grotesque parody, this satirical play upon the "Dies Irae" would degenerate into sacrligious buffonery Not so under Mr. Siloti's hands. To speak in detail of so perfect a conception, so perfectly realized is impossible.

In Bach's Concerto, than which n greater contrast to Liszt's horribl realism could have been offered, th pianist displayed a no less beautifu and remarkable side of his art. Agai it is impossible to give details of a interpretation in which every detai was so beautifully worked out. Mr Siloti's beauty and variety of tone, th clarity of his passage work, the immense technical resources of whic hs is master—all these may, of course be mentioned, but all this, unusual a it is, is lost sight of in the force o his musical feeling, in his ability t recreate the composer's thought, tha gift of the supreme artist.

Hue's Suite is agreeable music, well orchestrated, somewhat reminscent of Massenet, although this is not by way of reproach. Coming after the more stirring music of the earlier numbers it may, perhaps, haev lost somewhat of its full effect. It arouses no particular emotions, it has little distinction other than that of being wel land skillfully written. Such is the music of many composers, content to follow well beaten paths, content day after day and year after year to avoid giving offence or to excite bitter argument by attempting to create an individual musical speech for themselves. Musical progress owes them little, yet they serve to charm and sooth after the more arduous task of listening to their more adventurous brethren.

S. M.

MONITOR. APR. 8

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SIGNS, WONDERS AND NEW MUSIC OF SIBELIUS

His Fifth Symyphony for the First Tim in Characteristic Manner and Procedure in New Birth of Beauty, in Final Glov of Power—A Masterpiece (as It Seemed Revealed—Mr. Siloti from Liszt Eve to Bach—Sweetmeats to Old Recipe Vi Paris

THE ordeal has been safely passed—passed even with pleasure an plaudits. Sibelius's newest Symphony—his fifth, in E-flat major—has been played at the Symphony Concert Since late-comers were few, none, appa ently, delayed arrival at Symphony Ha until the orchestra had advanced to oth numbers. Since no more departed in th course of Sibelius's piece, it is safe conclude that not a hearer found it une durable or his resentful wrath not to contained so long as he remained sittin Rather, the audience listened intently, a plauded warmly, was ill at ease only ov the unexpected close of the slow mov ment. Even in the chatter of the inte mission, where Mr. Siloti occasionally di placed domestic gossip, there was "grouching" over Sibelius—except fro those who find all unstencilled music "ex cruciating." So did superfluous forebo ings dwindle; while the repetition of th Symphony this evening will whisk the once and for all away. A little reluctant Mr. Monteux had undertaken the musi admitting that it deserved performance b mistrustful of hearers' mood and so the more plying the pains of preparation. Measurably apprehensive, too, were those who have long set Sibelius high and rare among the composers of our time. Now the event justifies the adventure, and the Finn's newer pieces bid fair to be as welcome in Symphony Hall as the old. The truth is that his baffling Fourth Symphony of Dr. Muck's time gave him a bad name undeserved. In the new Fifth he has been of no mind to ultra-modern experimentation; has spoken less close-lipped.

Above any other, Sibelius is the individualist among contemporary composers. In more senses than one, his music is as solitary, reticent, remote, as his Finnish life. He belongs to no school, like all and sundry in Paris, like the camps of Strauss and of Schönberg in Germany and Austria. He is no eclectic in thought and speech like the young Britons and the young Americans. No one has quite plausibly traced his antecedents, as though to say there he noted a manner and there he learned a method. Out of the failure of these cataloging devices has come the custom to explain Sibelius by Finland. This or that in his music, we are told, reflects Finnish air and lights, Finnish lakes and forests. Or he has assimilated into tones ancient Finnish legend and epic. Or through his measures run Finnish trait and temper in sharpened, sublimated play. Perhaps and perhaps; few of us know Finland by absorption or even by sight and hearing.

It is easy critical device to attribute a poet, a painter, a composer, to his environment. It is comfortable also when he happens to be baffling. The wonder is that Taine turned the trick so belatedly into rite of reviewing. Yet it seems quite as easy and well-cushioned to attribute such artist to himself. After all, men have been known to look in their own minds and hearts—and write or paint, carve or compose. Antecedents, environment, nationality, the "time-spirit," no doubt has each a place in the cosmos of a composer. Yet as a man thinks and feels in himself, by himself, for himself, so shall he make music. The secret of creation, the main-spring thereof is individuality. It abounds—and it limits—in Sibelius as, perhaps, in no other composer of our time. By it, assuredly, he has ascended to unique place in twentieth-century music.

From first measure to last this new Fifth Symphony is a wholly individual music. Recall Sibelius's orchestra—the usual strings, paired wind-instruments, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, the kettle-drums—less than the band of Brahms, akin to the bands of Mendelssohn and Schumann. Many a twentieth-century composer would use such an orchestra condescendingly, employ it when he was writing by will and for adventure in the ancient style. Consider Sibelius's use of these instruments and find that he seeks no bizarre timbres, mated or isolated; that he lingers in no "register" as the phrase goes; that he would neither stretch nor confine these voices. Note the form of this Fifth Symphony—spare and bare as is the composer's cast of mind and hand, shunning the orthodox subjects and repetitions, the academic fluffs and tufts that scholiasts would hallow. Sibelius's music must speak stripped; while, like all discerning and self-reliant artists, he lets his design condition his form. Yet it departs not wholly from symphonic prescription: a movement Moderato quickens into a movement Scherzo-like; a songful Andante ensues at length—for Sibelius; a full-throated and striding Allegro—again for Sibelius—brings and rounds end.

Recall again—for the instant impression of the Symphony went deep enough to haunt memory—Sibelius's procedure. His terseness of musical speech, his economy of musical means, are an old story. He continues this concision on the new pages; indeed it is second nature to him; but he carries it less far, uses it less drastically than he did in the immediate predecessor. Earlier still—say in his first two Symphonies and in some of his tone-poems—he unfolded his music in large, long, sweeping line. Now he more concentrates and broods upon it. The motivs, whence this Fifth Symphony ascends and amplifies, are for the most part brief and bare. They give birth in Sibelius's mind and imagination to minor motivs of kindred shape and surface. He less enlarges and enriches them than he holds them in his thought, letting pensive, moody, reticent, "very personal" impulse and imagery play upon them.

Often, for example, perhaps too often to escape the reproach of mannerism, Sibelius keeps the string-choir in whirring background; while through this tonal mist sound from the wind instruments his melancholy melodies, remote and piercing. Recall, too, how of a sudden an instrumental voice will pierce this mist, as a gleam of northern sunshine, fitful, sharp, almost acidulous; or a harmony impinge upon it with as swift, as fine an iridescence. Remember most of all the complement of the Sibelian concision and economy—the reticence of mood whereby that mood in penetrating paradox—is the more eloquent. Therewith goes the other Sibelian virtue, almost divine. He is never commonplace; yet not once does he labor to avoid formula and familiarity. His music is his heart, his speech in tones are the man's, his own.

Yet all these things, interesting as they are, remain but means to the beauty of the music, intrinsic, emanating, unfolding, sustained. True, it is not a beauty for all ears, for every imagination, or for the lack thereof. Yet it was pervasive enough to hold the miscellaneous company of a Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall still and rapt. The beginning of each movement brings it, as Sibelius's spirit seems to waken and quicken from some self-communion. The listener feels the instant thrill of the veritable act of creation. Let there be music—and there is music. Yet slowly through the first [illegible] sion the composer's spirit seems to [illegible] It walks in those mists of dream; [illegible] fleck it; the voice, the illusion, is of grave and poignant ecstasy as far from soft sentiment, as it is from swollen [illegible] vor—the ecstasy of a man, master of self. Gradually the music clarifies [illegible] esces, takes form and motion Sche

he rhythms quicken, phrases re sharper-edged; there is hin ance. Sibelius has no mind t ess of Beethoven and Bruckn music; he is as remote from fluttering virtuoso-exercises that ent fashion therewith. He sha merry-making, in no free play gayeties. He watches, records ders. So do the sons and the men believe that life, whic may mask as joy. The pity, of it. Wan, in spite of itself,
music.

The longer Andante ensues,
Sibelius would comfort himself eternal quest of the ideal beauty
Now and then, perhaps, Moz found it; yet it slipped from thereafter has been only sear mighty, again wistful. Sibeliu is a motiv that brief, bare as it with eagerness. He sets to t Through choir after choir, up changeful modulations, in the r monies, in the snare of t rhythm that quivers and alm with his desire, he carries the never perhaps shall mortal ca enchain this hunted, evasive be it is the nature of the ideal an who seek it that it should alw
Yet in the pursuit they leave ea of beauty, and of such is the s ment of this Fifth Symphony.
sounds an absolute music with but its own longing, no patte own wanderings. But the lon the heart with its depth of de the pattern is like the foot-pri flying beauty fugitive. Too d passion of the pursuer for aug stilled music. As often as Sibelius in the pangs that are the pleasures of such ecstasy.
pains know also exaltation.

Through the finale, almost it is as though Sibelius we these bonds. Again, as in his phonies, his music streams; ag sion drives and floods it.
whip; his modulations goad;
swell; his orchestra beats and beauty evades him, yet may power, mount it, ride it down his Pegasus of tone. Life m mists; life may mock and be may seek and find not; yet life and superbly its prides and ene
and superbly, its prides and ene sion of illusions, phantom o ghost of ghosts! Gaunt and g mists again for the while the ishes. Does the end, sonoro only echo the energies? . . . Li Once again music to exalt th been written in our immediate d

In essence the rest of the
Mr. Siloti. In this place yester was said of the return of th Russian to the profession tha to the America that through years has hardly known hi also was printed of Liszt's Death" which pianist and now resumed. A second not materially alter the im the first. Not too easy to foll grim mediæval grotsequerie in day lacks the grisly imaginat Dante over the circles of he gether unrejoicing, that fil Angelo's altar-piece in the Si with the terrors as well as t
the Judgment-Day. Orcagna death and demons, of stinking perfumed damsels, of anchorit at play, is minor exercise in t fantastical, the far-ranging, fired Liszt believed he could and transfer it to piano and o moments the listener agrees w but hardly answers with th shudder. In 1922, the caden taves, the other trappings clo
the imagery. Other times, fantasmal—even to "The Emp
Yet, for enlightenment, mo
Thursday in Cambridge, Mr. S the measures of the pale joy life or difficult beatitude t beauty and illusion.

Other, however, than Lisztia
both as pianist and musician Laurent at the flute, Mr. Bu first violin and the gently string orchestra, he played Bach's Brandenburg Concerto dle division is Trio for the ments. It flowed with Mr. Si gentle and musing song, of d lation, of suffusing euphonie with reason the younger virt
Again in the first moment, long solo-passage, teeming figuration and ornament, a were lining contours and ara the resilient, smiling air. Th luminous; artfully yet as it s light and shade played over pianist. Elsewhere the lit Brandenburg—no doubt exa
seurs—might have applau evenness, now his plasticity grandiloquent and grotesque rene and spacious goes naught in either balks him.

End came to a longish co orchestral fancies and plati sieur Georges Hue—about f thin, pale tones, about a lan dance, with a curiously titil about the bleakness of win in bare harmonies; about Ti ing resonantly before the mo preferred her fleeting, sinist to more homely virtuous lo music-drama, beyond perad strife of phantom-lure and votion, at odds and racking
the fairies' prey. Yet Mo not write it. He dispensed, ant confections made from pe to the boys and maide parents lead to the Opéra-C scription nights." In Bosto led into Symphony Hall o noons. No doubt, here as they were pleased.

TRANS APR

forms of preparation nsive, too, were those Sibelius high and rare
ers of our time. Now
the adventure, and the ces bid fair to be as wel-ony Hall as the old. The is baffling Fourth Symphony a time gave him a bad name in the new Fifth he has been to ultra-modern experimentaoken less close-lipped.

other, Sibelius is the individu-contemporary composers. In than one, his music is as soli-
, remote, as his Finnish life.
to no school, like all and sun-
like the camps of Strauss and
g in Germany and Austria.
electic in thought and speech
ung Britons and the young
No one has quite plausibly
ntecedents, as though to say ted a manner and there he ethod. Out of the failure of ging devices has come the xplain Sibelius by Finland.
in his music, we are told, re-
air and lights, Finnish lakes.
Or he has assimilated into Finnish legend and epic. Or neasures run Finnish trait and sharpened, sublimated play.
perhaps; few of us know Fin-rption or even by sight and critical device to attribute a er, a composer, to his en-it is comfortable also when o be baffling. The wonder is urned the trick so belatedly eviewing. Yet it seems quite well-cushioned to attribute o himself. After all, men own to look in their own

earts—and write or paint,
pose. Antecedents, environ-
ality, the "time-spirit," no
ch a place in the cosmos of Yet as a man thinks and
elf, by himself, for himself, make music. The secret of main-spring thereof is indi-
abounds—and it limits—in rhaps, in no other composer
By it, assuredly, he has nique place in twentieth-cen-

measure to last this new ny is a wholly individual Sibelius's orchestra—the paired wind-instruments,
hree trumpets, three trom-
e-drums—less than the band
kin to the bands of Men-Schumann. Many a twen-omposer would use such an scendingly, employ it when
by will and for adventure style. Consider Sibelius's struments and find that he
e timbres, mated or isolated;
s in no "register" as the
at he would neither stretch
se voices. Note the form
Symphony—spare and bare poser's cast of mind and
the orthodox subjects and academic fluffs and tufts
would hallow. Sibelius's
ak stripped; while like all self-reliant artists, he lets ition his form. Yet it de-olly from symphonic pre-ovement Moderato quickens nt Scherzo-like; a songful at length—for Sibelius; a nd striding Allegro—again
ngs and rounds end.
—for the instant impression
ony went deep enough to —Sibelius's procedure. His
sical speech, his economy of
are an old story. He con-
cision on the new pages;
ond nature to him; but he far, uses it less drastically,
the immediate predecessor.
y in his first two Sympho-
me of his tone-poems—he usic in large, long, sweep-
he more concentrates and
The motivs, whence this ascends and amplifies, are art brief and bare. They belius's mind and imaginaotivs of kindred shape and ess enlarges and enriches
holds them in his thought,
moody, reticent, "very per-
and imagery play upon

ample, perhaps too often
reproach of mannerism,
he string-choir in whirring
ile through this tonal mist
wind instruments his meles, remote and piercing.
of a sudden an instru-
ill pierce this mist, as in
ern sunshine, fitful, sharp,
s; or a harmony impinge
swift, as fine an iridescence,
of all the complement to
ncision and economy—the
ood whereby that mood—
paradox—is the more elo-
h goes the other Sibelian livine. He is never com-not once does he labor to nd familiarity. His mind, speech in tones are one

things, interesting as they means to the beauty of rinsic, emanating, unfold-
True, it is not a beauty
every imagination, or for
f. Yet it was pervasive
the miscellaneous com-
ay afternoon in Symphony
nt. The beginning of each s it, as Sibelius's spirit
and quicken from sombre
The listener feels the
the veritable act of crea-
e be music—and there is wly through the first divi-ser's spirit seems to stir
se mists of dream; gleam
oice, the illusion, is of nant ecstasy as far fr
as it is from swol
of a man, master

The rhythms quicken, phrases and periods are sharper-edged; there is hint of moody dance. Sibelius has no mind to the lustiness of Beethoven and Bruckner in such music; he is as remote from flisking, fluttering virtuoso-exercises that are present fashion therewith. He shares in no merry-making, in no free play of human gayeties. He watches, records—and wonders. So do the sons and the daughters of men believe that life, which is cruel, may mask as joy. The pity, the pang of it. Wan, in spite of itself, turns the music.

The longer Andante ensues, as though Sibelius would comfort himself with the eternal quest of the ideal beauty of sound. Now and then, perhaps, Mozart almost found it; yet it slipped from him; and thereafter has been only searching now mighty, again wistful. Sibelius seeks it in a motiv that brief, bare as it is, haunts with eagerness. He sets to the pursuit. Through choir after choir, up and down changeful modulations, in the net of harmonies, in the snare of timbres, to rhythm that quivers and almost breaks with his desire, he carries the chase. Yet never perhaps shall mortal capture and enchain this hunted, evasive beauty. For it is the nature of the ideal and of them who seek it that it should always recede. Yet in the pursuit they leave each his trail of beauty, and of such is the slow movement of this Fifth Symphony. Out of it sounds an absolute music with no voice but its own longing, no pattern but its own wanderings. But the longing melts the heart with its depth of desire; while the pattern is like the foot-prints of the flying beauty fugitive. Too deep is the passion of the pursuer for aught but this stilled music. As often as not sounds Sibelius in the pangs that are more than the pleasures of such ecstasy. Yet these pains know also exaltation.

Through the finale, almost to the end, it is as though Sibelius were bursting these bonds. Again, as in his earlier symphonies, his music streams; again his passion drives and floods it. His rhythms whip; his modulations goad; his periods swell; his orchestra beats and surges. If beauty evades him, yet may he capture power, mount it, ride it down the winds—his Pegasus of tone. Life may swim in mists; life may mock and be cruel; life may seek and find not; yet life may swing, and superbly its prides and energies. Illu- and superbly, its prides and energies. Illusion of illusions, phantom of phantoms, ghost of ghosts! Gaunt and gray into the mists again for the while the music vanishes. Does the end, sonorous as it is, only echo the energies? . . . Little matters. Once again music to exalt the name has been written in our immediate day.

In essence the rest of the concert was Mr. Siloti. In this place yesterday, enough was said of the return of the illustrious Russian to the profession that he adorns, to the America that through twenty-five years has hardly known him. Enough also was printed of Liszt's "Dance of Death" which pianist and orchestra now resumed. A second hearing did not materially alter the impressions of the first. Not too easy to follow is Liszt's grim mediæval grotesquerie in tones. Our day lacks the grisly imagination that led Dante over the circles of hell, not altogether unrejoicing, that filled Michael Angelo's altar-piece in the Sistine Chapel with the terrors as well as the glories of the Judgment-Day. Orcagna's fresco of death and demons, of stinking corpses and perfumed damsels, of anchorites and youth at play, is minor exercise in the vein. The fantastical, the far-ranging, the easily fired Liszt believed he could capture it and transfer it to piano and orchestra. At moments the listener agrees with the mind, but hardly answers with the becoming shudder. In 1922, the cadenzas, the octaves, the other trappings clot and crowd the imagery. Other times, other things fantasmal—even to "The Emperor Jones." Yet, for enlightenment, more than on Thursday in Cambridge, Mr. Siloti gave to the measures of the pale joy of haunted life or difficult beatitude the voice of beauty and illusion.

Other, however, than Lisztian can he be both as pianist and musician. With Mr. Laurent at the flute, Mr. Burgin at the first violin and the gently accompanying string orchestra, he played the fifth of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos. The middle division is Trio for the three instruments. It flowed with Mr. Siloti's sense of gentle and musing song, of delicate modulation, of suffusing euphonies; from him with reason the younger virtuosi took cue. Again in the first moment, he played the long solo-passage, teeming with intricate figuration and ornament, as though he were lining contours and arabesques upon the resilient, smiling air. The design was luminous; artfully yet as it seemed simply, light and shade played over it—from the pianist. Elsewhere the little court of Brandenburg—no doubt exacting connoisseurs—might have applauded—now his evenness, now his plasticity. From Liszt, grandiloquent and grotesque to Bach serene and spacious goes Mr. Siloti—and naught in either balks him.

End came to a longish concert in pretty orchestral fancies and platitudes of Monsieur Georges Hüe—about fairy bowers in thin, pale tones, about a languorous fairy-dance, with a curiously titillating rhythm; about the bleakness of winter contrasting in bare harmonies; about Titania shimmering resonantly before the mortal youth who preferred her fleeting, sinister fascinations to more homely virtuous loves. There is music-drama, beyond peradventure, in this strife of phantom-lure and earth-bound devotion, at odds and racking in him who is the fairies' prey. Yet Monsieur Hüe did not write it. He dispensed, instead, pleasant confections made from well-tested recipe to the boys and maidens whom their parents lead to the Opéra-Comique on "subscription nights." In Boston they are also led into Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons. No doubt, here as well as in Paris, they were pleased.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS-APR. 8.

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will undertake for the first times in Boston one of the longer tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Quixote," the celebrated "Variations on a Knightly Theme," unheard here since Dr. Muck's day. The solo violoncello and the solo viola, representing respectively Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, will be played by Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Fourel. The other numbers of the programme are a little symphony of Haydn, No. 2 in D Major; the beautiful music of spring lights, airs, colors, the so-called "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"; three fragments of Schumaann's incidental music to Byron's play, "Manfred," viz: an Entr'acte, the Cowherd's Melody for English horn, and the Invocation to the Fairy of the Alps. Mr. Speyer of the wind-choir will play the English horn.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall the Symphony Orchestra will pass to the fifth and last of the "Special Concerts" designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than that of the regular series. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other items of the programme are Goldmark's Overture, to the poetic Hindu play, "Sakuntala." Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Saint-Saëns's large voiced Symphony with Organ.

TRANS-APR-8.

LAST EXTRA SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin, the young concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as soloist at the last symphony concert of the Monday evening series of five, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present at this concert Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Richard Strauss's humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the symphony, with organ, by Saint-Saens.

TRAV APR-8.

Boston Symphony Concerts Extra and Regular

The Symphony Orchestra will add to the unexpected profusion of musical entertainments offered here during Holy Week by giving the fifth and last of its extra series of concerts Monday evening, with its admirable concert master, Richard Burgin, as soloist. Mr Monteaux, wishing, one assumes, to honor the recently dead French composer, has chosen Saint-Saens' organ symphony for the chief piece on the program, although the work has never been particularly popular on any of the numerous occasions when it has been played here. The audience would probably have preferred Beethoven, Mozart or even Brahms.

For the regular concerts Friday and Saturday he has set an interesting program, ranging from a not hackneyed symphony of Haydn to Strauss' "Don Quixote," unheard here since before the war. In honor of Good Friday the familiar "Spell" from "Parsifal" will as on similar occasions in the past, be played.

GLOBE-APR. 9.

Vincent d'Indy, having this season conducted performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities and having himself given a number of concerts in the course of his trip, having also been privileged to lead first American performances of a new symphonic work of his own, returns to Paris, settles himself with a sigh of relief in his study at the Schola Cantorum, and talks to a reporter.

He says that there is a feverish and exaggerated craving for musical novelties over here, that American orchestral conductors vie with each other in giving first performances of works by Europeans whether they are good or bad, while a sound taste for the classics and the great enduring masterpieces of the music is rare, and much in need of cultivation on this side of the water.

Mr. d'Indy consoles himself with the remark that he did his duty on his American tour, and is happy at having been able to conduct what he considers some effective propaganda for the glory of French music.

Mr. d'Indy, a very great composer, a profound scholar, and, from certain aspects at least, a brilliant critic of his art, has not always shown consistency in his musical opinions or his attitude toward the public. Some of the charges he makes against the musical taste of America are undoubtedly true. They have more than once been lamented in these columns. On the other hand, criticism of the American curiosity to hear new music comes from Mr. d'Indy with a rather bad grace.

When Mr. d'Indy first appeared in Boston as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he had prepared a programme of modern French music which included his own second symphony, but recently issued from the presses, and he thought that much if not all of this programme would be novel to American ears. As a matter of fact, every one of the compositions, including Mr. d'Indy's new symphony, had been performed here before he came.

It is probable that his music has had nowhere such excellent performances as in America, and not only he, but the entire modern French school, must concede that America, much sooner than either Germany or England, was quick to perceive the originality and productiveness of the modern French school and make for it friendly, intelligent "propaganda."

The writer was in Paris during the summer of 1909. He talked there with a number of musicians. None of them were familiar, most of them had not heard performances of works by modern French composers which, thanks to the programmes of the Boston Symphony, the newspaper man from that city had heard.

The American curiosity to hear the newest music, the American willingness to co-operate in the very work which Mr. d'Indy congratulates himself on having furthered here during his recent tour, has been of the highest value, artistic and material, to French composers, including Mr. d'Indy.

Literati and cognoscenti are rowing over Sibelius' 5th Symphony, played last night and Friday afternoon, for the first times in Boston, by Mr. Monteux and his men in Symphony Hall.

Thoroughly damned in advance by most of the men who had rehearsed it, in performance it more than fulfilled expectation. That is to say, it proved to have originality and inspiration. A work heartily condemned is likely to have something in it.

This 5th Symphony is one of Sibelius' most interesting compositions. It is interesting for itself and for the additional light which it throws on the evolution of an extraordinary musical personality.

In the early symphonies Sibelius arrested the attention of the world by the primeval force and color of his music and by the magnificent strength and beauty of his themes. They towered to the high forbidding heavens. His rhythms were as the shock of battle. His orchestra reflected the fury and the grandeur of the tempest.

Sibelius' later works have less of the picturesque, though a deeper, more introspective spirit. They are simpler, more modern and original in expression than the picturesque and beautiful symphonies of the earlier days.

The fifth symphony is less bitter and harmonically less modern than the enigmatical fourth, but it is better proportioned than the fourth and saner in spirit. Its outlines are softer, although there is still the prevailing back ground of wild, bleak moors and winds that wail over the earth. A curious and inexplicable thing about this latest symphony is the looking back, as it appears, far back, in the second and third movements, to idioms which have an exterior suggestion of Mozart and even of Haydn. At the same time, the effect is logical and continuous. Rules cannot be made by which themes with actual relationship can be invented. It can be done on paper but not in fact. A counterpoint primer tils a student how to make a good kind of a melody. A counterpoint primer tells a student fashions a melody which is at odds with every principle of the musical phrase-maker, yet lives and speaks to the heart. Similarly with this music of Sibelius. There is something in it that cannot be explained which makes a first movement that is impressionistic and very subjective and melancholy in the modern manner develop without a break into a second movement bright in color, joyous in spirit, even a little like Haydn.

There is at once solace and confusion for the lover of the balanced and completed period in the third movement. The main theme has formal, proportioned phrases, regular, harmonically orthodox cadences. Repeated a number of times in variation, it is interrupted by the eternal questioning of fate, then comes to an abrupt and unforseen conclusion, a conclusion without weight, or emphasis, or conclusiveness. These two middle movements are for the greater part more conventional in an exterior sense than any other music of Sibelius we know. Yet how eloquent they are! How unmistagably they emanate from a modern and a Northern personality!

It is in the finale that the composer returns to his native heath and to the mood which those who understand him know and love, and it is in this movement that there occurs the melody, set over an obstinate, square-rhythmed accompaniment, as melancholy as Astarte's ghost before Manfred. Then, very unusual for Sibelius, comes a concluding section, with a brightening of color and mood, a resolution, if not a hope, a vigor of spirit that breaks through the clouds, as if in the midst of winter should occur the thought of the distant coming of spring.

It was with apprehension and relief that this music was heard by the writer. It had, of course, met with wide approval. But there had been signs of a possible decadence in the Fourth Symphony, and a man of Sibelius' power, a composer with his unique possession of the spirit of heroic tragedy, could ill be spared.

POST-APR. 9.

EXTRA SMYPHONY

Richard Burgin, brilliant young concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to appear as soloist at the closing concert of the newly instituted Monday evening services tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall. Mendelssohn's concert is the music in which Burgin will be heard with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Richard Strauss' humorous tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the great Symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor, with organ.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The principal number to be played at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Quixote." The "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," Haydn's D major symphony and some of the incidental music which Schumann wrote to Byron's "Manfred" will complete the program.

ADVTSR. APR. 9.

[98]

RICHARD BURGIN,

22D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The principal number to be played at the 22d pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, wil be Strauss's tone-poem "Don Quixote." This remarkable piece of program music, which graphically describes the various exploits of the legendary knight, is in the form of a theme with variations. The violoncello solo will be taken by Mr. Bedetti and the viola solo by Mr. Fourel, leaders of those respective sections in the orchestra.

Holy week will be observed at these concerts by the performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal." major (B. and H. No. 2) will be played. Mr. Monteux will revive three numbers from the Incidental Music which Schumann wrote to Byron's "Manfred." They have not been played at these concerts for a number of years. They include the Entr'acte, the Ranz des Vaches, an English horn solo (Louis Speyer), and the Invocation of the Witch of the Alps.

LAST EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

Enviable is the reputation of Richard Burgin, the brilliant young concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, soloist at the closing concert of the newly instituted Monday evening series of five by the orchestra, which will take place tomorrow evening at 8:15. One of the youngest concert masters the orchestra has had since the days of Franz Kneisel, Mr. Burgin has organized from the leaders of the string sections the Burgin string quartet, as Mr. Kneisel organized the Kneisel quartet from the ranks of the orchestra in its earlier days. Many hold great hopes as to its future. As soloist with the orchestra and in recitals in Boston, New York and several other cities, Mr. Burgin has impressed all who heard him by the beauty of his playing.

He came to his present post from eastern Europe two seasons ago. He was a pupil of Joachim and later became a pupil of Leopold Auer, likewise serving as assistant teacher under Auer in 1916-17. Following his first appearance at the age of 11, he toured eastern Europe in a series of recitals and subsequently became concert master and soloist with the foremost symphony orchestras of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. He has served as concert master in Europe under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Fiedler and the late Nikisch; likewise under Richard Strauss and other European celebrities. At this concert he will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Strauss's humorous tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the great symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor, with organ—Albert Snow, organist.

HERALD-APR. 9.

Religious Atmosphere Reflected in Boston Symphony's Tuesday Programme.—Announcement of Choral Society's Appearance.

Appropriate to the deepening religious feeling and significance of to-day and the days to come are the special programmes in the churches. From a musical standpoint, also, selections have been made that are of particular interest.

As in the churches the religious atmosphere will be reflected in the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in addition to the purely musical attraction of the occasion. The latter element is foremost in the first public appearance here of the Boston Symphony players in their young people's concert Tuesday afternoon, and the Monte

Final of Symphony Concert Series

With the orchestra's inclusion of the prelude to "Parsifal," and Miss Alcock's three religious numbers by Pergolese, the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will have something of Lenten atmosphere about it. In addition to the selections from the 18th century Italian composer, Miss Alcock is to sing "O don fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The tonal beauty and dramatic intensity of her contralto voice have won for her high recognition on the concert stage wherever she has appeared, including visits to this city.

There is no symphony on the programme but in its place will be d'Indy's musical setting of Schiller's triology "Wallenstein," which Mr. [illegible] will play probably for the first time in Providence. Like the other earlier works of the illustrious French composer, "Wallenstein" is translated with a certain romanticism, and this quality seems to go far in giving it so high and favored a place among the many fine scores which d'Indy has written. The music follows the career of the famous General of the Thirty Years War and, according to the scheme of Schiller, is divided into three parts. The middle section is an amorous interlude concerning the thwarted loves of Max and Thekla.

This concert and the season will close with Liszt's popular and impressively brilliant symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," said to describe the passage of Lamartine beginning, "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by Death?"

PROV-JOURNAL APR. 9.

Mr. Monteux has lately "tried over" with the Symphony Orchestra fragments from Pfitzner's opera, "Palestrina," music-drama that has made much stir in Germany and Austria. They pleased him and they are likely to be played at the Symphony Concerts next autumn. The Metropolitan has also turned favoring eye and ear to "Palestrina"; yet mistrusts a piece in which women's voices are scarcely heard.

Apropos these rising Germans, Mr. Monteux is semi-minded to repeat Schrecker's "Prelude to a Drama" at one of the remaining pairs of Symphony Concerts. He may rest assured that not a few frequenters of them would willingly hear anew so interesting a piece.

H. T. P.

TRANS.-APR 10.

THE end crowned the work at the fifth and last of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last evening. For once innovation upon the routine of music-making in Boston has won ready, clear, sustaining response; and timely a leaf of the programme-book announced that next autumn the series would be renewed. Then, perhaps, these concerts may find a fitting name, easier to lip, ear and memory than "special," "extra" or other adjective current by labelling them. Possibly, the programme-book has solved the problem when it calls them "Monday Evening Concerts." Whatever the designation, monthly they have flourished from November to April; while they bid fair to keep like vogue and desert through another musical year. At each of the five concerts, the audience has filled Symphony Hall, alert, appreciative, manifestly pleasured. It is not the company of the regular "subscription concerts;" no more is it the merely occasional listeners of the semi-annual concerts for The Pension Fund. It is a far more youthful assembly than the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, less marked, withal, by musical or social cachet. It is relatively inexperienced in symphonic music; yet therefrom, as plainly, it craves and receives satisfaction. Last evening, for example, of the four items on the programme, only Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" somewhat baffled it, even as more practised ears now and then find continuity and suggestion slipping.

No small part, then, of these audiences of Mondays is learning and liking, and in the process finding both fresh sensation and new pleasure. The remainder may be more versed in symphonic music; but prefers not to bind itself to twenty-four concerts, or lacks time or means for such lengthy commitment. Five, at monthly intervals, suffice it, even as two content the casual audiences for The Pension Fund—and Wagner. So has the Symphony Orchestra, under the new régime less institutionally superior and more intelligently progressive than of old, tapped two new and desirable publics. Of them, those who prefer five to twenty-four concerts, now have their pleasure and in turn contribute to the well-being of the band. From the other public, more numerous and more important, will come in degree the audiences of the future for the full course of the season. Especially for Saturday evenings are these Monday evenings breeding them. Not often in the immediate past has the barometer of public and orchestra so plainly marked "Set Fair."

To the assembling and the satisfaction of these audiences, Mr. Monteux's programme-making has materially contributed. In nothing is he more intelligent, open-minded, generally and particularly laudable than in this exercise of his profession. In choice of music, a careless conductor might have held these Monday-Evening concerts little above the level of "The Pops." A stupid, a narrow, conductor might have cumbered them with exacting or novel pieces, or both, desirable at the regular concerts, but unsuitable and vexing to newly assembled ears. Between this Scylla and this Charybdis, Mr. Monteux has held smooth and even course. For these Monday evenings he has indeed set "popular classics," like Dvorák's Symphony from "The New World," Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes," Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," Dukas's Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Yet side by side with them have stood classics more hallowed and exacting—say the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the Symphony of Franck, the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert, the Prelude to "Tristan."

In turn, the conductor has not overlooked the established moderns to which he would accustom newly hearing ears. With "The Afternoon of a Faun," he has tempted them to Debussy; with "Till Eulenspiegel" (though the plainer "Death and Transfiguration" might have been wiser choice), he has invited them to Strauss; while with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," he has led them into the vivid, exciting field of displayful, virtuoso-music as in these latter days, it is written. In the whole list of numbers for the five concerts, only one, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" may pass as mere trifle, and for those shallows Mr. Monteux seems to have a pardonable personal liking. Even to New York did he carry this "Carnival." A discreet management, on its part, strewed the five concerts each with a soloist. They played or sang pieces of kin with the rest. In three instances—Mr. Powell, the pianist, Mr. Burgin, the violinist, and Mr. Bedetti, the violoncellist—they were musicians of mood and so the pains of preparation hensive, too, were those set Sibelius high and rare mposers of our time. Now

the adventure, and the pieces bid fair to be as wel-phony Hall as the old. The t his baffling Fourth Symphony
's time gave him a bad name n the new Fifth he has been to ultra-modern experimentapoken less close-lipped.

ther, Sibelius is the individu-contemporary composers. In
than one, his music is as soli-
t, remote, as his Finnish life.
to no school, like all and sun-
like the camps of Strauss and
g in Germany and Austria.
clectic in thought and speech
ung Britons and the young
No one has quite plausibly
ntecedents, as though to say
ted a manner and there he ethod. Out of the failure of
ging devices has come the explain Sibelius by Finland.
in his music, we are told, re-
air and lights, Finnish lakes.
Or he has assimilated into Finnish legend and epic. Or measures run Finnish trait and sharpened, sublimated play.
perhaps; few of us know Fin-orption or even by sight and

critical device to attribute a ter, a composer, to his en-
It is comfortable also when be baffling. The wonder is urned the trick so belatedly
eviewing. Yet it seems quite well-cushioned to attribute to himself. After all, men
own to look in their own
earts—and write or paint,
pose. Antecedents, environ-
ality, the "time-spirit," no
ch a place in the cosmos of
Yet as a man thinks and
elf, by himself, for himself,
make music. The secret of main-spring thereof is indi-
abounds—and it limits—in rhaps, in no other composer
By it, assuredly, he has
nique place in twentieth-cen-

measure to last this new
ny is a wholly individual Sibelius's orchestra—the
paired wind-instruments,
hree trumpets, three trom-
e-drums—less than the band
kin to the bands of Men-Schumann. Many a twen-
omposer would use such an scendingly, employ it when
by will and for adventure
t style. Consider Sibelius's nstruments and find that he
e timbres, mated or isolated;
s in no "register" as the
at he would neither stretch
se voices. Note the form
Symphony—spare and bare poser's cast of mind and
the orthodox subjects and
academic fluffs and tufts
would hallow. Sibelius's
ak stripped; while like all
self-reliant artists, he lets ition his form. Yet it de-
olly from symphonic pre-
ovement Moderato quickens
ent Scherzo-like; a songful
s at length—for Sibelius; a nd striding Allegro—again
ngs and rounds end.
—for the instant impression
ony went deep enough to Sibelius's procedure. His
sical speech, his economy of
are an old story. He con-
cision on the new pages;
end nature to him; but he ar, uses it less drastically,
the immediate predecessor.
y in his first two Sympho-
me of his tone-poems—he
usic in large, long, sweep-
he more concentrates and
The motivs, whence this ascends and amplifies, are art brief and bare. They belius's mind and imaginaotive of kindred shape and
ess enlarges and enriches
holds them in his thought,
moody, reticent, "very per
and imagery play upon

ample, perhaps too often
reproach of mannerism,
he string-choir in whirring
ile through this tonal mist
wind instruments his meles, remote and piercing,
of a sudden an instru-
ill pierce this mist, as in
ern sunshine, fitful, sharp,
s; or a harmony impinge
swift, as fine an iridescence.
of all the complement to
ncision and economy—the
ood whereby that mood—
paradox—is the more elo-
th goes the other Sibelian divine. He is never com-
not once does he labor to and familiarity. His mind,
speech in tones are one

things, interesting as they t means to the beauty of rinsic, emanating, unfold-
True, it is not a beauty
every imagination, or for
f. Yet it was pervasive
the miscellaneous com-
ay afternoon in Symphony
pt. The beginning of each
s it, as Sibelius's spirit
and quicken from sombre
The listener feels the
the veritable act of crea
e be music—and there is wly through the first divi
ser's spirit seems to stir
se mists of dream; gleam
oice, the illusion, is of nant ecstasy as far from as it is from swollen of a man, master of the music clarifies
[illegible]

The rhythms quicken, phrases and periods are sharper-edged; there is hint of moody dance. Sibelius has no mind to the lustiness of Beethoven and Bruckner in such music; he is as remote from flicking, fluttering virtuoso-exercises that are present fashion therewith. He shares in no merry-making, in no free play of human gayeties. He watches, records—and wonders. So do the sons and the daughters of men believe that life, which is cruel, may mask as joy. The pity, the pang of it. Wan, in spite of itself, turns the music.

The longer Andante ensues, as though Sibelius would comfort himself with the eternal quest of the ideal beauty of sound. Now and then, perhaps, Mozart almost found it; yet it slipped from him; and thereafter has been only searching now mighty, again wistful. Sibelius seeks it in a motiv that brief, bare as it is, haunts with eagerness. He sets to the pursuit. Through choir after choir, up and down changeful modulations, in the net of harmonies, in the snare of timbres, to rhythm that quivers and almost breaks with his desire, he carries the chase. Yet never perhaps shall mortal capture and enchain this hunted, evasive beauty. For it is the nature of the ideal and of them who seek it that it should always recede. Yet in the pursuit they leave each his trail of beauty, and of such is the slow movement of this Fifth Symphony. Out of it sounds an absolute music with no voice but its own longing, no pattern but its own wanderings. But the longing melts the heart with its depth of desire; while the pattern is like the foot-prints of the flying beauty fugitive. Too deep is the passion of the pursuer for aught but this stilled music. As often as not sounds Sibelius in the pangs that are more than the pleasures of such ecstasy. Yet these pains know also exaltation.

Through the finale, almost to the end, it is as though Sibelius were bursting these bonds. Again, as in his earlier symphonies, his music streams; again his passion drives and floods it. His rhythms whip; his modulations goad; his periods swell; his orchestra beats and surges. If beauty evades him, yet may he capture power, mount it, ride it down the winds—his Pegasus of tone. Life may swim in mists; life may mock and be cruel; life may seek and find not; yet life may swing, and superbly its prides and energies. Illu- and superbly, its prides and energies. Illusion of illusions, phantom of phantoms, ghost of ghosts! Gaunt and gray into the mists again for the while the music vanishes. Does the end, sonorous as it is, only echo the energies? . . . Little matters. Once again music to exalt the name has been written in our immediate day.

In essence the rest of the concert was Mr. Siloti. In this place yesterday, enough was said of the return of the illustrious Russian to the profession that he adorns, to the America that through twenty-five years has hardly known him. Enough also was printed of Liszt's "Dance of Death" which pianist and orchestra now resumed. A second hearing did not materially alter the impressions of the first. Not too easy to follow is Liszt's grim mediæval grotsequerie in tones. Our day lacks the grisly imagination that led Dante over the circles of hell, not altogether unrejoicing, that filled Michael Angelo's altar-piece in the Sistine Chapel with the terrors as well as the glories of the Judgment-Day. Orcagna's fresco of death and demons, of stinking corpses and perfumed damsels, of anchorites and youth at play, is minor exercise in the vein. The fantastical, the far-ranging, the easily fired Liszt believed he could capture it and transfer it to piano and orchestra. At moments the listener agrees with the mind but hardly answers with the becoming shudder. In 1922, the cadenzas, the octaves, the other trappings clot and crowd the imagery. Other times, other things fantasmal—even to "The Emperor Jones." Yet, for enlightenment, more than on Thursday in Cambridge, Mr. Siloti gave to the measures of the pale joy of haunted life or difficult beatitude the voice of beauty and illusion.

Other, however, than Lisztian can he be both as pianist and musician. With Mr. Laurent at the flute, Mr. Burgin at the first violin and the gently accompanying string orchestra, he played the fifth of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos. The middle division is Trio for the three instruments. It flowed with Mr. Siloti's sense of gentle and musing song, of delicate modulation, of suffusing euphonies; from him with reason the younger virtuosi took cue. Again in the first moment, he played the long solo-passage, teeming with intricate figuration and ornament, as though he were lining contours and arabesques upon the resilient, smiling air. The design was luminous; artfully yet as it seemed simply, light and shade played over it—from the pianist. Elsewhere the little court of Brandenburg—no doubt exacting connoisseurs—might have applauded—now his evenness, now his plasticity. From Liszt grandiloquent and grotesque to Bach serene and spacious goes Mr. Siloti—and naught in either balks him.

End came to a longish concert in pretty orchestral fancies and platitudes of Monsieur Georges Huë—about fairy bowers in thin, pale tones, about a languorous fairy-dance, with a curiously titillating rhythm; about the bleakness of winter contrasting in bare harmonies; about Titania shimmering resonantly before the mortal youth who preferred her fleeting, sinister fascinations to more homely virtuous loves. There is music-drama, beyond peradventure, in this strife of phantom-lure and earth-bound devotion, at odds and racking in him who is the fairies' prey. Yet Monsieur Huë did not write it. He dispensed, instead, pleasant confections made from well-tested recipe to the boys and maidens whom their parents lead to the Opéra-Comique on "subscription nights." In Boston they are also led into Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons. No doubt, here as well as in Paris, they were pleased.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. APR. 8.

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will undertake for the first times in Boston one of the longer tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Quixote," the celebrated "Variations on a Knightly Theme," unheard here since Dr. Muck's day. The solo violoncello and the solo viola, representing respectively Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, will be played by Mr. Bedetti and Mr. Fourel. The other numbers of the programme are a little symphony of Haydn, No. 2 in D Major; the beautiful music of spring lights, airs, colors, the so-called "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"; three fragments of Schumaann's incidental music to Byron's play, "Manfred," viz: an Entr'acte, the Cowherd's Melody for English horn, and the Invocation to the Fairy of the Alps. Mr. Speyer of the wind-choir will play the English horn.

On Monday evening in Symphony Hall the Symphony Orchestra will pass to the fifth and last of the "Special Concerts" designed to please a more miscellaneous and less regular public than that of the regular series. Eagerly and in numbers the desired audience has come. The full orchestra will play; Mr. Monteux will conduct and Mr. Burgin, first violinist of the band, will take the solo-part in Mendelssohn's Concerto. The other items of the programme are Goldmark's Overture, to the poetic Hindu play, "Sakuntala," Strauss's tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Saint-Saëns's large voiced Symphony with Organ.

TRA.15-APR.8.

LAST EXTRA SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin, the young concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as soloist at the last symphony concert of the Monday evening series of five, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, April 10, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present at this concert Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Richard Strauss's humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the symphony, with organ, by Saint-Saens.

TRAV APR-8.

Boston Symphony Concerts Extra and Regular

The Symphony Orchestra will add to the unexpected profusion of musical entertainments offered here during Holy Week by giving the fifth and last of its extra series of concerts Monday evening, with its admirable concert master, Richard Burgin, as soloist. Mr Monteaux, wishing, one assumes, to honor the recently dead French composer, has chosen Saint-Saens' organ symphony for the chief piece on the program, although the work has never been particularly popular on any of the numerous occasions when it has been played here. The audience would probably have preferred Beethoven, Mozart or even Brahms.

For the regular concerts Friday and Saturday he has set an interesting program, ranging from a not hackneyed symphony of Haydn to Strauss' "Don Quixote," unheard here since before the war. In honor of Good Friday the familiar "Spell" from "Parsifal" will as on similar occasions in the past, be played.

GLOBE-APR.9.

Vincent d'Indy, having this season conducted performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities and having himself given a number of concerts in the course of his trip, having also been privileged to lead first American performances of a new symphonic work of his own, returns to Paris, settles himself with a sigh of relief in his study at the Schola Cantorum, and talks to a reporter.

He says that there is a feverish and exaggerated craving for musical novelties over here, that American orchestral conductors vie with each other in giving first performances of works by Europeans whether they are good or bad, while a sound taste for the classics and the great enduring masterpieces of the music is rare, and much in need of cultivation on this side of the water.

Mr. d'Indy consoles himself with the remark that he did his duty on his American tour, and is happy at having been able to conduct what he considers some effective propaganda for the glory of French music.

Mr. d'Indy, a very great composer, a profound scholar, and, from certain aspects at least, a brilliant critic of his art, has not always shown consistency in his musical opinions or his attitude toward the public. Some of the charges he makes against the musical taste of America are undoubtedly true. They have more than once been lamented in these columns. On the other hand, criticism of the American curiosity to hear new music comes from Mr. d'Indy with a rather bad grace.

When Mr. d'Indy first appeared in Boston as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he had prepared a programme of modern French music which included his own second symphony, but recently issued from the presses, and he thought that much if not all of this programme would be novel to American ears. As a matter of fact, every one of the compositions, including Mr. d'Indy's new symphony, had been performed here before he came.

It is probable that his music has had nowhere such excellent performances as in America, and not only he, but the entire modern French school, must concede that America, much sooner than either Germany or England, was quick to perceive the originality and productiveness of the modern French school and make for it friendly, intelligent "propaganda."

The writer was in Paris during the summer of 1909. He talked there with a number of musicians. None of them were familiar, most of them had not heard performances of works by modern French composers which, thanks to the programmes of the Boston Symphony, the newspaper man from that city had heard.

The American curiosity to hear the newest music, the American willingness to co-operate in the very work which Mr. d'Indy congratulates himself on having furthered here during his recent tour, has been of the highest value, artistic and material, to French composers, including Mr. d'Indy.

Literati and cognoscenti are rowing ever Sibelius' 5th Symphony, played last night and Friday afternoon, for the first times in Boston, by Mr. Monteux and his men in Symphony Hall.

Thoroughly damned in advance by most of the men who had rehearsed it, in performance it more than fulfilled expectation. That is to say, it proved to have originality and inspiration. A work heartily condemned is likely to have something in it.

This 5th Symphony is one of Sibelius' most interesting compositions. It is interesting for itself and for the additional light which it throws on the evolution of an extraordinary musical personality.

In the early symphonies Sibelius arrested the attention of the world by the primeval force and color of his music and by the magnificent strength and beauty of his themes. They towered to the high forbidding heavens. His rhythms were as the shock of battle. His orchestra reflected the fury and the grandeur of the tempest.

Sibelius' later works have less of the picturesque, though a deeper, more introspective spirit. They are simpler, more modern and original in expression than the picturesque and beautiful symphonies of the earlier days.

The fifth symphony is less bitter and harmonically less modern than the enigmatical fourth, but it is better proportioned than the fourth and saner in spirit. Its outlines are softer, although there is still the prevailing back ground of wild, bleak moors and winds that wail over the earth. A curious and inexplicable thing about this latest symphony is the looking back, as it appears, far back, in the second and third movements, to idioms which have an exterior suggestion of Mozart and even of Haydn. At the same time, the effect is logical and continuous. Rules cannot be made by which themes with actual relationship can be invented. It can be done on paper but not in fact. A counterpoint primer tlls a student how to make a good kind of a melody. A counterpoint primer tells a student fashions a melody which is at odds with every principle of the musical phrase-maker, yet lives and speaks to the heart. Similarly with this music of Sibelius. There is something in it that cannot be explained which makes a first movement that is impressionistic and very subjective and melancholy in the modern manner develop without a break into a second movement bright in color, joyous in spirit, even a little like Haydn.

There is at once solace and confusion for the lover of the balanced and completed period in the third movement. The main theme has formal, proportioned phrases, regular, harmonically orthodox cadences. Repeated a number of times in variation, it is interrupted by the eternal questioning of fate, then comes to an abrupt and unforseen conclusion, a conclusion without weight, or emphasis, or conclusiveness. These two middle movements are for the greater part more conventional in an exterior sense than any other music of Sibelius we know. Yet how eloquent they are! How unmistagably they emanate from a modern and a Northern personality!

It is in the finale that the composer returns to his native heath and to the mood which those who understand him know and love, and it is in this movement that there occurs the melody, set over an obstinate, square-rhythmed accompaniment, as melancholy as Astarte's ghost before Manfred. Then, very unusual for Sibelius, comes a concluding section, with a brightening of color and mood, a resolution, if not a hope, a vigor of spirit that breaks through the clouds, as if in the midst of winter should occur the thought of the distant coming of spring.

It was with apprehension and relief that this music was heard by the writer. It had, of course, met with wide approval. But there had been signs of a possible decadence in the Fourth Symphony, and a man of Sibelius' power, a composer with his unique possession of the spirit of heroic tragedy, could ill be spared.

POST-APR.9

EXTRA SMYPHONY

Richard Burgin, brilliant young concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to appear as soloist at the closing concert of the newly instituted Monday evening services tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall. Mendelssohn's concert is the music in which Burgin will be heard with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Richard Strauss' humorous tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the great Symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor, with organ.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The principal number to be played at the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Quixote." The "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," Haydn's D major symphony and some of the incidental music which Schumann wrote to Byron's "Manfred" will complete the program.

ADVTSR. APR.9.

RICHARD BURGIN,

22D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The principal number to be played at the 22d pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, wil be Strauss's tone-poem "Don Quixote." This remarkable piece of program music, which graphically describes the various exploits of the legendary knight, is in the form of a theme with variations. The violoncello solo will be taken by Mr. Bedetti and the viola solo by Mr. Fourel, leaders of those respective sections in the orchestra.

Holy week will be observed at these concerts by the performance of the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," major (B. and H. No. 2) will be played. Mr. Monteux will revive three numbers from the Incidental Music which Schumann wrote to Byron's "Manfred." They have not been played at these concerts for a number of years. They include the Entr'acte, the Ranz des Vaches, an English horn solo (Louis Speyer), and the Invocation of the Witch of the Alps.

LAST EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

Enviable is the reputation of Richard Burgin, the brilliant young concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, soloist at the closing concert of the newly instituted Monday evening series of five by the orchestra, which will take place tomorrow evening at 8:15. One of the youngest concert masters the orchestra has had since the days of Franz Kneisel, Mr. Burgin has organized from the leaders of the string sections the Burgin string quartet, as Mr. Kneisel organized the Kneisel quartet from the ranks of the orchestra in its earlier days. Many hold great hopes as to its future. As soloist with the orchestra and in recitals in Boston, New York and several other cities, Mr. Burgin has impressed all who heard him by the beauty of his playing.

He came to his present post from eastern Europe two seasons ago. He was a pupil of Joachim and later became a pupil of Leopold Auer, likewise serving as assistant teacher under Auer in 1916-17. Following his first appearance at the age of 11, he toured eastern Europe in a series of recitals and subsequently became concert master and soloist with the foremost symphony orchestras of Russia, Finland and Scandinavia. He has served as concert master in Europe under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Fiedler and the late Nikisch; likewise under Richard Strauss and other European celebrities. At this concert he will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala," Strauss's humorous tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the great symphony of Saint-Saens in C minor, with organ—Albert Snow, organist.

HERALD-APR.9.

Religious Atmosphere Reflected in Boston Symphony's Tuesday Programme.—Announcement of Choral Society's Appearance.

Appropriate to the deepening religious feeling and significance of to-day and the days to come are the special programmes in the churches. From a musical standpoint, also, selections have been made that are of particular interest.

As in the churches the religious atmosphere will be reflected in the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in addition to the purely musical attraction of the occasion. The latter element is foremost in the first public appearance here of the Boston Symphony players in their young people's concert Tuesday afternoon, and the Monte

Final of Symphony Concert Series

With the orchestra's inclusion of the prelude to "Parsifal," and Miss Alcock's three religious numbers by Pergolese, the final concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall will have something of Lenten atmosphere about it. In addition to the selections from the 18th century Italian composer, Miss Alcock is to sing "O don fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The tonal beauty and dramatic intensity of her contralto voice have won for her high recognition on the concert stage wherever she has appeared, including visits to this city.

There is no symphony on the programme but in its place will be d'Indy's musical setting of Schiller's triology "Wallenstein," which Mr. Monteux will play probably for the first time in Providence. Like the other earlier works of the illustrious French composer, "Wallenstein" is translated with a certain romanticism, and this quality seems to go far in giving it so high and favored a place among the many fine scores which d'Indy has written. The music follows the career of the famous General of the Thirty Years War and, according to the scheme of Schiller, is divided into three parts. The middle section is an amorous interlude concerning the thwarted loves of Max and Thekla.

This concert and the season will close with Liszt's popular and impressively brilliant symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," said to describe the passage of Lamartine beginning, "What is our life but a series of preludes to that unknown song, the first solemn note of which is sounded by Death?"

PROV-JOURNAL APR.9.

Mr. Monteux has lately "tried over" with the Symphony Orchestra fragments from Pfitzner's opera, "Palestrina," music-drama that has made much stir in Germany and Austria. They pleased him and they are likely to be played at the Symphony Concerts next autumn. The Metropolitan has also turned favoring eye and ear to "Palestrina"; yet mistrusts a piece in which women's voices are scarcely heard.

Apropos these rising Germans, Mr. Monteux is semi-minded to repeat Schrecker's "Prelude to a Drama" at one of the remaining pairs of Symphony Concerts. He may rest assured that not a few frequenters of them would willingly hear anew so interesting a piece.

H. T. P.

TRANS.-APR.10

The end crowned the work at the fifth and last of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last evening. For once innovation upon the routine of music-making in Boston has won ready, clear, sustaining response; and timely a leaf of the programme-book announced that next autumn the series would be renewed. Then, perhaps, these concerts may find a fitting name, easier to lip, ear and memory than "special," "extra" or other adjective current by labelling them. Possibly, the programme-book has solved the problem when it calls them "Monday Evening Concerts." Whatever the designation, monthly they have flourished from November to April; while they bid fair to keep like vogue and desert through another musical year. At each of the five concerts, the audience has filled Symphony Hall, alert, appreciative, manifestly pleasured. It is not the company of the regular "subscription concerts;" no more is it the merely occasional listeners of the semi-annual concerts for The Pension Fund. It is a far more youthful assembly than the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, less marked, withal, by musical or social cachet. It is relatively inexperienced in symphonic music; yet therefrom, as plainly, it craves and receives satisfaction. Last evening, for example, of the four items on the programme, only Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" somewhat baffled it, even as more practised ears now and then find continuity and suggestion slipping.

No small part, then, of these audiences of Mondays is learning and liking, and in the process finding both fresh sensation and new pleasure. The remainder may be more versed in symphonic music; but prefers not to bind itself to twenty-four concerts, or lacks time or means for such lengthy commitment. Five, at monthly intervals, suffice it, even as two content the casual audiences for The Pension Fund—and Wagner. So has the Symphony Orchestra, under the new régime less institutionally superior and more intelligently progressive than of old, tapped two new and desirable publics. Of them, those who prefer five to twenty-four concerts, now have their pleasure and in turn contribute to the well-being of the band. From the other public, more numerous and more important, will come in degree the audiences of the future for the full course of the season. Especially for Saturday evenings are these Monday evenings breeding them. Not often in the immediate past has the barometer of public and orchestra so plainly marked "Set Fair."

To the assembling and the satisfaction of these audiences, Mr. Monteux's programme-making has materially contributed. In nothing is he more intelligent, open-minded, generally and particularly laudable than in this exercise of his profession. In choice of music, a careless conductor might have held these Monday-Evening concerts little above the level of "The Pops." A stupid, a narrow, conductor might have cumbered them with exacting or novel pieces, or both, desirable at the regular concerts, but unsuitable and vexing to newly assembled ears. Between this Scylla and this Charybdis, Mr. Monteux has held smooth and even course. For these Monday evenings he has indeed set "popular classics," like Dvořák's Symphony from "The New World," Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes," Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuser," Dukas's Scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." Yet side by side with them have stood classics more hallowed and exacting—say the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the Symphony of Franck, the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert, the Prelude to "Tristan."

In turn, the conductor has not overlooked the established moderns to which he would accustom newly hearing ears. With "The Afternoon of a Faun," he has tempted them to Debussy; with "Till Eulenspiegel" (though the plainer "Death and Transfiguration" might have been wiser choice), he has invited them to Strauss; while with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," he has led them into the vivid, exciting field of displayful virtuoso-music as in these latter days, it is written. In the whole list of numbers for the five concerts, only one, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" may pass as mere trifle, and for those shallows Mr. Monteux seems to have a pardonable personal liking. Even to New York did he carry this "Carnival." A discreet management, on its part, strewed the five concerts each with a soloist. They played or sang pieces of kin with the rest. In three instances—Mr. Powell, the pianist, Mr. Burgin, the violinist, and Mr. Bedetti, the violoncellist—they were musicians of [illegible] and interest. Two of the three, it is pleasant to note, came from the orchestra itself.

[98]

In nearly every particular the concert of last evening corresponded with the predecessors. It began with the sumptuous and sensuous measures of Goldmark's Overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," or rather his tone-poem of that legend, now languorous and longing, again passionate and tumultuous, thick-textured as drug of the Orient, yet sharp at need with Orient bite and tang—music, moreover, that fifty years have hardly anywhere worn bare. It continued with Strauss's tone-picturing of the pranksome "Eulenspiegel," the masterpiece in our time of characterization in and by music—savored, as repetition more and more discloses, with Strauss as half-amused, half-pitying and wholly artful narrator. There is inventive genius in that teetering, cheeping motiv wherein Till lives, moves and has his tonal being. With equal fertility of imagination and certainty of means Strauss makes it as many sided as his buffoon. If Till teeters and leers, yet also does he swell and swagger. If he pipes, none the less loudly does he riot in boastful pride. Akin are the successive pranks—market-place, academy, courtroom. The music pictures and points, grins and chortles—yet remains music; while over all, especially in prologue and epilogue, the composer cocks an ironic eye. The more the pity that here and there in the piece Mr. Monteux laid on with over-weight of tone and so, as it were, "gummed" more than one fine, sharp line. Minded also to large sweep of impetuous tone was the conductor through much of Saint-Saëns "organ" Symphony. Sonorous indeed were the beginning and the end and thrilled accordingly was the audience over this pseudo-Lisztian grandiloquence. Better lasts into these days the fine mapping of the slow movement. Softly of tone and of mood Saint-Saëns etches it and never once scratches.

For soloist's interlude Mr. Burgin played Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin. To the ear, the restless, laboring concert-master was as one who strove with his music, his instrument, himself. Poise, repose, the Kreislerian illusion that all is effortless, Mr. Burgin, in solo-pieces, has not yet conquered. Yet to the ear, he made Mendelssohn's music sound as with divining sense of the fineness of texture, the gentleness of curve and undulation, the grace of phrase, modulation, transition, the niceties of emphasis and euphony which in these days are the life of a slender, fading piece. Not once did Mr. Burgin strain so much as a measure of this placid, playful, rippling music, even though over a whole division of it the composer wrote "Allegro Appassionato." And as soft, finespun, luminous and resilient was the violinist's tone. Sensitive of musical mind is Mr. Burgin, hearing a composer's true voice. With imagination, though the composer be as ancient and mannered as Mendelssohn in this concerto, he persuades that voice to sound anew. H. T. P.

TRANS. APR 11

LAST EXTRA CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin's Playing Features Brilliant Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fifth of the extra series of Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was very attractive: Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Mr. Burgin, concert-master; Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with organ. Albert Snow was organist.

MR. BURGIN RECALLED

Goldmark's overtures may have some conventional padding, but once the luscious melody of Sakuntala is heard in the clarinet, and the strings take up the dreamy counter-theme, and the composer draws upon his orchestral palette of purple and gold—the spell is cast, the hearer listens entranced.

Mr. Burgin played Mendelssohn's concerto with the certainty, the sanity, the sure grip of his technic and his composition, and the youthful enthusiasm which will probably always characterize his playing. There are virtuosi who play like old men at the age of 20, and there are elderly men, like the soloist Siloti who played at the subscription concerts of last year, who will play to their dying day like young geniuses. The brilliancy and the sincerity of feeling, the contempt of any theatrical tricks to catch applause, and this same contagious enthusiasm which always characterize Mr. Burgin as an artist—conduced to a most effective and artistic performance of the famous concerto. The soloist was repeatedly recalled.

Then Mr. Monteux gave an extremely brilliant and imaginative reading of [illegible] will probably emerge from the [illegible] of time as Strauss' greatest [illegible] perhaps his one immortal [illegible] of audacity and inspiration, his art founded deeply and unshakably on the folklore and the folk-spirit of his race.

---

Again there was admiration of the architectural breath and nobility of the structure of Saint-Saens' symphony, of his prophetic treatment of certain orchestral instrument, and his modern interpretation of the old, classic form. Mr. Snow's performance added to the significance of the composition.

POST-APR 11

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mendelssohn Concerto Is Played With Skill and Taste

The extra series of five Monday evening Symphony concerts ended last night with a program which seemed to please the usual capacity audience. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Mendelssohn's violin concerto with a skill and taste which won him many recalls. This concerto seems rather dull and faded music nowadays, no matter who the violinist may be, but Mr Burgin made the most of the opportunities it offers for nuances of phrasing and dynamics, not to mention the feats of merely technical skill. When at his best, as he was last night, he is an admirable solo performer as well as an exceptionally capable orchestral player.

Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony, with Albert Snow playing the organ part, was the chief item on the program. Mr Monteux gave it a reading more eloquent than polished. This symphony has never seemed spontaneous, original or profound music, but it has what might be called the qualities of its defects, good taste, a superficially skillful thematic structure, a clever use of the orchestra with piano and organ added. The adagio alone seems really moving, the rest is concocted by freshening time-worn musical devices.

A brilliant performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" greatly pleased the musical modernists present, though one apparently old-fashioned and unpracticed listener was heard calling it "an epileptic fit set to music." It is really much simpler and more genuinely melodious than it sounds at a first hearing.

The opening number was Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, in which Mr Monteux brought out the warm romanticism of the music effectively. It wears rather better than the composer's other orchestral works.

These concerts at popular prices were offered by the trustees of the orchestra in the hope of attracting people not subscribers to the regular series. Three out of the five have been given to capacity audiences, which have been pleased without any concessions to what is commonly miscalled popular taste. Programs and almost always performances have been of the same high level set by the Friday and Saturday Boston Symphony concerts. All concerned ought to be gratified at the success of what in most cities could not be achieved.

Five extra concerts will be offered next season, on Monday evenings. Although this year's subscribers have until Nov 1 to reengage their seats applications from others will be placed on a waiting list in order of receipt.

APR 11 GLOBE

FINAL CONCERT OF MONDAY SYMPHONIES

Large Audience Enjoys Good Program With Burgin as Soloist

Symphony Hall was filled last night for the last concert of the Monday night series of five. Mr. Monteux conducted and Richard Burgin, concert master, was soloist.

The program was as follows: Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto in E minor for violin, Mendelssohn; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; symphony in C minor with organ, Saint-Saens. The program as a whole rather lacked variety except for the Strauss number, which was delightful and very unusually well given.

Mr. Burgin acquitted himself well and was recalled four or five times. He played with the background of the orchestra much better than he has on the occasions of his work in connection with the quartet bearing his name.

The other feature of interest was the symphony with organ. Albert Snow was at the organ and his work added very decidedly to the success of that number. Mr. Snow is a musician of the highest rank and he made the work of Saint-Saens far more interesting than it might have easily been with an organist of lesser note.

There have been other concerts of the series wherein the program as a whole was more interesting. However, the large audience liked it all immensely.

AMER APR-11

SYMPHONY CLOSES 'POPULAR' SERIES

Last Monday Concert Pleases Music Lovers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave in Symphony Hall last evening the fifth and last concert in the Monday evening series begun in November. Well-intentioned, to give lovers of music of substance an opportunity quite apart from the regular Symphony season to hear this famous band in carefully arranged programs; well attended, from first to last, by just that strata to which Mr. Monteux and his advisers made appeal—the experiment has proved very successful. It should become a fixed feature in years to come.

Last night's program: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13; Mendelssohn, concerto in E minor for violin, with orchestra, Op. 64, Richard Burgin, soloist; Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," (after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in rondo form), Op. 28; Saint-Saens, Symphony, with organ, in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. Albert Snow at the organ. It was a program cumulative in interest and instructiveness. The Goldmark masterpiece, by now fairly familiar, served chiefly to warm the players to the more difficult work at hand, for the Mendelssohn concerto is in many ways as exacting of ensemble as of soloist. Mr. Burgin played with rare fervor and brilliancy; to the second movement, andante, he gave beauty of tone and color worthy of Kreisler himself. He was recalled five times at the end of his fine performance.

Then, it was as if Mr. Monteux said to his audience, "Now, my children, I am going to give you something appetizing, something that tastes nice, and then I am going to give you something which may not seem so palatable but which yet will be good for you." And he proceeded to unfold the "once upon a time" legend of Eulenspiegel, in all the richness and novelty of the Strauss inventiveness, until all were in abundant good humor. Then, with unwonted impressiveness, imparted to every player before him, he gave such a reading of the mighty Saint-Saens symphony, through to the thunderous finale, as to rouse even the most turgid soul. It was a justification of his choice of this number for the climax of this so-called "popular" series. It was music in its highest, most absolute form. For those who heard it, and still were unmoved, there will come soon the lighter things, the summer trifles proffered by the Pops. W. E. G.

HERALD-APR 11.

The Boston Orchestra's Extra Series of Concerts Ended

The fifth and last of the "extra" series of Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Concerto for violin...........Mendelssohn
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss
Symphony No. 3 in C Minor..Saint-Saëns

The programs of this series of symphony concerts have in no wise deviated from the usual standard maintained at the Friday and Saturday concerts but in arranging them Mr. Monteux has evidently borne in mind that his public on these Monday evenings would perhaps be likely to consist of persons less regular in their attendance upon concerts of symphonic music than that frequenting the long established Friday and Saturday gatherings. His good taste in his choice of the pieces has been commendable, for he has avoided the hackneyed and commonplace as well as those novel experiments in musical composition of certain disquieting moderns which undoubtedly have a right to be heard but which would be out of keeping with the general purpose for which these concerts of Monday were instituted. In this way he has succeeded in giving the programs a character all their own, quite as delightful and interesting as those which he makes for other occasions, yet distinctly different. In their performance too, he has often brought to the playing of long familiar pieces a freshness and animation none the less remarkable, so that a listener, no matter how familiar he may be with such music, is always able to derive pleasure and profit from the hearing of it. This is no mean attainment on Mr. Monteux's part for the task must have been no light one. The continuation of this new series next year may, therefore, be looked forward to with anticipation for it has added a distinctly characteristic note to the past musical season.

Last evening the outstanding feature of the program was Saint-Saëns' Symphony. Familiar as it is, each rehearing reveals new beauties, new perfections of form and constructive skill. It was played with an unusually sympathetic understanding and sense of proportion. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist in Mendelssohn's concerto, grateful to both soloist and listener. He has never played here with greater authority of style or perfection of technic, and he succeeded in giving an interpretation of this thrice familiar work which was free from sentimentality, yet which was musically convincing. Strauss' tone poem and Goldmark's Overture were brilliantly played. The orchestra and its conductor cannot be accused of not understanding German music. The playing of the tone poem was as filled with the spirit of German folk music as was that of the Saint-Saëns' Symphony with Gallic grace and clarity.

S. M.

MONITOR APR. 11

A new Symphony by Mr. Converse, his second, to be played for the first times anywhere, and fragments from Wagner's operas will divide the programme for the Symphony concerts of next week. The Wagnerian excerpts are the music of the Venusberg from "Tannhäuser," the music of the forest from "Siegfried," and the "Ascent to Brünnhilde's Fire-Girt Rock, the Dawn and The Rhine-Journey" as arranged by Richter from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." To them Mr. Monteux, of his motion and for larger end, has appended the final pages of the latter music-drama.

TRANS-APR. 13.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon arranged a program that the audience found very interesting through the contrast that was offered. The arrangement was: The Haydn symphony in D major; the Schumann "Manfred" music; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner; and the Strauss "Don Quixote" theme and variations. Surely, greater contrast than that between the Haydn and the Strauss numbers could not be imagined.

There was no soloist except, that in the Manfred number, Louis Speyer played exquisitely a solo on the English horn, and he was applauded to the echo, which by the way, was appropriate since the solo was of the pastoral type with echoes throughout.

In the "Don Quixote," the burden of the music was carried successfully by Jean Bedetti, cellist, and Georges Fourel, who had the viola solos. Their work was difficult and very beautifully done.

The program, considered as a whole, was one of the best that has been given lately, and the audience gave Conductor Monteux every indication of its admiration for him and his men. He finally called the entire orchestra to their feet to respond to the plaudits.

The Haydn symphony was delightful throughout the four movements. There are not many conductors today who give the nice consideration for every little beauty that is in the Haydn that Mr. Monteux does. It is and should be appreciated by his hearers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the last pair but one of the regular series of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place. Pierre Monteux will on this occasion give the first public performance of the latest symphony of Frederick S. Converse, the celebrated New England composer. The latter portion of the program will consist of the following excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner: "The Bacchanale," from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried; "The Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock" from Siegfried's "Daybreak"; and Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," from the "Dusk of the Gods."

AMER-APR. 15.

Symphony Plays Parsifal Music

To give a religious tone to this week's Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux is conducting the Good Friday Spell music from Wagner's sacred music drama, "Parsifal." The most brilliant feature of yesterday's matinee was "Don Quixote," one of the most graphic and entertaining of the Richard Strauss tone poems. Haydn's melodious D major symphony and the romantic, colorful music that Schumann wrote to accompany Byron's "Manfred" are the other numbers on the program.

ADITOR APR. 15

THE "POPS"

On the night of May 1 the last vestige of the "high-brow" season of concerts in Symphony Hall having finished, the delightful Spring relaxation of the "Pop" concerts will take possession and extend every night, except Sunday, through the Spring and into the early Summer. This, the thirty-seventh season of the historical "Pops," which are so very much Boston's own institution, promises with a splendid array of Pop nights to be one of the most gloriously successful of them all. Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops for five seasons past and surely the most popular leader that the Pops have ever had, will again be at the helm.

AMER APR. 15

SYMPHONY ENNOBLES STRAUSS

Telling Performance of Tone Poem, "Don Quixote"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Had it been said, even 50 years ago, that the music of the future would present, among other things, orchestral compositions in which solo instruments would take the place of personages in drama; that these instruments would play a kind of music as free, as irregular in its rhythms, as intelligible and varied in its meanings as speech; that an instrument would address the audience with an individuality as striking as that of any great actor who might appear on the stage, and wring the heart—had such things been said, there would have been only incredulity and amusement to echo the statements.

IN "DON QUIXOTE"

There are still those incredulous and amused at the idea of music doing any thing like that, just as people were amused when Balzac in the '30's or '40's wrote his story of "Gambetta, the Mad Musician." But exactly these things have been accomplished by Richard Strauss in his tone-poem, "Don Quixote," played yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. An admirable performance of a most impressive work.

As it sounded yesterday, a quarter of a century since the first blazing manifestations of Strauss's genius stirred the world, there was not a weak spot in the whole work. It is a tour de force, both of inspiration and workmanship. It is the immediate and thoughtless thing to poke fun at the variations which imitate the bleating of sheep or the whirring of wind. These things were intended by the composer to be laughed at. They are details of a picture; they throw into the higher relief the absurd, noble, tragic figure of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance.

Strauss Supremely Human

In those variations which treat of this Ideal, of the argument with Panza on chivalry, of the sleep of Panza while the Don invokes the vision of his beloved, and above all the unforgettable pathos of the concluding pages, Strauss is supremely pitiful, unforgettably human. He is human, too, if sardonic and merciless in his picturing of the bourgeois, fat-witted Sancho.

Here is indeed a rare pair, limned by the instruments as distinctly as if they were together on the stage. These solo instruments, these characters, as it were, were taken by Mr. Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as Don Quixote; by Georges Fourel, violinist, as Sancho Panza, in which connection the tenor tuba also deserves special mention, for Sancho is at times sounds like a viola, at other times like a tenor tuba and even a bass clarinet!

Mr. Bedetti's Virtuosity

Of all the performances of the 'cello part given in Boston Mr. Bedetti's seemed to us the most eloquent. He had noble music of laughter, and gentleness, and tears. It will be long before his interpretation of the final pages of the composition, in which Don Quixote, in all humbleness and prayer, gives up the ghost, will be forgotten. Mr. Fourel, too, gave an excellent performance. The orchestra distinguished itself.

The other compositions were the good natured symphony of Haydn in D major, briskly played; excerpts—the "Entracte," "Ranz des Vaches," and "Invocation"—from the charming but rather weak music which Schumann wrote for Byron's "Manfred"—music which is Schumann, and not Byron at all, and in honor of the season, the wonderful music of the "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal." This was one of Mr. Monteux's most notable concerts.

APR. 15

Strauss and the Spanish Don at Boston Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2) ....Haydn
Three movements from the music to Byron's "Manfred..........Schumann
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner
"Don Quixote"......................Strauss

It is too late in the day to discourse of the genius of Richard Strauss. That has long since been admitted by all, although some still make the admission with reservations. Yet the impression created by yesterday's performance of his "Don Quixote" was none the less novel and vivid than on its first hearing many years ago. It is possible that its long absence from Boston programs may have served to heighten its effect at this time, but none the less it is a work which grows with the years and which will reveal more and more of its beauty as time goes on. Taken by themselves, many portions of the composition are no doubt harsh and strident, but in their proper setting they are seen to be necessary to the effect of the work as a whole, and in a composition planned on so large a scale the passages of mere filling in are few and far between. No composer of modern times, save Strauss, could have successfully indulged in such flights of fancy, such bold and daring realism and only the imaginative power and orchestral skill of a Berlioz could have equaled him among those of the past in the musical portrayal of such a fantastic hero as the Spanish Don.

Each and every variation is a marvel of the just expression of the underlying poetic idea, yet the music never descends to mere caricature

---

real pathos.
with true aracter. To so arkable that a Fr
ret a distinctively
complete a com
pirit. To others w
s career since he b
this orchestra it
dded proof of his in bilities in the music
Mr. Bedetti played the part with his accustom
one and felicity of ex playing of Mr. Fourel,
was no less excellent.
Schumann's music to ne of his greatest works.
be regretted that the
ments played yesterday w
most interesting ones.
played the all too short English horn with fin phrasing. Placed somew behind the scenes, his ould scarcely have been hose sitting in the rear o
The D major symphony o ne of his most perfect wo
orm. Too often he is r y his lighter, gayer, more t ositions. In this symphony
e find him in more seri
he introduction sounds a so are with him, and the orche
fuller and more varied th
After all our modern improv
orchestration, in form, in there is still much to be lea
this master, apparently sim music seems. Even Mozart i phonic works scarcely equ
and Beethoven, great as was nality of his genius, owes this teacher and friend of
Wagner, for once, seemed ou
His "Good Friday Spell" is his greatest inspirations, an
of the scenes with which it ated in the opera, it often sou
atrical and forced.

MONITOR-APR

OLD AND MODERN SYMPHONY PROG

Orchestra Proves Equ at Home in Each

Yesterday's Symphony concert
with a lively, well-balanced pe
ance of Haydn's D major Sym
and ended with Strauss' "Don ote," eloquently played, provin
present orchestra equally at ho
old and modern music, despite doubts lately expressed on the su
In between came curiously fragme
excerpts from Schumann's incid
music to Byron's "Manfred," an honor of the day, the "Good F Spell" from Act 3 of Wagner's "
fal."
There was no formal soloist, bu
Speyer in the "Ran des Vaches"
"Manfred," and Messrs Bedetti
Fourel in "Don Quixote" were de
edly named in the program for important incidental solos. Their ing was far more musicianly than
of some of the official "soloists"
been.
"Don Quixote," never popular
as some of its companion pieces become, was coldly received, excep
a few hundred enthusiasts, alth
the orchestra has seldom of late done better work. The variations not easily followed or referred bac
the theme, and much of the m seems rather dull except as a d
and slavish following of Cerva
story, which Strauss claims it is Yet there are many beautiful pass
scattered through it, warmly, lyri emotional in the vein of the compo
best songs.
Mr. Monteaux has reversed Dr. Mu
custom of never giving excerpts f pieces not composed for concert formance, in the main wisely. But so times the excerpts are not comp
in themselves, like tantalizing snat
of tunes which one never hears finis
The "Good Friday Spell" yesterday
quite capable of standing alone,
not even the prop of Byron's quoted at length in the programs sa
the "Manfred" snatches from seem pointless.
Haydn's D Major Symphony,
twelfth of those composed for English impressario Salomon, is a v favorable specimen of his music, for right, squaretoed, with its skele structure painfully emphasized to
ears unused to the sonata form,
full of homely energy and good spir
with an occasional bit of serious, d nified eloquence added. It was b accurately and sympathetically playe
Next week a new Symphony in Major, by F. S. Converse, of Bost
will be given its first public perfor
ance. The rest of the program is ma up of excerpts from Wagner operas.

GLOBE

SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S "DON QUIXOTE" AFT PRELUDINGS

A Tone-Poem That Remains Masterp
of Large Design and Unflagging
complishment, That Ranges from G
tesquerie to Pity and Ecstasy, Tha
Tragi-Comedy Summed and Vivid
Tones—Haydn, Wagner, Mr. S and Sp[illegible]ng

I[illegible]

high merit and interest. Two of the three, it is pleasant to note, came from the orchestra itself.

In nearly every particular the concert of last evening corresponded with the predecessors. It began with the sumptuous and sensuous measures of Goldmark's Overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," or rather his tone-poem of that legend, now languorous and longing, again passionate and tumultuous, thick-textured as drug of the Orient, yet sharp at need with Orient bite and tang—music, moreover, that fifty years have hardly anywhere worn bare. It continued with Strauss's tone-picturing of the pranksome "Eulenspiegel," the masterpiece in our time of characterization in and by music—savored, as repetition more and more discloses, with Strauss as half-amused, half-pitying and wholly artful narrator. There is inventive genius in that teetering, cheeping motiv wherein Till lives, moves and has his tonal being. With equal fertility of imagination and certainty of means Strauss makes it as many sided as his buffoon. If Till teeters and leers, yet also does he swell and swagger. If he pipes, none the less loudly does he riot in boastful prides. Akin are the successive pranks—market-place, academy, courtroom. The music pictures and points, grins and chortles—yet remains music; while over all, especially in prologue and epilogue, the composer cocks an ironic eye. The more the pity that here and there in the piece Mr. Monteux laid on with over-weight of tone and so, as it were, "gummed" more than one fine, sharp line. Minded also to large sweep of impetuous tone was the conductor through much of Saint-Saëns "organ" Symphony. Sonorous indeed were the beginning and the end and thrilled accordingly was the audience over this pseudo-Lisztian grandiloquence. Better lasts into these days the fine mapping of the slow movement. Softly of tone and of mood Saint-Saëns etches it and never once scratches.

For soloist's interlude Mr. Burgin played Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin. To the ear, the restless, laboring concert-master was as one who strove with his music, his instrument, himself. Poise, repose, the Kreislerian illusion that all is effortless, Mr. Burgin, in solo-pieces, has not yet conquered. Yet to the ear, he made Mendelssohn's music sound as with divining sense of the fineness of texture, the gentleness of curve and undulation, the grace of phrase, modulation, transition, the niceties of emphasis and euphony which in these days are the life of a slender, fading piece. Not once did Mr. Burgin strain so much as a measure of this placid, playful, rippling music, even though over a whole division of it the composer wrote "Allegro Appassionato." And as soft, fine-spun, luminous and resilient was the violinist's tone. Sensitive of musical mind is Mr. Burgin, hearing a composer's true voice. With imagination, though the composer be as ancient and mannered as Mendelssohn in this concerto, he persuades that voice to sound anew. H. T. P.

TRANS. APR 11

LAST EXTRA CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin's Playing Features Brilliant Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fifth of the extra series of Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was very attractive: Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Mr. Burgin, concert-master; Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with organ. Albert Snow was organist.

MR. BURGIN RECALLED

Goldmark's overtures may have some conventional padding, but once the luscious melody of Sakuntala is heard in the clarinet, and the strings take up the dreamy counter-theme, and the composer draws upon his orchestral palette of purple and gold—the spell is cast, the hearer listens entranced.

Mr. Bergin played Mendelssohn's concerto with the certainty, the sanity, the sure grip of his technic and his composition, and the youthful enthusiasm which will probably always characterize his playing. There are virtuosi who play like old men at the age of 20, and there are elderly men, like the soloist Siloti who played at the subscription concerts of last year, who will play to their dying day like young geniuses. The brilliancy and the sincerity of feeling, the contempt of any theatrical tricks to catch applause, and this same contagious enthusiasm which always characterize Mr. Burgin as an artist—conduced to a most effective and artistic performance of the famous concerto. The soloist was repeatedly recalled.

Then Mr. Monteux gave an extremely brilliant and imaginative reading of what will probably emerge from the crucible of time as Strauss' greatest work, as perhaps his one immortal work. In "Till Eulenspiegel" you have [illegible]

---

of audacity and inspiration, his art founded deeply and unshakably on the folklore and the folk-spirit of his race.

Again there was admiration of the architectural breath and nobility of the structure of Saint-Saens symphony, of his prophetic treatment of certain orchestral instrument, and his modern interpretation of the old, classic form. Mr. Snow's performance added to the significance of the composition.

POST-APR 11

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mendelssohn Concerto Is Played With Skill and Taste

The extra series of five Monday evening Symphony concerts ended last night with a program which seemed to please the usual capacity audience. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Mendelssohn's violin concerto with a skill and taste which won him many recalls. This concerto seems rather dull and faded music nowadays, no matter who the violinist may be, but Mr Burgin made the most of the opportunities it offers for nuances of phrasing and dynamics, not to mention the feats of merely technical skill. When at his best, as he was last night, he is an admirable solo performer as well as an exceptionally capable orchestral player.

Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony, with Albert Snow playing the organ part, was the chief item on the program. Mr Monteux gave it a reading more eloquent than polished. This symphony has never seemed spontaneous, original or profound music, but it has what might be called the qualities of its defects, good taste, a superficially skillful thematic structure, a clever use of the orchestra with piano and organ added. The adagio alone seems really moving, the rest is concocted by freshening time-worn musical devices.

A brilliant performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" greatly pleased the musical modernists present, though one apparently old-fashioned and unpracticed listener was heard calling it "an epileptic fit set to music." It is really much simpler and more genuinely melodious than it sounds at a first hearing.

The opening number was Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, in which Mr Monteux brought out the warm romanticism of the music effectively. It wears rather better than the composer's other orchestral works.

These concerts at popular prices were offered by the trustees of the orchestra in the hope of attracting people not subscribers to the regular series. Three out of the five have been given to capacity audiences, which have been pleased without any concessions to what is commonly miscalled popular taste. Programs and almost always performances have been of the same high level set by the Friday and Saturday Boston Symphony concerts. All concerned ought to be gratified at the success of what in most cities could not be achieved.

Five extra concerts will be offered next season, on Monday evenings. Although this year's subscribers have until Nov 1 to reengage their seats applications from others will be placed on a waiting list in order of receipt.

APR. 11 GLOBE

FINAL CONCERT OF MONDAY SYMPHONIES

Large Audience Enjoys Good Program With Burgin as Soloist

Symphony Hall was filled last night for the last concert of the Monday night series of five. Mr. Monteux conducted and Richard Burgin, concert master, was soloist.

The program was as follows: Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto in E minor for violin, Mendelssohn; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; symphony in C minor with organ, Saint-Saens. The program as a whole rather lacked variety except for the Strauss number, which was delightful and very unusually well given.

Mr. Burgin acquitted himself well and was recalled four or five times. He played with the background of the orchestra much better than he has on the occasions of his work in connection with the quartet bearing his name.

The other feature of interest was the symphony with organ. Albert Snow was at the organ and his work added very decidedly to the success of that number. Mr. Snow is a musician of the highest rank and he made the work of Saint-Saens far more interesting than it might have easily been with an organist of lesser note.

There have been other concerts of the series wherein the program as a whole was more interesting. However, the large audience liked it all immensely.

AMER APR-11.

SYMPHONY CLOSES 'POPULAR' SERIES

Last Monday Concert Pleases Music Lovers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave in

---

Symphony Hall last evening the fifth and last concert in the Monday evening series begun in November. Well-intentioned, to give lovers of music of substance an opportunity quite apart from the regular Symphony season to hear this famous band in carefully arranged programs; well attended, from first to last, by just that strata to which Mr. Monteux and his advisers made appeal—the experiment has proved very successful. It should become a fixed feature in years to come.

Last night's program: Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13; Mendelssohn, concerto in E minor for violin, with orchestra, Op. 64, Richard Burgin, soloist; Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," (after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in rondo form), Op. 28; Saint-Saens, Symphony, with organ, in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78. Albert Snow at the organ. It was a program cumulative in interest and instructiveness. The Goldmark masterpiece, by now fairly familiar, served chiefly to warm the players to the more difficult work at hand, for the Mendelssohn concerto is in many ways as exacting of ensemble as of soloist. Mr. Burgin played with rare fervor and brilliancy; to the second movement, andante, he gave beauty of tone and color worthy of Kreisler himself. He was recalled five times at the end of his fine performance.

Then, it was as if Mr. Monteux said to his audience, "Now, my children, I am going to give you something appetizing, something that tastes nice, and then I am going to give you something which may not seem so palatable but which yet will be good for you." And he proceeded to unfold the "once upon a time" legend of Eulenspiegel, in all the richness and novelty of the Strauss inventiveness, until all were in abundant good humor. Then, with unwonted impressiveness, imparted to every player before him, he gave such a reading of the mighty Saint-Saens symphony, through to the thunderous finale, as to rouse even the most turgid soul. It was a justification of his choice of this number for the climax of this so-called "popular" series. It was music in its highest, most absolute form. For those who heard it, and still were unmoved, there will come soon the lighter things, the summer trifles proffered by the Pops. W. E. G.

HERALD-APR 11.

The Boston Orchestra's Extra Series of Concerts Ended

The fifth and last of the "extra" series of Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Concerto for violin...........Mendelssohn
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss
Symphony No. 3 in C Minor..Saint-Saëns

The programs of this series of symphony concerts have in no wise deviated from the usual standard maintained at the Friday and Saturday concerts but in arranging them Mr. Monteux has evidently borne in mind that his public on these Monday evenings would perhaps be likely to consist of persons less regular in their attendance upon concerts of symphonic music than that frequenting the long established Friday and Saturday gatherings. His good taste in his choice of the pieces has been commendable, for he has avoided the hackneyed and commonplace as well as those novel experiments in musical composition of certain disquieting moderns which undoubtedly have a right to be heard but which would be out of keeping with the general purpose for which these concerts of Monday were instituted. In this way he has succeeded in giving the programs a character all their own, quite as delightful and interesting as those which he makes for other occasions, yet distinctly different. In their performance too, he has often brought to the playing of long familiar pieces a freshness and animation none the less remarkable, so that a listener, no matter how familiar he may be with such music, is always able to derive pleasure and profit from the hearing of it. This is no mean attainment on Mr. Monteux's part for the task must have been no light one. The continuation of this new series next year may, therefore, be looked forward to with anticipation for it has added a distinctly characteristic note to the past musical season.

Last evening the outstanding feature of the program was Saint-Saëns' Symphony. Familiar as it is, each rehearing reveals new beauties, new perfections of form and constructive skill. It was played with an unusually sympathetic understanding and sense of proportion. Richard Burgin, the concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist in Mendelssohn's concerto, grateful to both soloist and listener. He has never played here with greater authority of style or perfection of technic, and he succeeded in giving an interpretation of this thrice familiar work which was free from sentimentality, yet which was musically convincing. Strauss' tone poem and Goldmark's Overture were brilliantly played. The orchestra and its conductor cannot be accused of not understanding German music. The playing of the tone poem was as filled with the spirit of German folk music as was that of the Saint-Saëns' Symphony with Gallic grace and clarity. S. M.

MONITOR APR. 11

A new Symphony by Mr. Converse, his second, to be played for the first times anywhere, and fragments from Wagner's operas will divide the programme for the Symphony concerts of next week. The Wagnerian excerpts are the music of the Venusberg from "Tannhäuser," the music of the forest from "Siegfried," and the "Ascent to Brünnhilde's Fire-Girt Rock, the Dawn and The Rhine-Journey" as arranged by Richter from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." To them Mr. Monteux, of his motion and for larger end, has appended the final pages of the latter music-drama.

TRANS-APR. 13.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon arranged a program that the audience found very interesting through the contrast that was offered. The arrangement was: The Haydn symphony in D major; the Schumann "Manfred" music; the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner; and the Strauss "Don Quixote" theme and variations. Surely, greater contrast than that between the Haydn and the Strauss numbers could not be imagined.

There was no soloist except, that in the Manfred number, Louis Speyer played exquisitely a solo on the English horn, and he was applauded to the echo, which by the way, was appropriate since the solo was of the pastoral type with echoes throughout.

In the "Don Quixote," the burden of the music was carried successfully by Jean Bedetti, cellist, and Georges Fourel, who had the viola solos. Their work was difficult and very beautifully done.

The program, considered as a whole, was one of the best that has been given lately, and the audience gave Conductor Monteux every indication of its admiration for him and his men. He finally called the entire orchestra to their feet to respond to the plaudits.

The Haydn symphony was delightful throughout the four movements. There are not many conductors today who give the nice consideration for every little beauty that is in the Haydn that Mr. Monteux does. It is and should be appreciated by his hearers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the last pair but one of the regular series of Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place. Pierre Monteux will on this occasion give the first public performance of the latest symphony of Frederick S. Converse, the celebrated New England composer. The latter portion of the program will consist of the following excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner: "The Bacchanale," from "Tannhauser"; "Forest Murmurs" from Siegfried; "The Ascent of Brunnhilde's Rock" from Siegfried's "Daybreak"; and Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," from the "Dusk of the Gods."

AMER-APR. 15.

Symphony Plays Parsifal Music

To give a religious tone to this week's Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux is conducting the Good Friday Spell music from Wagner's sacred music drama, "Parsifal." The most brilliant feature of yesterday's matinee was "Don Quixote," one of the most graphic and entertaining of the Richard Strauss tone poems. Haydn's melodious D major symphony and the romantic, colorful music that Schumann wrote to accompany Byron's "Manfred" are the other numbers on the program.

ADITOR APR. 15

THE "POPS"

On the night of May 1 the last vestige of the "high-brow" season of concerts in Symphony Hall having finished, the delightful Spring relaxation of the "Pop" concerts will take possession and extend every night, except Sunday, through the Spring and into the early Summer. This, the thirty-seventh season of the historical "Pops," which are so very much Boston's own institution, promises with a splendid array of Pop nights to be one of the most gloriously successful of them all. Agide Jacchia, conductor of the Pops for five seasons past and surely the most popular leader that the Pops have ever had, will again be at the helm.

AMER-APR. 15

SYMPHONY ENNOBLES STRAUSS

Telling Performance of Tone Poem, "Don Quixote"

BY OLIN DOWNES

Had it been said, even 50 years ago, that the music of the future would present, among other things, orchestral compositions in which solo instruments would take the place of personages in drama; that these instruments would play a kind of music as free, as irregular in its rhythms, as intelligible and varied in its meanings as speech; that an instrument would address the audience with an individuality as striking as that of any great actor who might appear on the stage, and wring the heart—had such things been said, there would have been only incredulity and amusement to echo the statements.

IN "DON QUIXOTE"

There are still those incredulous and amused at the idea of music doing anything like that, just as people were amused when Balzac in the '30's or '40's wrote his story of "Gambetta, the Mad Musician." But exactly these things have been accomplished by Richard Strauss in his tone-poem, "Don Quixote," played yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. An admirable performance of a most impressive work.

As it sounded yesterday, a quarter of a century since the first blazing manifestations of Strauss's genius stirred the world, there was not a weak spot in the whole work. It is a tour de force, both of inspiration and workmanship. It is the immediate and thoughtless thing to poke fun at the variations which imitate the bleating of sheep or the whirring of wind. These things were intended by the composer to be laughed at. They are details of a picture; they throw into the higher relief the absurd, noble, tragic figure of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance.

Strauss Supremely Human

In those variations which treat of this Ideal, of the argument with Panza on chivalry, of the sleep of Panza while the Don invokes the vision of his beloved, and above all the unforgettable pathos of the concluding pages, Strauss is supremely pitiful, unforgettably human. He is human, too, if sardonic and merciless in his picturing of the bourgeois, fat-witted Sancho.

Here is indeed a rare pair, limned by the instruments as distinctly as if they were together on the stage. These solo instruments, these characters, as it were, were taken by Mr. Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, as Don Quixote; by Georges Fourel, violinist, as Sancho Panza, in which connection the tenor tuba also deserves special mention, for Sancho is at times sounds like a viola, at other times like a tenor tuba and even a bass clarinet!

Mr. Bedetti's Virtuosity

Of all the performances of the 'cello part given in Boston Mr. Bedetti's seemed to us the most eloquent. He had noble music of laughter, and gentleness, and tears. It will be long before his interpretation of the final pages of the composition, in which Don Quixote, in all humbleness and prayer, gives up the ghost, will be forgotten. Mr. Fourel, too, gave an excellent performance. The orchestra distinguished itself.

The other compositions were the good natured symphony of Haydn in D major, briskly played; excerpts—the "Entracte," "Ranz des Vaches," and "Invocation"—from the charming but rather weak music which Schumann wrote for Byron's "Manfred"—music which is Schumann, and not Byron at all, and in honor of the season, the wonderful music of the "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal." This was one of Mr. Monteux's most notable concerts.

APR. 15

Strauss and the Spanish Don at at Boston Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was:

Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 2) .... Haydn
Three movements from the music to Byron's "Manfred"........Schumann
"Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner
"Don Quixote"........................Strauss

It is too late in the day to discourse of the genius of Richard Strauss. That has long since been admitted by all, although some still make the admission with reservations. Yet the impression created by yesterday's performance of his "Don Quixote" was none the less novel and vivid than on its first hearing many years ago. It is possible that its long absence from Boston programs may have served to heighten its effect at this time, but none the less it is a work which grows with the years and which will reveal more and more of its beauty as time goes on. Taken by themselves, many portions of the composition are no doubt harsh and strident, but in their proper setting they are seen to be necessary to the effect of the work as a whole, and in a composition planned on so large a scale the passages of mere filling in are few and far between. No composer of modern times, save Strauss, could have successfully indulged in such flights of fancy, such bold and daring realism and only the imaginative power and orchestral skill of a Berlioz could have equaled him among those of the past in the musical portrayal of such a fantastic hero as the Spanish Don.

Each and every variation is a marvel of the just expression of the underlying poetic idea, yet the music never descends to mere caricature but

---

ways symp nd in the conc f real pathos. M ork with true
haracter. To som
markable that a French ret a distinctively G o complete a compreh spirit. To others who ha his career since he became of this orchestra it is on added proof of his interpret bilities in the music of Mr. Bedetti played the solo part with his accustomed one and felicity of expres playing of Mr. Fourel, the
was no less excellent.
Schumann's music to "M
one of his greatest works.
to be regretted that the ments played yesterday we
most interesting ones.
played the all too short so English horn with fine phrasing. Placed somewha behind the scenes, his ec could scarcely have been those sitting in the rear o
The D major symphony o
one of his most perfect wo form. Too often he is r by his lighter, gayer, more positions. In this symphony
we find him in more seri
The introduction sounds a so rare with him, and the orche
fuller and more varied th
After all our modern improv
orchestration, in form, in
there is still much to be lea
this master, apparently sim music seems. Even Mozart
phonic works scarcely equ
and Beethoven, great as was inality of his genius, owes
this teacher and friend of
Wagner, for once, seemed ou
His "Good Friday Spell" is
his greatest inspirations, an
of the scenes with which it ated in the opera, it often sou
atrical and forced.

MONITOR-APR

OLD AND MODERN SYMPHONY PROG

Orchestra Proves Equ at Home in Each

Yesterday's Symphony concert
with a lively, well-balanced pe
ance of Haydn's D major Sym
and ended with Strauss' "Don
ote," eloquently played, provin
present orchestra equally at ho
old and modern music, despite
doubts lately expressed on the su
In between came curiously fragme
excerpts from Schumann's incid
music to Byron's "Manfred," an honor of the day, the "Good F Spell" from Act 3 of Wagner's "
fal."

There was no formal soloist, bu
Speyer in the "Ran des Vaches"
"Manfred," and Messrs. Bedetti
Fourel in "Don Quixote" were de
edly named in the program for important incidental solos. Their
ing was far more musicianly than
of some of the official "soloists"
been.

"Don Quixote," never popular
as some of its companion pieces
become, was coldly received, excep
a few hundred enthusiasts, alth
the orchestra has seldom of late done better work. The variations
not easily followed or referred bac
the theme, and much of the
seems rather dull except as a d
and slavish following of Cerva
story, which Strauss claims it is Yet there are many beautiful pass
scattered through it, warmly, lyri
emotional in the vein of the compo
best songs.

Mr Monteaux has reversed Dr Mu
custom of never giving excerpts f
pieces not composed for concert
formance, in the main wisely. But so
times the excerpts are not comp
in themselves, like tantalizing snat
of tunes which one never hears finis
The "Good Friday Spell" yesterda
quite capable of standing alone,
not even the prop of Byron's
quoted at length in the programs sa
the "Manfred" snatches from seem pointless.

Haydn's D Major Symphony,
twelfth of those composed for English impresario Salomon, is a v favorable specimen of his music, fo
right, squaretoed, with its skele structure painfully emphasized to
ears unused to the sonata form,
full of homely energy and good spir
with an occasional bit of serious, nified eloquence added. It was be accurately and sympathetically playe

-Next week a new Symphony in major, by F. S. Converse, of Bost
will be given its first public perfor
ance. The rest of the program is ma
up of excerpts from Wagner operas.

GLOBE APR 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

STRAUSS'S "DON QUIXOTE" AFT PRELUDINGS

A Tone-Poem That Remains Masterp
of Large Design and Unflagging
complishment, That Ranges from G tesquerie to Pity and Ecstasy, That Tragi-Comedy Summed and Vivid
Tones—Haydn, Wagner, Mr. S and Spring

IT may be, as some like to [illegible]

high merit and interest. Two of the three, it is pleasant to note, came from the orchestra itself.

In nearly every particular the concert of last evening corresponded with the predecessors. It began with the sumptuous and sensuous measures of Goldmark's Overture to the ancient Hindu play, "Sakuntala," or rather his tone-poem of that legend, now languorous and longing, again passionate and tumultuous, thick-textured as drugs of the Orient, yet sharp at need with Orient bite and tang—music, moreover, that fifty years have hardly anywhere worn bare. It continued with Strauss's tone-picturing of the prankscome "Eulenspiegel," the masterpiece in our time of characterization in and by music—savored, as repetition more and more discloses, with Strauss as half-amused, half-pitying and wholly artful narrator. There is inventive genius in that teetering, cheeping motiv wherein Till lives, moves and has his tonal being. With equal fertility of imagination and certainty of means Strauss makes it as many sided as his buffoon. If Till teeters and leers, yet also does he swell and swagger. If he pipes, none the less loudly does he riot in boastful prides. Akin are the successive pranks—market-place, academy, courtroom. The music pictures and points, grins and chortles—yet remains music; while over all, especially in prologue and epilogue, the composer cocks an ironic eye. The more the pity that here and there in the piece Mr. Monteux laid on with over-weight of tone and so, as it were, "gummed" more than one fine, sharp line. Minded also to large sweep of impetuous tone was the conductor through much of Saint-Saëns "organ" Symphony. Sonorous indeed were the beginning and the end and thrilled accordingly was the audience over this pseudo-Lisztian grandiloquence. Better lasts into these days the fine mapping of the slow movement. Softly of tone and of mood Saint-Saëns etches it and never once scratches.

For soloist's interlude Mr. Burgin played Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin. To the ear, the restless, laboring concert-master was as one who strove with his music, his instrument, himself. Poise, repose, the Kreislerian illusion that all is effortless, Mr. Burgin, in solo-pieces, has not yet conquered. Yet to the ear, he made Mendelssohn's music sound as with divining sense of the fineness of texture, the gentleness of curve and undulation, the grace of phrase, modulation, transition, the niceties of emphasis and euphony which in these days are the life of a slender, fading piece. Not once did Mr. Burgin strain so much as a measure of this placid, playful, rippling music, even though over a whole division of it the composer wrote "Allegro Appassionato." And as soft, finespun, luminous and resilient was the violinist's tone. Sensitive of musical mind is Mr. Burgin, hearing a composer's true voice. With imagination, though the composer be as ancient and mannered as Mendelssohn in this concerto, he persuades that voice to sound anew.

H. T. P.

TRANS. APR 11

LAST EXTRA CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Richard Burgin's Playing Features Brilliant Performance

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fifth of the extra series of Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was very attractive: Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, played by Mr. Burgin, concert-master; Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, with organ. Albert Snow was organist.

MR. BURGIN RECALLED

Goldmark's overtures may have some conventional padding, but once the luscious melody of Sakuntala is heard in the clarinet, and the strings take up the dreamy counter-theme, and the composer draws upon his orchestral palette of purple and gold—the spell is cast, the hearer listens entranced.

Mr. Bergin played Mendelssohn's concerto with the certainty, the sanity, the sure grip of his technic and his composition, and the youthful enthusiasm which will probably always characterize his playing. There are virtuosi who play like old men at the age of 20, and there are elderly men, like the soloist Siloti who played at the subscription concerts of last year, who will play to their dying day like young geniuses. The brilliancy and the sincerity of feeling, the contempt of any theatrical tricks to catch applause, and this same contagious enthusiasm which always characterize Mr. Burgin as an artist—conduced to a most effective and artistic performance of the famous concerto. The soloist was repeatedly recalled.

Then Mr. Monteux gave an extremely brilliant and imaginative reading of what will probably emerge from the crucible of time as Strauss' greatest work, as perhaps his one immortal work. In "Till Eulenspiegel" you have [illegible] creative musician, full of audacity and inspiration, his art founded deeply and unshakably on the folklore and the folk-spirit of his race.

Again there was admiration of the architectural breath and nobility of the structure of Saint-Saens' symphony, of his prophetic treatment of certain orchestral instrument, and his modern interpretation of the old classic form. Mr. Snow's performance added to the significance of the composition.

POST-APR.11

BURGIN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mendelssohn Concerto Is Played With Skill and Taste

The extra series of five Monday evening Symphony concerts ended last night with a program which seemed to please the usual capacity audience. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Mendelssohn's violin concerto with a skill and taste which won him many recalls. This concerto seems rather dull and faded music nowadays, no matter who the violinist may be, but Mr Burgin made the most of the opportunities it offers for nuances of phrasing and dynamics, not to mention the feats of merely technical skill. When at his best, as he was last night, he is an admirable solo performer as well as an exceptionally capable orchestral player.

Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony, with Albert Snow playing the organ part, was the chief item on the program. Mr Monteux gave it a reading more eloquent than polished. This symphony has never seemed spontaneous, original or profound music, but it has what might be called the qualities of its defects, good taste, a superficially skillful thematic structure, a clever use of the orchestra with piano and organ added. The adagio alone seems really moving, the rest is concocted by freshening time-worn musical devices.

A brilliant performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" greatly pleased the musical modernists present, though one apparently old-fashioned and unpracticed listener was heard calling it "an epileptic fit set to music." It is really much simpler and more genuinely melodious than it sounds at a first hearing.

The opening number was Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, in which Mr Monteux brought out the warm romanticism of the music effectively. It wears rather better than the composer's other orchestral works.

These concerts at popular prices were offered by the trustees of the orchestra in the hope of attracting people not subscribers to the regular series. Three out of the five have been given to capacity audiences, which have been pleased without any concessions to what is commonly miscalled popular taste. Programs and almost always performances have been of the same high level set by the Friday and Saturday Boston Symphony concerts. All concerned ought to be gratified at the success of what in most cities could not be achieved.

Five extra concerts will be offered next season, on Monday evenings. Although this year's subscribers have until Nov 1 to reengage their seats applications from others will be placed on a waiting list in order of receipt.

APR.11 GLOBE

FINAL CONCERT OF MONDAY SYMPHONIES

Large Audience Enjoys Good Program With Burgin as Soloist

Symphony Hall was filled last night for the last concert of the Monday night series of five. Mr. Monteux conducted and Richard Burgin, concert master, was soloist.

The program was as follows: Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto in E minor for violin, Mendelssohn; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; symphony in C minor with organ, Saint-Saens. The program as a whole rather lacked variety except for the Strauss number, which was delightful and very unusually well given.

Mr. Burgin acquitted himself well and was recalled four or five times. He played with the background of the orchestra much better than he has on the occasions of his work in connection with the quartet bearing his name.

The other feature of interest was the symphony with organ. Albert Snow was at the organ and his work added very decidedly to the success of that number. Mr. Snow is a musician of the highest rank and he made the work of Saint-Saens far more interesting than it might have easily been with an organist of lesser note.

There have been other concerts of the series wherein the program as a whole was more interesting. However, the large audience liked it all immensely.

AMER-APR-11.

SYMPHONY CLOSES 'POPULAR' SERIES

Last Monday Concert Pleases Music Lovers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave in Symphony Hall last evening the fifth and last concert in the Monday evening series begun in November. Well-intentioned, to give lovers of music of substance an opportunity quite apart from the regular Symphony season to hear this famous band in carefully arranged programs; well attended, from first to last, by just that strata to which Mr. Monteux and his advisers made appeal—the experiment has proved very successful. It should become a fixed feature in years to come.

